14. These were all gentlemen who had had special experience or great experience in this particular subject?—Yes, great.

15. Did they report?—We reported on the 30th September 1889, and the modification of the existing Regulations which we suggested are shown in the second column on pages 7 to 17, Parliamentary Paper, C. 6869. We issued our report. It is very short, and perhaps I may be permitted to read it, because I wish to show the Committee that we objected entirely to alterations in principle; we thought it best to adhere to the principle of the existing rules, so far as we possibly could. "We have to state that in compliance with the request of Sir M. Hicks-Beach,"——

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

Chairman.

17. Is that report published and printed?—Yes. You will find it, sir, on page 58 of Blue Book, [C. 6132], the one that has already been handed in. Now, it will be seen on referring to that Paper, that we recommended one new fog signal, one of two long blasts to be sounded by a steamship not at anchor but stopped and having no way upon her; and we defined the long blast for a steamship under way, putting the blast as one of about four seconds. That was a signal that we, or rather, that the Board of Trade, had been pressed to give. The necessity of such a signal had been frequently pointed out by sailors, and it was upon those representations, and upon the knowledge and experience of those of my colleagues, who, I think, all save myself, had great nautical experience, that we decided to propose that; and we did propose it. But, although that was the only one we proposed, we did not shut the door to any others, as will be seen by the report. It will be seen that we kept our minds open, or rather the delegates who go to Washington do, to consider each proposal as it is made; but I think I may say this now, that one and all of the fog signals that have been approved of by the conference, and by the committees that have sat since, each one of those signals has been proposed and asked for by sailors of great experience; not one has been proposed by what are called "officials"; they have been proposed by sailors. They have been considered (as I shall be able to point out presently) by committees consisting of sailors of the greatest experience, and each signal, and each proposed signal, has been threshed out at very great length and with very great care, at Washington, and subsequently. I, of course, do not propose to-day (subject to what you wish) to call your attention to the discussions that arose upon each signal; but if I am permitted to do so, I shall be able to give the Members of the Committee some of the references where the more salient points are discussed on each of those signals that have been carried, from which Members of the Committee will be able to see that none of them have been adopted lightly, but only after the most careful consideration.

18. When

Chairman—continued.

18. When we come to the signals I will ask you to name the gentlemen who proposed the signals in order to impart that information to the Committee?—Very well.

19. The conference, I believe, met at Washington in October 1889?—Yes.

21. Besides that, there were 42 other delegates, were there not?—Yes; there were 42 delegates. The United States in its wisdom thought fit to invite all (what was called) "The Maritime Powers." The consequence was that invitations were sent to every power that apparently owned a mile of sea-board. The result was that undoubtedly the conference was very unwieldy owing to its size. It required, therefore, all the more care in going through matters practically to get a unanimous assent to the propositions that were adopted.

22. The Great Powers were all represented, were they not?—The Great Powers were all represented; and I should like to be allowed to call the attention of the Committee to the names of the delegates which appear at pages 5 and 6 of the first volume of the Washington Protocols; that is C. 6133. I think copies of that are laid before Members of the Committee. Now, on reference to that, it will be seen that the greater Powers sent a considerable number of delegates, and on a mere cursory inspection of their names it will be seen that they include a number of sailors, certainly of very high position in their respective navies; but, in addition to that, there were a considerable number of gentlemen who had had great experience in the mercantile marine, and upon matters such as these, of course, their opinion was most valuable. If they are not well known in this country, when attention is directed to the fact, it is clear that even the description of the position they held in their respective countries is some guarantee that they were gentlemen qualified and competent to discuss these matters. And I think I may safely say this, after having been at Washington three months engaged in discussing this question: that the foreign delegates who attended and took part in the discussions showed very great ability and very great knowledge of the matters that were being discussed before them.

23. Practical knowledge?—Practical knowledge; and especially on questions such as the question which is before this Committee, the question of sound signals. The questions discussed were sailors' questions, and the discussion that took place was, almost entirely, on the part of sailors.

24. Have you told us, or do you tell us, that committees had to be appointed by reason of the size of the conference?—Yes; it was really so unwieldy that we found it especially desirable to appoint committees to deal with the questions of sound signals and other matters; for example, lights. One of the difficulties that we had to face in going out there, as we knew from experience here in England (because, as a matter of fact, every proposal, almost every invention, connected with nautical matters, is submitted to this country) was, that we should have to face numberless proposals; proposals in regard to lights, proposals in regard to sound signals, and so on; we therefore thought it necessary to appoint committees to deal with what was called "the literature" on the subjects, that is, to read the various proposals, patents, and specifications, and then to deal with them substantially afterwards.

25. What was the committee on sound signals?—The committee on sound signals consisted of the following gentlemen: Admiral de Spaun, representing Austria; Mr. Schneider, representing Denmark; Vice Admiral Sir G. Nares, representing Great Britain; Captain Settembrini, representing Italy; Captain Van Steyn, representing the Netherlands; Captain Salvesen, representing Norway (a gentleman who had had very great experience afloat); and Captain Shackford (who was a retired master mariner), representing the United States. Six of those seven it will be seen were sailors; I believe, but I cannot say accurately from my recollection, that Mr. Schneider had also had great experience at sea; I am not certain as to that.

26. Did they report in the first instance?—They reported, and they concurred in the opinion which had been expressed in this country against course-indicating sound signals for fog, and they advised the retention of the existing helm signals for vessels in sight of one another. (You will find this on pages 136 and 137 of [C. 6132].) This is a lengthened and very careful report, as will be seen by reference to it, of the committee on sound signals; and in dealing especially with the questions now before this Committee, they recommended that, "as a vessel at anchor in a fog, etc., in a fair way at sea, is in a more dangerous position than if under way and sounding the authorised fog horn, such a vessel should be compelled to use a more efficient sound signal than the bell at present authorised." They also reported as to tugs, that, "As in a fog, etc., a tug towing another vessel forms an exceptional danger, we would suggest that the tug, and the one or more vessels towed, should be compelled to sound a special fog signal." Then, as to a vessel not under command, they say, "We would suggest that a vessel 'not under command' should be compelled to sound a special fog signal. Further, although disapproving of the course-indicating sound signals, they recommended the conference "to consider the desirability of introducing a few urgent and important sound signals, particularly one to denote that, when two neighbouring ships are stopped in a thick fog, one vessel making the signal will remain stopped, while the other is carefully feeling her way past her." It will be found that those are the four fog signals which have been added by the conference at Washington, and which we have practically approved of, with some slight modifications. There is another one, which has been added, as to a vessel not under command, and another as to a telegraph ship laying cable. Those are the only additions that have been made.

27. Do you mean those are the only additions which have been made to the recommendations of this committee at Washington?—Yes; and these recommendations of the committee, plus the telegraph ship and the vessel not under command, are the only new fog signals which are proposed.

Admiral Field.

28. There are four, you say; will you give us the letters as they stand here?—I can do it in one moment. Members will find a most useful volume in referring to most of these matters in the index to the Protocols, because it gives the regulations now in force and the regulations proposed at Washington side by side; I believe it has been supplied to all the Members of the Committee; [C. 6664], a Blue volume.

Chairman.

29. What page is that?—It is Appendix "A," page 47; it will be found invaluable in referring to the Protocols, because the index has been so carefully prepared that you can find every discussion raised upon every point, raised on any single one of the Articles. At the beginning of the index you will find, first of all, an alphabetical index. Then you will find under the heading "Articles" each article set out with the pages of every discussion that there was upon that article. For instance, turning to "fog signals," if you turn to Article 15, which you will find at page 17, you find from that a history of the whole of Article 15, every discussion that took place upon it; and it will be seen from that that the index to that article alone occupies three pages or more, showing the amount of discussion that took place. I will now answer Admiral Field's question. At page 53 of that index you will find the additions set out in italics. "D" is not an additional signal, it is merely a provision as to the time that the bell shall be rung for a vessel at anchor; but the new signals are "E," "F," "G," "H," "I" (those five), and "B"; "B" being the one that the committee that met before Washington proposed in this country. The ones proposed at Washington by the committee and subsequently adopted by the conference were "E," "F," and "G."). Then "H" and "I" were subsequently added by the conference, with the approval of the committee which again sat to discuss them. I may say that no fog signal was put to the conference until the committee had reported upon the desirability of having such a signal, and the course we took in order that there should be the greatest care in dealing with the matter was this: After the committee approved of having a signal, it being necessary to have a signal for such a state of affairs, that was then put to the conference for approval; if the conference approved of the desirability of having a signal for such a state of affairs, it was then reported back to the committee to find a signal which they thought was the best signal to be adopted. They having done, that signal again went before the conference, and if the conference approved of it as being the best signal that could be given, it then adopted it and passed it.

30. Will you let me ask you, in order to make this clear, as it seems to one: looking at page 53 of the Blue Book, is it not the case that "E," "F," "G," and "I" were all recommended by the committee?—Yes, that was so.

31. So that the only addition that was made by the conference at large was "H," which relates to a vessel employed in laying telegraph cable?—Yes; and I think you will find on reference to the Protocols that "H" was adopted unanimously as being an absolutely necessary signal; because a vessel laying cable goes at a very considerable speed; she is some considerable distance away, and therefore it is most desirable that sailors should know what she is doing.

32. Can you tell us now, as we are at this stage of the initial proposals of the committee which were brought before the conference, whether the committee were practically or absolutely unanimous in regard to these four recommendations?—I should like Sir George Nares, if he does come as a witness before this committee, I do not know whether he will, to answer that. He can do it better than I can, because he was a member of the committee and chairman of that committee. I do not think I am in a position to answer that; but on reference to the debates that took place in the conference upon their proposals, it will be seen if there was any divergence of opinion upon the committees; but I think it will be found that in the case of only one of these signals was there not a unanimous acceptance by the members of the committee and of the conference. There were a great many proposals which we dropped out and which were disagreed with, a great many; but the ones we have adopted were carried unanimously, with the exception of one, and I will point out which that was.

33. Very well; at this stage it stands thus:—that the committee recommended four fresh sound signals to the conference?—Yes.

34. Then when it came before the conference what happened?—When it came before the conference the conference resolved to reject all the course-indicating signals.

35. One honourable Member wishes me to ask this, if it does not interfere with your evidence. At page 52 of the same Blue Book there is "B"?—Yes.

37. We

37. We will ask you about that when we get to the conference; at present it does not seem quite clear whether "b" was before the Committee or not?—No, I do not think it is.

38. Now to go to the conference, if you please; the conference received the Report from this Committee?—Yes; that Report will be found on reference to the Protocols. That was debated several days most exhaustively, and the conference resolved on the 8th November (page 175 of C. 6113) that the "former Committee on Sound Signals should consider and report the specific cases in which new fog signals should be adopted, and report the specific signals in such cases." Then the Report made in consequence of that resolution of the Committee was adopted on the 21st November 1889.

40. That is five recommendations?—Yes. It will be seen that the second of those propositions was not approved of by the conference, but was struck out; the one as to the vessel going astern.

41. And the other four?—The other four were adopted.

42. And do they correspond?—They correspond with "b," with "e," with "f," and with "g."

43. That is to say, that of the six additions which were recommended in the final Act, four of them come from the recommendations of the second Committee, or of the Committee sitting for a second time?—Yes.

44. That is to say, "b," "e," "f," and "g"?—Yes. The questions of "h" and "i" had not come before the conference up to that time, practically.

45. You cannot tell us, I suppose, as regards the deliberations in the second Committee whether these recommendations on the second Report were unanimous; we must ask that of Sir George Nares, perhaps?—I cannot answer as to that.

46. Then will you proceed, if you please, as to what was done on that Report?—Then, when the question of sound signals came on for discussion at the conference, the conclusion of the Committee against the use of course-indicating signals in fog was unanimously agreed to, and course-indicating signals were all rejected; we threw them all out, we declined to have any at all; we would have no course-indicating signals at all. Even a proposal made by Captain Shackford (who was, as I have said, one of the United States delegates, and who was a master mariner of great experience) as to going east or west was rejected. He proposed to allow steamers in the North Atlantic service to give a distinctive signal to indicate whether they were going east or west; and the conference struck even that out. They were so convinced of the danger of allowing signals to be given indicating a course, for fear the vessel which heard the signal might act on the supposition that she was justified in proceeding, as she would think she knew what the other vessel was doing, that the conference struck even such a simple course-indicating signal as that out, and would allow no course-indicating signals at all. I may, perhaps, tell the Committee that amongst the proposals which we had to consider, and which we had had submitted to the Committee in this country before we went out there, was one for every vessel to be supplied with a high whistle and a low whistle; and there was to be a code with a distinctive signal for every point of the compass. That is the kind of proposal that was put before the conference.

Admiral Field.

47. By landsmen, I suppose?—I do not like to say; it was proposed by some ingenious patentee, I think.

Chairman.

48. Dealing with the fog signals that were recommended by the Committee in their Second Report, what course did the conference take about that?—The conference adopted them with one or two alterations; they adopted them in principle. No modification in principle was made in the three existing fog signals (that is the first thing the conference started with; that the existing signals for merchant shipping were not to be interfered with at all, so far as possible), the prolonged blast on the whistle for a steamer under way, the blast or blasts on the fog-horn for a sailing ship under way, and the bell for any vessel at anchor; the conference did not interfere with the principle of these.

49. That is, the three old signals?—Yes; but what we did, and what our object at the conference was (and not only so with this rule, but with all the rules), was to try if we could, where we found signals were not sufficiently definite or precise, to improve the regulations by making them more precise and more definite; and, therefore, even with regard to these three rules, we specified, so far as we could, the length of the long blast on the whistle, and of the signal made by the bell. It was found in experience that sailors sometimes gave the bell a shake, and thought that sufficient; and the same way with regard to a blast. What the conference thought was, that if the vessel was under way she ought to give a good long blast. There were various practical reasons for that, and also with regard to the bell; the bell must not be merely swung once, but rung for four or five seconds. Then the new signals adopted were six in number, namely, two prolonged blasts on the whistle for a steamer stopped and having no way upon her (that is "b"); then "e," two prolonged blasts on the whistle or fog-horn, followed by ringing the bell for a vessel at anchor at sea when not in ordinary anchorage ground, and when in such a position as to be an obstruction to vessels under way; "f," three blasts in succession, viz., long long, short, short for a vessel towing or being towed; ("g") three blasts in succession, viz., short, long, short, for a vessel wishing to indicate to another, "The way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me" (that is an optional signal, it will be observed); and the three prolonged blasts ("h") for the telegraph cable ship; and the four short blasts ("i") for a vessel not under command.

50. So that it came to this, did not it, to get it summarily, that they adopted in substance the four new signals proposed by the Committee on their second report?—Yes.

51. And added two fresh signals?—Yes, but I should add this, that they only added those two fresh signals after the Committee's opinion had been taken upon them, and they had reported in favour of them, and that Committee had selected the kind of signal that it was necessary to give. That was done after great deliberation. Now a reference to the Protocols will show that each of these new signals was proposed by sailors. There was only one signal (the one for ships at anchor in a fairway at sea) which was not adopted by the conference practically unanimously. With reference to the one as to the ships at anchor in a fairway at sea, there were some slight disputes; but the others were adopted practically unanimously; and it may be convenient if I state (to save honourable Members the time and trouble of wading through the whole of the Protocols) that the more important pages of the discussion on these various signals are in the first volume, pages 46-47, where the matter is first of all discussed.

52. Which volume is that, 6,132?—No, 6,133, the large volume, at the bottom of page 46, where, on behalf of this country, I handed in a paper with regard to course-indicating signals. We then have the discussion upon that. Then with regard to these various new signals (Volume I., page 165), you will there find the discussion as to the proposal ("b"), in which I point out that there is "practical unanimity as to the desirability of having some such signal as" that, and that is accepted, as will be seen, by the speakers, and that was carried unanimously. Then as regards ("e"), that will be found commencing at page 21 of the second volume of the Protocols, C. 6,255. Then in Article ("f") (Volume I. of the Protocols), page 166 and following pages, specially pages 173, 174, and following pages, will be found to deal with that. Then with regard to ("g"), the second volume of Protocols (62, 55,) pages 62 to 70; ("h") the same volume, pages 74 to 77; and ("i") the same volume, page 81. I perhaps ought to add that although I have given those as the pages which contain most of the salient discussions, a reference to the index will show that there were very many other pages of discussion which I have not referred to.

53. You tell us that at the conference the only one fog-signal which was not adopted with practical unanimity was that for ships at anchor in a fairway at sea?—Yes.

54. Am I right in thinking that that is the only one which was recommended by the British Committee before you went to Washington at all; or is it a different one?—That is a different one. The one that the British Committee proposed was the one for a vessel stopped, with no way upon her.

55. Not at anchor at all?—No; the vessel at anchor in a fairway was considered to be specially dangerous, because an approaching vessel would be keeping on, even in a fog, with some speed, not expecting to find her course blocked.

57. Then so far as sound signals are concerned there was the Final Act of the Washington Conference at the end of 1889?—Yes, I should say this, that we had, as it were, a sort of "third reading" of the whole of the rules. They were referred to what was called the "Collocation Committee" to draw them up shipshape, and to make the wording harmonise with all the other rules; so that there was again a discussion upon each of those rules before they were finally adopted by the conference.

58. Then they were embodied in the Final Act?—In the Final Act, yes. That is published as a Parliamentary Paper, C. 6050. That was published as long ago as 1890 (in August). Then the correspondence, including the Reports of the various Committees (C. 6132, which you have before you), was published in October 1890; the first volume of the text of the proceedings (what I have called the first volume of the Protocols), in August 1890; and the second in March 1891.

59. So that the actual recommendations were made known in this country in August 1890, and all the papers relating to the conference were published by March 1891?—That is so.

60. Now I understand that the invitation from the American Government was accepted by Her Majesty's Government only on the terms that the conclusions were to be ad referendum?—Yes.

61. And when the recommendations were received from the Washington Conference was a Committee appointed in July 1890 to consider them in this country?—Yes.

62. And you were yourself, again, Chairman?—Yes, I was.

63. Who were your coadjutors?—Rear Admiral Bowden Smith, Rear Admiral Sir R. H. More Molyneux, and Captain Wharton, again represented the Admiralty, as they had done on the pre-Washington Committee; Sir Henry Calcraft, Sir Digby Murray, and Sir George Nares, again represented the Board of Trade; Captain C. G. Weller represented the Trinity House; and Mr. (now Sir Thomas) Sutherland, the Chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and Mr. Watson, of the City

Chairman—continued.

City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, represented the shipowners.

64. Did you report?—We reported in January 1891. We went through, of course, the whole of the proposals. We recommended only five alterations altogether.

65. Where shall we find this?—You will find this in the report of that Committee, C. 6293, page 5.

66. Will you give us the substance of what you think is material, the pith of this report?—Yes. We said: "In dealing with the subject referred to us, we have felt the necessity of giving due weight to the consideration that the decisions of the Washington Conference were arrived at after much deliberation, and that any subsequent alterations suggested by one of the parties to that conference might delay or perhaps even imperil the adoption of a universal system of regulations for preventing collisions at sea. We have, therefore, limited our suggestions to alterations which we regard as essential, and likely to be assented to by the Maritime Powers which took part in the conference." Perhaps I may point out, what I have already referred to, that the fact of there being no less than 28 Powers who had to be communicated with upon, even a proposed verbal alteration, or the supplying of a single word that had been omitted at Washington, involved correspondence with 28 foreign Powers. The Committee will see what the result of even such a proposal as this was; it brought down upon this country a shower of counter proposals and amendments at once. "It will be seen that the only articles in which we propose to make any changes are numbers 2, 7, 15, 21, 31, Article 2. The alteration in (e) is merely verbal, and is intended to make the meaning of this rule perfectly clear." In Article 7 the words we introduced were simply required to supply a casus omissus. Then there was a paragraph with regard to the case of rowing boats, and the alteration (Article 15) which is the one now before this Committee, was this: We proposed to omit "(i)," the Washington proposal, with regard to vessels "not under command," and we proposed to include vessels provided for in "(i)" as vessels not under command in "(b)," that is the two long blasts for a vessel at sea stopped, and with no way upon her; and we give our reason. "By the omission of '(i)' and the inclusion of vessels 'not under command' in '(b),' all the sound signals that are practically necessary at sea are provided for, and the number of such signals, and consequent liability to confusion, are reduced. Moreover, '(i),' as it stood, by providing a signal to indicate that a vessel is unable to manœuvre as required by the rules (for which the 'not under command' signal is practically sufficient) appeared to us to be too wide, as it might tempt vessels to sound such a signal when entitled to do so, and to disclaim further responsibility in case of collision." It will be seen that the Committee were unanimous in that report.

67. That is the post Washington Committee?—The first post Washington Committee was unanimous in adopting the signals that we proposed at Washington, with the exception that they proposed to do away with "(i)," and to merge the vessels that were to be affected by "(i)" in "(b)."

Chairman—continued.

68. Was that the only alteration proposed or recommended by the post Washington Committee, so far as sound signals were concerned?—Yes, the only one.

69. That, were it adopted, would reduce from six to five the additional sound signals?—Yes. I may say this: We adopted the opinion (which I believe is the opinion of every sailor) that the fewer the sound signals you have the better; but if a case was made out where signals were really wanted, then we did our best to try and provide the signals where we could; and as we found that by including vessels "not under command," in "(b)" we could do away with one distinct special signal, we thought it best to try and do so.

70. I shall ask you about that. As far as fog signals were concerned was the post Washington Committee unanimous?—Unanimous.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

71. In Article 15, which you have just read, is there any misprint in the last line, "to sound such a signal when entitled to do so;" is there any word left out. It "appeared to us to be too wide"?—Yes; it "appeared to us to be too wide, as it might tempt vessels to sound such a signal when entitled to do so, and to disclaim further responsibility in case of collision." What I think we meant by that was this: We did not want to open the door to a man, if it was not convenient to him to follow the ordinary rules to give a four-blast signal, to say, "I am not under command;" we thought it undesirable to open the door to that. That was one of our objects in trying to do away with "(i)"; it was only a reason for doing so. Our principal reason, as will be seen here, was to reduce the number of the signals; but an additional reason was that we thought it might lead a man to say: "I will give the four-blast signal, then they will have to get out of my way; I am not under command."

Admiral Field.

72. Did not you insert the words "not under command" in some other letter?—We proposed to, but directly we proposed this we were met by such a deluge of counter proposals that we gave way and adhered to "(i)" as originally passed; and we give our reasons for doing so. Although we should have preferred to strike out "(i)" we did not think it of sufficient importance to imperil the passing of the rules; and practically, I think, it is conceded now that a great many of the proposals made at Washington are improvements in the rules.

Chairman.

73. Your report then was presented to Parliament, and was published and was sent to foreign and colonial Governments for their criticism?—Yes, that is C. 6293.

74. After that were replies received from these various Governments?—Yes.

 75. I do

Chairman—continued.

75. I do not know whether they have been printed?—They are set out at length at page 43 of C. 6869. The replies that were received from the foreign powers really came to this: With the exception of the verbal amendment in "e" and the casus omissus, they objected to the amendments we proposed. There were only three, one of them being the fog signals.

76. As to fog signals?—Yes; they objected to our striking out "(i)" in the fog signals. The United States especially rejected the proposal to cut out "(i)." As I say, the almost natural consequence (which we foresaw) of sending out that report was, that there was a whole crop of proposed alterations made by one foreign power after another; so we were appointed to report again, and to consider the proposed amendments from the various foreign powers. We therefore reported again (C. 6833) on the 22nd June 1892.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.

78. Perhaps you would give the date of that second report?—The date of the second is the 22nd June 1892. It is what is called the "further report of the committee" that was appointed in 1890. We made one report, and proposed these alterations; then the replies of the foreign powers were sent to this country, and then we met again to consider them. I will read what appears to me to be the only part that is material: "We have had under consideration the observations of the foreign and colonial Governments who have sent replies up to this date, and also of certain shipowners' societies in this country, upon the recommendations made by us in January 1891, in regard to the proposed International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea." "We much regret that only two of the five amendments which we suggested in our first report, viz., those in Article 7 and 31, have met with general acceptance, and we are still of opinion that they" (the proposals we made, that is) "are all improvements upon the rules adopted at the Washington Conference; but having regard to the fact that numerous amendments have been proposed by other powers, parties to the conference, and the indefinite delay which would be caused by an attempt either to press our amendments or to come to a final conclusion upon those proposed by the other powers, we think it best to recommend a course which, so far as this country is concerned, will put an end to the interminable discussion which would otherwise arise, and which would still further increase the difficulties in the way of international agreement on the subject. For the same reason we do not recommend the adoption of the suggestion made by the Italian Government for another international conference to consider all such amendments." So that the Committee will see what the first crop of amendments produced—another proposal for another conference. "We are of opinion that the most satisfactory course will be for Her Majesty's Government to adopt the regulations as passed at Washington, Article 9 excepted, with the addition to Article 7 and the alteration in Article 31, which we recommended in our first report, these two amendments having been assented to by all the powers from whom replies have been received, and with the addition of the note to Article 21 recommended hereafter." Now comes the material paragraph, with regard to sound signals: "In the hope that the regulations in this form may be accepted by all the powers, we are willing to withdraw the suggested alterations in Articles 2, 15, and 21" (15 being the one now under consideration), "but we retain the opinion that the multiplication of sound signals in Article 15 may possibly result in confusion, and we recommend in lieu of the proposed amendments," and so on; that deals with another matter. So that there, although we still thought it desirable to reduce the number of sound signals if we could in fog, we found that even our moderate proposal, to eliminate "(i)," which was our only proposal, would have the effect of tying up the whole of the conclusions of the conference indefinitely, and make it impossible to come to an international agreement, and we gave way, and gave way (as will be seen by the report) unwillingly. But although we thought the multiplication of sound signals might cause confusion, we never said that we thought it might create danger; and there is a great distinction, as will be seen by the Committee, between those two matters. Confusion may arise; but if confusion may arise, it will put seamen more on their guard if they do hear signals in a fog. If they do not understand what they are, it will make them all the more cautious in proceeding until they have made out what they are. The signals will at all events warn the mariner that there is a vessel near him in a fog, and it will make him all the more prudent and cautious if he is not quite certain what that vessel is doing.

Chairman.

79. Your proposal had only been to omit one of them and to merge it in "(b)"?—Only to omit "(i)", a vessel "not under command," and to merge it in "(b)."

80. Were you called again together in 1893?—We were called again together in 1893, and we found that our expectation had been realised, that by our giving way and not insisting upon our amendments the other powers gave way and withdrew their amendments, and there was international agreement arrived at with all the powers; but we only gave up the proposal to strike out "(i)," as regards fog signals.

81. So far as fog signals were concerned, all the

the Powers accepted the final Act of the Washington Conference?—Yes.

82. I think there were changes in the Committee which we may as well get; was it in 1893 that Sir Courtenay Boyle took the place of Sir Henry Calcraft?—Yes. Perhaps I ought to say that at that date when we were called together every foreign Power had not sent in its reply, but it was generally accepted by every foreign Power, although the formal acceptance had not been received. We were practically at one with all the leading foreign Powers at the time, but there were certain points which still require discussion, as you will see.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

83. Was that last Report unanimous?—Yes, that was unanimous as to fog signals.

84. There is a separate report by Mr. Watson, which says something at the end?—Yes; he did not dissent as to fog signals.

85. It was unanimous, was it, as to that matter?—Yes; each Committee has been unanimous as to fog signals throughout; there has not been a dissentient voice as to that.

Chairman.

86. You mean the British Committees?—The British Committees.

87. I may as well get the changes in the Committee; Sir Courtenay Boyle took the place of Sir Henry Calcraft?—Yes.

88. Captain Holland that of Admiral Bowden-Smith?—Yes.

89. And Captain Angove, the Marine Superintendent of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, took the place of Sir Thomas Sutherland; is that so?—Yes.

90. Now, you were going to tell us that you had been required by the Minute calling you together to consider letters which had been received from the Governments of certain foreign countries and from certain shipowners' societies?—Yes.

91. Do you wish to add anything with regard to the principal objections that were made by foreign countries to the proposed amendments?—Yes; the principal objections to the fog signals came from the Netherlands and from Germany.

92. May I ask, do you mean to your amendments or to the original fog signals?—To the Conference fog signals. Those objections of the Netherlands will be found in C. 6869, at page 85. It will be seen from that that the Netherlands objected because they said that the multiplicity of the signals adopted constituted a real danger, and that their application might produce deplorable confusion in much-frequented waters. And Germany desired the omission of three of the nine Washington signals "e," "g," and "i," on the ground apparently that they were not absolutely necessary, and on the ground that the Washington signals made demands on the memory which could not be responded to by the majority of seamen; but, as I have said, those were their initial objections, and they are objections which might very naturally be made on the face of them.

93. What page is that?—Pages 85 and 86 of C. 6869.

94. That is Germany?—Eighty-six is Germany; the Netherlands is 85 and Germany 86; but, then, when the regulations were thoroughly considered, and when they had time to think them over, those objections were waived, both by the Netherlands and by Germany.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

95. Waived?—They were waived; they further considered them, and they went through the process that some minds in this country have gone through, at first thinking changes and additions are dangerous, but when they are carefully thought out they appear in a different light. Certainly one eminent authority to whom I propose to refer in my evidence, after analysing them and considering them each one by one, came to the conclusion that although at first sight it appeared to be a somewhat startling thing to add five or six new sound signals in fog, yet when they are analysed and considered carefully, each on their merits, then they are not objectionable. But there was a matter which, if I may say so without offence to any foreign Power, the Committee considered almost with more care, and that was the representations from shipowners in this country. We felt that having regard to the fact that England owned practically 50 per cent. of the whole of the tonnage afloat in the world, the English voice in such a matter ought to be considered, and most carefully considered, upon every point; and so, when we found that objections were raised, we went into those objections and considered them very carefully. There were six shipowners' societies altogether, ranging from the year 1891 to the year 1893, making various objections to the proposed rules. I do not say this at all to find fault, but as an illustration of the attitude that is naturally taken up by sailors and those representing sailors. When a proposal is made to alter the rules, that proposal on the face of it meets with objection at once. Sailors say, "Oh, the old rule is good enough for us." I do not use the word in the political sense when I say that there is not a more conservative body of men than sailors. For instance, when you come to deal with the question of the rule of the road at sea, they hate a change, they dislike it, and their tendency, we know, is to object to change until they are satisfied that the proposed change is a desirable one. I cannot give you a better illustration of that than this: that one of these leading societies, a society representing thousands and thousands of shipowners, when they were first of all invited to give their criticisms upon the proposed changes that were made at Washington (which were very numerous and some of them very important, and which are, I think, admitted now by universal consent to be great improvements, especially in the matter of clearing up doubtful points), when they were sent to this society the answer that came back was, "We object to them all;" and it was only upon inviting them to give us really their objections, that their objections were narrowed down to two or three. I only give that as an illustration.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

We still thought that it was most desirable to give them every opportunity of laying their views before the Committee upon any points on which they objected to the rules; not merely the sound signals, but all of them; so the Committee asked them to send up two practical mariners, men of experience, who would lay their views before the Committee; they did so, and those men came and gave their evidence before us. Now, again, as an illustration only; I am not finding fault at all; I can quite understand the feeling, as an illustration of the natural, almost invincible, objection of sailors to changes in the rules; we found when they came to give evidence that very few of them had looked at the rules. We invited 12 altogether, and on the first day, out of eight who came before us to object most strongly to the proposals with regard to various matters, we found that only two of them had taken the trouble to look at the rules before they came into the room. The rules had been before the country for years, and there had been meetings held at Liverpool. We asked them to send up their experienced men to lay their views before us, and when they came, as I say, except the two, they had actually not seen the rules. I can quite understand their attitude. They heard that a lot of rules were going to be added, and so they came to object to them. There is a copy of that evidence here which will be handed to the Committee, if it wishes to have it, which will show that what these men objected to was, generally, the addition of sound signals; but certainly, with regard to one or two of the signals, like that of a vessel towing, or a vessel stopped in a fairway, some of them admitted that they were most salutary rules, and most desirable rules if they could be brought into operation. So that it is when you come to deal with each signal on its merits that there are so many matters to be considered. For instance, as regards that special signal for a vessel in a fairway, it is not likely to be used often, because a vessel does not often break down in a fairway at sea, and so on. It is only by an examination of the signals in that manner, I think, that you can arrive really at whether or not there is insecurity or danger in their being used. Now, those gentlemen came before us; they were men of great experience, men who laid their views before the Committee exceedingly ably, but some of them certainly went very much further than either the Washington Conference did or than our Committee did, because they proposed for use in fog the course-indicating signals, which are only allowed to be given by one vessel to another when they are in sight of one another. They said that it was the wish of their associations that those signals should be used in fog, a proposal which we certainly have always thought a very dangerous proposal; because if you once allow course-indicating signals (even those three) to be used in a fog, a man will say he hears a whistle, as he thinks, on the starboard bow; he will hear another vessel giving the "port helm" signal, as he thinks; he will only hear one whistle, perhaps, and he will say, "That vessel is on the port tack;" he will go on upon that assumption, and then he may find that, instead of being on the "port bow," that vessel is somewhere else, and he will steer right into that vessel, perhaps. I only give that as an illustration.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

Chairman.

96. In addition to those you have told us about, there were other signals discussed at the Washington Conference, were there not?—Yes; there are signals which the Committee will find are optional signals, No. 28. Those are signals which we considered before going to Washington. You will see that at present they are to be allowed to be used; they may indicate their course by the usual signals; one blast, "I am directing my course to the starboard;" two blasts, "I am directing my course to port;" and three blasts, "My engines are going full speed astern."

97. And that is when the vessels are in sight of one another?—Yes.

98. I do not wish to enter upon that; I do not think we are concerned much with it?—I am only giving this as an illustration: these gentlemen who objected, on the ground of danger, to the new signals, proposed in lieu of them the actual use of those course-indicating signals in fog. We certainly thought that would be much more dangerous than the very modified signals which the Conference proposed.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

99. May I just interpose one question; I think you have told us that the Washington Conference unanimously opposed that?—Yes, unanimously. We carried that, and that was the unanimous opinion almost, as far as we could gather, of our marine in this country before we went to Washington, because the Board of Trade issued, as I have pointed out, questions to which they had replies from all the great associations with regard to whether or not it was desirable that course-indicating signals in fog should be used; and the very large consensus of opinion was dead against anything of the kind being done. Perhaps I may before leaving that point cite also, as an illustration of the difficulty in persuading sailors that new rules may be or are an improvement, one more thing: those three signals are signals which in the River Thames are compulsory for vessels in sight of one another. When they were proposed there was a storm of opposition by the pilots in the River Thames, by mariners who navigated the River Thames; and it was argued that they would be very dangerous indeed. Well, they have been in use now a good many years, and every sailor now is very glad to have them; and sailors have applied to the Board of Trade to add to those signals. They are found to be of the greatest use. It is most important that a man when he sees a vessel approaching him should know what course that vessel is going to take, and that he should be informed by either the one or the two blasts, as the case may be. But, as I say, although when these signals were first of all proposed they were hotly opposed on the ground that they would lead to difficulty and danger, practice has shown how useful they are.

100. I should

Chairman.

100. I should like to ask you, if you please, to get it on the note, the nature of the representations made; shortly, I believe there were six representations made up to 1893, by shipowners' societies?—Yes.

101. Of which two only dealt with the question of fog signals?—Only two of them objected to the fog signals; that is so.

102. The Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association stated that they were very doubtful as to the proposed sound signals for fog?—Yes.

103. And the General Shipowners' Society protested strongly against them saying that they had taken the opinions of numerous ship masters and pilots on the subject?—Yes.

104. Can you summarise their reasons?—Well, their reasons were apparently (and I judge not only by communication with them but by the evidence of their representatives) that all sound signals are misleading in fog, and that the men to whom the making of the new signals would be entrusted could not acquire a practical knowledge of them in a lifetime. They further urged that the signals could not always be correctly made owing to the condensed steam in the whistle, or correctly heard in all states of the wind, and that this uncertainty would cause confusion. It will be seen on reference to the Protocols that all these points were most thoroughly threshed out. Every sailor knows that with the condensation in the steam whistle there is difficulty in getting the first blast, or getting it into such a blast as can be recognised as part of a signal; but that matter was all carefully thought out. The question of condensation in the steam whistle existed, and does exist with the existing signals, of course.

105. It was then, was it not, that your Committee invited all the bodies who had made criticisms upon any of the regulations to send men of nautical experience to explain their views?—Yes.

106. That was the time?—Yes.

107. Then they came from six associations?—Yes.

108. Nine witnesses came?—Yes.

109. And four of them came to object to the fog signals; is that so?—Yes.

110. Now can you summarise to us what the four, in effect, said, and tell us in a few words?—Yes. They objected to the new position-indicating signals as confusing; but they wished the old helm signals, as I have said, to be used in fog in their place; and one of the witnesses admitted in his evidence that it would be a good thing to have a special signal to show that a ship is stationary, as is provided in Article 13; and he also admitted that it would be a good thing to have a special signal for tugs, vessels towing.

111. You have copies of this evidence, I think?—Yes.

112. Can we have it before us?—Yes. With regard to the general objection to the signals, I may point out what has been proved before us. Of course, it is difficult for sailors to learn a lot of new signals, that everyone knows, but men do learn them; for instance, take New York Harbour, where I am told complicated signals are used, not only do they learn them, but as the Committee would suppose, our English mariners learn them too; and we have no reason to suppose that English sailors are not just as sharp as any other sailors in learning new rules. But there are many signals that men learn who have to learn them; take, for instance, the signals on the River Thames. Every big line of colliers almost, I believe, has its own distinctive signal; when she is coming up in foggy weather and is nearing wharves, she gives her signal.

113. Did you find the objections were directed against particular signals on the ground that they were not themselves separately valuable or generally directed against them all?—They were simply generally directed; there was no particular signal attacked at all. It is very simple to say you have added a lot of new signals which men cannot learn. There was no objection to any particular signal, as I have pointed out. It was admitted that some of the new signals were desirable to have.

114. You stated in one of your reports that confusion might arise?—Yes.

115. But you distinguished that from danger?—Yes, from danger.

116. Just explain, will you, what you meant; was that considered at Washington?—That was considered, and the conclusion that we came to then was that undoubtedly it would cause confusion if you were in crowded waters, where there were a great many vessels giving signals especially. It would create very considerable confusion, but not necessarily danger, because, as I have pointed out, if a man heard signals and did not know what they meant, he would be all the more careful; he would go slower. If he was in very crowded water, perhaps he might think it necessary to come to anchor; but it would be a caution to him. Even if he did not know what the signal meant, he would know that the vessel was there; and I think the general opinion was that—so far as it could be done without deafening the officer on the bridge, the more noise made the better in a fog—so that a man might have distinct warning of vessels in his vicinity.

117. Was it the prevailing, or general opinion at Washington that these fog signals would be intelligible in a fog?—Yes, it was; that sailors would get to learn them.

118. But that even if they were not intelligible they would not produce danger?—They would not produce danger.

119. That they would rather operate as a warning?—Yes.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

120. You are not alluding to course-indicators?—No; the proposed signals.

Chairman.

121. The proposed new signals are none of them course-indicating signals, are they?—No.

122. There are course indicating signals, I think, as to sailing ships in the existing rules?—Yes; the rule is that a steamer must give way to a sailing vessel, as she cannot alter her course as the steamer can. A steamer can go whichever way she likes, of course; but as a sailing vessel is on a particular tack it is desirable that she should give warning of what tack she is on. There was no objection to this at Washington. This was not included in course-indicating signals.

123. The new proposed signals are not in any way course-indicating signals, are they?—No. I am reminded that there is one which might by a stretch be called a course-indicating signal; that is, when both the vessels are brought up in a fog, and neither dare move, and then one man says, "I am a log on the water; you may feel your way past me." That is an optional signal, and it might perhaps be contended that that was a course-indicating signal; but that is not my idea of the meaning of the words "course-indicating."

124. That is when a vessel has no way upon her?—Yes.

The Marquess of Carmarthen.

127. You are aware that that is the principal objection amongst shipowners, where there are objections, that one point?—Yes; so I understand; and it was for that purpose more especially that we examined witnesses on the point. We were most anxious to hear all the reasons that they had to give for holding that position; but after having heard them we could not come to the conclusion (they did not satisfy us at all) that there would be danger. We were satisfied before they came that there might be confusion from these signals but not danger. And I may say this, that in drawing that report we were most careful to use the word "confusion" as distinguished from "danger."

Chairman.

128. In what circumstances did you apprehend that confusion might arise. It was when there were a large number of ships each sounding their appropriate signal, I suppose?—Yes. This is a case suggested as likely to occur very often in crowded waters: A man might have vessels all round him; one vessel might signal "I am towing;" another vessel might signal "my way is off," and so on; such occasions may arise, and we thought it very likely that a man might be very confused on hearing all these signals, but it does not necessarily cause danger; it would make him all the more prudent and cautious.

129. According to the existing rules, if a vessel were in a fog, with a large number of vessels round her, they would be sounding their foghorns or steam whistles, or indicating their presence in some way?—Yes.

130. Did you consider that the introduction of the new rules would aggravate the confusion necessarily consequent upon a situation like that?—It might, in this way; the signals would be made more complicated, but only to a very limited extent, because they ought to be using an ordinary fog-signal if they are under way, or even if they are at anchor. It would be confusing, because a man would have a difficulty in picking up the long blast and the short blast; for instance, he would not be quite certain, perhaps, where one signal stopped and the other began. We saw the weight of these objections, but those numerous signals did not, to our minds, constitute danger, we thought that (if possible), on the contrary, it would make a man all the more cautious, because he would not be quite certain what was going on, and therefore would have to navigate most cautiously and most slowly.

131. I think before preparing your final report you very carefully considered all these objections and you made a unanimous report on 8th December 1893?—Yes.

132. That is in C. 6869, page 141; will you just read what you think is important?—"We have considered the letters received by the Board of Trade from Foreign and Colonial Governments, and from certain British Shipowners' Societies in regard to the proposed alterations of the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, as recommended by the Washington Marine Conference, 1889, and as subsequently modified by the Committee appointed in July 1890, to consider the recommendations of that Conference. We have also heard representatives from the Shipowners' Societies on the various points raised by them, and we have especially considered the objections made to Articles 15, 21, and 28. We see no reason to recommend any alteration in the rules submitted by the late Committee in their Report, dated 22nd June 1892, and we entirely concur in that Report, which has received the general approval of the ForeignPowers;" and in that that Committee was unanimous.

133. Is it the case that since then more than a general approval has been obtained from foreign Powers?—I am told (but, of course, as to this I can only speak from hearsay) that the whole of the Foreign Powers adopted the rules as we proposed them. All the important maritime powers have now accepted the text, I believe, but but as to this I am only speaking from hearsay as to some. I believe the United States actually passed an Act for them to come into force.

134. In their waters?—In their waters.

135. Do you know if that Act applies to their waters or to their ships in all waters?—It would be their ships on the high seas. They adopted the Washington rules by Act of Congress in their own waters directly after the Conference concluded its work; they suspended the operation of it for some time, but they passed an Act of Congress the very next Session adopting the rules for use in their own waters.

Sir Francis Evans.

136. Is not it now in suspense?—I say they suspended it in consequence of this; but they were so satisfied with the rules themselves that they meant to put them in use almost the next day, as it were; it was only when the foreign pourparlers took place between the powers that they saw the necessity of hanging them up for the time. I may say this: In consequence of what has occurred lately, Germany having waived her objections to the fog signals, has now revived them.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

137. What has occurred lately?—I allude to the objections that have been made in this country.

Chairman.

138. They have been revived absolutely?—The objections are put forward by Germany again. She has put forward her previous objections, the objections which she had waived, and she has done so, I am told, since correspondence took place in the English newspapers, and since meetings were held in this country (one was held at Liverpool), and now those objections have been put forward again; but having regard to the fact that she waived them when we agreed to accept them in their entirety, it may be she is putting them forward to keep the door open to raise objections if we make objections; otherwise the whole of the foreign powers, so far as I am told (of course you will have evidence before you, sir, upon that if necessary), accepted them.

139. There has been a certain amount of give-and-take?—There must be in discussing matters which, although matters of very great importance, are matters in which great delay is involved. That is especially the case in trying to devise new signals; and although Great Britain at Washington carried practically every single proposal that she went out to carry, that was only done by judicious give-and-take.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

140. You told us before that Germany protested against all fog signals, because they were unnecessary; that is what she claimed, I think?—Yes.

141. She afterwards waived those objections, and now puts them forward again; is it on the same ground, that they are unnecessary?—I believe that is so. She only objected to three, you will remember.

142. Yes; "(e)," "(g)," and "(i)"?—"(E)," "(g)," and "(i)"; she objected to those on the ground that they were not absolutely necessary, and that it was too great a demand on the memory of seamen to remember them all. Now she has revived those objections, having waived them before; and it is almost a fair inference that she has revived those to be in a position, if we want to make any alteration in the rules, to be able to make alterations herself.

Mr. Cayzer.

143. The United States Government have suspended these rules principally owing to the representation made by the German and Netherlands Governments; is that so?—That I am not in a position to answer. I have no doubt, subject to the opinion of the Committee, that there will be evidence put before you by official witnesses who can speak officially as to that; I can only speak from hearsay.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

147. You used the sentence that, though it might produce confusion, it was not likely to produce danger; am I quite clear that that was the opinion of the whole of your committee?—Yes; we came to the conclusion that it might cause confusion, and I may say this: there is the best evidence of that. We discussed whether or not the word "danger" should be used or "the approach of danger" or "the possibility of danger," and we declined unanimously to insert the word "danger" and decided to use the word "confusion," because that would convey the idea in the mind of the committee that it was confusion that would ensue and not danger.

148. Then the committee really did consider the point that is in my mind, namely, that all mariners are not alike; they differ?—Yes.

149. A pushing mariner, thinking he had a direct indication by these signals of a port helm, might push ahead instead of (as your committee seemed to think) remaining more quiet and being more careful; the pushing mariner, thinking he knew that his right was to go ahead, did not your committee consider that that man would push ahead because he heard sounds that indicated to him that he was in the right and might do so?—No, we did not assume that "port helm signals" might be given in a fog; they must not be given.

150. When you state that you allude to the existing and not to the course-indicating signals?—Yes; a man is not entitled to use course-indicating signals even to show that he is on his port helm or his starboard helm in a fog. We do not allow that except in the case of a sailing vessel. We never have, in a fog. The distinction to be drawn is this: the port helm, one blast; and the starboard helm the two blasts; the port helm and starboard helm signals are never allowed to be used in a fog, but only when vessels are in sight of one another, so that the pushing man that you refer to would not hear the port helm signal, and he would not be justified in thinking that he heard the port helm signal; he would merely hear "vessel stopped," or "vessel under way" in the fog, or, in exceptional cases, the signal of a vessel towing or a vessel brought up in a fair-way, and so on. He would never be justified under these rules in thinking that any signal he heard indicated "port helm" or "starboard helm." There is no signal in the case of a sailing vessel except the fog horn; there is no steam-whistle signal there to show how the vessel is proceeding, whether under the port helm or the starboard helm, or going straight ahead. We have all along realised the great danger of allowing a man to speculate as to what course the other vessel was on. I do not know whether I have answered the question.

151. You have quite; but my point was this; I want rather to get this information: the question about leading to confusion and not to danger did not deal in any way whatever with the proposed Article 28, about "I am directing my course to starboard," or "I am directing my course to port"?—It had nothing whatever to do with that; that must not be used in a fog.

152. I know that; but it was proposed by Great Britain; and I want to know whether you consider that that was one that we adopted?—It was as I have stated.

Admiral Field.

153. May I ask you whether you hold still to your opinion that Article "(i)," which you recommended should be blended with Article "(b)," should be still so blended?—Yes, I still adhere to that, but we thought we must give way upon such a small point as that; I certainly think so. I think the fewer sound signals you have the better, and if you can cut down the number so much the better.

154. If that were done you would get rid of the four short blasts?—Yes.

155. You would adopt the two prolonged blasts?—Yes.

156. Which is much easier to understand than the four short blasts?—Yes, that was also a very strong reason for our proposing to eliminate "(i)," which was an addition to the signals, and therefore might create confusion.

157. Then, may I ask you (of course, I am almost a novice in the study of these fog signals, because they are new to me), was it carefully considered whether "(d)" and "(e)" could not be blended, because they both refer to vessels at anchor; one, "a vessel when at anchor"; the other, "a vessel at anchor" in a fair-way "at sea," or when not in ordinary anchorage ground; it seems to me that those two signals might still be blended and made into one, with a slight modification; the vessel "D," at anchor, rings a bell?—Yes.

158. And the vessel at anchor at sea "E," why should she not?—We had that before our minds. Our object was to try and make the new signals harmonise with the existing signals; therefore, in the case of a vessel at anchor in a fair-way at sea we made her give the signal of a vessel at anchor elsewhere, and superadded to it that she should ring her bell the same as if at anchor in anchorage ground; but we superadded to that the two prolonged blasts with the whistle, or siren, if a steamer, or, if a sailing vessel, in two blasts with her fog horn. The suggestion was this: you are a vessel at anchor, therefore you must give the signal of a vessel at anchor, but you ought to make more noise, because no one will expect you to be at anchor where you are; therefore, in addition to ringing your bell, you must do something else. Then we said: What else can she do? If she is a steamer she can use her whistle; if she is a sailing vessel she can use her fog-horn and ring her bell; in the case of the steamer we said: You must do that as well; you must make more noise to let other men know you are there; therefore you must use your bell as well as use the whistle.

rang her bell, especially having regard to the speed at which vessels approach one another nowadays; members of the Committee who know what a ship's bell is in a small coasting vessel will know that it is really no warning at all to a vessel going out, I will not say how many knots, but at such a speed, even in a fog, that she is on top of a vessel that is not moving, before that vessel has time to ring the bell a second time almost. With regard to that, I should like to give the reason that was given by the Committee at Washington in its first Report: "As a vessel at anchor in a fog, &c., in a fair way at sea, is in a more dangerous position, particularly while swinging round broadside to the main line of route with a change of tide, than if under way and sounding the authorised fog-horn, we would suggest that such a vessel should be compelled to use a more efficient sound signal than the bell at present authorised." So we merely added this. We thought: Now, what can she do? And our object, as I say, was not to impose upon such a vessel more onerous duties than we could help, therefore we said: She has her fog-horn if she is a sailing vessel, and if she is a steamer she has her whistle; let her use that, as well as her bell.

160. You have imposed fresh conditions on the vessel at anchor beyond what the law formerly required, have you not?—Yes, because experience had shown that it was necessary. We were told: It is a thing that would not often happen for a vessel to be broken down and brought up to anchor in a fair way; but when it does happen it is an exceptional case that might be provided for by a signal.

161. Then I ask you whether you admit this or not. In Article "f" there are three blasts laid down for a ship towing, two long blasts and one short blast; is it not difficult, in your judgment, for ordinary seamen of the mercantile marine, not educated as signalmen, to distinguish three blasts as to whether they are long or short?—I think it is.

162. Most difficult, is it not?—I think it is; but it was necessary to have a distinctive signal, and we thought that was the simplest signal for a man to be able to catch. I should like to go a little further to qualify what I say; I say it is difficult at first, but I think experience shows that fog signals may be picked up more quickly perhaps than some people think. We know there are a great many signals which are optional used by vessels which are perfectly understood.

163. I want you kindly to bring your mind to bear upon a question I want to ask you in connection with "g," which follows "f": "A steam vessel wishing to indicate to another, 'the way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me,'" may sound three blasts in succession, viz., short, long short, with intervals of about one second between them"; in signal "f" she is to sound three blasts, one prolonged, two shorts?—Yes.

164. Now, is not that likely to confuse an ordinary seaman of the mercantile marine?—I think it very likely.

165. You have these two signals for very definite things; one vessel telling the other, "I am stopped, the way is off my vessel"?—I think a man might make a mistake as to whether the signal was for the one way or for the other.

166. Then, would it not be desirable to eliminate one of these two, and if so, which one?—I cannot adopt that conclusion. What we thought, taking the general opinion, was this: that when a vessel is towing, it is most desirable that men navigating in the vicinity of it should know that there is something behind that vessel, so as to give her a wider berth; and the committee (I have no doubt finding it very difficult to devise signals) adopted that as the least objectionable signal they could devise. I think it very likely that in a great many cases a man may not be quite certain whether the signal given is for "f" or for "g." In that case it will be all the more unwise of him, to say the least of it, if he goes on.

167. I quite accept your view with regard to the towing, but what I want to press upon you is this: seeing that you admit there may be great confusion in a merchant seaman's mind, inasmuch as three blasts are necessary in both cases, it is only a question whether the "short" or "long" is inverted, putting one before the other, would it not be desirable to get rid of "g" altogether; is there any great object in retaining it; "the way is off my vessel"; suppose they do not know "the way is off my vessel," does it matter much?—In looking at the protocols, Sir, you will find it stated by many of the delegates that this is a signal that has been asked for by sailors. What they say is this: "We are at a deadlock; we are in a dense fog; we know there is a man there somewhere, and we neither of us like to move." Now this is only an optional signal, the "g;" he would be entitled to say: "Well, feel your way past me, I will wait until you have got by." That is not a compulsory signal at all.

168. No; I see it is made permissive?—Yes.

169. I will not press you more, but I will pass to the next one, "h." There, again, we have three blasts?—Yes.

171. No, that is quite so; but still, in view of these three signals being so similar, they are all of them three blasts, it is only a question of how they shall follow one another; again I would ask: Would you not be willing to eliminate one of these three signals, and, if so, which one?—No, I think not, because I think it desirable that in each one of these cases it should be open to a man, at any rate, to try and tell the other ship what he is doing. Let him try to give the information. He may fail, but give him an opportunity of telling, so far as he can, where he is.

Mr. Blake.

172. In that case, one of the ships knows that he is one of three; he has a chance of knowing which one?—Quite so.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

173. I should like to ask just three short questions; one is, whether your opinion is or is not that letter "(h)" should be included under "(i)" or "(b)," as being a vessel under way, or not under her own command?—No. You will find pages of discussion on that, for this reason: It was pointed out that you must not say a vessel laying cable is not under command, because in some cases now-a-days they go at very considerable pace, these cable-laying vessels.

174. I ask your opinion as to whether a vessel laying cable (she must be going through the water in laying cable) does not come under the category of not being under command, or unable to manœuvre according to these rules, when attached to the cable?—I do not think, myself, that that would be such a desirable method as what the committee proposed in 1893; that is, to leave the telegraph cable signal, which will be very seldom used or heard by itself as a distinctive signal, and merge "(i)" in "(b)" as we proposed. We thought it better to let the telegraph cable ship have her own distinctive signal.

175. You thought it necessary to have "(h)" distinctive?—Yes, we thought so.

176. There is another question I want to ask you: as I understand, at the committee and conference, each of the proposals was proposed by seamen?—Yes.

179. But the majority of the seamen, the large majority, at the conference, were of the Navy?—Yes, they were, undoubtedly. I may, perhaps, before you pass from that, say this: that we British delegates received the greatest assistance from Captain Wyatt and Captain Kendall, who were men of very great experience. Captain Wyatt had been one of the senior captains of the P. and O. Company, and Captain Kendall belonged to the Dublin and Holyhead line, and his opinion was, perhaps, the more valuable because he has to navigate in narrow and crowded waters, practically, every day of his life.

180. The only other question I wish to ask is as to the opinions or information that you acquired on the committee from representatives of ships in the English trade, both owners and officers, and, perhaps, men; I understand that in regard to the second or third committees you acquired a great deal of evidence, which has been handed in?—I will not say a "great deal"; we invited every society that had raised any objection to any of the rules to send us two practical men. Only four practical men came to object to the fog signals, two from one society and two from another. Others did come and object to other rules, but not to fog signals.

181. I want to ask whether, as regards the first committee before the conference, you can give us any details as to the gentlemen you called as witnesses?—No, I think, in the committee before the conference, we relied upon the experience of the members of the committee, who, as I have pointed out, with the exception of myself and Mr. Gray, were all sailors.

182. That is what I wanted to know, whether you had any opportunity then of consulting with shipowners?—No; we only met, I may say, to decide as to our general line to be taken at Washington, and what proposals we thought were desired practically by our shipping interest; and any representations which had been made to the Board of Trade undoubtedly were considered by us then, but we did not take evidence.

183. No fresh inquiry was made?—No.

184. One other very small point; I notice that this Paper [C. 6293] opens with a letter or report, and a separate report, by Mr. Watson, to which there are no dates; can you give us approximate dates for these?—The date is January 1891. I observed that we omitted to put the date on, and I looked out the date from my own memoranda; it ought to have been dated January 1891. This is the First Report of the 1890 Committee, but the separate report is not as to fog signals.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

185. Mr. Watson objected apparently?—Yes; but not on fog signals. Mr. Watson objected to another Article. I should point this out: It may have been thought at first that Mr. Watson's objection was to the sound signals in fog; it is not so; he does raise an objection to sound signals in the case of vessels in sight of one another being made compulsory and not being left optional, but he makes no objection other than that.

186. You

186. You have been in New York, of course?—Yes.

187. Do you ever happen to have been down in the bay in a fog?—No; I do not think I ever was there in a fog.

188. Then you have no personal experience of the great number of fog signals and sound signals which are in constant use in foggy weather in New York Harbour?—No; I have simply referred to that from what I have heard.

189. I think it would be a great advantage to the Committee if they could understand from any evidence you happen to have before you the great number of sound signals which are in habitual use there?—I have not any; I was only referring to what had been stated generally.

190. Can you refer us to any point in the evidence generally where we could see it?—I am afraid I cannot now. I think probably the Board of Trade will make inquiries upon that, and be prepared with the information for the Committee later on.

Chairman.

191. As I understand, you anticipate that the seamen in the mercantile marine would learn these signals more rapidly than perhaps they themselves apprehend?—Yes, we do.

Chairman—continued.

192. You also seem to regard the fact that there are so many powers all interested, whose concurrence it is not always easy to obtain upon minutiæ, as a very important factor in dealing with the propriety of recommending these fog signals?—Yes.

193. As an international question?—Yes.

194. I do not know whether it is necessary to ask you this question, but I am told that in some papers, and elsewhere, it has been treated as if you had proceeded in some professional sense to the conference?—Yes, it has.

195. I believe, in point of fact, you gave your gratuitous services to the country at the expense of your practice for a considerable time, in going to Washington; is that so?—That is so; and I should not have thought it necessary to state the fact if it had not been that some correspondents have suggested that we made a very good thing of it by going out there. I gave up my practice at the Bar for the whole of one term and part of another term in order to attend to this matter.

196. On public grounds?—On public grounds.

Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Vice Admiral Sir GEORGE STRONG NARES, K.C.B., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

197. YOU are a Vice Admiral of the Royal Navy?—Yes.

198. And I believe you were chairman of the Washington Sound Signal Committee?—Yes.

199. And I think also you have been for 15 years a member of the London Rule of the Road Committee?—Yes.

200. I believe that the proposals put before the Washington Conference for additional signals were very numerous?—The literature was very large indeed; it took us three or four days to arrange it into anything like order.

201. I think you divided those suggestions, so far as sound signals were concerned, into three groups?—Yes, we thought it was most convenient. We divided them into three groups:—(a) To indicate the course steered; (b) To indicate a change of course in the vessel; and then (c) to indicate what we termed character signals; that was, to indicate the character of the vessel making the signal.

202. I think the first report of the committee was made upon the 31st of October 1889?—Yes.

203. And then, on the 8th of November, after a debate for a whole day upon the principles of fog signals, it was referred to the Sound Signal Committee, to report cases in which new fog signals should be adopted, and the specific signals in such cases?—Yes.

204. Then the second report of the committee was made on the 21st of November 1889?—Yes. I might say that there was practically a third report, the verbal report. You will see by-and-bye that certain extra signals that we did not include in the first and second reports were carried by the conference, and referred again to the Sound Signal Committee to find suitable signals for; but then that does not appear in the paper, it was a verbal report.

205. I believe that the committee had in their minds strongly the importance of not extending to one vessel a right of way over another vessel?—We had that very strongly. Practically now there is a right of way by courtesy on the sea; but if that were extended to a legal right of way, it would be very dangerous indeed; it would lessen the responsibility of officers in command, and would certainly end in a much less cautious look-out than is taken at present.

Chairman—continued.

206. That you are, of course, anxious to avoid?—Yes.

207. Did the committee come to any unanimous opinion after full discussion?—Yes.

208. Will you tell us the substance of it?—Practically, in the cases of (a) and (b), they came to the opinion that vessels not in sight of one another were unable, by means of sound signals alone, to locate each other with sufficient precision to enable them to manœuvre with safety depending on such signals, and that it would be highly dangerous to encourage officers to continue to navigate their vessels during fog in obedience to such uncertain information.

209. Therefore you reported against all sound signals to indicate the course steered, and also against all sound signals to indicate the change of course?—Yes, that was so.

210. Then you had to deal with the cases of sound signals to indicate the character of the vessel making the signal?—Precisely.

212. Then signal (b), did that signal emanate from the London Rule of the Road Committee?—That has been asked for over and over again. There has been a legal signal in the United States waters for years; it is not exactly of the same character as this, but it is generally felt by seamen that when a vessel is stationary and therefore unable to manœuvre the same as a vessel that has way on and steam up to act upon her rudder, she should be able to defend herself, in fact, by some other signal; and therefore the London Rule of the Road Committee suggested (and it was the only signal, in fact, that they suggested) that it should be added to the rules before we went to Washington. At the Washington Conference it was tabled early in the proceedings as a proposed amendment, to come before the conference in ordinary course; consequently it was not mentioned in the Sound Signal Committee's first report. The signal came before the conference, where it was discussed on the 8th of November, and carried with practically no criticism whatever. That was when for the first time the principles of sound signals was discussed at all. Then it was again brought up before the conference, after a second report of the Sound Signal Committee, again considered on the 2nd of December, and carried without opposition. If you will allow me, before we pass to (c), I may say that this signal, as you will see if you refer to page 22 of the correspondence with the Board of Trade, has been approved by the Liverpool Mercantile Marine Service Association.

213. Was the committee which contested this rule and the previous one, and indeed the others, a committee mostly of practical seamen, or almost entirely of practical seamen?—That question was asked of Sir Charles Hall, and he forgot for a moment the position that the only member of that Sound Signal Committee, who was not a seaman, occupied. Previously to going to Washington the northern maritime powers assembled at Copenhagen, where they constituted the International Mercantile Merchant Shipping Commission. They practically considered a good many of the subjects that would have to be discussed at Washington, and in fact prepared a paper, I suppose something like our London Rule of the Road Committee did. The chairman of the Copenhagen Chamber of Commerce was the chairman of the commission, and the other members were the manager of the Copenhagen Marine Insurance Association, the inspector of the Bureau Veritas, and the chief registrar of shipping. The chief registrar of shipping was Mr. Schneider, and therefore that was practically the reason, I expect, why he was put upon the Sound Signal Committee at Washington, as being thoroughly conversant with the subject, and as practically representing the northern powers.

214. And he was the only person on that committee who was not himself a practical seaman?—Yes.

215. Now we come to Rule (c), if you please?—That is the sailing vessel's signal; I should like to point out that a great deal has been said in opposition to these proposed signals on account of their number; but I think a mistake has crept in there. By the old rule, Article 12, there are only three headings (a), (b), and (c), and at first sight it looks as if there were only three signals; but this present (c) comprises three sailing ship's signals, and therefore that makes five altogether. There is also a legal sound signal in fog for trawlers and drift net boats, so long as they are attached to their nets in fishing; so that, practically, there are six legal signals for use in fog at the present moment. Now, if you will allow me to compare that with what is proposed

I think it will clear the ground. In addition to those six, we have, practically, given three more signals for vessels that will generally be met with at sea. Then there are two what we call answering signals, for a vessel not under command and for a telegraph ship, vessels you may sometimes come across. Therefore, the whole of the signals now proposed, as compared with the present system, is as 11 to 6, and not 11 to 3.

216. May I put it in this way: that in fact there are already six sound signals for fog?—Yes.

217. That if the Washington Conference recommendations were accepted there would be added to those six signals three for ordinary use?—Yes.

218. And two for exceptional use?—Yes. I may say further now that in that I am talking about compulsory sound signals for fog to indicate the character of the vessel. There is the other signal, the communication signal; but that is not legal; it may be used, but it is an optional signal.

219. You mean that it is not compulsory?—It is not compulsory, and it need not be learnt; if any seaman thinks it is confusing and does not want to learn it he may leave it alone.

220. We have done now with signals (a), (b), and (c). Now as regards signal (d); what do you say with regard to that?—Signal (d) is the same as before. It has only been altered from sounding two minutes as it was in the olden days, as the speed of vessels has increased. With the large vessels in the harbour that the vessel is approaching, although the approaching vessel easies down coming into the anchorage ground, it was thought that two minutes was too long an interval for the bell. It was known that we cannot increase the size of the bell; we have recommended that it should be increased so as to give more sound, but I am afraid that will not be carried out for years. The consequence was, that at Washington we got over the difficulty by making them for the future have to sound their bell every minute.

221. Then, in fact, this is merely the old signal, but re-worded in order to suit the modern requirements?—Yes. At present the legal signal is given every two minutes; in the future we hope it will be every minute. And I believe there is no objection to it.

222. Then we come to signal (e)?—I must own that signal (e) is a child of my own. It arose in 1888 through a P. and O. steamer being at anchor in a fog in the Channel in the fairway. Luckily, she escaped without accident; but it was a fact that she swung round with the tide, and, therefore, for 20 minutes or so she was broadside on, 500 feet in length, to the whole Channel passing trade. Until you can stop vessels from moving at all in a fog (which is impossible) I hope this signal will be allowed. It was passed by the Sound Signal Committee; they considered that such a vessel presented a special danger. The vessel is in this position: she is sure to have her steam up; she is only anchored temporarily, and yet, if she makes any sound at all, she will be condemned by the courts, unless it is ringing her bell; if a collision occurs through her making any other signal than ringing the bell she will run the risk of being condemned. The difficulty was, what signal to give her. She must must still legally ring her bell, because she is at anchor; we cannot get over the anchor signal in (d). Then the Sound Signal Committee said: Very well, she is at anchor, but she is also a steamship under way, but not moving through the water. Make her sound the two signals; make her sound the signal for a steamer stopped and having no way upon her, and the present legal fog signal. This same signal was also founded on what has been law for years in the fishing trade. The sound signal of a fishing vessel you will find in the Regulations in Force, Article 10, paragraph (g) [C. 6869], page 151: "In fog, mist, or falling snow, a drift net vessel attached to her nets, and a vessel when trawling, dredging, or fishing, with any kind of drag net, and a vessel employed in line fishing, with her lines out, shall, at intervals of not more than two minutes, make a blast with her fog-horn, and ring her bell alternately." You see she is practically anchored by her nets; she rings her bell as the anchor signal, but she also gives something else to say: "Here is a vessel attached to the bottom in not an ordinary anchorage ground, and she cannot get out of the way." It was considered at the Sound Signal Committee that we could attach those two signals.

223. It was founded upon the signals now used by fishing vessels in their trawling, or in a similar situation?—Yes. A good deal has been said to the effect that this signal will clash with another signal, the two-blast fog-horn signal, and I will explain further on that the one is for fog and the other is for clear weather; but I may compare the signal to this fishing signal. There undoubtedly, there is the one blast of the fishermen's fog-horn sounded, and it is precisely the same as the one-blast of a sailing vessel on the starboard tack during a fog; it is also precisely the same as the one-blast helm signal for fine weather; but it has been the law for years, and I have never heard of any accident that has occurred or any objection that has been taken to it.

224. Was the committee unanimous or practically unanimous upon its recommendation?—Not only was the committee unanimous, but it was passed by the Conference, unanimously.

225. By the committee, I mean the Sound Signal Committee, the smaller committee as opposed to the Conference, which is the assembly of all the delegates?—Yes.

226. You say that it was unanimously accepted both by the small committee and by the Conference?—No; let me correct myself. You will find upon reference to [C. 6255], 1891, page 27, that after a long debate it was carried by 12 votes to eight. They all admitted the danger, but eight objected to the principle of the signal.

227. That is at the Conference?—That is at the Conference. If you look at page 27, you will find the countries that voted against it; it was rather a strong vote against it on the principle; Belgium, China, Chili, France, Germany, Russia, Spain, and Sweden.

228 And which countries were for it?—Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Great Britain, Hawaii, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Norway, Portugal, Siam, the Netherlands, and the United States.

229. You have now named the representatives of 20 nations who voted one way or the other; I want to know what the remainder did?—They were either not present or did not vote. The number of nations represented was 27.

230. Twenty out of 27 took part in the voting?—Yes.

231. When you say they all admitted the danger, do you mean the danger of the rule, or the danger of the situation which the rule was intended to cover?—The danger of the situation; but they objected to the principle of the signal. If you read it, it is practically introducing a second signal for a vessel at anchor.

233. Then the next Rule is (f); that is the towing signal, is it not?—Yes. There was more debate, practically, upon the towing signal, I think, than any other. The principle was adopted, but there was a difference of opinion about introducing sailing vessels as well as steam vessels towing; but although it occupies a great number of pages of the Blue Book, on page 49 of that same Parliamentary Paper, [C. 6255], 1891, you will find that the towing signal for steam vessels was carried unanimously. Then, on page 57, you will see that after a long debate as to whether it was to include sailing vessels towing, that was carried by 18 to five. With regard to the optional signal for vessels towed, there was a long debate upon that touching the danger of approaching a vessel in tow, with perhaps one, or eight, or 10 vessels behind her, as is the custom in the United States waters. They have had the towing signal for ages there, and I forget now what signal they make the tow give, but that was carried by 22 to one, as you will see on page 60. I think it was France that objected. I may say about the towing, that in the correspondence you will find on page 22, the Mercantile Marine Service Association approve. On page 12 of the evidence taken before the London Rule of the Road Committee Captain Peel approves it; and you will find that it is asked for by vessels that are experiencing now the dangers they are running. I may say further, that on the east coast there is a large trade springing up now of buying up old steam vessels and practically turning them into barges; there are cruising about on the east coast vessels of 1,000 or 2,000 tons, full of coal and being towed, and the proprietors of the tugs are demanding a signal. You will find that on pages 53 to 56 of the correspondence with the Board of Trade, and on page 96.

234. Is there anything further that you wish to

to say about signal (f)?—As to the character of the signal, I may say that the United States signal for a vessel engaged in towing is three blasts in quick succession every minute. This is a fog signal which is practically the same as the signal of a steam vessel going astern; but they appear not to be confusing in their waters. However, we were working at Washington in the United States, and we wanted to adopt their same signal; it was well considered, but we refused to do so; we decided that the towing vessel must give her one prolonged blast, and then that is how those two short blasts come in, because three blasts is the United States signal now, and we gave her three blasts, but made the first one prolonged. It might be said, why did we not give three prolonged blasts. We dwelt very much upon it, both in the Sound Signal Committee and in the conference. It is a well known thing that these blasts are deafening to the officers in command of the vessel that makes them. You must not tax their ears or they cannot hear another approaching vessel, and therefore we have considered them all through; and that is why we have attached those two short blasts. We considered it very wrong to give anybody who is manœuvring the three prolonged blasts, or four. We should like to have done so; it would have simplified the whole rhythm of the signals very much, but we could not do it.

235. Then the next is Rule (g), the signal which means "The way is off my vessel; you may feel your way past me"; I believe this is an optional signal, too?—Yes, this is an optional signal.

236. Did that emanate from the Board of Trade International Signal Book Committee of 1889?—About the same time that we were considering the rule of the road at sea there was a demand, mostly emanating, I might say, from inventors (and it is going on to the present day), for the International Signal Book to be used not only by day, but by night. The Board of Trade invited the opinions of the mercantile marine by a circular of the 11th of March 1889, which is to be found in [C. 6132], 1890, at page 167, regarding the introduction of course-indicating sound signals and the use of special signals. The reason of the general disapproval of night signals, in connection with the International Signal Book, is that it takes off the attention of the officer of the watch on board the vessel instead of his looking after his own ship. The replies were generally condemnatory of the course-indicating sound signals, but 49 masters or shipping associations, including the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and the Cunard Company, advised the introduction of this (g) signal. That was the only one that they asked for amongst the half-dozen that the Board of Trade had picked out. There were such as, "You are running into danger," and signals like that; but nobody chose them; not one master chose anything but this (g) signal. The Washington Signal Committee considered this signal important in connection with old Article 13, if you will refer to it, and new Article 16. I am obliged to allude to this Article, although I believe it is not before you, because there was a very long debate upon what "moderate speed" means, which has been carried on in the Press for years in all countries. At Washington, at the conference, the arguments went on the principle that, if you strictly define what "moderate speed" means you are taking the command of the vessel out of the officer's hand, and that he must still remain responsible for conducting his ship, and for the rate that he runs at in fog. How we got out of it was that to the old rule, which is, "every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall, in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed"; we have added words so that the proposed rule will read: "Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions." You may say that that does not alter much; but now we have added further: "A steam vessel, hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." That is a very important new rule.

237. That is not a sound signal rule?—No.

238. We need not, then, go into it in detail?—I have finished it now; but I am obliged to show you how this fog signal rule will work, and in consequence the legal position that a captain will be in in future as the result of having stopped his ship. Then will come in this signal.

239. You mean that the value of this signal is to be understood by reference to the other which you have quoted?—Yes, it will be more than ever more important than it is now.

240. I think I understand that the discussion turned in the conference more upon whether the signal should be adopted in the Regulations?—Yes; you will find, on page 70 of the Proceedings, that the adoption of the signal was carried unanimously.

241. You mean the character of the signal?—Yes; but on the question whether to introduce it into the Regulations there was a long debate, and upon page 69 you will find that it was only carried by 15 to 4. The four were France, Germany, Spain, and Sweden. The reason, I may say, that the signal appears where it is is to bring it into prominent notice as quickly as possible; it need not be there; it is not a rule of the road signal; it is a Signal Book signal; but it is introduced there to bring it prominently into notice. We practically know that the International Signal Book cannot possibly go the round of the powers for international agreement for the next five or six years; therefore, as it would not be brought into notice for that time, we put it in the Rule of the Road Regulations.

242. Now, can we go to Rules (h) and (i); signal (h) is for a telegraph vessel, and (i) for a vessel not under command?—I think, with your permission, it would be quicker to take those two together in giving you the history of them.

243. If you please?—(h) is a signal for a telegraph vessel; (i) for a vessel not under command. These signals are answering signals; they are only to be sounded in reply to the fog signal of an approaching vessel; at other times such vessels would make the one prolonged blast signal. I may say that these signals were not included in those recommended by the Sound Signal Committee's second report. In their view the detonating signal in Article 12, which is a new signal, was sufficient, and they did not wish to add to the number of signals.

244. Will you read Article 12, if you please?—"Every vessel may, if necessary, in order to attract attention, in addition to the lights which she is by these rules required to carry, show a flare-up light, or use any detonating signal that cannot be mistaken for a distress signal." We thought that although we would have been in favour of two signals for these two character vessels, we had recommended signals enough, and that they had better be brought into play first, and therefore we hedged back, you may say, and did not recommend signals for these two character vessels. But after a discussion in the conference, Germany proposed signals for these two special cases; then it was decided to refer the case to the Sound Signal Committee to choose suitable signals, and the reference to it was carried by 15 to 4. If you read through the debates you will find that, speaking on behalf of the Sound Signal Committee, I continuously made very strong protests that we should have no more signals.

Mr. Penrose Fitz Gerald.

245. Against having any more signals?—Yes, against having any more signals. But when it was carried by the conference I considered the matter, and the only way out of it, I may say, was that I proposed to my committee that they should not have signals to be always sounding continuously; but that in case of danger, in case a vessel is approaching near enough for the commander to consider that he ought to define his character, "I am laying a cable," or, "I have picked up a cable and am anchored to it," or, "My vessel is not under command, and I cannot get out of your way"; then we should give them these signals to define that.

Chairman.

246. May I ask you this: In the first place your Committee recommended these two signals?—Yes, when it was referred back to us.

247. And then were they adopted by the conference unanimously?—They were both adopted by the conference unanimously.

248. Upon the condition that they were only to be answering signals?—Yes, that was it. The conference at once saw the principle that we had proposed, and I am sure several of them were very glad to get out of it in that way. I may say that the four-blast signal for vessels unable to manœuvre as required by these rules is the same as that which has been in use on the Thames for years. It is a well-understood and well-known signal; the whole trade of London use it; and there has been no trouble with it and no complaint. And that is how the first blast came to be short. You see we have departed from the principle that we laid down, that a steamer moving must have a prolonged blast for her first blast, but this is the only time that we departed from that principle.

249. Is this signal applicable to sailing vessels as well as to steam-ships?—Yes, and that was also a consideration to us. I am sorry to say that the fog-horns are very poor things indeed, and there are still vessels cruising about with a horn that is only like one used on a coach, which perhaps not one man on board can blow. Therewe could not give a crippled sailing ship anything but four short blasts.

250. I think we have now gone through these different rules from (a) down to (i); will you be kind enough to tell the Committee the general conclusions that you have come to in regard to this matter?—Throughout my work at the Board of Trade every proposal for a new fog signal necessarily comes before me; therefore during the 15 years that I have been there I have had to keep my attention very closely to these matters; and my conclusion is that with the large and increasing steam traffic at sea the present single fog signal for a steam vessel at sea is insufficient, both for the protection of the vessels, their cargo and the people on board of them, and that the time has arrived when it has become necessary that those in charge of vessels presenting more than ordinary danger should be able during fog (as they are now by means of lights on fine nights) to proclaim to an approaching vessel the special character they present. It is also desirable that those in charge of the approaching vessel should know the character of the danger they are nearing; whether it is an ordinary steam vessel or one of a special character. The literature, as I said, presented to us at Washington, was very voluminous, but the literature at the Board of Trade on proposals of this kind is very voluminous also. In proposing the new signals the principle has been, both at London Rule of the Road Committee and at Washington, to discard all that we possibly could, and only to introduce those of undoubted necessity for the general protection of the growing trade. To my mind, if you will allow me to say so, it is an unjust aspersion on the skilful and expert officers of the Mercantile Marine, both Home and Foreign, to suppose for a moment that they are so wanting in ability as to be unable to remember the plain fact that any additional number of sounds following the one well-known prolonged blast of a steam vessel at sea is a warning that the vessel sounding it is of a special character. I go further, and am confident that the signals proposed will be readily learnt and adopted, and will prove a boon to life and property at sea.

251. This Committee has been appointed, as you know, to consider the objections which have been raised to the proposed adoption of these new signals. Of course you have had to consider those objections?—Yes.

1894, have, in my opinion, very largely confused the question by coupling the proposed compulsory character fog signals with the helm or manœuvring signals for vessels in sight of one another. These two systems are quite distinct. In clear weather the fog signals will not be in use. During fog, if any one sounds any one of them it will be illegal to use the helm signals, and he would risk coming before the courts. I should like, by reference to page 41 of the Board of Trade correspondence, to show that the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, in their latter letter of the 17th of August, further connect these two classes of signals in quoting a report of a Board of United States naval officers who considered the alterations proposed by the London Rule of the Road Committee of 1890. That was our first alteration when we wanted to put a "Not under Command" signal into (b). The Board in their report disagreed with the proposal of the London Rule of the Road Committee to couple (i) with (b); and, regarding the fog signals, were of opinion, "that the rule should stand as presented by the Washington Conference." The compulsory sound signals which they disapproved of, to which the Liverpool Steamship Owners allude, were the helm signals of Article 28, for vessels in sight of one another, not the fog signals under Article 15.

253. Sir Charles Hall, when he was before us, drew a distinction between the confusion that might arise and the danger that might be supposed to arise from the use of these signals; what have you to say about that?—Of the sound signals and the helm signals?

254. The fog signals, which we have to consider?—I would ask any one of the honourable Members to put themselves in the position by shutting their eyes, then they would be in the fog. They might then hear two signals of two vessels that are not in a fog, but those signals could not confuse them, because it is only in the case of a vessel approaching near enough to risk collision, for which the rule of the road gives regulations, then she would be in a fog, too, and she could not be giving those helm signals legally.

255. You are speaking now of a vessel in a fog hearing the helm signals of a vessel outside the fog?—Yes, if any vessel is coming near enough to her to risk collision she must be in the fog also.

257. Do you think there is anything in the view that the addition of these fresh fog signals would lead to danger?—Most decidedly not. If you will allow me to turn that question, the danger that presents itself to my mind is the danger of a careless or inexperienced master not making the proper signal, and being run into the courts; that is how a great part of this opposition has arisen in my mind. The masters are in danger (they are in danger now) and in great fear of the courts.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

258. In danger of their certificate?—In danger of their certificate, and they are afraid they will be in more danger with these extra signals. But as against that I say that these signals will give them considerable relief and lessen the danger of collision at sea.

Chairman.

259. You have already said that you are not apprehensive of their not being able to master these signals?—The new signals they have got to learn are three. If you couple those two answering ones, there are five. In my opinion the signals have not been thoroughly studied by the opponents.

261. Will you please read it?—"Dear Sir,—In reply to yours of yesterday, I beg to say that I have made inquiries of the captains of the 'Teutonic' and 'Tauric,' and from what they say it appears there are no printed regulations now in use with regard to fog signals in New York Harbour, but that the following signals are always used in fogs, and are looked on by constant use as compulsory. One blast about every two minutes, as a warning; three short blasts by a vessel towing another, and an additional blast for each extra vessel towed, if exceeding 300 feet in length, vessel and rope; three long blasts 'I am going astern'; four blasts 'I am stopped, feel your way past me'; one blast 'Am porting my helm'; two blasts 'Am starboarding my helm.' The last two signals are also used when the vessels are in sight of one another. I cannot get a satisfactory answer to the question of, 'How do you distinguish in a fog between the one blast as a warning, and the one blast for 'I am porting.' They tell me that the ferries on the New York rivers have signals of their own." (That I can confirm. Each of the ferry boats running across has a special whistle, and they thoroughly know each other's vessels, the same as at Liverpool.) "Beyond this they say no other fog signals are used in New York Harbour."

262. Do you know yourself whether they are really worked satisfactorily in New York Harbour?—They are certainly working satisfactorily, because they know each other so well. But I may say that one of the reasons for calling the International Conference at Washington together was (under the rose) for the United States to get a really good system of International rules ready for adoption. In the United States waters there was a good deal of confusion, and there is a good deal of confusion at the present day.

263. Is that because of different signals prevailing in different parts of the United States?—Yes, I may say that only a month ago we received a copy at the Board of Trade, of a new regulation passed by Congress for the lakes, and there they have got a different system from what they have on the coast.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

264. The subject which is referred to us is the objections which have been made to the proposed alterations; I will only ask you one question; I take it for granted that you are acquainted with all those objections, and have read through this mass of them?—I have practically read them; I may have slipped one or two.

265. In your opinion are there any of the objections that are really of any value; do you think that there is any possibility of their being of any value with regard to safety in the adoption of the new rules?—No, I am strongly of opinion that instead of being more dangerous the adoption of these new signals will render navigation safer.

266. You yourself, from your own experience, are entirely in favour of this adoption?—I am of this opinion: that if the signals do not come into force now they must come into force within a few years. My own opinion was, as I said at the Sound Signal Committee, that I should have been quite content to leave out one or two of them for a few years, and let them come gradually into force. The only opponents of any force that I see are Germany and the Netherlands (the Netherlands is very vague). I know what is at the bottom of Germany's opposition, and that is, that pressure has been brought to bear upon Germany, the same as pressure is being brought to bear on the Board of Trade by our East Coast fishermen in connection with the new steam trawlers. We have at Washington given the right of way (and they are the only vessels that have the right of way; I was against it myself) to the sailing fishing boat over the sailing ship. Immediately that was given the steam fishing boats now are pressing for the right of way over sailing ships; and you will find in correspondence that the Board of Trade have been advised strongly against that, but they have practically promised Germany to go as far as giving the right of way to a steam trawler over steamers.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

268. I only wanted to know whether the objections are growing in sense or in strength in your opinion?—No, I think it is the other way.

Admiral Field.

269. With your great experience in command of ships in thick weather, have you, as a naval officer, felt the necessity of an addition to the then existing fog signals?—Strongly, of a towing signal.

270. Apart from the towing signal?—Apart from the towing signal I have never come across a ship not under command, I have never come across a telegraph vessel, and I have never come across a ship in the dangerous position of being at anchor in a crowded thoroughfare where she ought not to be, and is not expected to be.

271. May I ask you: do you share the views which Sir Charles Hall told us (at least I understood him to say so) were shared if not by all at least by the majority of the London Rule of the Road Committee, that (b) and (i) signals could be usefully blended: (b) a vessel under weigh but stopped and having no way upon her, two prolonged blasts; and (i) a vessel not under command, four short blasts?—I was one of the London Rule of the Road Committee that accepted it.

272. Then you still would approve of blending those two signals if it could be done with the consent of other nations?—If you ask me my private opinion as a seaman, I would sooner keep them separate.

273. May I ask you, are you not of opinion with Sir Charles Hall, that they might be blended?—They might be blended, but I would prefer their not blending them. There would be no confusion, no danger at all events, in blending them.

274. Then by that means you would get rid of these four short blasts, and you would still stick to the two prolonged blasts?—I am perfectly certain, whether the signal (i) is there or not, that any captain who trades in the London river, if he finds himself in the disagreeable position of being not under command when he is out on the ocean, will give the same signal that he is allowed to give by law in the London river, which is signal (i).

275. Still I think I may hold you to your opinion, that you are not opposed to blending those two signals. There is great opposition you understand to increasing the number of signals?—I am perfectly certain that if this Select Committee propose the blending of (b) and (i), the whole of the rule of the road as an international rule for ships at sea will go by the board.

Chairman.

276. You mean that foreign nations will not accept accept it?—Foreign nations will never have it; the United States will never have it.

Admiral Field.

277. I thought that Germany had recently intimated approval of blending those two; at first she was opposed to it?—But Germany is only one power.

278. I know that Germany is only one power, but we have it from yourself that you personally, in common with Sir Charles Hall, are not opposed to blending (h) and (i)?—I say that I prefer leaving them separate, as a sailor. I might go further in helping you; I say that if that signal (i) was not known by about a quarter of the seamen of the world, I should not so much like it; but knowing that a quarter of the seamen of the world know the signal and are using the signal, I accept it as a first rate signal.

279. May I ask you whether you are not of opinion that merchant seamen, who probably would be on the look-out for the report of signals that they should hear in fog, would not be likely to be confused in trying to distinguish prolonged blasts and short blasts. There are three signals here: (f) but with three blasts, one prolonged and two short; (g) "way off my vessel," one short, one prolonged, and then a short; and the telegraph ships (h), three prolonged blasts. What I ask is, seeing that merchant vessels as a rule have no proper signal staff, is it not likely to confuse the minds of merchant seamen who might be on the look-out to have three blasts, the only difference of which is that some are inverted, short put before long, or long put before short, or two longs and a short? — You see anything beyond the one blast is caution. It does not matter to me whether I have got to feel my way past a vessel in tow, or feel my way past a telegraph ship, or feel my way past a vessel not under command; whatever is more than the one blast is a caution to me, and I must so take it. But I would say this: that on the Mersey there are a number of private signals known to the whole trade. There is the "Wish you a pleasant voyage" sounded regularly as vessels go in and out of the Mersey; there is "Glad to see you back again"; there is "Hip, hip, hip, hurrah"; that is a common signal all over our coasts. There is no difficulty whatever in distinguishing between a prolonged blast and a short one. In fact, there is a steamer that comes up here every afternoon nearly that sounds a prolonged blast under your windows, and there is no difficulty in knowing that it is a prolonged blast.

280. You are aware that there is great opposition among shipowners, to say nothing of ship captains, to having this considerable addition to the number of fog signals; may I ask you whether you are of opinion that there would be any mischief in seeking to combine the signals (f) "vessel towing," with signal (h) "telegraph ship," seeing that there are for "vessel towing" three blasts, one long and two short, and for "telegraph ship" three long blasts?—Each of these vessels has a cable astern of her, and they are both three sounds. Supposing they do confuse them, supposing that instead of a towing ship, as I think she is, I come across a telegraph ship, I have got to take the same caution.

Supposing I come across a telegraph ship and think she has got something in tow, I still do not go close to her stern. It is much the same thing. But as to telegraph ships, how many are there? About a dozen in the world. I suppose no seaman has ever come across more than one in his lifetime. Practically, that signal can be pushed away, so far as the ordinary mariners go. But now think of the telegraph men; when they had lights, they had three lights, and the Board of Trade were obliged to alter those lights because they were coupled with the "not under command"; they used to use the "not under command" lights; but so many vessels ran down to them to see if they wanted relief, came close to them poking about under their stern, that we had to alter the lights. That is how you cannot combine the telegraph ship and vessel not under command if you give sound signals at all.

281. But if the number of telegraph ships, as you rightly observe, is so few, and the towing is the more important difficulty to indicate with sound signals, could you not afford to sweep away the signal for a telegraph ship in fog, and let the telegraph ship rest in that position under the signal as if towing, and then we should get rid of three prolonged blasts?—If you will allow me to say so, she is not always having her cable out behind her. When they are repairing it is hove up to the bow; so that the few vessels that are laying and picking up cables do want protection. If you will allow me, I would refer you to some pages in the correspondence as to the demand that is made for this telegraph cable signal. You will find at pages 3 and 4 of the correspondence with the Board of Trade, Captain Schenk; at page 141, the Telegraph Maintenance Company; page 149, the Eastern Extension Company; page 151, the Eastern Telegraph Company; and at page 174 there is a very long letter again from Captain Schenk (he writes from a telegraph cable ship; I do not know whether it is in Canadian waters or United States waters), all demanding protection.

Mr. Richardson.

283. Have you read letter No. 55, page 51 of the correspondence from the secretary of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, which is dated September 20th, 1894, in which he says that the representatives of 64 per cent. of the whole shipping of the world objected to the new rules, while the representatives of only 29 per cent. approve of the new rules; I want to ask whether the Board of Trade have verified those percentages, and whether they remain in your opinion the same to day as they did on 20th

Mr. Richardson—continued.

September, because I understood you to say that the objections were not so strong as they were, but that there had been some change in public opinion respecting them?—I may say that I have not considered that letter.

284. Do you not consider it a very important letter for the Board of Trade to consider?—I may say, as regards the Board of Trade, although I am a member of the Rule of the Road Committee, I am not the adviser of the Board of Trade on this correspondence; I am in another Department.

285. Then I shall get that out of some other witness perhaps; could you tell us who that would be, who is the adviser to the Board of Trade?—The Marine Department.

286. Could you give the name of the gentleman?—Mr. Walker is the chief secretary.

Chairman.

287. You were going to make an observation, I think, about the statement made in the letter?—I know it is generally accepted at the Board of Trade that these figures are very misleading, but I have not seen the official papers. I think the letter is not altogether against the sound signals but the proposed new rules.

Mr. Richardson.

288. That is so; but do not the new rules embrace the sound signals?—As I have shown you in a previous letter, this same association has mixed up the manœuvring signals with the character signals; and I state at once that I do not think they have considered the matter as fully as they ought to have done.

Mr. Cayzer.

289. Sir Charles Hall told us the other day that although these new fog signals might be confusing they would not lead to danger; do you agree with him in that statement?—Totally; there is not one of them that will lead to danger to the vessel, or the people on board of her.

290. Not although they might be confused by the blasts?—For the moment, as they are brought into play, they might be mistaken; but I say that it does not matter if they are mistaken.

291. Then I should like to ask you whether a master in charge of a vessel, say close to Dungeness, the North-west Light Ship, or the entrance to Yarmouth Roads, in thick weather, with perhaps a dozen other vessels trying to feel their way past, and with all these large numbers of vessels, say, within a radius of an eighth of a mile, would not be likely to be confused, and danger would arise from these confusing sounds, this babel of sounds that would be produced?—Not more so than he is confused at the present moment; he would be less confused by distinct character signals than he is confused now by illegal signals, as we may say.

292. You have told us that a master, if he did not know these signals perfectly, might be afraid of what might come from an inquiry in the court with regard to his certificate, and these numerous sounds round about him would be likely to make him more nervous, and, I should contend, lead to danger; would you not think so?—The only two extra signals that he will, practically, hear are "steam vessel under way, but stopped," when by the new rules he will stop himself, and the other vessels will have to stop if they are ahead. Instead of hearing the one blast of the moving vessel he will hear two, or else it will be a vessel in tow.

293. I may take it that it is your opinion that although he is confused with all these sounds, and there is the possibility that if he makes a mistake his certificate will be suspended and his means of livelihood taken from him, this multiplicity of sounds will not lead to danger?—I am strongly of opinion that it will not lead to danger, and I am certain that, as soon as they are introduced and known, the masters will be perhaps clearer of the courts than they are now.

294. You said that, although you were quite content with all these new fog signals, and that you approved of them, you would be quite content to leave one or two out; would you tell us which are those you would leave?—I think I can scarcely pick out any now, because the ones I would pick out would be the telegraph vessel and the vessel not under command. I say that as an ordinary navigator myself approaching those vessels; but I cannot recommend either of those being taken out, because they are wanted for the defence of the vessels.

295. I would like to ask you another question as a principal officer of the Board of Trade; you have stated that the blasts are deafening to the officer in command, and as we all know that the steam whistle is behind him on the bridge; did your committee consider the advisability of putting this steam whistle in the fore part of the vessel or in some other place where it would not lead to so deafening the officer that he would not be able to distinguish the short and long blasts?—We gave a distinct recommendation on that point. I know we have recommended that. You will find it in our recommendation. We pointed out the deafening noise of a steamer stopped and blowing off her steam; and we recommended that the attention of the Board of Trade and foreign countries should be directed to a means of blowing off so as to get rid of that noise, by blowing off through the water.

296. That is right, but not quite the question; I want to know whether you would remove the steam whistle to another part of the vessel, whether you would put it further forward say, so that he should not be deafened?—If that can be done it would be very desirable.

297. There is no recommendation from the committee to that effect, is there?—No.

298. You told us that the fog horns (and I know it from personal experience) are very imperfect in many ships; is there any recommendation by your committee that the fog horn (and I would couple with it that the steam whistles of a barge) and ships bells should be of a uniform size and power?—No, we recommended strongly that they should be improved.

299. Not of a uniform size?—No.

300. Do the Board of Trade make any inspection of these appliances at present?—Yes, they inspect them; but I know they have great difficulties in that way; they inspect vessels lights; lights; but they cannot get a uniform light, much less a uniform bell.

301. It would be quite competent to have a uniform bell, fog-horns, and steam whistles for all ships, would it not?—It would be very useful if they could be improved.

Mr. Williamson.

302. I understood you to say that there may be confusion, specially in narrow waters, from a number of vessels and one vessel hearing many fog signals around, particularly from the effect on the officers on the watch of deafening long blasts, but that notwithstanding the confusion thereby caused you still think that it would only lead to additional caution, and so it might minimise the risk instead of increasing it?—I distinctly am of that opinion.

303. That although the confusion may be great, still you think the effect would be to lessen the danger, and not to increase it, from the caution necessary?—The confusion would not be greater than it is at present.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

304. In the first place on Rule (e) I think you stated that it was started on the analogy of the fishing boats?—Yes.

305. The fishing boats, of course, are not technically at anchor?—No.

306. In many cases they would be drifting with the tide?—Yes.

307. And I daresay you have heard the objection that these rules do not absolutely distinguish between the only three conditions that a vessel can be in, namely, "under control," "not under control," and "at anchor," I want to know whether those three possibilities were carefully considered by the committee when drafting the blasts?—The "under control" would be (a).

308. Under way?—Yes.

309. Having way upon them?—Yes.

310. Then there is having no way, and not being at anchor?—Yes.

311. And then there is being at anchor?—Yes; and there are signals for each of those cases.

312. The objection that is taken according to what has been sent in to me, is that these rules they do not distinguish between those three classes of conditions under which a ship can be; that is to say, the telegraph ship practically comes under the rule for a ship at anchor, that is to say, attached to the bottom. I only want to know whether those three considerations have been attended to?—Certainly they have.

313. Then in regard to Rule (g), I think you said that it referred, or it was anticipated at all events that it might, to Article 16 in a measure. Of course Article 16 only deals with vessels reducing their speed, but (g) is for vessels which have no way upon them?—Of course, as I have said (g) has no business here at all; it is an optional signal; it should be in the signal book.

314. Do you think it could be possibly included under one of the others?—No, certainly not; it is a most important signal.

315. (g) is an important signal?—Most important.

316. Then could it not technically come under (b)?—No, it is a manœuvring signal; it is the only manœuvring signal.

317. The objection taken to it is that it is adding a complication; that (b) is for a vessel having no way upon her, and so is (g). In either case it is a steam vessel under way, but having no way upon her?—May I say how (g) comes in?

318. If you please?—In a calm fog without echoes, you can with two vessels only, after a little time decide whether the other vessel is on your starboard bow or your port bow; and then if there are two vessels stationary, two ocean liners say, stationary in mid-Atlantic, the one that has the other on its starboard bow has to give way and let the other pass.

319. Those are two vessels under way?—Yes, under way but stopped.

320. But this is the case of two vessels, one without way on her, and the other with?—But they would both be stopped under the new rules; they must stop their engines, and then the one that has the other on the starboard bow will give this signal.

321. I was referring to another signal, the one of the vessel that has no way on her?—They would both be sounding (b) at first.

322. Yes; you think there is a necessity for having (g), which is another rule for a vessel without way on her?—Yes; because as soon as I knew I had the man on my starboard bow I would give him (g) at once: "You may go on, I will remain still."

323. Why not (b)?—Because if I am stopped and you are to stop——

324. Why am I to stop if you stop?—I give him permission to pass me; it is an extra warning.

325. There was one or two other points or objections that have been raised. There is, for instance, the objection that mistakes in blasts cannot be rectified; has that been dealt with by the committee?—In our report we say that on first sounding with the steam whistle the whistle may not run properly; but the second or third time it is certain; there is no mistake whatever.

326. The objection that a mistake in blasts (which, I believe, is not uncommon) cannot be rectified if they are made wrong in error was dealt with by the committee?—Yes, certainly.

327. Then there is another point on the confusion of what I may call in-sight signals with fog signals; of course the fog signals are in rain, mist, snow, and fog; was the point taken that those conditions are local very often in distribution, and that vessels, for instance, in sight of each other outside a heavy rain squall might be signalling in-sight signals, while the vessel in the fog might be signalling fog signals?—There has been no trouble at all between (a) and the starboard signal; there has been no confusion at sea, practically, although one man might be in a fog sounding (a), and another might be in the clear sounding, "I am starboarding my helm."

328. That leads me to this further point: you, I believe, affirm that changes are needed, because of the increase of steamers?—Yes.

329. Has any concise statement been drawn up on the ascertained causes of collision in fogs; has any analysis been made of the records of collisions in fogs?—Not that I am aware of.

330. Do you think that such an analysis could be made; of course all the causes of collisions that have been inquired into are on record?—You might have an analysis of the result of the court of inquiry, but the statements put before the court are very wide sometimes.

331. But the findings of the court are recorded?—But you have first of all got to prove it.

Chairman.

332. The finding of the court, unless it be the Court of the Wreck Commissioner, would not do more than find one vessel to blame, or both to blame, or neither, would it?—They are generally both to blame.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

333. But in the very case you mentioned, of the local extent of a fog, I have had cases put before me where the signals seemed to have been quite wrong, one vessel saying she was out of the fog, and the other saying she was in it?—Then I come back to this: that everything beyond a single blast is for caution. If I am mistaken I can only be mistaken for the starboard signal, of one blast.

334. Then we come to this: that anything beyond one blast, which is an in-sight signal, or say two blasts, is merely a signal for caution?—That is all; that is the principle on which we chose them.

335. Does it follow that that is not sufficient; providing that three blasts mean caution, is not that a sufficient signal in all fog cases?—Practically any three blast signal is caution, so long as they begin with a prolonged one. This (g) signal is three blasts also, but that is a communication signal, and I might say that (g) can never be used except for two vessels.

336. If you had a simple rule that three blasts mean caution, but that they might be varied with various indications to the learned, that might be sufficient?—That is the exact position we have come to.

Chairman.

337. I have only one question to ask you. Apart from the wisdom in themselves of any proposal for altering these new rules, is there another consideration in your mind, namely, the risk of losing the rules altogether by being unable to bring foreign nations to an agreement?—Very strongly. The alterations of the rules are so important in the direction of caution that I would give anything not to alter these sound signals for fog.

338. In order to get the other nations to come together?—Yes. And I may go further and say that the promise to Germany to consider the proposition that she has brought forward will enable the different nations to sweep away any of these rules within a few years if they wish to.

339. If experience should prove that they require amendment?—Yes, it is not final at all. In fact the further consideration of the international Rule of the Road will go on immediately this has passed, it will commence again.

Vice Admiral Sir ROBERT MOLYNEUX, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

340. YOU have been kind enough to come and help us. You are an Admiral in the Royal Navy, and I need hardly ask whether you have had great experience in nautical matters?—Yes.

341. I do not know if you have had to do with these rules yourself. Have you been concerned in their preparation?—Yes. I was one of the delegates at Washington, and I have also been a member of the different Board of Trade Committees on the subject, both before and since.

342. I do not think it is necessary, and I do not think the Committee desire to go over the ground again; we have had evidence already from Sir Charles Hall and Sir George Nares as to the procedure which took place and a particular description of these rules. But what do you say in regard to the rules themselves; what is your view, if you will tell us generally, as to the propriety of adopting these rules, and as to the objections made to them?—My opinion is that the value of the new proposed fog signals is not quite the same in every case. There are some that I think should be retained at all costs; there are others which I do not think in themselves are of vital consequence; but at the same time I do not consider that they are any danger whatever; under no conceivable circumstances do I consider that they could be a danger, and, therefore, I think that to risk wrecking the whole of the international regulations which have been the subject of very anxious consideration and very long arguments for several years, would be a very great pity, in fact a fatal mistake. It was the first time that this International Rule of the Road at Sea had been the subject of a conference in which every nation you may say that has any interest in it was represented; and, certainly, it took three months, I think, at Washington discussing it very fully on every point, and I think to upset the whole of that unless there are some very strong objections which affect the safety of shipping, would not be a credit to this country.

343. Do you yourself think that there would be any real difficulty in masters of ships or others mastering the new rules so as to be able to work this new signal system?—No, I think not. I think what little experience that there has been in England and other parts of the world would show that there is not any great difficulty in it. For instance, where the traffic is most congested, such as in the Thames, the Mersey, and New York Harbour, and along the coasts in some countries, they have special signals which they use in fogs, some authorised and some not, but which are well recognised; and they are, I believe, universally approved of after some experience. Take the pilots, for instance, in the Thames; I suppose there is nowhere in the world with a greater amount of traffic. A few years ago when it was proposed to introduce

some special fog signals they demurred very much; they were, I think, in the position in which the shipping interest is now all over the country, that is to say, they were afraid of a change; but now that they have had some experience of it they would not alter it for anything. I think myself that a great deal of this agitation, which did not exist until quite lately, although the rules were published five years ago, is the result of a nervous fear of change, and of what possibly may happen by misunderstanding the signals; but people do not seem to grasp the fact that these new signals are nothing but cautions, that they do not authorise the captain of a ship to do anything whatever except to exercise great caution, and to stop his engines. There is a new rule put in in connection with the speed in fogs which actually gives a distinct order to every man, when he hears a sound before his beam, to stop his engines, and then to proceed with great caution. If seamen in the merchant service, or the navy, or any other people afloat, will only carry that out, collisions will be very much less frequent, and very much less fatal than they are now.

345. In cases of fog, and only two vessels being within hearing of one another, there would. I suppose, not be much difficulty in following and appreciating what was meant by every one of the signals used?—I do not see why there should be. A collision does not take place, as a rule, the moment you hear the first sound. If the ships have been going by the instructions, as they ought, sounding regularly every two minutes, under ordinary circumstances you would hear that fog signal some little distance off; it is not hearing a sound and running into it at once. If it were so, scarcely any fog signal would be of any use at all. You have to apply all these rules, of course, with the ordinary light of common sense.

346. You feel quite satisfied, as I understand, that there is really no danger involved in adopting these signals at all?—I do not think there is any danger, but as I said before I do not consider all of them of equal importance, and if half-a-dozen English seamen could get together and get the whole of the world to agree to what they are going to do, I should have no objection to one or two being swept off, and perhaps one comprehensive signal substituted for them. But that is not the position we are in. We have large mercantile interests, of course; but the rest of the world have large mercantile interests too, and some countries attach great importance to these signals. Perhaps one of the least important you may consider is the telegraph ship signal, because the thing will so seldom be needed. I have been at sea for 40 years, and I have hardly ever seen a telegraph ship at work. I have never met one in a fog, and I do not quite remember that I have met one under any circumstances at sea; but at the same time, if the telegraph ship people ask for a protective signal, there is no harm in giving it them; and I do not think it is quite worth while upsetting the whole of the rules on that account, although I myself do not think it is of importance.

347. You think, taking the rules as a whole, that their adoption as a whole would be a great improvement on what exist now?—Yes.

348. And your view is that although some parts might be omitted or changed without injury at all events, it would, perhaps, run the risk, if not incur the certainty of losing all?—I think so. For instance, the United States, I know, will make a great point of the towing signal; I do not think they will drop that. They are very subject to fogs, and they are in the habit of towing great lengths of two, three, four, five and six vessels, perhaps half a mile long. They are using the signals themselves, in fact, and have proved them to be of use.

Admiral Field.

349. I need not press you, because you have already indicated your willingness to lessen the number of signals; we are here, as you know, to consider the objections, and I want to ask you as an experienced seaman, do you not think that the telegraph ship would be amply protected if she had to take refuge under the towing signal; the towing signal being three blasts, one long and two short, and the telegraph ship three long blasts. Why should not the telegraph ship be protected by the towing signal, and then you get rid of a signal?—I should have no objection personally to dropping a signal and blending it with another, but I think it is not worth the powder and shot. If we could make the rules ourselves I should drop one myself; I see no vital object in it. I am not connected with towing companies, and I do not know what the origin of it was.

350. I have it that you are not opposed personally to combining the telegraph ship and the towing signal?—I do not quite say that. I think they might have a general signal, perhaps, to meet vessels under exceptional circumstances. I do not say that I advocate that particular combination.

351. But if there is to be a reduction you would not be opposed to combining those two?—I would not be opposed to wiping out a signal; but I have not considered which way I would alter it if I gave it up at all. But I still must repeat that I do not think it would be wise to risk the rules generally for the sake of altering that. I do not think it is a matter of danger. That rule may possibly be superfluous, but it does not hurt anybody. The towing man is the only only one who has to make that signal, nobody else has to make it. The telegraph ship is the one that has to make his signal, so he is the only one concerned.

353. As a matter of fact the captains of the mercantile marine were not, I think, represented on the committee, unless it was by one?—There were two on the Washington Conference; and there have always been one or more representatives on the Board of Trade Committees, two, I think, if not more. In fact there have been others (I mean to say not naval men) connected with the sea in mercantile marine pilotage or otherwise.

Mr. Richardson.

354. Captain Wharton?—He is naval.

355. And Captain Angove?—He is P. and O.

Admiral Field.

356. Supposing the Committee should think it was desirable to lessen the number of these signals, of which serious complaint has been made by the shipping interest; may I remind you of the fact that for (f), (g), and (h), "vessel towing," "way off my vessel," and "telegraph ship," the signals are three blasts, either one long and two short blasts, or inverting the shorts before the long, or three long blasts?—Yes.

357. Is not that likely to cause confusion in the mind of a merchant seaman who would be the person on the look-out probably for these signals; and therefore would not that be an argument, if you could see your way to do it, for lessening the number?—I do not see what bad result there would be. There might be confusion in his mind (we cannot answer for anybody's mind), but it would not cause him to run into danger, if he does what he is told: that is, stop his engine.

358. But as an experienced naval officer, and having had plenty of responsibility in command before these signals were thought of being introduced, did you ever desire a large increase to the fog signals yourself?—No. We ourselves, the London committee, before we left for Washington, discussed the Rules very carefully, and had the opinions of different people who volunteered to give them, and we only suggested one increase. That shows what our mind was at that time. But this is international; we cannot have our own way.

359. I want to get your personal opinion?—The only signal we proposed ourselves was a signal to say: "I am stopped," and that I consider is not only of great importance but I am quite certain it will save life and property.

360. That is (b) signal; two prolonged blasts?—Yes. As it is now, a ship cannot, of course, tell whether you are stopped or not. That signal alone, I believe, will add very much to the safety of ships in fogs. That indicates our view, I think, but at the same time we have to consider others as well as ourselves.

361. That is the (g) singal?—No, that is quite a different thing. That has only been introduced into the rules because it is going to be, I believe, in the new commercial code, and therefore, if it is in the new commercial code (I do not say it is a wise thing to have done, but I do not make any comment on that) merchant ships will be authorised to use it, and therefore the only idea, by putting it into these rules, was to draw special attention to it. But it is a little previous, putting it in here, because the new commercial code is not out yet, and it may not come out.

Mr. Cayzer.

362. I should like to ask you just one or two questions. You say that these signals are not all of equal importance, and that one, two, or three of them might be swept away; do I take it rightly, from your reply to Admiral Field, that the only one you think it is of any use retaining is (b)?—Not quite. Although we did not propose it, I think the signal for a vessel at anchor in the open sea, where she would be a danger to navigation as well as to herself, would be a very useful signal indeed. I think that might be retained. After all it is not so much a new signal as it is an old signal used in a different way.

363. May I take it then with (b) and (e) you would be content to do away with the others?—My own personal opinion is that those other signals are not of great consequence, because, whatever happens, the captain has to do the same thing in the first place; he must stop. I think the Americans, for instance, with their long towing lines, might, and I know do, consider the towing signal of very great importance, and one must consider other nations' wants as well as our own. I believe they would never consent to drop that.

364. I take it that, practically, you are in accord with nearly the whole of the mercantile shipmasters, that is to say, that you only lay great stress on these two signals, and the rest may be abandoned?—Not at all.

365. You told us that you had never found any want of them in your previous experience at sea, and that is the position taken up by the objectors; by the mercantile shipmasters of this country?—No; I am not of that opinion at all. I differ entirely from them. The ground apparently of their objection is that they are a source of danger. I say they are no danger whatever. If a man hears two or three blasts instead of one blast it only makes him more cautious and less likely to run into danger. I do not take their view at all. I entirely differ from them.

366. You have laid great stress upon other nations adopting these rules; are you aware that the German Government and the Netherlands Government have both protested against their being being put into force, and that it was chiefly the action of those two Governments that induced the United States to delay putting these Rules into force; the Government of Germany and the Netherlands Government as I am informed, asked the United States through their consuls, to have these Rules delayed until further inquiry was made?—I am not aware of that myself. If you say so I have not the slightest doubt that it is the case. All I know is that these rules were passed at Washington; there have been two or three revisions sent all round the world, which have all received the approval of the respective Governments; and the actual date was fixed and agreed to by all the Governments when they were to come into operation. What previous pressure may have been brought on the Governments, and what the result is I have no knowledge whatever.

Mr. Williamson.

367. I should like to put a question, and in order to elucidate what I am driving at, I want to know your view as to the importance of securing the acquiescence of the United States to these rules; I have here a letter from the captain of a ship of mine now in Hamburg, in which he says: "A question which requires to be taken up is towage signals in fog; so many ships tow now at the loading port, that in a fog when you hear a steamer's whistle you really do not know whether it is an ocean steamer or a tug until you see his two lights flare up, and you are generally too close them to manœuvre. The American system is good, I think; viz., several short blasts. We towed the voyage from Lacona to Latoosh, and never saw land or lights but once, in perfect safety, although surrounded by coasters and steamers." That is the testimony of a very intelligent commander in our own British mercantile marine; you agree, I suppose, with him; you have been at Washington and heard all the proceedings there?—Yes.

368. You agree with him as to the value of these fog signals in towing?—You mean to say that I think that ought to be retained?

369. Yes?—I think that of the various fog signals that is perhaps one of the most important; but at the same time what I think is this: that supposing a captain meets a veseel towing with a lot of vessels in tow, his first duty, however many blasts there may be, is to stop and proceed with caution. I think there are occasions certainly where he might want to go under her stern in crossing, and that kind of thing; and, therefore, if he understood the towing signal he would know that he had to give her a wider berth. I think there are circumstances where it would be a useful signal.

370. I am only asking with regard to the value of, and necessity for, towing signals and the unlikelihood of the United States Government giving them up?—They never will give them up. I am certain they will not; they laid great stress upon that. They have more experience of them than we have, as they are accustomed to use towing signals.

371. And in this extract that I have given you you have the testimony of an intelligent British commander as to their value?—Certainly, I think so; but I think that is only an illustration of the fact that the objectors to these signals are frightened without any cause.

372. That is what I wanted to bring out?—That is my opinion; they are nervous about it.

Rear Admiral William J. L. Wharton, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

373. You are an Admiral of the Royal Navy, and you hold the position of Hydrographer to the Navy?—Yes.

374. You were a member, I believe, of this Rule of the Road at Sea Committee?—Yes, all though from the beginning.

375. Did you go to Washington?—No, I did not go to Washington; I was a member of the British committees that considered the subject both before and after.

vessel at anchor at sea," proposed at Washington, because I think it is of very great value. The other four signals I do not lay much stress upon, but there is no danger in them.

377. You would rather preserve the new rules intact, I suppose, than lose the chance of carrying any of the necessary reforms by other nations not agreeing to any alterations?—Quite so; that is what led us to agree to these, or led me to agree.

378. And you see nothing dangerous in the proposed new rules?—No.

379. Do you consider them necessary under the altered conditions of steam applied; do you consider that they have been rendered necessary by the change in steam and speed particularly?—Are you referring to (b) and (e)?

380. Yes?—The answer is, yes.

381. That is only a corroboration of what Sir George Nares said?—Yes.

Admiral Field.

382. As an officer of great experience and with the responsibility of command for many years, and in fogs, did you, as a naval man, ever desire to increase the number of fogs signals while you were so in command of a ship, and with your experience in fog?—I have felt the want of both (b) and (e).

383. We understand from the evidence given us by previous witnesses, that the United States will never give up (f); that is for a vessel towing?—I believe that is so.

384. No doubt that is a signal of growing importance; but, as regards the other three signals (g), (h), and (i), I understand you not to have very strong convictions as to their importance. May I ask you, following up your statement, would you have any great objection to bringing the telegraph ship signal three long blasts, under the towing signal, which is also three blasts, but one long and two short. Would not that be sufficient protection for the telegraph ship, and thus get rid of three blasts, and get rid of one signal, seeing that the merchant captains are apparently so strongly opposed to having so many?—I think the telegraph ship signal might be merged into one of the others; whether it would go best into the towing I do not quite know.

385. She is more or less captive if she is picking up a cable. However, you are of opinion that it might be merged?—Yes.

386. Then as regards (i) signal, "A vessel not under command." We have here four short blasts introduced, and we have it from Sir Charles Hall, and others, that they were of opinion (and apparently the committee so reported) that (b) and (i) might be blended into one?—Yes.

387. And it was so blended, at least by the conference at that time. Have you seen any reason to alter your view as to the blending of those signals being easy?—It was the British committee that proposed them, not the conference. When the British committee sat they reviewed the signals proposed, and that was the only proposal they did make to shorten them, that (i) should be merged into (b). But we gave that up (as has been before stated) in consequence of the representation being made that if we held to our objections the rule of the road would never become law at all.

388. I understand, I do not know whether I am correct, that Germany has withdrawn her objection to that blending?—I do not know; I am not aware of that.

389. Do you consider that it is essential to retain (g), "way off my vessel"?—I do not consider that it is essential to retain any of those; but in the circumstances under which we found ourselves, that we must either retain them or give up the whole of the revised rules, we were perfectly ready to accept them, feeling convinced that there was no harm in them; they may do somebody good, and they certainly will not do anybody harm.

390. Then, as an old officer, thoroughly acquainted with signals, I put this question to you: Seeing that (f), (g), and (h), "vessels towing," "way off my vessel," and "telegraph ship" are all three blasts, but varying in length, some long, some two long and one short, and some two short and one long; in your opinion, looking to the mercantile marine, and the way they are manned, a great many of them with a large infusion of foreign seamen, would an ordinary merchant seaman be likely to discriminate as to whether the signals were long or short, or two short and one long, or two long and one short; would he be likely to learn them intelligently?—I think it is quite possible that mistakes may be made as to what the signal is; but I cannot see that it would have any effect upon the action that the man hearing the signal will take, and therefore, although he fails to understand the signal it will have no effect upon his action, and it does not matter.

391. But in the serious position of a vessel towing, if confusion arises in interpreting that signal, might not the commander of the vessel be led into error?—I think not; I have thought very long over these signals, seeing the numerous objections that have been raised to them, and I think the ground for objection is that a mistake has been made in thinking that these signals indicate some certain thing to be done, whereas they do nothing of the sort; they simply indicate certain conditions under which the ship that gives them is; but that there would be any difference in the action of a ship bearing those signals I entirely fail to see. I try to put myself in the position of a ship hearing a vessel really giving the towing signal, and I mistake it and think she is a telegraph ship. I do not think it would make any difference in my action.

392. That would be an argument in favour of putting the telegraph ship under the towing signal, would it not?—It is generally in favour of my abstract view, that the multiplication of signals is unnecessary.

Mr. Parker Smith.

393. There were course-indicating sound signals proposed also; those you consider dangerous?—If you refer to those proposed at Washington, I do most undoubtedly.

394. You discriminate between those and these?—Yes.

395. You think that those would lead to danger?—Very great danger, I am sure; any mistake there would lead to different action.

396. But here you think a mistake could not change the action?—No.

397. You hear the signals, and if you do not understand them you are no worse off than you are under the present system?—That is my belief, always supposing that the ship is going to obey Article 16. We must start with the supposition that the ship is going to obey the regulations.

398. But the distinction that you draw between those and any other sound signals, is that you cannot be worse off with these signals, and you might be worse off with the others?—With these signals, if any sound is made you are precisely where you were. All you think is that there is a vessel in the direction from which the sound comes. If you mistake any of these signals, you will be precisely in the same position.

399. Have

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

399. Have you read Sir Charles Hall's evidence?—I have read part of it.

400. So far as you have gone, do you agree with what he laid before the Committee?—Yes.

401. Would you like to make any further statement upon the question submitted to us, as to the value of the opposition to those rules, whether it is increasing, and what points we ought to direct our attention to with regard to the opposition to these sound signals?—I would merely say that so far as I have been able to find out, from talking, as I have to do, to a good many people who are violently opposed to the new rules, I think they mistake the result of any misunderstanding of a signal. They have an idea that if a ship mistakes a signal, she will be under some liability, and there will be a penalty for having mistaken one signal for another. There is nothing of the kind in the rules, nor can I conceive that a court of law could so interpret these rules as to bring any burden upon a man supposing a collision took place afterwards, because he said, in his evidence, that he thought he had heard a signal for one thing, say towing, whereas it was a signal for a telegraph ship; because, as I say, there is no action to follow on these signals, except in every case extra caution. I think the opposition has misunderstood the whole bearing of these signals.

Admiral Field.

402. If it is contended by shipmasters that the signals, as here laid down, would be confusing to uninstructed minds on the high seas, where we say navigation is more or less open, would not that confusion be intensified as the traffic is converging, say, into the narrow part of the Irish Channel, say between the Tuskar and the Smalls, where a vessel might be in a fog with a number of vessels all round her, all making fog signals at the same time; would it be possible for any ordinary minded man to intelligently interpret those signals under those conditions?—I should think very likely not; but, as I said before, it will make no difference.

403. But is not that an argument in favour of reducing their number, if it can be done with international consent?—I certainly agree, if it can be done with international consent. We started with that.

Mr. Parker Smith.

404. As to the case of collision which you suggest, might it not seriously affect the position of the colliding ship, supposing the ship that has been run down is able to say, "I was giving this signal, which, if you had properly understood, you would have been able to escape me"?—I do not think so; I cannot see that it does.

405. Would it not create a fresh liability in such cases?—No, if they are merely signals of warning.

406. Take a telegraph ship; supposing a ship passed close astern, and cut the cable, whereas if she had understood that it was a telegraph ship she could have given a wider berth to it, and kept clear of her stern, might it not make a difference in the liability of that ship?—No ship has any right to try to go so near another one in a fog as to cut across her stern. I have thought over it, and I cannot see that any court of law could possibly hang a penalty on that.

407. You know better than I what cases are likely to arise, and you do not see that it can make any difference in the liability?—That is my opinion.

Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. INGRAM BATHURST WALKER, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

408. ARE you the Assistant Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade?—I am.

409. We have been referred to a letter of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association of the 20th September 1894, which is upon page 51 of the proof of correspondence before us; is the list of foreign countries who have objected to the new rules correctly given in that letter?—I think not. I do not think any of those four named in the list can be taken as objecting to the new rules. I may say that the figures which show the total tonnage of the mercantile marine owned by those countries have been taken from Lloyd's Register, and appear to be practically correct. First, as regards the United States, if I may take that, at the time when this letter from the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association was written, the United States Government had already issued a proclamation fixing the date when the new rules should come into force. As regards the opinion of the United States, I should like to refer the Committee to page 43 of the Blue Book, 6869. It is about the sixth line on page 43, and that is a report, which was sent here from the Government Department at Washington, in which, referring to Article 15, they say, "Referring to the proposed change in Article 15," that is the change proposed by the Board of Trade Rule of the Road Committee and the British Government, "which would omit Rule (i), and insert in (b) the words 'not under command,' the words should stand as presented by the International Conference." From that I think it can scarcely be said that the United States have objected to the rules. Next, as regards Belgium, I may say that no objection has ever been received in this country from Belgium. As a matter of fact, Belgium has on each occasion expressed her agreement with the decision of the Rule of the Road Committee. Then, as to Germany, at the time when this letter was written, in September 1894, the German Government had expressed its readiness to accept the new rules, with slight alterations. I would refer to page 33 of the proof of correspondence which is not yet presented. In that letter the German Government expressed its readiness to accept the new rules, with two slight reservations. Neither of those reservations dealt with Rule 15. One dealt with the provision forbidding crossing any iron warships in squadrons, and the other dealt with fishing rules or regulations, the consideration of which has been postponed.

410. None of them related to Rule 15?—None of them related to fog-signals. I think it only right to tell the Committee that since the question has been re-opened, at page 160 of that same paper, the German Government has practically brought forward some modifications which were suggested in 1892, but at the same time they expressed their opinion that it is important that the date upon which the rule should come into operation should not be much longer deferred; and in the latter part of the letter they expressly state that the Imperial Government would, at the same time, observe that it cannot be their intention, nor to their interest, to hinder a speedy agreement of identical regulations for the rule of the road at sea by continually reverting to former proposals.

411. You have now dealt with each of the four countries referred to?—Other than Great Britain.

sea on the ground that they were inopportune, uncalled for, and likely to bring about more collisions than there are at present.

413. Those objections pointed specially to Rule 15?—I pressed them for details, and they sent in detailed objections; and, among others, they objected generally that all sound signals are misleading in fogs, but they expressly objected to the signals which are known as (f) and (i). As regards (f), although they objected to it, they only objected to the particular sound, and suggested an alternative one.

414. At what page did they suggest that?—At page 28 of the Blue Book, 6869. On page 29, fog-signals, Article 15, the passage beginning, "The option given to a vessel."

Chairman.

415. Is that all the criticism which was made at that time by that association?—There is one more, under Article 15, beginning, "Whereas the proposed signals by different sounds are open to grave objections."

416. Were there any objections subsequently?—Those were in 1891. Those were the only objections we received that year. The Second Report of the Rule of the Road Committee, which had considered the objections, and also the representations of the Foreign Powers, was dated June 1892, and was published very shortly afterwards. No objections at all were received in the year 1892; but in 1893 objections were received from the Steamship Owners' Association, the Clyde Steamship Owners' Association, and the Irish Steamship Owners' Association, which are at pages 125 and 127 of the Blue Book, No. 6869. Not one of those two objections referred to Rule 13 and the fog-signals. The Rule of the Road Committee made their final Report in 1893, and the Admiralty expressed their concurrence, and steps were then taken to secure international agreement, after which a great many objections were received from the various shipowners' associations.

417. A great many objections after that were received to Rule 15?—I think mainly to Rule 15.

418. As to the objection to the other rules being either withdrawn or mitigated?—No alteration whatever has been made in the proposal since it left the Rule of the Road Committee.

419. Have the objections to the other parts of the rules been withdrawn, or ceased?—I do not think they have been withdrawn.

420. You have not had them repeated?—They are content with the ones we have received. They have been made.

421. You do not quite follow my question. There are, as you said, many objections since 1893 to Rule 15?—I was dealing only with Rule 15.

422. You have done with Rule 15?—Yes.

423. Have there been numerous objections since 1893 to other rules?—Yes, mainly to Articles 21 and 28.

424. Have those objections to Articles 21 and 28 been maintained up to the present?—We have not heard that they are withdrawn.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

425. I do not at all want to go into objections in this country; but can you shortly tell the Committee, as it stands now, the list of foreign nations who object, because there have been some alterations, and we are a little confused about which of the foreign nations are objecting to this Report?—At the present time?

426. As far as you know. It is partly a matter of opinion; but will you state it as far as you can tell us?—I am told that the only objections we have now are from Germany.

427. The answer to the main question which was put to you by the Chairman is that the list is not correct as it stands at present?

Chairman.

428. The list I put to you was contained in a letter of the 20th September 1894?—We are not talking of the same objections, I think.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

429. May I take it that only Germany objects?—That is so; and the Netherlands have reserved to themselves the right to open up other objections.

Admiral Field.

430. You said Germany is the only nation that now objects. Can you specify what points she lays great stress upon in making her objection?—It is contained on page 33 of the proof correspondence. I read them out just now.

Mr. Blake.

431. As I understand, the attitude of foreign nations towards the question is to be found in this paper?—Yes.

432. You are only attempting to give a summary of it?—Yes.

433. Is there anything she objects to as to Article 15?—There is a subsequent letter at page 160; I mentioned and referred to it just now.

434. She does object to Article 15?—Yes.

435. Practically, in consequence of the question being re-opened, they raise the objections which they raised in 1891?—Yes.

Mr. Cayzer.

436. I would like to ask whether you have seen a report of the leading shipowners to the Netherlands Government; they invited the leading shipowners to report on the rules of the road at sea in 1892. This is a Report of the Royal West India Mail Service, the Dutch Steam Packet Company, the Royal Dutch Steam Packet Company, the Steamboat Company of the Netherlands, the Dutch Shipping Company, the Royal Packet Shipping Company, the Dutch-American Steam Shipping Company, and the New African Commercial Company. This is a report to the Netherlands Government, and they say at Article 15: "We cannot deny but that the Washington Conference has earnestly endeavoured to secure a greater share of safety to ships in a fog; at the same time we think they have rather overdone it, and entertain great fears that the great number of sound signals as proposed are bound to bring about confusion, and thus add to the already existing dangers of collision"?—Yes; a copy of that report was sent to the Board of Trade by the Liverpool Steamship Association in March last, after the last Report of the Rule of the Road Committee, and after the British Government had communicated with foreign powers suggesting that a final settlement should be come to on the basis of their Report.

Chairman.

437. Is it among the papers we have?—Yes, it is printed among the papers.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

438. May I ask about the Netherlands Government; they, I think you said, also objected to the rules?—In the first place they did.

439. Are they in the condition of objecting at the present moment?—Their condition at the present moment is, I think, to reserve to themselves the right to reopen any of the objections, or bring forward any objections they think right, if the question is opened up again.

440. Have they given any indication as to what those objections would be?—Not in their subsequent letter. We can only refer to their letter on page 55 of the Blue Book 6869.

441. They merely reserve the right to object if they see fit?—Yes.

442. We have no further evidence of what their objections are?—Not any except the objections they made as far back as 1892.

443. They have not said that they maintain the same objections?—No, I think they only reserve to themselves the general right.

Sir DONALD CURRIE, a Member of the House; Examined.

Chairman.

444. I BELIEVE you are the representative of the Shipping Interest of London, and were the representative of the Shipping Interest in your communications with the Board of Trade as to the rule of the road at sea?—Yes, I was appointed at their meeting.

445. It was at your instance that this Committee was appointed by the House of Commons?—It is so.

447. Have you taken a great deal of pains in order to acquaint yourself with the views of those interested in shipping on this matter?—In the first instance I consulted the whole of our different captains and the different trading companies with which we are concerned, the mail steamers, and the Liverpool Line, and the Leith Line, and they all concur in the strongest expressions within the last nine months of objection to the proposed Board of Trade Regulations under the Washington Conference, as well as in respect of side lights. Further, I am President of the Shipping Exchange of London, the members of which own shipping up to 1,800 to 2,000, and they asked me to preside at the City meeting very largely attended by underwriters, shipmasters, and shipowners. I did so. The strongest possible resolutions were framed and passed unanimously against the proposed regulation under the Washington Rules, particularly with regard to fog signals and Clause 15, and there, subsequently upon being invited by the President of the Board of Trade to attend with a deputation on the claim that the objections should be on behalf of the whole shipping interest, and the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, the Shipmasters' Association of Great Britain, numbering 9,000 certificated captains, pilots, and the underwriters met together the day before that deputation, and they appointed me their spokesman, and we addressed the President of the Board of Trade on the 6th February as to our views. We protested that the Board of Trade, in opposition to the objections of the British shipowners and shipmasters, had spent two years in inducing foreign powers to approve of the proposed scheme, and had not asked British shipowners to produce evidence against the proposals until foreign approval had been obtained. Every shipowners' association and shipmasters' association in the country joined in this protest: the Chamber of Shipping; the Steamship Association of Liverpool; the shipowners there and in London, and the shipowners and shipmasters in Glasgow, Dublin, Leith, and elsewhere. The Chamber of Commerce and the Shipowners' Association of Hamburg, the Nautical Union of Berlin, the Nautical Union of Hamburg, and the Nautical Union of Sea Captains at that port; unanimously the German shipping joined with us, and the German shipowners authorised me to protest in their name at the deputation to the Board of Trade, and there we had present the representatives of the Hamburg-American Steamship Company and the North German Lloyd. Since that time the strongest representations have been made, as I can show the Committee, and with good results, to the German Government to prevent the German Government acquiescing in the proposals of the Board of Trade.

448. You spoke of a meeting being the commencement of the movement, and proceedings that you have referred to; when was that meeting?—As in 1875 I had been appointed to shape the opposition to the legislation proposed by the Government

Government of that day, which eventuated in the last Merchant Shipping Act of 1875, now the law of the land, they asked me to come forward again as President of the Shipping Exchange here, following the date of the meeting held in Liverpool, where the Lord Mayor had presided. I took the chair, as already mentioned to the Committee, and then subsequently all the associations together joined and asked me to be their spokesman, and we obtained from the President of the Board of Trade the sanction to a deputation. Subsequently, Sir William Harcourt, on behalf of the Government, agreed to my suggestion to the President of the Board of Trade, and that is why the Committee was appointed.

449. Can you tell us about the meeting first; how was it summoned, and whom did it consist of; I mean the meeting at which you presided; was it summoned by circular?—The meeting in London, when I presided as president, was summoned by the Committee of the Shipping Exchange of London at the request and earnest pressure of their members, and I agreed to take the chair; I took the chair; very strong speeches were made; they were published at the time, and I was pressed then to try and get a deputation accepted by the Board of Trade. At last the President did invite us, the members of this deputation, to go to him at the Board of Trade, and the result of it I have here.

450. I will ask you about that in one moment, but I rather wanted to go by steps. In the first place, as to the meeting, you say it was summoned by the committee of the Shipping Exchange?—By the committee of the Shipping Exchange, of which I am president.

451. What body does that represent?—It is an exchange where they meet together every day (all the shipowners generally, shipmasters, underwriters, brokers, and seafaring people) to discuss questions amongst themselves of charters, freights, and business engagements of one kind and another. It was formed a few years ago; there are about 1,800 members in the City of London.

452. Are the committee elected by the members?—The committee are elected by the members, and they elected me to be president a year ago, and I accepted it.

453. Have you got the proceedings of that meeting?—Yes, if you will allow me I will give you a report of the deputation.

454. I was asking about the meeting?—No, I have not. It was in "The Times" of the day.

455. It was shortly before this?—It was shortly before the deputation; that was the outcome of it.

456. It was the beginning of 1895; we can get that, I suppose, from "The Times"?—I will explain to the Committee this: at the time when the meeting was held all the Shipping Exchanges had focussed the ideas of shipowners immediately; for there had been some friction, I may frankly state, between the Steam Shipowners' Association and the shipowners of Liverpool and the Mercantile Marine Association and the Chamber of Shipping with the Board of Trade. There had been a long correspondence between them, with which I had nothing whatever to do, and I entered into the matter simply on its merits, and tried to smooth that feeling away, and obtain the deputation.

457. This happened in the beginning of 1895?—Yes; February last.

458. How was it that it started up into so much activity in the beginning of 1895 for the first time; how was it it had not been previously made the subject of correspondence?—There had been correspondence between these bodies and the Government; great dissatisfaction was expressed among them, and it was at last so marked that when we came to the matter of a deputation the Board of Trade asked the Mayor of Liverpool and myself to come with the deputation, which annoyed very much the shipowners of Liverpool, London, and elsewhere, and immediately the general objection which prevailed against the proposed legislation and rules was brought into a focus, and I took it in hand, to write for the shipping interests, though very unwillingly, as I have plenty to do.

459. From what you say, there seems to have been some feeling of annoyance and dissatisfaction?—Some feeling that they had not been fairly treated, in which I largely concurred.

460. There had been some friction between two or three of these bodies?—I thought it was unnecessary, and I tried to remove it.

461. That being the case, the meeting was followed by a deputation?—The deputation went to the Board of Trade. I might, perhaps, state the specific objections in a few words that I offered there, and I would have you understand that I had the full concurrence of the whole of the representatives.

462. In the first place, we want to get the proceedings, and then the nature of the objections I am going to ask you presently. The deputation took place; it was a deputation, as I understand, representing the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom?—You will see the names there; I will read them, if you will allow me.

463. I was reading the first line: "A large and influential deputation, representing the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom and numerous associations of shipowners, shipmasters, and underwriters," and then we have got the different bodies who are represented. After that deputation, you say that certain representations were made to the German Government?—No; I had authority, and I will read them in a few minutes, from the German shipowners to represent them at this meeting and state their views; and subsequently they, as I will relate in a few minutes, made their representations to the German Government, and I may be able to give you the result of that.

464. I am now asking about the representations that were made to the German Government by their own shipowners. Can you tell me the date of that?—On the 12th January 1895 Mr. Adolph Woermann, the chairman of the Hamburg Shipowners' Association, made representation to me as to their views, which I will read to the Committee. On the 2nd February 1895 Mr. F. Laeisz, who is the head of the Nautical Society, made his representations, and then on the 19th February he wrote to me to this effect, as the result of their action with the German Government subsequent to the deputation having met: "Berlin, 19th February 1895. Dear Sir Donald,—Thanking you for sending me the account of your deputation to the President of the Board of Trade, which I have read with the greatest interest. I can now report to you the following, which I have ascertained here. It is not true that England has been in a minority at Washington on any question beyond the most trifling details. The smaller States have invariably followed the lead of England. More particularly on the question of sound signals England has most certainly not been in a minority; on the contrary, Admiral Bowden Smith, one of the English delegates, has been the mover of the Article (15) as it now stands, and which has been carried against the opposition of Germany and some other countries. Admiral Bowden Smith, I am told, has also presided over the committee appointed by the British Government to consider the rules proposed by the Washington Conference. Mr. Bryce is incorrectly informed in stating that Germany has textually agreed to the rules respecting the sound signals. She has done so only after remonstrating in vain with the British Government about the dangerous nature of some of these stipulations. On the 20th July 1892 the German Government informed the British Government of their serious objections to paragraphs e and g, of Article 15, i.e., the most complicated of the sound signals, and only when the British Government, in answer thereto, submitted the rules adopted by their committee, and including all the sound signals, Germany acquiesced in order not to jeopardise the whole. Germany, I have reason to believe, will be but too glad to see the rules revised, and more especially to see England waive the obnoxious sound signals. I have also reason to believe that almost every other country will be equally ready to assent. The United States, I am informed, have suspended the coming into force of the rules until next autumn. I shall be glad if this information can be of any use to you, and I remain, dear Sir Donald, yours faithfully, C. Fred Laeisz, of Hamburg." He is president of the Hamburg Nautical Union.

465. I gather from that letter that all the countries, or nearly all the countries, are ready to assent to a revision of these rules?—He had information as to the views of Germany and the German Government itself; he expressed those to the shipowners; and as regards the world at large he had his own general ideas.

466. I do not know whether you yourself had grounds for believing that all the other countries are ready to revise these rules?—I am perfectly certain. One great country, called Siam, which has 2,500 tons of shipping, and had its representative at the Washington Conference, came to the meeting at which I presided in London, to which I have already referred, and declared his protest against the application of these Washington rules. Further, I had communications made to Russia to the commander of Cronstadt, who was the Russian delegate to the Washington Conference, and he wrote expressing his happiness that action was being taken; and the other day he wrote to his friend, and his letter I have, and will show it to you if you would like to see it, in which he says it is a good thing for the whole world at large, and for shipping generally, that there was a delay in the application of those rules, which he says the representatives of England had pressed upon the other powers.

467. You say that is a gentleman who represented Russia at the conference?—Yes.

468. Is it proper to ask for that letter?—I have not got it here, but I will show it to you with pleasure. It is a letter to another gentleman, but I think it is my duty to state it here.

469. Apart from that, there does not seem to be any ground for supposing that the other countries are willing to revise except Siam?—I will give another which is just before me now. Not in 1892 nor 1893, but in 1895, on the 4th April, I received a letter from Keller Wallis and Company, the largest foreign agents here for steamers, and it says this: "In view of the concern felt in England at the proposed alterations in the rule of the road at sea the inclosed report of the leading steamship companies in Holland, made by desire of the Netherlands Government, may have some practical interest for you." I know perfectly well that the Netherlands Government, through their shipowners, would be very glad to see some prudence exercised in these rules in their extended form, if they are extended in any way throughout the world. We want simplicity, and we think it is most dangerous, the proposals now made for such an extended application, for men to puzzle their brains and minds who are not thoroughly trained as to signalling at sea.

470. That letter which you read is the opinion of the shipowners?—It is of a shipowners' agent. He sends with it a printed paper, which refers to the views of the shipowners.

471. This is a letter from a gentleman who is the general agent, as I understand?—Yes, and the names of the companies and shipowners is at the end of it. He sent that to me uncalled for by me; I did not ask for it.

472. This is not an expression of the opinion of the Netherlands Government?—Not of the Netherlands Government. The names of the shipowners are at the end, and I have reason to think all these governments are thinking more seriously now of what their shipowners want and are paying absolute attention to it.

1888, said: "I have specially consulted the Trinity Brethren, and they say, what may be called the vagaries of sound in a fog are of the most astonishing character." I told the president that the shipowners want simplicity; they are willing to have uniformity, certainly international, and I suggested that Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 were objected to, as their use in the most frequented thoroughfares would only lead to a dangerous confusion of indistinguishable sounds; that we did approve of 1, 8, 9, and 10, and we thought there was quite enough for shipmasters to have in hand. There are 17,000 or 18,000 British ships generally at sea, I pointed out, and 9,000 of these shipmasters unanimously, through their associations, protested against these rules. Mr. Bryce, in his reply, said this to me: that the question of a fog signal was international. "I am perfectly willing to tell you," said Mr. Bryce, "my own opinion is, that I think it would have been better if fewer of these new rules had been introduced." I do not at all doubt that that was our view. He added: "It appears to me upon the first flush of the matter that it would have been better to have left the thing with some fewer rules." That was the opinion of our own committee, and it first recommended the omission of one of these rules as tending to confusion. I would here remark that I heard Sir Charles Hall state that there might be confusion, but not danger. Now, I have had a good deal to do with the subject for 50 years, and there is nothing more dangerous to a ship than for the captain or anybody else in charge to be in a state of confusion.

not a point for this Committee, but we do not want to have still further obligations which we believe and say practically, as practical men, cannot be carried out by us, and we appealed to the Board of Trade, who have not attended to it, and fortunately we have the opportunity before the international arrangement is finally made to appeal to this Committee.

475. You have stated very clearly your views about it, and you have said you would like us to ask the captains of ships, which we would do, but may I ask you this: Would your view be affected, supposing you were to be satisfied that foreign governments have all waived objections, or many at least have waived objections, in order, if possible, to come to a unanimous opinion, which must be rather difficult between a number of governments; would your judgment be affected as to the propriety of getting a universally good system which has caused so much pains and trouble on the part of those who produced it?—In the first place, I am certain that the foreign powers whose judgment is of any value at all will not object to the modification of these rules; and, in the second place, I may mention four of the powers referred to there (as to which I own more steamers than the whole four put together) I think their judgment is not of great importanc . Most of them only have small sailing ships, and we shipowners in Great Britain hold 64 per cent. (12,000,000) of the whole tonnage of the world, and I think the judgment of the shipowners interested in the mercantile marine of this country should largely outweigh the possibility on the part of other powers of perhaps falling in with something.

476. The Board of Trade and their representatives must take the views of the foreign governments from their own statements?—Certainly.

477. We must deal with the foreign governments; you deal with their shipowners?—Naturally the foreign government is the medium of communication; but I say this: having had the knowledge imparted to them, they would one and all agree to the representations suggested to this Committee and approved of by the shipowners of Great Britain.

478. That is the view you hold, and it is upon that ground you feel yourself quite free to press the objection?—It is for the interest of the country; I am not speaking from any partiality.

479. I would ask you to suppose that it was established, that there is really very great difficulty in getting a consensus amongst foreign powers, would not that affect your judgment as to the propriety of giving a trial to the rules which have been agreed?—I think the danger is so great that I would not give it a trial on any ground, and, further, the Board of Trade should not have pressed matters to such a position as to embarrass the shipowners by saying "Try it."

480. Of course we only want to get your opinion and information; you think the danger arises from the fact that there are a multitude of sounds in a fog?—Ten or 11. Four of them are very good, and could be improved later on; but instead of diminishing from 10 downwards, I should advise them to try from five upwards.

 481. What

481. What are the changes that you think should be made in the rules yourself?—I have mentioned them, and I will read them if I may, although I am not a sailor, and they will give you better reasons than I can; but if we take four we should like a prolonged blast.

482. Will you tell us about each rule, whether you object to it; there is Rule A.; what do you say about A.; do you object to it, or not; you see these rules at page 154, Article 15; do you object to Rule A.?—No. Mine is upon blasts, upon sound signals. I am not objecting to A.; that is moving out of the way of a ship that is close hauled.

483. Do you object to A.?—I am afraid these are different from ours.

484. "A," a steam vessel having way upon her, shall sound at intervals of not more than two minutes a prolonged blast; that is one of those you object to?—I cannot go into the technical points. As far as the evidence is concerned, that is different from what I have been considering here in the opinion I have before me with regard to blasts of sound signals. I would have to read this and study it.

485. Then I had better ask others?—If you please, I would rather you do so.

486. You have put your list according to the number of blasts?—Yes, it is the Steamship Owners' Association list which I was looking at, and you have it amongst your papers. It is much more important to the Committee to get the information from the officers as to the more technical points of navigation. I think I know what they are, but I would rather not confuse the issue.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

488. What proportion of shipping do the protesting owners of the Netherlands hold; you passed in a paper just now from the Netherlands shipowners protesting against these rules; I want to know what proportion of the shipping those men hold?—I do not remember the exact amount of their tonnage, but I have got all the rates here, and I will supply that to the Committee; it is easy to find it out.

Admiral Field.

489. I understood you to imply by your answer, or, rather, your statement, that there were 17,000 vessels and upwards, and there are 9,000 shipmasters interested in the settlement of this question, and that your ships represent 64 per cent. of the tonnage of the world; it is on that ground that you think the British objections should prevail with the other nations rather than that we should enter into an agreement, and the other nations object to that view?—I said there were 9,000 shipmasters in these associations making reports; but I was not saying there were only 9,000 shipmasters in the United Kingdom.

490. All that you would point out is that the shipping interest is favourable to the fullest consideration of the question?—I mean to say there has never been such unanimity amongst the British mercantile marine, whether underwriters, pilots, or captains of ships, or chief officers, or those in charge of navigation responsible for their certificates, and shipowners, as in this matter, where they feel that their dangers are largely increased, and that we shall have very serious embarrassment, we say, from the desire of some powers, who are not so largely interested as we are in maintaining our supremacy at sea.

491. At page 6 of the proceedings at that important deputation to the Board of Trade you point out the great importance of a ship at sea in a fog being able to indicate her position?—I made that as a suggestion that I thought was a practical one, namely, it is one more for practical men than myself, but I suggested it to the President, and I thought it was worth making; I did not ask that it should be inserted in the Washington Rules; several others I suggested.

492. You do not wish to express an opinion upon the special rules which have been submitted as to which should be omitted or not omitted?—I mention it from my point of view; the captains are in charge of that particular duty, and I have taken charge of the historical and national view, and prefer to keep out of the thing that I do not know so well as my neighbours.

493. I understand you to think that we ought to derive our information as to the real practical difficulties to be encountered from these rules from the men on the bridge?—Yes, and who are responsible.

494. You are about to tender the evidence of some of the captains of your own line?—At once; you are all aware that I have to go to jail for two years, under the Shipping Act of 1875, if I send a ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and I submit that I will send all these ships to sea in an unseaworthy condition if I send captains to sea who are not able to handle their ships in a fog, and who may run the ship into danger, just as if they were sent with a bad boiler. It is rather important for us that the Canadian shipowners are strongly with us on this matter, and I hope that you will receive evidence from the Deputy Minister of Marine, who has the general direction by his Government in Council to give evidence against the application of these rules.

Mr. Cayzer.

495. I think you told us that you have interviewed many of the foreign shipowners relative to

to these sounds in fog signals, and that the information you get from them is that the author of them was Admiral Bowden Smith, and their representatives at the Washington Conference protested against these new fog signals, but gave way to the British proposals considering they were the largest interest?—I have read a letter from the President of the Nautical Society of German Shipowners, in which he has stated from Berlin what are the facts of the case as referred to by Mr. Cayzer, and the letter itself shows to that extent, as far as Germany is concerned, it is quite true.

Sir Richard Webster.

496. As I gather, when you appeared before the Board of Trade, you were, practically speaking, representing other people's opinion with regard to some of the rules?—I was made the spokesman for all, and I spoke on the general behalf and with the approval and concurrence of them all.

497. You pick out 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7. That referred, did it not, to the letter of the 21st March 1894, from the Liverpool Steam Shipowners' Association, which is printed on page 11 of the Correspondence?—That is so.

498. And if the Committee compared 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 there with the rules which are altered, we shall find what you refer to?—That is it, exactly.

499. You do not desire to put this forward as a witness of expert opinion as to the difficulties that may arise?—No, I would rather leave that to those who are responsible.

500. We must have it clear; you are not to be quoted as an expert witness as to confusion which may be apprehended, or which may be brought about by these rules?—So much so, that I wrote to that effect to the Secretary of the Committee to say that the technical evidence and practical evidence would be given by others. I offer no opinion, and would rather not be involved in a discussion about them.

501. Your position is that you do not want to have it said that you were a witness as an expert against them?—I think it is better for the Committee to have better information. The steamers of our line, running round the Land's End from Liverpool to Hamburg once a week, have done so for over 20 years without any injury, and frequently in fogs. I have asked the Liverpool Office, with your sanction, to give one of their captains leave to come here and give a few minutes' evidence as to their experience in coasting round the Land's End and in the Channel in fogs.

Mr. Roby.

502. Am I right in understanding that your great objection is that the mercantile marine have not been consulted, and yet are the most concerned?—That is a grave objection on their part, producing the sense of injustice which caused the friction to which I referred, between them and the Board of Trade, into which I entered for the sake of pacification, and to enable them to have a little more certainty in the shipping business of the world.

Mr. Roby—continued.

503. I understand you to say also that the great objection that you represent here is that the multiplicity of these signals will not be readily worked by a large number of the mercantile marine?—It is an impossibility, I hold; an absolute impossibility. It is very well for the admirals to come here and give evidence, or to speak as they did in my presence before now. I could name some of the best admirals in the British Navy who are entirely of my opinion in this matter; but admirals and officers of the Navy have their men continually with them; and will the Committee just bear in mind for one moment that they pay off their men after three years' service or longer, and I have to pay my men off, according to the Merchant Shipping Act, every trip, and I am not allowed to engage sailors for a year, three years, or five years. I have to pay them off every trip, however well they behave. The "Norham Castle" coming in lately, every man was paid off, but they do not leave the service. Admiral Hoskins spoke to seven of the men, and he found there was not one less than seven years in the service; but they cannot be trained, because they are not bound, and they are in different ships from time to time of our service. I think it is unreasonable to suppose that the conditions are the same for the admirals. They have their officers specifically set aside for the purpose. Our officers cannot do it; the men have not time for it, hardly time to get their meals.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

505. Do you recollect whether there was any consultation before the meeting at Washington?—I believe there was; but the great complaint of the shipowners has been that they have not been consulted except in a certain way; not with a desire to meet their views, but from an opposition point of view, and with the view to impose Board of Trade regulations, which makes the shipowners very dissatisfied. They contend that they have not been properly dealt with; they have had reason for complaint.

506. Had the British shipowners any idea that such large alterations were to be made in fog signals, before the Washington Conference?—I do not think they had, and if they had known what was going on they would have presented it there.

507. The British shipowners did not contemplate such alterations being made at Washington?—No.

508. With regard to foreign shipowners, and to their protest against these rules as they are now represented (we know of Germany and Holland) have we any specific objections from the shipowners of any other countries?—I believe even in America there is opposition, but, inasmuch as there is a great deal of traffic and trade in the bays and rivers of the United States, and they have not such a large ocean traffic as we have, there has not been the same manifestation as there is in Germany, where they are very strong, as I have read.

509. Do you know of any protest coming from the Scandinavian Government?—I do not. Be it remembered that they have very small sailing ships. I may say upon that, I think I might read a very important letter from Germany, which is prior to this meeting, in which Mr. Adolph Woermann, the great shipowner, as chairman of the shipowners' association, states specifically their reasons against the sound signals.

510. The German Shipowners' Association?—Yes; and he represents the whole shipping trade. "During my recent stay in London you told me that you would wish to hear the view which shipowners and captains had here with regard to the proposed alterations in the Rules of the Road at Sea, intended to be introduced by the British Board of Trade, especially with regard to the sound signals for fog. I may state herewith, that since the year 1891, after the Resolutions passed in the Washington Conference were known, both our Chamber of Commerce and our Association, and also the Nautical Union," whose letter I have read, "and the Union of Sea Captains have taken every opportunity of protesting most energetically against the introduction of the sound signals. All these associations have pointed out that those signals were not only most unreliable, but that their introduction would be absolutely dangerous. It would, in the first place, be impossible to state exactly what a prolonged blast and what a short blast was; according to the scientifically proved laws of the nature of the sound, it was quite certain that very frequently sounds could not be heard in certain districts or various distances from the source of the sound; and that therefore it would be quite impossible to rely upon the sounds being heard always and in all places, and to make out whether it was a short or long blast. At the same time, it was said that it would be difficult to the captains to know the various signals by heart, while it would entirely be impracticable to refer each time to the table of signals in order to ascertain the meaning of each signal. Besides these points, it was mentioned that very often, owing to the insufficiency of steam whistles on most of the steamers, which do not produce a loud sound on the first pull of the whistle, but let the steam rush out for several seconds without giving a loud sound, it would be even impossible to the signalling captain to say when the sound actually began. There are also serious objections here with regard to the introduction of the new side-lights proposed by the Board of Trade, and all the associations above referred to have decidedly opposed this proposal. I hope that the agitation of the British shipowners will succeed in preventing the final introduction of such very dangerous changes in the present Rules of the Road; and remain, dear Sir, yours very truly, Adolph Woermann, Chairman of the Hamburg Shipowners' Association." These two gentlemen are the most important shipowners, and they represent the whole shipping interest of Germany; and in the letter of the 2nd February, 1893, the same year, this was said to me by Mr. Laeisz: "You are well aware that all our nautical men are unanimous in their concurrence with the views you have so forcibly and convincingly expressed about the complications of the sound signals of the Board of Trade."

Captain MATTHEW PEDDEN WEBSTER, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

511. ARE you in what is popularly called the Donald Currie Line; the Castle Line?—Yes.

512. Trading to the Cape?—Yes.

513. And to Natal?—Yes.

514. Have you been a long time captain of one of these vessels?—I have been with Donald Currie and Co. in command for 23 years, and in command of other ships for five years; altogether more than 28 years in command.

515. As we all know, these are very large ships?—Yes, large ships.

516. Have you had your attention drawn to the new proposed sound signals for fogs?—Yes, I have.

517. I do not know when you considered them. Have you been considering them long?—Yes, ever since I heard of them: but I heard nothing of them until they had been passed by the Washington Conference.

518. Will you give us, if you please, your opinion upon the point of the propriety of these rules, and whether they are likely to induce danger?—Yes, I do think so.

519. Will you tell us in your own way what you think about them?—I think it will be a great mistake to multiply the signals we have already got for use in a fog. Practically, for a steamship under way, we have now only one signal, and that is what is named here (a); a steamship having way upon her shall sound at intervals of not less than two minutes a prolonged blast. That is the only signal we have, and that, I think, is ample for a fog. If you increase the signals you are bound, in my opinion, to increase the risk of collision.

520. What leads you to think that; will you give us your reasons?—In the first place, that the one signal that you have got, the moment that you hear another ship giving the same signal, one blast, every prudent shipmaster stops, and the other ship stops too. You feel your way. He gives a blast, and probably after some time time you are able to determine the locality of that signal, and you are very careful; but if you get these other signals you will make officers think that they have a right, by giving those signals, to move on.

521. Is there not another rule, Rule 16, which contains a provision upon that subject. Just see if that does not contain a provision: Rule 16 says a steam vessel having apparently forward of her beam a fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over. That rule is a new rule in addition to Rule 15?—Yes; that is supposing all the rules under Article 15 are in force. That is a thing you have to be careful of; how is it possible to tell if that signal is abeam? You hear a noise. How are you to tell it is abeam? It is a well-known fact that you cannot locate a fog signal; in fact, the Board of Trade themselves issue a notice to mariners warning them against placing reliance upon the apparent location of a sound. Perhaps there are six ships surrounding you; you are hearing six blasts, and yet the words of the Board of Trade notice to mariners are:—"Sound is conveyed in a very capricious way through the atmosphere. Apart from sound, large areas of silence have been found in different directions and different distances from the signals, in some instances even when in close proximity to the sound signals. The mariner should not assume, first, that he is out of ordinary hearing distance because he fails to hear the sound; second, that because he hears a fog signal faintly, he is at a great distance from it; thirdly, that he is near it because he hears the sound plainly; fourthly, that the distance from, and the intensity of, the sound on any one occasion is a guide to him for any future occasion——"

522. What are you reading from?—I am reading from a notice issued by the Board of Trade to mariners: "Fifthly, that a fog signal has ceased sounding because he does not hear it, even when in close proximity."

523. Those are the conditions under which you have at present to act as best you can?—This is a special notice from the Board of Trade warning mariners against putting reliance in a sound signal; and, as a matter of fact, I think we have six new signals introduced here.

524. I wanted to ask you about what you were saying, in order that the Committee may appreciate it. You said that if the new signals were added to the old signal, that a captain would think himself at liberty, when he heard some of these new signals, to go on instead of doing what he ought to do, to stop?—I am afraid that would be the tendency, that what has been in the mind in making all these new signals is not only for safety in a fog, but that you can navigate in a fog; my contention is that we should not navigate in a fog.

525. But supposing there is a rule also, which we will assume ought to be added, forbidding you to navigate in a fog unless you were perfectly clear where the sound was, and knew exactly, do you not think that would prevent that particular objection?—I am afraid not, from the fact that it is impossible to be certain where the sound is.

526. Your view is that whenever you are in a fog you ought not to navigate at all?—Certainly not, when you know a ship is near.

527. I thought you said that, as soon as you were satisfied, after waiting a little, where the other ship was, you might navigate?—No doubt then, if both ships are stopped and we continue blowing our whistles, probably after a time we are in absolute certainty that one of the whistles has gone past us, and we have passed each other; that may be so, but the difficulty on the bridge of a steamer is that many a time have I been with two officers on a bridge in a fog, and a whistle has sounded, and I have said, Where is that sound? One officer would say, It is there, and another would say, No, it is out there, and I would say, No, it is out here, to my mind.

528. I think that has been shown to us, but the point you were putting at the time was, as I understood it, that the number of the rules would tend to make men less cautious than they should be in navigating in a fog?—I am afraid it would have that tendency; I am afraid the men would think those rules were specially laid down to allow them to navigate in a fog.

529. And though it is dangerous to navigate in a fog, it would encourage them to do so?—That is my view.

530. Tell us any other objection that you have about it?—The other objection I have is one on which surely every person must be agreed. My opinion, as I say, is that we should have none of these, but simply have the rule that we now have; but supposing that is over-ruled, and that it is determined that we shall have some extra sound signals for fog, surely every person must agree the fewer we have the better. In those new signals take, for instance, (h) and (j); (h) says a vessel employed in laying or picking up a telegraph cable shall, on hearing the fog signal of an approaching vessel, sound, in answer, three prolonged blasts in succession; (i) is a vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel, through not being under command or unable to manœuvre as required by the rules, shall, on hearing the fog signal of an approaching vessel, sound, in answer, four short blasts in succession. The last one is a ship disabled for a moment, and from some reason she cannot manœuvre. A telegraph ship laying a telegraph wire, or picking it up, is in the very same position. Why have two signals for the same thing? She is a ship that cannot manœuvre. Why multiply the signals unnecessarily?

531. That is, you would like to apply the one rule to the telegraph ship?—She is a ship that cannot manœuvre; she is identical with the other one.

532. You would dispense, in any case, with one rule relating to telegraph ships?—Yes, certainly; she is a ship in the same position as the other; she cannot manœuvre.

533. Telegraph ships, in fact, I suppose you are not very constantly meeting?—I never met one in my life, I mean never laying a cable. Of course, I have met a telegraph ship.

534. I want to ask you in what other way, besides what you have told us, the new rules would lead to danger. You think they would lead to danger?—Yes.

535. In the first place, because they would encourage people to navigate when they should not navigate in a fog; in what other way do you think they would lead to danger?—By their sense, for a certainty, being misunderstood. Supposing in very narrow waters you are surrounded by ships, as it sometimes happens; for example, it frequently happens in the Thames that fog comes down just like a mantle thrown down at once; with a big ship, supposing you are going down on an ebb tide, you cannot drop your anchor instantaneously, because you would probably tear away all your hawse pipes; you would probably do a lot of damage. The consequence is that you must try and get your ship round to head the tide before you anchor, or partially head the tide, and in going round there are a dozen of these different sounds where you have the one sound just now, which is all that is required to know that it is a ship there, or if you hear a bell, to know that it is a vessel at anchor; but supposing you have at once six extra sounds all sounding about you, I do not know about creating confusion, but I think you would have to increase the size of your asylums here for the masters on the bridge of these steamers.

536. There being five or six other ships about, and if they were all sounding the prolonged blast, it would not afflict you so much as if they were all sounding different signals?—No, because we know the blast is the one signal for a vessel under way now, and we know the sailing ship is a horn; we know that a vessel at anchor is a bell. It is the one thing; it does not matter which, but with the new fog signals your mind would be strained to make out what signal is that, what is this, and what is the other. It would be impossible to tell what they were, and it would lead to endless confusion, and, consequently, I think, to more collisions.

537. You were speaking, particularly in this instance you gave, of river navigation; of the tidal River Thames?—Yes, but the same thing occurs out in the ocean. There are tracks of the ocean round Finisterre, when you are going down to the Mediterranean, a place where fogs are very prevalent, and I have seen 20 ships within a radius of one mile there frequently.

538. Just describe, if you will, as distinctly as you can, in what way you think the difference between these new signals and the other signals would tend to increase the danger in a situation like that. Do you mean if they were old signals only you would be able to discriminate between the vessels, and you would know there was a steamship under way and a sailing ship at anchor?—Quite so; that they were under way, and you would not have to study what the different signals meant, and, as I have already explained, the multiplication of those fog signals, when you cannot allocate the direction that the sound is coming from, must be confusing.

539. Two naval officers have given us evidence about that, and they told us that though, in the multiplicity of sounds, if there were a great many ships, it might be difficult to distinguish one signal from the other, at the same time the quantity of sound there is all round you would tell a cautious man to navigate very carefully; in fact, to stop his engines, and, for that reason, it would be a warning and caution to him, even though he could not distinguish the sound. What do you say about that?—I do not know. I think those signals, if adopted, would decidedly create great confusion in the mind of any person on the bridge of a steamer. There is no position in life where a man requires to have a cooler head than on the bridge of a steamer in a foggy, dirty night in the Channel, or anywhere else; no position in this life that you would require greater coolness; and, if you pass any rules that will create confusion in the mind of that man, then you are undoubtedly increasing the risk of collision.

540. This is what the naval officers tell us, I think in substance, that if a master of a ship heard all these sounds all round, whether he could distinguish or not what each particular sound was, if he was a sensible man he would stop his engines?—So we do with the one signal. What is the good of having those other six when we do that with the one?

541. I was not asking you what the good was. I was rather asking if the man was a prudent master, when he heard all this dreadful sound round him, and he could not distinguish the sound, I suppose he would stop his engines as you do now?—We do so now.

542. That is what these officers told us, and I want to know your answer to it. I want to know what your idea is about that which those distinguished men have told us. They have said there might be confusion from the effect of these different sounds on the mind, but there would be no danger, because a prudent man would do what he would do now; that is to say, he would stop the engines. How would that increase her danger if he did that?—Because by these rules you are given in different positions to do different things; and, as I have said before, it seems to me that nine-tenths of the coming shipmasters will say those rules are made for navigating in a fog, and they would not be so careful.

over here, and I go into her. There is a rule that is absolutely telling you that you are to navigate in a fog.

544. You would take that rule only to apply to cases where the vessel sounding the signal was ascertained, and where you felt really perfectly certain?—Yes, it ought to apply to that; but the great difficulty is, as we experience, to avoid what happened the other day, where one of our ships touched the Eddystone Rock by the sound being away in a different direction.

545. I quite appreciate, that and you have told us another also, that a sound is very misleading in a fog; but you are not bound unless you feel perfectly certain, Rule 8 does not compel you or order you to feel your way past the other vessel?—Surely, when you make a signal for that purpose it is an inducement to you to go on.

546. You think that would operate as an encouragement if you could do what you would not do if you only had the one long blast?—Yes, I might be mistaken in the direction of the signal and it might lead to trouble.

547. Is not the substance of your apprehension this: that these rules may operate to induce captains of ships to navigate by the sound?—Partially that is so, but also that the present rule has acted admirably well, and I cannot see why you should multiply those sounds when they are apt to lead to confusion.

548. Is there any other criticism you would like to make upon it?—No, not within that rule.

549. It is only Rule 15 we are discussing, and, of course, Rule 16 relates to Rule 15; is there any further criticism you would like to make?—I think if you took a great number of shipmasters, and asked whether they thought it necessary to have other fog signals, probably you would have found that the large majority of them would have said, "Well if we are to have anything else, have the signals that are now optional when ships are seen." That is Article 28. There are three signals that every seaman understands perfectly; that is, one short blast, port; two short blasts, starboard, and three short blasts, going astern. Everyone understands that. If it were necessary to give us more fog signals, I think it would have been better if we had acted in that direction than to give us new ones.

550. You mean you would have applied, in the case of a vessel in a fog, the signals you have in case of vessels in sight?—Yes; as a matter of fact, it is very often done in a fog. I have heard vessels do it again and again.

551. Has it led to difficulty, their using these other signals?—I do not think it does, greatly; but I think the real fact is that in a fog, when it is possible, the proper thing is to anchor. If it is not possible, you ought to drift.

552. Those being signals you have referred to for vessels in sight of one another, are they course-indicating signals?—To a certain extent they are. One is, I am porting; the other is, I am starboarding; and the other is, I am going astern. You might say they are course-indicating.

Chairman—continued.

553. If they have been course-indicating, to use them in fogs has a greater tendency to affect a master's coolness, has it not, than merely to apply other signals?—I am not advocating their use at all; but I say, if it was found necessary to have other fog signals, in my opinion it would probably have been better to have introduced the signals that are already well known and well understood.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

554. You desire the fog signals to remain as they were before the Washington Conference?—Yes, just the one signal for a steam vessel under way.

555. Supposing that Great Britain, for instance, adhered to that, and other nations, say the United States and other nations, adopted the Washington Conference rules and the proposed new signals, would not that make much more confusion at sea than the general adoption of the new signals or the universal adoption of the new signals?—Undoubtedly; but if you ask my opinion, I think it is very probable you would find all the other countries would follow whatever you do now.

556. I do not want you to think of probabilities, because I am afraid there are probabilities the other way; I want you to tell me if you think if that were to be done it would not make more confusion at sea than the universal adoption of the new signals?—Why should two-thirds of the shipping of the world be forced into a thing by the other third?

557. I am afraid that is not an answer; we all feel that?—My answer, if you wish me to answer that question is, that it would cause more confusion undoubtedly.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

558. Have you spoken of this to other captains and other officers in the mercantile marine; I do not mean the Navy?—Yes, very largely.

559. Have you found one of them in favour of the rules?—Not one; I have not heard one practical man in favour of them. I must qualify that by saying that I certainly have found naval men; but the navigation of warships and our mercantile marine are utterly different things. You have highly qualified officers on board the men-of-war, and you have an officer for everything. On board a man-of-war you would have an officer to attend to those signals specially. An officer on board one of our ships has to do everything.

Admiral Field.

560. Perhaps it may be a comfort for you to know that the naval officers are in sympathy with you in every way, but I want to ask you a question. I think your main objection to most of these signals rests on this: you would not suffer very much if it was only an isolated ship in a fog, but it is because where traffic converges, say at Finisterre or at the entrance to the English Channel round the Fastnet, that then the number of ships would cause a confusion?—Yes.

561. There is one important signal here, B.; I want to know whether you share the opinion of

Sir Robert Molyneux, who, in answer to a question from myself about the signal "B," "two long blasts, stopped," said that he looked upon that signal as of very great importance, and is quite certain it will save life and property. Have you any objection to those two prolonged blasts being maintained to indicate that a vessel is stopped. You have given your opinion if there was a crowd of shipping; but supposing you were meeting only one ship, it would be a great advantage to you, would it not; it would not increase your danger?—In answering the question of the gentleman just now, I have been stating generally that I would rather have no alteration; but if it becomes a question that we have to accept some of them, if there is a compromise to be made, then, of course, that is a different matter. Undoubtedly there are three of them there that I think are absurd. That would be one probably that I would retain.

562. I want to pin you to that "B" signal. I think you would agree with most practical men that, if you could be sure of that, that would be an advantage?—Yes, if it is necessary at all, but I still do not think it necessary.

563. You would not be in a worse position by having it there?—No.

564. It may comfort you to know that the signals "E," "G," and "I" are objected to by Germany?—Yes, I think the signal for a vessel at anchor is an absurd thing. In "E," in my opinion, you are hearing two blasts of a whistle, then you suddenly hear a bell, and it is all from the same ship. You first have the two blasts, then a bell. Why not a bell? A bell answers very well to anchor. The only thing is, it perhaps does not make noise enough at times.

565. I want you to turn your attention to signal "I," "not under command," and then to signal "B"; it has been thought that those two, at all events, might be blended?—That is one of my objections, the interval of one second between those. You might get the short blast continuous (that is my meaning)—general confusion.

566. Will you take signal "B"; we are told on authority that the United States will never give up that signal, "Vessel towing"?—If we are to have anything there is no doubt that we ought to have one to indicate a vessel in tow.

567. You would not object to that?—I do not know that that would be the best form, but there is no doubt we ought to have some indication. If we are to have any additional fog signals, that is about the most important thing, a vessel in tow.

568. Then, the telegraph ship, you have already said, is an imaginary danger?—Yes.

569. Then it might be blended into signal "B"?—It might be blended into "I."

570. You would abolish "I," and blend "I" with "B"?—Yes.

571. You would blend telegraph signal "H" with "F," the vessel towing and the telegraph ship?—Quite so.

Mr. Blake.

572. I would like to ask you this in reference to these new signals: do they, as a general rule, indicate a greater or less condition of danger than the condition of the signalling ship being under way, being under steam, and moving in the water?—I do not just follow your question.

573. You have a signal for a vessel towing?—Yes.

574. You have a signal for a vessel at anchor in a fairway. You have a signal for a cable ship, which might be blended with another, but still it is a different condition to a vessel not under command. Take this class of cases, which is intended to be indicated by these new rules, do they as a rule indicate a condition of greater danger which requires greater precaution than the other condition which is to be left untouched?—I do not think that they do, but they would lead, in my mind, to greater danger.

575. I do not say the signals, but I say the condition of the ship which is attempted to be indicated. Would you be more cautious or less cautious; would you feel you had more to do?—I think if you were surrounded by a lot of ships, and they were all blowing off signals——

576. I am not speaking of any number of ships, I am speaking of one ship for the moment. I want to know whether the condition attempted to be indicated by special signals is, in your judgment, a condition which would demand greater caution on the part of a navigator than the condition of a vessel being under command, going through the water, not being at anchor, not having a ship in tow?—You are speaking, of course, of a fog. These signals are made in a fog in distinction to one signal we have now. I do not think that it would conduce to more caution. You say you have not a number, only one sound. You say that I hear two or three blasts, whatever it may be, only from one; I am surrounded by ships. In that case, I think that those rules would rather induce you to go on navigating when probably you would otherwise stop.

577. You think you would have less inducement as a prudent man to be cautious and stop navigating when you knew that it was a ship you were approaching that had a tow, for example, or a ship not under command?—I think so. I would probably find I was mistaken.

578. You tell us that you would go on more boldly?—I am afraid these rules would conduce to that.

579. I am talking of a cautious man. Supposing you truly recognised the signal and found out what it was, would you be more or less careful about moving when you knew the ship you were approaching was a ship that had a tow or a ship at anchor in a fairway?—If you knew exactly where the ship was.

580. You do not know that with the present signal?—You do a ship at anchor, perfectly; the only case that we do not know is the towing.

581. I thought you said just now that you did not know in a fog where the ship was?—At anchor.

582. But you cannot recognise where the sound comes from, and, therefore, you do not know where the ship is?—Perfectly, but we have a signal for it.

583. But

Mr. Blake—continued.

583. But it does not tell you where it is?—On that point, with the signal that you spoke of just now, I cannot tell where it is either; I thought you said we had located where it was.

584. No, not located where it was, but had become informed of what the signal was. You have a permanent difficulty of not knowing where it is, but you recognise the two short blasts and the long one, whatever it may be?—Any prudent shipmaster in navigating the ship in a fog, whether you have a dozen signals or one, of course, is bound to stop and be very careful. I do not suppose, having a lot of things, you make much difference.

585. You do not think a man would be less cautious; you think he would be rather more cautious in the confusion of sounds?—If he has a very great number of sounds he will not be so cool in his head over it.

586. That is all?—It is a very great "all." I have already said I know no position in life where a man requires to be cooler than on the bridge of a steamer on a foggy night.

587. I agree; but I understood you to say, that the one duty of a prudent mariner in a fog was to stop and drift, not to navigate the ship. I do not at present see why, because the confusion of sounds is aggravated, and they are all round him in every quarter, he should be disposed to go on any more than when there was only one sound from one ship?—Supposing he hears sounds all round, and he knows there are a very great number of imprudent people in this world, and they may be coming to him, he cannot distinguish; he cannot get away from them, and he is there in absolute confusion.

Sir Richard Webster.

588. Under the present condition of things, the only rule of navigation in a fog is that you are to go at moderate speed?—Yes.

589. We ought to add one other general rule, that in obeying these rules due regard should be had to all dangers of navigation, which, of course, would include fog?—Yes.

590. There was no rule about the vessel which was being approached in a fog stopping at all, was there?—Yes.

591. The old rule was only going at a moderate speed; just look at the old rule, Article 13: "Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall, in a fog, mist, or falling wind, go at moderate speed." I want to ask you a question about new Article 16. There was no rule directing a ship to stop in a fog at all?—I think there is in the old rules.

592. You are thinking of the rule about approaching and involving risk of collision; there is no rule in a fog you will find. Suppose you hear nothing in a fog, you are allowed to go at a moderate speed?—That is one point that I have often thought was a mistake; the words "moderate speed" ought to be defined.

593. I want to bring out your opinion about that. Are you aware that it was decided that if a captain hears a fog signal on his bow, and he thinks it is, say, two or three points, and does not stop at once, that he will be held to be blamed?—I think in practice we would all do it.

594. In practice, if you heard a signal which was two or three points on your bow, in a fog, from a steam whistle, you, as a prudent captain, would stop?—Yes.

595. You know what a passed ship means very well?—Yes.

596. You know her, when you can see a light broad enough on your beam, to be passed?—Yes.

597. Do you not think it a prudent thing that there should be a direction to tell a man in a fog that he was to stop if he was not satisfied it was a passed ship?—Not if we say that everyone really does stop the moment they hear any fog signal.

598. I perfectly understand you, and I wanted to bring out your opinion, and it seems to me you answer it as I wish. If you heard a fog signal away on your bow you would stop at once?—Yes.

599. Unless you saw she was clear of you?—Yes.

600. Let me call your attention to Article 16, which bears on these signals: "A steam vessel, hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over"; do you not think that is a good rule; that is what a practical seaman would do, or what you yourself would do?—Yes, that is really what we do do.

601. Now, let us go back to the fog signals; there is a broad distinction between crowded waters and open sea, is there not?—Certainly.

602. You will agree, as a practical navigator, that no prudent man would think of navigating when he heard fog signals round him?—Certainly not.

603. He would stop at once?—If there is an anchorage he ought to anchor.

604. Or, if he cannot anchor, he ought to stop?—Yes.

605. When it is put to you about being confused with a number of sounds, one ahead, one on the port bow, one on the starboard, you would stop and anchor if you could?—Anchor if you could.

606. Let us consider not that condition of things, but the condition of navigating in comparatively open waters; I mean in the ocean, and hearing one signal only. You are aware that a prolonged blast is an understood signal at the present time?—Yes.

607. I will read you the present rule: "A steamship under way shall make with her steam whistle or other steam, sound signals at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast." That you have no difficulty in understanding at the present time?—None whatever.

608. It has worked well?—It has worked well.

609. You have also told us that the course-indicating rules when vessels are in sight, one short

short blast, two short blasts, and three short blasts, are perfectly well understood?—Yes.

610. You have never had any difficulty in distinguishing between a prolonged blast and a short blast, have you?—I have never had the two combined.

611. Do not misunderstand me. I am merely saying, with the blowing of the prolonged blast which is now used, you never had any difficulty in distinguishing that from the short blasts which are used in the helm rules, had you?—No, because the one is used in a fog, the other was used when you saw the vessel.

612. I will ask you a question about the application of the short blast rules directly. I want to follow out the question put by Admiral Field. Just imagine that you have got in a fog one prolonged blast, surely it would be an advantage to know whether that vessel was actually under way; that is to say, had way upon her or whether she was stopped?—I say, as a matter of fact, if you are yourself going at a very moderate speed, the moment you hear a blast from a whistle or any signal, a prudent shipmaster, knowing the signal or the sound may be all round, stops at once, and the other ship does the same.

613. We all assume that, and we are not making rules for gentlemen of your experience, but for other people. Would it not be an advantage to a man who hears one prolonged blast to know whether that vessel had any way upon her or was stopped in the water?—If it could be absolutely conveyed to him, yes.

614. It would be an advantage?—Yes, if it could be conveyed without the slightest difficulty.

615. What confusion can possibly be introduced by a vessel that is stopped giving you two prolonged blasts instead of one?—Supposing there are half a dozen vessels round; supposing you are off the Isle of Wight, and there are half a dozen vessels, and they commence blowing off horns round you.

617. That would probably lead to a rule that vessels are not to navigate at all where there are a number of fog signals. I wanted to know if you could tell me, as a practical man, any danger that would be caused by your being told that a vessel whose fog signals you hear is not making way through the water?—If I could understand the signal, certainly it would be an advantage, but you are assuming I only have one ship near.

618. Now, I want to ask you about towing; vessels tow under very different circumstances, do they not; that is to say, a vessel may tow with a very considerable length of hawser out?—They tow under different circumstances out at sea and in a waterway like the River Thames.

619. Do you not think in a fog it would be an advantage to be told that a vessel that was signalling you had something fastened on to her?—I have already said yes.

620. If that signal could be given without confusing you, it would be a prudent thing?—Yes.

621. Do you think that one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts would not be a signal readily distinguishable, bearing in mind what you said to me about prolonged blasts being well known. Do you think that one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts would not be a signal readily comprehensible?—I fear that if you are hearing a lot of them you might take it for two prolonged blasts, the one long blast and two short ones.

622. You are always coming back to the question of hearing a lot of them, and I quite understand your view; but what I am putting to you is that the vessel that is signalling to you desires to tell you that she has something in tow. Do you really think that one blast followed by two short blasts, supposing there were only two, could be a misleading signal?—Yes, I do; in many circumstances it would. With the interval of a second between the two short blasts you might easily mistake those for two long blasts.

623. One word about the anchorage: You do not like the bell being mixed up with the steam whistle?—Certainly not.

624. For all anchorage purposes a bell is as good as a steam whistle?—Yes, with the bell in a good position.

625. With regard to "G," that is "The way is off, you may feel your way past me," you think that would encourage people to navigate in a fog?—I think it would.

626. I want to ask you a question about what you have introduced for the first time. Do you really think it would be a prudent thing to introduce the course signals of Article 19: "I am directing my course to starboard"; you know the signals I mean?—Yes, perfectly; I think I was misunderstood there. I did not say I would suggest they should be introduced; but I said, if I had been compelled to accept of some fog signals, that I think it would have been probably better to have given us the signals that were thoroughly understood by the whole of the officers of the mercantile marine.

627. Just think, for a moment, before your opinion goes out in favour of that. Those are now understood as signals for vessels which are in motion, indicating, the one "I am porting," the other "I am starboarding," the other "I am going astern"?—Yes.

628. If those were applied to fogs they would be course-directing signals in a fog. If they were to be used in a fog, or it was optional that they were to be used in a fog, they would be course-directing signals in a fog?—I did not mean mean to advocate these as against the other signals at all.

629. Do you not think it would be highly dangerous to introduce anything of that kind in a fog?—Certainly, it is highly dangerous to offer any inducement to navigation in a fog.

630. Your view is that, under any circumstances of danger, you ought not to navigate in any fog at all?—Certainly.

631. It is to that end you would frame all your signals?—Yes.

632. To induce people to stop whenever there was danger in a fog?—Whenever any sound indicates that they are approaching any vessel they ought to stop.

633. And, of course, all the more where there is a probability of crowded waters or many ships as distinguished from the open sea?—Quite so.

Mr. Roby.

634. You objected just now to this particular signal of one long blast followed by two short ones. Can you suggest any better signal?—No, I do not believe in the signals at all; that is my argument all through.

635. Can you distinguish well in fogs between a long and a short blast?—No, you cannot.

636. A good many remarks have been made to show that what might be all right in open waters might be wrong in crowded waters. Could you lay down any rules as to what you should consider crowded and what you should consider open?—No, it is impossible.

637. They run into one another?—They run into one another often.

Sir G. Baden-Powell.

638. Have you any experience in the smaller class of steamers?—Yes, I have been for a short time in a steamer of 800 tons.

639. The class of steamers I am thinking of is coasters?—No.

640. In their capacity for making signals, do you think they are all fitted with apparatus which would make distinct signals. Could you be sure, in your steamer, of making a long and two short blasts?—No, not always on a frosty night. We will suppose the fog just comes down; you would be quite half-an-hour getting the whistle clear before it will sound at all.

641. While you are getting clear, are you making any sound?—Horrible sounds, but not sounds which would be distinguishable at all.

642. Do you feel some difficulty in making the signals?—With some there is. That might be overcome by some other mechanical appliance, compressed air, say.

643. On one point you think that if these rules were enacted as they stand, these (a) to (i) rules, that captains would look upon them as rules to be obeyed, and that might encourage them to navigate where, under your system, that would not be permitted?—I do.

644. Do you think that captains of steamers look upon such rules as regulations to be obeyed, not merely as hints in navigation?—They look upon them as rules to be obeyed; I take it if this once becomes law that the captain's certificate is at stake if he does not obey them.

645. And you think, if you heard a signal that implied, for instance, a telegraph ship, you would navigate accordingly?—Yes.

646. And feel that you ought to do so?—I would think you ought to do so.

647. Speaking of those signals when vessels are in sight, the new Rule 28, which is the same as the old Rule 19, do you think those signals would be made at all in fogs; the ordinary one, two, or three blasts?—No, I am not going to advocate that at all.

648. That was not the position of my question; one vessel may be making those signals in a fog, and other vessels making those signals may not; do you consider there are circumstances in which one steamer might be making the in-sight signal, and another steamer making fog signals?—I can conceive that frequently; it very often happens that a fog is divided almost like a wall, and I can conceive a ship answering the new fog signals, and ships to be in clear weather using those other blasts, which would make confusion still worse.

649. You think there are circumstances which might occur?—Certainly; it frequently does occur in the Thames even.

650. It has occurred?—Yes.

651. It is rather a delicate question to ask, but have you any personal experience of collisions in fog?—Never. I beg your pardon; yes, in the Thames once.

652. Have you at all followed the causes of collision in fog; perhaps some of your friends have been unfortunate?—I have very often thought the cause of collisions in fogs is undoubtedly the mistake in the direction of the sound.

653. Mistaking the direction from whence the sound comes?—Undoubtedly.

654. In your opinion, as an experienced captain, you think the present regulation as to sound signals is all that is practicable?—I think so.

655. And that no change is necessary?—It is not necessary; but if any change is made, certainly I think it ought to be for the towing business.

656. In reference to these particular new rules, should you think they could be simplified into three classes, vessels with steerage way, vessels without steerage way, and vessels at anchor?—I think so; you mean the new ones?

657. Would that be sufficient indication of what the other vessels are doing?—Yes; they certainly could be condensed. There are two or three rules here meaning the same thing.

658. What you say is that you cannot understand at sea, for a certainty, whence the sound comes?—You cannot.

659. In crowded waters you would stop your navigation?—Yes.

660. In open waters it would be an advantage if there were simple directions to tell you that another vessel was towing?—Yes, that is practically so. There is one point: I do not know whether it is within the scope of the Committee, but connected with it; it is in reference to the rule that all ships shall go at a moderate speed.

It is very, very trying to the shipmaster. A mail boat that goes 20 knots, her moderate speed is 10 knots; an ocean tramp that goes 10 knots, her moderate speed is 5; some mail boats again going dead slow, the engines would stop if they went less than 7 knots. There ought to be something better defined about moderate speed by the Board of Trade.

Captain ROBERT DUNCAN, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

661. You are also in the Castle Line?—Yes.

662. And have you commanded one of the vessels for a long time?—Twenty-four years.

663. I need not ask you; you have great experience of navigation matters, of course?—Yes.

664. Will you tell us your own view about these new sound signals; do you agree generally with what Captain Webster has said?—Yes

665. What do you say about this point: that if there was a multitude of signals it would be the duty of the captain to stop?—Yes.

666. Do you think, in that sense, the fact that the signals were undistinguishable one from the other would alter his duty to stop?—No.

667. It would not alter his duty; it would still be his duty to stop?—It would still be his duty to stop, if he could not make out the signals.

668. It would be his duty to stop even at present, if there was only one single long blast?—Yes.

669. Will you tell us in your own way the way in which you think, if you do think, the new signal will introduce an element of danger?—If you were in a narrow channel and signals all round you, that is where there would be a confusion, where you would hear a sound here, a bell there, and so on, all over the place.

670. Sir Richard Webster asked, and another gentleman also asked another witness about that. You have in that case a plain duty?—To stop, and if there is anchorage to anchor.

671. And if the new rules were passed, you would have one plain duty, to stop?—Yes.

672. One does not quite see how danger would be increased?—If you ran into a dense fog all of a sudden, where there is a lot of traffic, then you have whistles and gongs all over the place; so many different things; one making a long blast, and another making short blasts, it would confuse you.

673. Would it alter your duty?—No, it would not alter your duty; to stop.

674. It would be your duty to stop. It might distress you to hear all these various sounds which you could not distinguish, but it would still be your duty to stop, as you would if you could make out every signal?—Yes.

675. With the exception of Signal (g), which would authorise you to proceed and feel your way past another vessel. Supposing you were in the open sea, and in a fog, and you heard only one signal and knew there was only one ship, would it not be an advantage to you to know something of the character of that ship?—Yes, we generally can. If there is only one ship you could distinguish it better than if you were in a crowded channel, with all the different bells going.

676. If you were always to use these new signals in the open sea, do you not think it would be an advantage, if it were not for your fears of crowded waters?—Yes, that is the only thing; it is the crowded places.

677. It would be useful in the open sea to be able to know the character of the vessel?—Yes.

678. Do you think these new signals would be useful in the open ocean?—I do not think that it would assist. We have got along all right.

679. You would not get on any worse?—I have been 27 years master of steam and sailing ships, and I have been in a good many fogs in that time, and I have never had a mishap. I do not see that the new rule would be a benefit.

680. Do you think yourself that would be an increased danger, that masters of ships using these rules would be induced by the rules to go on instead of stopping, in a crowded thoroughfare, in a fog?—The rules would rather lead you to go on, but still a prudent man in a dense fog would not go on; he would stop and anchor, if possible.

681. Even if these rules were passed?—Yes.

682. Imprudent men you cannot help by any rules?—No, you cannot help them.

683. Rule 16 as amended, in point of fact, directs you to stop?—Yes.

684. Therefore it would be very perverse, would it not, to understand that these rules ordered him to go on when, in fact, they told him to stop?—Yes.

685. Is there any other source of danger which you think would arise from the use of these rules beyond what you have stated?—I notice one here about a ship being anchored, where the ship gives two blasts with her whistle; anchored in a fairway she gives two blasts with her whistle, and then she rings a bell. You hear the two blasts, you would say that is a steamer; and then you hear the bell, you would say that is a sailing ship at anchor. You would take the two blasts for a steamer under way.

686. In fact, you think you might be misled into supposing there were two ships, and not one?—Yes.

687. That is to say, one in motion and the other at anchor?—The one ringing a bell was at anchor, and the other was in motion.

688. The effect of the mistake would be to exaggerate your idea of danger, to make you think the danger was greater than it really was?—Yes.

689. Would that be likely to produce danger. Would not it be likely to produce extra caution?—Of course, if you hear the bell and the whistle you would stop until you found out where the sound was coming from.

690. That

Chairman—continued.

690. That is what you would do in any case?—Yes.

691. I do not want to take you at length over the ground, but is there any other criticism you would like to make?—No.

Admiral Field.

692. We have been dealing with generalities. I must ask you shortly to give particulars with regard to the questions asked by the learned Chairman just now, about Signal (e): vessel at anchor in a fairway; I understood you to say, in answer to the question of the Chairman, that the ringing of the bell would indicate to you that the ship was anchored, and that two blasts would indicate that the ship was under way. If you refer to Signal (h), the two blasts there indicate the ship is stopped; therefore there ought not to be that confusion in the mind of which you speak. Perhaps you will look at the rule. There is no controversy over (a). If you look at Signal (a), that is the ordinary signal, long blast, in a fog?—Yes.

693. Now we come to (b); you say that is new. I understood you just now rather to object to any new signal. I want to press you rather, because we have naval testimony here, which is in sympathy with your views and the views of our brother captains; and in regard to that Signal (b) there was very valuable evidence given by Sir Robert Molineux: "We propose that signal, and we look upon it as of very great importance. . . . As it is now," he says, "you cannot tell whether the ship has stopped or not," and that alone, he said, will indicate. I want to press you on the point of (b), because I think most people will admit it is important if you could ascertain whether a ship has stopped or not. You would not object to that signal in a fog, would you?—For instance, if there were two steamers, one steamer would give a long blast; the other would give a long blast perhaps just at the same time. Perhaps you would not know it was a steamer at all that was stopped.

694. I will come to that again; I put to you an imaginary case, with only one vessel in a fog besides yourself?—It would be an advantage.

695. It would be an advantage to know that the ship was stopped?—Yes.

696. We are all agreed upon that point. As regards (d), the ordinary signal, the old signal, rings a bell at ship at anchor?—Yes.

697. Look at (e) again: vessel at anchor at sea, or in the fairway; do you think it necessary to retain that signal, or would you rest on (d)?—I would have the old signal (d).

698. You would eliminate (e)?—Yes.

699. You agree with Germany; that may be a comfort to you; will you take the signal (f): vessel towing; do you object to that; because the United States very strongly insist on it, and they will never give it up; do you not think it would be of advantage, I will not say with a number of ships, but with a ship at sea, if you could lay down that rule. She has a long line of vessels, possibly she may have three or four towing?—Yes.

700. You will not object to that?—No.

701. If there are crowded vessels, and there might be confusion, you have already been reminded by the Chairman you should naturally stop, as a good seaman, until you could feel your way?—Yes.

702. Will you look at (g): way off my vessel; do you object to that?—I object because many blasts of whistles do confuse you; I say in a fog the less signals you have got the better.

703. I want to get from you, as an experienced seaman, which signals you would eliminate; I understand you would eliminate (e), and remain under the bell at anchor; and you would also eliminate the vessel towing. How about (g): way off vessel; is not that the same as (b): stop?—Yes.

704. Now, come to (h): telegraph ship; do you think, as a seaman, that is of great importance?—No, one signal would do for both.

705. You might merge that under towing?—The one signal would do for both; I do not see that you would want three for a telegraph ship, and another wants four.

706. Have you ever come across a telegraph ship in your experience?—No, I have never come across a telegraph ship all the time I have been at sea.

707. Now, signal (i): several witnesses of experience, and the Committee itself, recommended that (i) and (b) should be blended; vessel not under command might be blended in (b); vessel stopped?—Yes.

708. Then you would eliminate (i)?—Yes.

709. By that exhaustive process you would get rid of (e), (g), (h), and (i)?—Yes.

710. Would that embody your view?—Yes.

711. It simplifies matters?—It simplifies matters. I say that the fewer the signals in a dense fog the better.

Sir Richard Webster.

712. I want to ask one question: you know that prolonged blast now?—Yes.

713. You have no difficulty in distinguishing that under ordinary circumstances?—No.

714. You know the short blasts which we give when vessels are in sight?—Yes.

715. You have no difficulty in distinguishing those?—No; you give one short blast.

716. Just a touch of the whistle?—Yes.

717. Can you distinguish that any better than the signal for towing ship, one long and two short blasts?—No.

Mr. Roby.

718. What do you understand by one prolonged blast; how long?—I should say a blast of about eight to ten seconds.

Mr. Joseph Richardson.
Mr. Parker Smith.

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Vice Admiral PHILIP HOWARD COLOMB, R.N., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

719. YOU are an Admiral of the Royal Navy?—Yes.

720. And, I need not ask, you have had a large experience of seafaring matters?—The usual one, I suppose.

721. I do not know whether your attention has been called to the proposed new sound signals for fog?—Yes, it has.

722. In the first place, perhaps, I had better ask you to tell us, in your own way, what is your general view about these new signals?—My general view is that although they are not quite perfect they aim at perfection; they are, generally speaking, an improvement, and in any case are not likely to do much harm.

723. You think it might be possible to improve the proposed regulations?—Distinctly.

724. Would you tell us in what direction you think they would be improved?—I think the whole thing might be simplified; but I doubt if it can be very much simplified until the whole of the rules are themselves simplified.

725. You mean the other rules regulating navigation?—Yes; the nature of the rules necessitates certain fog signals. Where those rules are various you necessarily require various signals. If the rules were fewer in number and not so various you would require, I consider, fewer signals.

726. We have, of course, to consider only the question of the sound signals and the objections to them; and, therefore, we have to take it that the other rules are to stand as they are?—Quite so.

727. Taking that as the postulate, do you think that from that point of view you could suggest any substantial improvements to the Committee in the sound signals?—I think not. I think that possibly there is some little redundancy in the signals as established; but, taking the law to stand as it is, it seems to me that the sound signals are a very fair adjunct, or system of adjuncts to it.

728. From what you said just now, I gather that you think that there would not be any additional danger by reason of these sound signals?—I think none.

Chairman—continued.

729. I suppose there might be, to a certain extent, some confusion of sounds if there were a large number of different vessels close together in a fog, each sounding different signals?—I do not think the confusion would be increased. All the evidence I know of, and specially the evidence taken before the Thames Traffic Committee, goes to show that in narrow waters, in close waters, everybody is perfectly certain to whistle and sound; and the difference between an attempt at making such sounds intelligible and leaving them open to discussion, I do not think would create more confusion than exists at present.

730. Any prudent master, when he heard all these sounds all round him in a fog, would, of course, either stop altogether, or proceed with the utmost care and very slowly?—Clearly.

731. Has your attention been drawn to Article 16: "Every vessel shall in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain-storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel, hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." You would read that article, I suppose, in connection with the sound signals, as being an injunction to masters of ships as to what they were to do when they heard a multitude of signals round them?—Quite so.

732. You agree, then, that these new signals would not impart any fresh element of danger?—I do not think they would.

733. Do you think they might be useful in averting danger on occasions?—Yes, I should say so. I am nearly sure that I have amongst my cases two where a steamer was stopped and sounding the signal for being under way, and the ship that heard the signal took the proper steps for clearing the ship that was under way, and she ran into a ship which was stopped. Therefore, I think that to differentiate between a signal which denotes "Way" and a signal which denotes "No way" is important.

734. Supposing

734. Supposing the case of two ships, or even three ships, in a fog within a mile of one another, or half a mile, as the case might be, do you think that the master of each would be able to understand and follow the signals given by the other?—I do not see why he should not, at any rate, after a little time.

735. Do you think there is any ground for apprehension that the masters of trading vessels would be unable to learn and get at their fingers' ends these rules?—I cannot see that there could be any. I say that I think it on exceedingly good grounds, because in introducing sound signals into the Navy years ago I had to try what could be done with all sorts and conditions of men in learning. We introduced into the Navy a most elaborate system of sound signals, involving many thousands of combinations, and those all sorts and conditions of men never, from first to last, had any difficulty in apprehending and reading the signals correctly; and those signals are now read all over the world with the same correctness in all nations.

736. I do not wish to go through the thing in detail, because we have had a good deal of detail about it already, of course; but you have, I believe, been for many years very deeply interested in this question of fog signals, and have followed the whole controversy very closely?—I have.

737. And you have made yourself thorough master of it?—I hope so; at least, I have tried.

738. Is it your opinion that these sound signals ought to be given a trial?—Certainly.

739. Supposing that this country was to refuse to accept these new signals, and that some other countries were to insist upon accepting them, do you not think that the confusion then might be a very serious matter?—It might in some cases.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

740. We may take it that altogether, although you would not commit yourself so far as to say they are perfect, you consider these proposed new rules a distinct improvement on the old sound signals?—Yes.

741. Are there any suggestions or alterations which you would make in them at all, or would you like to amalgamate one or two, which has been suggested by some witnesses?—The only suggestion I think I should make would be that I have some doubt about the signal "Not being under command." It is Article 15, (i). I think that that is perhaps redundant; that a ship which is in that condition ought to be stopped; and that the signal denoting being stopped would be enough. There is a little discrepancy too, I think, possibly in the "Anchor" signal; that is (e). The two blasts which are made by a sailing vessel on a fog-horn might possibly be confounded with the two blasts which denote being on the port tack, if the bell was not heard, and I know that the bell is not always heard, and therefore only part of the signal might be heard. But I cannot say that I lay very great stress upon either of those things. I do not think you would hear much of either of them if they passed into law.

742. It was suggested, I think by Captain Webster, or another mercantile captain whom we had before us the other day, that a master might very easily, as you just said, mistake the two blasts for a vessel on the port tack, and that the ringing of the bell might be mistaken for another vessel being brought up; do you agree with him as to the likelihood of that in a thick fog?—I should doubt it. The two come from the same direction, and I do not think you would mistake.

743. Is it not often, in the case of fog, almost impossible to make out the direction from which the sound comes?—That is a point that is constantly argued; but when I was in the habit of looking up every collision case that happened in fog (and I looked them up by the hundred), I never met a case where the direction was mistaken, not one single case.

744. Then that is only a theory which is sought to be imposed upon us?—Yes.

745. There is only one other question I should like to ask you: You say you are generally in favour of these new sound signals; but is it not possible that you are looking at the matter rather too much from a naval point of view, and having always had to do with trained men under you instead of having, like many of the Mercantile Marine always have, men with no training, and men not in the habit of watching fog signals as your men are?—That is possible. I cannot answer for that, but my mind is much more full of what has been actually happening all these years in collision cases; so far as I know myself my views are founded exclusively on what happens in the Mercantile Marine at sea.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

746. You said just now, in answer to the learned Chairman, that the elaborate fog signals which have been adopted in the Royal Navy were now easily understood all over the world, and by all nations. When you said that, did you mean by the men of the Royal Navies or by the Mercantile Marine of other nations?—The Royal Navies.

747. That did not apply to the Mercantile Marine?—No.

748. Then, shortly, you are decidedly in favour of the revised regulations being passed, rather than to throw the whole thing into the cauldron again, and have other nations adopting some, and England not, or vice versâ?—Clearly.

749. In all the cases of collision that you have examined into and taken evidence about, and read the evidence of, you told the Committee that you did not know of a single instance in which the sound was reported coming from an opposite direction, such a direction as brought the collision about?—Yes.

750. In that case the words which have been put into our hands by the Board of Trade, that sound is conveyed in a very capricious way by the atmosphere, &c., are unnecessary?—No, that is perfectly correct, I think; but that has to do more with the distant sounds made by syrens at lighthouses, over long ranges in the vicinity of the coasts, and so on. The short distances at which steam syrens and fog-horns are heard do not seem to be affected by that principle.

Admiral Field.

751. In your large experience in command of ships yourself in the Navy, may I ask you: Have you ever seriously felt the want of more fog signals than were then in use in your time?—I do not think I have.

752. Then may I take it that, in your opinion, if you could be assured that no increased risk would arise by diminishing the number of these fog signals now under review, you would not object to such diminution?—I do not think that the whole question of the fog signals is of such importance as the getting of the Washington Conference Rules into law; therefore, I cannot look upon the fog signal question as the primary question; and that governs anything I might say upon the matter.

753. That is a very clever answer, but it is not an answer to my question?—I was going on to answer your question. Having coloured it in that way, I should say, that if you could surely reduce the proposed fog signals without delaying the passage of the whole thing into law, and that if you could show that advantage would be gained, I should be perhaps in favour of reducing them.

754. Then your sole objection, I may take it, is that, as you suppose, some increased delay might be caused by the proposal to eliminate some of the signals which are objected to by the representations of the Mercantile Marine; delay is your chief objection in fact?—Probably, yes.

755. We are sitting here mainly because of a very strong expression of objection, as you know, on the part of gentlemen of the Mercantile Marine, who are entitled to have their views well considered; may I take you, if you will bear patiently with me, through a few of these fog signals which some experts, naval as well as mercantile, think might be eliminated with advantage; you have them, I presume, before you?—Yes.

756. May I ask you to look at signal (i), a vessel not under command, four short blasts. No one has better knowledge than yourself of the value of long and short blasts, because you are the inventor of them; may I ask you whether in your opinion (i) and (b) might not be combined, as in the opinion of some it might; in other words, whether you might not merge (i) in (b)?—I have already in my evidence expressed the opinion that that might be done.

757. Then may I ask you whether in your judgment there would be any objection to combining signal (h) for a telegraph ship: three long blasts, with signal (f) for a vessel towing: one long and two short blasts. We understand that the United States will not part under any conditions with the towing signal?—The telegraph ship signal must be one that is so very rarely used in anything like crowded waters that I do not think the change is of any importance.

758. They are both three blasts?—I think you might go through several generations without making a mistake between the two.

759. But if a telegraph ship is so rarely met with, why should she have a signal in her favour?—Because, I presume, the telegraph people asked for it. There is great fear of injury to the cable, either coming in over the bows or coming in over the stern; and they have been all along very anxious to have some sort of protection for that cable. The towing signal will not protect the head; it will protect the stern, but not the head.

760. But if the towing signal is understood, will it not make the mariner approaching very cautious indeed, because he will not quite know the point from which the sound proceeds, whether from the head or the tail; a vessel towed, I understand, may also sound as well as the vessel towing?—No, I do not think it is a matter of importance. I should leave it as it stood.

761. Supposing that, under great pressure, we should be of opinion that we must eliminate some of these signals, would you go so far as to say that you think that is one of the least important?—So far as the safety of ships is concerned I should think it was.

762. That is a great point; then we have got your important view about (i) and (h), and about (b). There is one other that I want to press you upon, if you will forgive me. We understand that Germany strongly objects to (e), (g), and (i). Might not (g): Way off my vessel, be combined also with (b): Vessel stopped?—I think so.

763. You would have no objection, if we eliminate some, to eliminate that?—I think we have to recollect that one of them is an optional signal. You need not take away an optional signal; you might take away a compulsory signal, but you need not take away an optional signal.

764. But how is a poor captain, with no staff whatever for signals, to tell whether a signal is optional or one of the others. However, I take your answer as it stands, and I am much obliged to you for it. Then (e), which Germany objects to, Vessel at anchor at sea: by this new proposal she is to sound two long blasts every two minutes, and ring a bell; but the ordinary anchor signal is ringing a bell. Are you not satisfied that a vessel at anchor at sea might also be left under the bell signal alone?—I do not think I am. So far as I know it in cases of collision the bell is a bad signal; it is not heard to any distance, and it is generally placed so that there are great echoes round it, and I do not think for a very exposed anchorage where ships are likely to be passing at speed a bell signal is a good signal. It may be a perfectly fair signal in the Thames, for instance, although even there it fails sometimes where they are going slow, and where they have the chance of avoiding collision even when getting close to; but where there is good speed and a ship is at anchor I think I am in favour of a better signal than the bell.

Mr. Parker Smith.

765. I understand that you attach primary importance to international agreement as to the Rule of the Road?—Yes.

766. You consider that a matter of very great importance?—Yes.

767. And while you have certain criticisms on the details of the rules, if the result of our accepting cepting those criticisms was to open up the whole question with other countries to reduce their signals, you would rather drop the criticisms altogether?—Certainly.

768. Then, I want to ask you this question: you say the use of these signals, even if mistaken, cannot produce great danger; take the case of one captain using these signals, and another knowing nothing about them, and using the old signals, would there be no greater danger of collision than there is at present?—No, I think not; and for an exceedingly plain reason; if you hear a sound in any direction (no matter what you may make out of the signification of that sound at sea) denoting motion, so long as you understand that it denotes motion, there are only two options so far as your helm goes; those options are either to continue your course as it stands, or to turn towards the sound; there is no option in a fog of turning away from the sound. Consequently you see that the danger must either arise from turning towards the sound when you ought to have kept your course, or from keeping your course when you ought to have turned towards the sound. If you follow that out you will find that the danger becomes minimised because the Admiralty Court constantly, and very properly and rightly, lay down that a ship in a fog must be very cautious about altering her course. Therefore, when you say that a ship might have turned towards the sound when she kept her course, you will not get so much danger out of that fact of keeping her course; so that you see the danger of mistaking the sound signal becomes very much minimised, when you face it as it actually is in collision cases. You know there are no collision cases where either of those two things are done, and nothing else. All the collision cases in fog occur with the preliminary movement of turning away from the sound, which is always wrong.

769. Then, take the case of one captain not knowing the signals, and another captain knowing them, and using them, and a collision; can you imagine any case in which that would throw greater liability on the ignorant captain than if the signals had not been in force at all?—I do not think so.

770. Then, in regard to learning these signals, I suppose they would be very much easier than the Morse Alphabet?—Yes.

771. You do not consider, then, really that they would a great addition to what a man has to know?—They would be naturally posted up on a placard in the chart house, and people would get accustomed to them very soon.

Admiral Field.

772. There is one other question I want to ask you, if you please, as you are the greatest authority we have on these short and long flashes and blasts; the complaint on the part of the mercantile captains is that from a lack of a signal staff specially trained, and with the men they have under them, and the few officers, they fear great difficulty in being able to distinguish between long and short blasts, or short and long blasts; may I call your attention, in view of that fact (for it is a fact) to signals (f), one long and two short blasts, (g), short, long and short, blasts, and (b), three long blasts; those three signals having three blasts, do you not think the captains have some reason on their side in thinking that that would make it very difficult for them in their vessels with their lookouts to distinguish those several long and short blasts given sometimes in one way, or in inverted order?—Some reason, but not very much. I should say that what would cure them would be to try them.

Chairman.

773. If there is any suggestion that you would like to make to the Committee in regard to these sound signals we should be very pleased to hear it; we know your great experience in the matter?—I think not. I want to see the thing passed into law; I am sure it will come right after that.

Mr. JOHN FENWICK FENWICK, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

774. YOU are a member of the firm of Messrs. John Fenwick and Son, of 57, Gracechurch-street, E.C.?—Yes.

775. And you appear here at the request of the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom?—Yes.

776. I believe you are managers of 32 steamers employed in the coasting and short sea trade?—Yes.

777. And you yourself have been President of the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, and a member of a deputation on the subject of the Rule of the Road at Sea which waited upon the President of the Board of Trade on the 5th February last?—Yes.

778. And you have consulted a great many persons, skilled in nautical affairs, about this matter?—Yes, my own masters. I have one in the room here who is prepared to give evidence if the Committee desire it.

779. I think I had better ask you, please, your own view in regard to these fog signals, if you will put it in your own language?—I would rather not have the present signals disturbed.

Admiral Field.

780. You mean the old ones?—I mean the existing ones, those now in force.

Chairman.

781. You prefer to remain with the sound signals for fog that exist at the present time?—Yes.

782. Without any alterations at all?—Without any alteration.

783. But what do you consider to be the objections to the altered rules that are proposed?—The multiplication of the signals tempting a man to make a passage when he has no business to do so; the confusion occasioned by these multiplied signals and the consequent danger.

784. Those are the general heads under which you put it?—Yes.

785. I should like to ask you about them, taking them in the order in which you have put them; in regard to the multiplication of these signals, do you think there would be no practical difficulty in seamen learning the signals so as to be able to apply them?—They might learn them after a very considerable time; but then there would be the difficulty in moments of agitation of applying those signals correctly.

786. In fact, you have not got confidence; I mean you think it is rather taxing human memory too highly in a period of embarrassment?—That is it. I do not mean to say that I have not got confidence, but you have expressed it correctly.

787. Do you think that that would be met by a diminution, if it were attainable, of the number of the new rules, a consolidation of the new rules?—I think it would be very difficult to cut down the new rules, because everybody has his own particular fancy.

788. You are rather of opinion that if the rules are to be adopted—— ?—Let them be simple.

789. But you think it is difficult to simplify them by consolidating or running two into one?—Yes.

790. But your objection is against having any increased number at all?—Yes.

791. Against having too many?—Yes, the present rules have, on the whole, worked well, as I believe, in the crowded navigation which is constantly passing all round the coasts of these islands.

792. Supposing that a man by mistake was to sound (I will leave out the optional signal for a moment) wrongly one compulsory signal instead of the right signal; or, which would be the same thing, I suppose, was to misunderstand one of the signals he heard, and took it to mean something different, what do you suppose would be the effect? He would hear, at all events, a formidable sound in his neighbourhood; what do you suppose would be the danger even if he did misunderstand it?—He might hear it, and it might, in the first place, not be in the position he is expecting it to be in.

793. As to that, is not that common to all sounds, whatever signals they might be; that might occur under the present rules, might it not?—But there is only one signal in fog.

794. I thought you were speaking of mistaking the direction from which the sound came?—Quite so.

795. That would be the same whatever the sound was, would it not?—Yes, it might be.

796. And therefore that difficulty would apply equally to the present rules as it would to the proposed rules?—Of course, I am only a layman; but it strikes me that, if a master heard a signal which he considered indicated that the vessel signalling was in a certain position, and he had, owing to the conditions of the atmosphere, formed a wrong conclusion, a collision might result. This signal, if he heard it, would, of course, mean a great deal more than the present signal.

797. The present signal would merely mean, would it not, that there was a vessel there?—That there was a vessel there; and by the new signal (b) there is an obligation upon the vessel in that position to sound it, she shall sound it. Now supposing that by misadventure a collision happened, I can fancy very well what the judgment of the Admiralty Court would be on the man who runs into the vessel that has carried out this rule.

798. I want to follow you, and I am not quite sure that I do?—He would be held to blame probably, though he might have acted to the best of his judgment.

799. Then take the case of a man hearing the sound (b), which is a steam vessel under way, but stopped, and having no way upon her; do you assume for your illustration that he misunderstands that signal?—He might misunderstand the signal; he may not hear it; I will rather say he may mistake the direction of the signal.

800. I am trying to get out what the difference in that respect would be between the present rule and the new rule; supposing that he heard any ship under the present rule giving a fog signal, what would that convey to him?—He would know there was a vessel there, and would continue in his ordinary way, and probably not alter his helm at all. He might consider that he would have to make a special effort if this signal of two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them, was made.

801. You mean it would tempt him to make the passage, as you expressed it?—Yes; I think that would be the effect of the whole of the signals, particularly on the coasting trade. The men are constantly at sea, and Englishmen want to get ahead; and then, of course, any man may think "What is the use of these signals unless we make our passages?"

802. You mean that they might use them for the purpose of facilitating their passages?—They would use them as course signals.

803. As course-indicating signals?—Yes.

804. Are you acquainted with Article 16?—No, I call these course-indicating signals for that purpose.

805. I do not think you quite follow me; will you kindly look at Article 16?—I have it before me.

806. It is a general direction to ships to be moderate in fog, and so forth?—Yes.

807. I want to get your opinion upon this: these rules are accompanied by Article 16 directing that a vessel is, under the circumstances, to stop her engines and then navigate with caution until the danger of collision is over?—Yes, I understand that.

808. But you apprehend that the man would disregard that?—No, he would still keep at moderate speed, but he would make use of these signals signals probably to make his passage in a fog, he would keep on going easy, when perhaps he might lie dead on the water altogether with the signals as at present.

809. You think that these new signals might encourage him to try and do more than he would under the existing rules?—Yes, I think so.

811. Supposing that the master of a ship, or the mate in the absence of the master, was to comply with the intention and was not to misuse the new rules so as to try and make his passage quicker, do you think that in those circumstances the rules would be dangerous, or is it merely that you are afraid that they might be misused?—I am afraid they might be misused in that sense in addition to their being confusing. A master, whom I have here, the week before last was detained off Shoebury Buoy in a fog. When the fog cleared he found that there were 36 vessels, principally steamers, in a radius of about a mile around him. You can fancy what that would be to an unfortunate master when he hears all these signals which might or might not be used; how is he to discriminate between them.

812. Would not his duty be very clear under those circumstances, to stop his engines altogether?—It probably would be, but one is not always certain, with a fallible human being, whether he would do so.

813. I do not profess to speak as an expert on these things, but all of us have been occasionally in a fog on a ship; would it not be the height of imprudence and a very gross breach of duty for a captain to try and navigate his ship with so many as 36 steamers within a radius of a mile emitting fog signals?—I quite agree, put in that way; but neither you nor I have to carry them out.

814. Supposing a man in that situation, whatever the fog signal might be prescribed by law, he would be almost guilty of manslaughter, would he not, if he went on and ran down a ship?—I cannot judge the circumstances in which the rules would be applied.

815. I am not a seaman so I cannot say; however, that is your view of it?—Yes.

816. Am I right in gathering that you have two main views: the first is that the existence of these rules would encourage men to try and make their passage in fog?—No, I say first that they are confusing and unreliable.

817. If you please, I am only putting them in different order. One is, that they would encourage men so to do?—I fear they would encourage men to do so.

Chairman—continued.

818. And the second is that you think they are, from their multiplicity, confusing?—Yes.

819. That they would not be readily learnt and known, and therefore would tend to confuse?—Yes; and I say that the present rules have answered exceedingly well.

820. You think that there is no fault to be found with the present rules at all?—I think not; they are very simple, and simplicity is the great thing.

821. They have been found sufficient for all purposes, you think?—I think so.

822. I understand that you have spoken to masters of your steamers, and that they agree with you in your disapproval of these new rules?—Yes. Might I make a remark before I leave these sound signals?

823. If you please?—With reference to signal (f), some of my steamers are engaged in towing lighters along the coast, and we do not want that signal; and so far as the lighters are concerned, the owners of those lighters know what I am going to say to-day, and they concur; they also do not want that signal.

824. You do not think that a vessel when towing requires any different signals from a vessel not in that situation?—I think not; I think a man towing would be very foolish to attempt to go on in a dense fog. That, of course, is with reference to multiplicity.

825. That, of course, is contemplated by the present rules. That duty of stopping in a fog is laid upon him by the present rules, is it not, by Article 16, if he only obeys it?—It says that he is to go at a moderate speed.

826. It is this: "A steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over"?—Yes.

827. You do not think that if that article was obeyed, it would eliminate the danger that you speak of?—What I mean to say is, that we do not consider that there is any necessity for this signal (f) for towing; we think it is unnecessary. I am speaking now again of the multiplicity of sounds.

828. I see at the end of the précis of your evidence that there is a table of wreck abstracts?—Yes.

829. You have taken that out, I suppose, from the Board of Trade returns or tables?—Yes, I have given the pages from which they come.

830. If there is any point in connection with that or any comment that you wish to make upon this wreck abstract we shall be glad to hear it?—It seems to me to prove that the loss of life in the coasting trade, which is the most crowded part of the navigation, is one that is relatively very small, and that it is very questionable whether even if these new rules succeed you will be able very much to reduce the loss of life. In the year 1893 there were 173,636 vessels entered in the coasting trade, counting their repeated voyages, with a tonnage of over 41 million tons. I think it is a wonderful record considering the number of vessels. There seems to be no pressing call for a change.

831. Take the first table in 1893; I understand stand that would be the 173,636 vessels, British steamers only, that entered in; the loss of life by collision amounted only to one life; is that so?—Only one.

832. There was only one life lost by collision?—Yes.

833. In the previous years the totals are 19 in 1890, 13 in 1891, and 15 in 1892?—Yes, with the tonnage increasing every year.

834. And then in 1893 only one?—Yes.

835. That is in the coasting trade only, is it?—Yes.

836. The home trade?—Yes, the home trade, the coasting trade.

837. You have not, I suppose, any figures as to what the loss of life by collision is in British ships in the ocean trade?—I have got the total; the first column shows the total loss of life, sail and steam. (See Appendix.)

Mr. Blake.

838. But that is from all causes?—Yes.

839. That does not distinguish the loss of life by collisions?—No, I have taken the collisions out; it is on this page (handing in a Blue Book).

Chairman.

840. This is the Blue Book, [c. 7069], of 1893, at page 15?—Yes.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

841. That is the book from which you have compiled this table?—Yes.

Chairman.

842. I am just looking at this, and I find that there are also figures relating to sailing vessels; your table related exclusively to steamers?—My Table No. 1 says, total loss of life, sail and steam.

843. But at the end, as I understand, it is the loss of life by collision in the home trade; is that sail and steam?—Yes.

844. I beg your pardon. The figures in this Blue Book relate to 1892?—Yes, I think you will find what you want in this Blue Book, [c. 6717], for 1892, which has reference to 1891, because they are published in June.

845. I only want to see if I can get the ocean collisions also?—I think they are all in here. There is the home trade in one and the foreign trade in the other.

846. You will be able to tell us, so as to get it on the notes, what the figures are. Can you tell us in the year 1891 what was the loss of life by collision and of British ships totally lost in the foreign trade?—The foreign trade, 574; it is No. 2, under Head C., at the end of page 15.

847. Those were lives lost, am I right in saying, in collision in the foreign trade?—No; by collisions in the foreign trade there were 556.

Mr. Blake.

848. In 1892?—In the year ending the 30th of June 1892, that was the passengers, and 609 was the total, including the crew.

Chairman.

849. Is that in collisions only?—Yes.

850. That is a total of 609 lives lost in that year of passengers and crews in the foreign trade from collision?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

851. Now can you tell us, as it will be a very valuable addition to your evidence, what was the total loss of life in the foreign trade in British vessels in that year?—That includes founderings, strandings, collisions, other causes, and missing vessels, that is 913.

852. That includes the 609?—Yes. [N.B.—A note at the foot of page 15, Blue Book [c. 6717], for 1892, states, includes 555 passengers lost in the "Utopia" of Glasgow (run into at Gibraltar when anchored).]

Mr. Blake.

853. That is two-thirds of the whole loss?—Yes.

Chairman.

854. Is that all ships, whether they were totally lost or partially lost; your figures relate to all ships whether they were totally lost or partially lost, do they?—The annotation is: "for founderings, strandings, collisions, other causes, and missing vessels," it is in the margin; the lines follow.

855. I see in another year (I have got the same before me) that represents all the lives that were last in the foreign trade of British vessels from all causes?—I gather so.

856. Then, practically, it comes to this, that about two-thirds of the lives lost in the foreign trade in British vessels are due to collisions; I am speaking for that year. You know these figures better than I do; would you mind saying for the next year what they amounted to, if you can help us to that?—From collisions do you mean?

857. First, if you please, from collisions?—You wish them in the home trade.

858. We were taking the foreign trade last year. We have the home trade before us in your own figures?—There were 20 in the foreign trade in the following year.

859. Twenty lives lost in collision?—Yes.

860. In the foreign trade?—Yes.

861. What was the total number of lives lost?—There were 15 in the home trade.

862. That was in the year ending June 1892; I am trying to compare all the lives lost in British ships in the foreign trade from collisions with the total number of lives lost from all causes in the foreign trade?—The collisions are 20, and the total lives lost in the foreign trade are 279.

863. Then that is less than one in 10?—Yes.

864. You have not any other year present; I do not want to trouble you unduly about it?—I have only brought these two books up, because I did not expect to be asked about this.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

865. What two years were those; let us be quite clear about that?—The first is the year ending June 1892, that is from June 1891 to June 1892; the second is from June 1892 to June 1893.

Chairman.

866. Have you studied the figures generally for other years sufficiently to be able to say what is the relative proportion of losses from collisions to losses from other causes in the foreign trade?—No.

Chairman—continued.

No. I have only taken this table out for four years. The general impression amongst shipowners is that the loss of life, considering the work that is done, tends rather to decrease than otherwise.

867. Is not the view of shipowners rather the same as the popular view. The popular view, I think, is that collisions are responsible for a great deal of loss of life and property at sea; do you think that that is an erroneous view?—I should be disposed to say that it was an erroneous view, looking at the figures I have submitted here, particularly in the crowded navigation of our coasts.

Mr. Parker Smith.

868. You have just given us figures for two years. In the one case the losses by collisions were two-thirds of the whole number; in the other case they were less than one-tenth. Can you say at all which is nearer the average if we had a larger series of years?—I am afraid not; I have only gone into these four years so far as the home trade is concerned, and the totals; I have not got anything beyond them.

869. Then, to take your own table on page 3 of your précis, so far as the home trade is concerned, in 1893 the loss of life in collision was only one?—Yes.

870. That, of course, is very much better than the average; we shall not have as good a result as that probably in other years?—I would not venture an opinion upon that.

871. If you take your table for 1890 there was a total loss of 66 lives?—That is from all causes.

872. And out of that 19 from collision?—Certainly.

873. That is about one-third, nearly?—Yes.

874. If you take the following year the loss from all causes was 25, and the loss from collisions was 13?—Yes.

875. That is one-half?—Yes.

876. If you take these four years that you have got down here (I have added them up) the total loss was 158, and the loss from collisions 48?—Yes.

877. That is to say, that about one-third of the number of lives lost were due to collisions?—Yes.

878. And taking it over four years I suppose one might consider it a fair average, that in the home trade about one-third of the number of lives lost are due to collisions?—Yes, it appears so from these figures. Seeing what I do I consider these results wonderful, considering the work that is done, and the way the vessels travel backwards and forwards, because a vessel, say, may be in London from the Tyne twice in one week.

Mr. Blake.

879. We see the number from your figures; this is 352,916 passages?—I was only citing my own experience for the moment.

Mr. Parker Smith.

880. We quite assent that it shows wonderful seamanship, but still of the lives lost it shows about one-third due to collisions?—Yes.

881. Now, about these additional sound signals, of course we all understand that when a ship is in a fog with signals round her there must be confusion; but I want to understand how the confusion is increased by the ships sounding different signals instead of by the present system?—There are so many more signals to sound.

882. How does that make your position any worse?—It tends to confuse the man in charge of the ship; he does not know what to do.

883. But suppose he is confused and makes a mistake in the signals, how is he any worse than at present?—Supposing that he makes the wrong signal in his hurry and agitation.

884. Suppose that he makes the wrong signal in his hurry and agitation, how is he in a worse position than he is under the present system?—He may come into collision.

885. I do not understand how he is more likely to come into collision than he is at present?—From my experience I am afraid he would.

886. All these signals here, leaving out the optional signals, all these compulsory signals are signals to be used in cases where there is more need to take care than in an ordinary case; is not that so?—Supposing that he sounds the wrong signal.

887. Supposing he does?—And another vessel runs into him.

888. Yes?—And he has sounded the wrong signal.

889. You mean that in that case his liability might be different in a court of law; but leave out the court of law at present?—Yes.

890. Let us wait for the court of law?—That is the point.

891. We will come to that directly?—As shipowners we are afraid that if more lives are lost (and we believe they will be) we shall be held in the judgment of the nation to be responsible for them.

892. But there are the two points that I want to ask you about separately: the one the captain on the bridge, and the other the owner in a court of law, we will keep them separate for the moment; take the captain on the bridge, I want to know how he is any more confused or can be put in a worse position by not understanding the signals; can you suggest any of these signals here which would enable him to go more boldly ahead than if he just heard the signal that is made at present?—Yes, he might think that he heard a certain signal and manœuvre accordingly. I am afraid, speaking from experience, that masters will be led to make their passages by making use in some way or other of these signals.

893. Of course, it is generally assented that that applies to course-indicating signals in a fog?—I believe it is pretty well understood that they are used in a fog now.

894. But are not all these cases here cases in which more care, and not less care, is required?—They are intended for that, but when you get into a crowd of from 50 to 100 vessels, I do not know what use they would be.

895. So that if you do understand them they would make you take more care than if you do not understand them?—I am afraid that mistakes would arise in their use.

896. But, to leave the captain on the bridge, and to take the owner in the law court, you are afraid there that supposing you were the owner in the law court, you would be injured?—I am afraid that there would be an immense increase of litigation if these new rules are passed.

897. Will you explain how you could be worse off than you are now in the case of collision at present?—That would be a case for the judge of the Admiralty Court; he would decide it for us.

898. But what I do not understand is, how you could be in a worse position before the judge in the Admiralty Court, with these new rules obtaining, than you would be if you had a collision without the new rules?—There are so many more signals to apply, and so many more mistakes to be made.

899. But can you explain how, assuming that a collision takes place under the new rules, you, as an owner, could have greater liability than you can now, assuming an exactly similar position at the present time?—There will be so many more rules to interpret. I am afraid that is a question that cannot be answered until the thing comes before the court, as to how the court would interpret the rules.

Chairman.

900. The point seems to be whether these rules are more likely to create a collision?—I say that I am afraid they will.

901. And the other point is, whether it is more likely to embarrass you in the law courts?—I should think it is highly probable.

902. You are afraid of both?—Yes.

Mr. Parker Smith.

903. Do you attach much importance to an international agreement on the rules of the road at sea?—So far as I am concerned I do not.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

904. You refer to your home trade?—Quite so.

Mr. Parker Smith.

905. But supposing you found that to insist upon these objections of yours would prevent international agreement for an indefinite time, that would not prevent you from insisting on them?—I really do not know sufficient to go into international regulations. I do not know how the matter stands, and would not like to venture an opinion upon it.

906. You feel yourself in your own experience practically confined to the British trade?—No, I have other vessels going abroad; but I should have thought that other nations, considering that we own more than half the tonnage of the world, would have fallen into our view.

907. But supposing you find that they will not fall into our views, and it is an alternative, would you, under those circumstances, still adhere to your objections?—I think that is a case where our rulers ought to come in and do something for us; whoever is responsible for these rules ought to manage that.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

908. That is just what the rulers want your experience about?—We shipowners really do not know in what position matters stand on this subject with other Powers.

Chairman.

909. You would rather not give an opinion upon that?—No.

Mr. Blake.

910. I understand that your view as to the effect upon a master of these new rules, whether with reference to his duty of making the signal himself or his duty of listening and acting upon it, is based very largely upon the opinions which the practical men, the masters of your ships, have communicated to you?—Yes.

911. You do not profess yourself to have derived original experience upon that subject, but to be rather conveying views which struck your mind as being correct, but which are not from personal experience?—That is so; still I see and hear of these things almost every day of the week.

912. And I rather understood you to say that one of your masters was here ready for examination?—Yes.

913. Then there are two points of view from which I understand you looked upon it; first of all, the liability of the master whose ship was, as you supposed, governed by one of these new rules mistaking the signal he ought to sound and sounding the wrong signal?—Yes.

914. And that, of course, is a question dependent upon his capacity to learn and remember under difficult circumstances what the signal is?—Whether he will remember it at the precise moment of action.

915. His memory at other times, of course, would be only remorse. Passing from that to the duty or position of the man who hears the signals, I understood you to say that you thought there were two distinct lines of difficulty: first of all, that the man who hears them would be likely to be confused, and perhaps misled?—Yes.

916. And, secondly, that he would be likely to be encouraged to go on when he otherwise would not go on?—Yes.

917. And your impression is that there would be a considerable amount of confusion occasioned in these crowded waterways with which you are more familiar, by the new signals?—Yes.

918. The multiplicity of sounds and the number of vessels sounding would create an additional confusion, you think?—Yes.

919. Do you not understand that it is the first duty of a mariner who hears a fog signal to pause until he takes stock of the situation, and sees whether he can go on, and in what direction he ought to go on?—Quite.

920. Do you not understand that duty to be accentuated the more signals he hears; that it is more his imperative duty to stop and be cautious?—If he hears them and can distinguish them. It is not a case of two vessels meeting upon our coasts; it is a case of many. No doubt it might be beautiful if we were always certain of meeting only two vessels.

921. I will

Mr. Blake—continued.

921. I will interpolate a question to you upon that: according to your view, so far as you know, for the ocean navigation, apart from the fairways and coasting trade, you think that these new rules would be good?—They would not lead to so much danger if we were certain of meeting two vessels.

922. I thought you said a moment ago that they would be beautiful; you say now that they would not lead to so much danger; but I was dealing with you with reference to that which your knowledge and your information, as I understand, gave you a certain amount of right to speak upon; that is, the crowded places in the coasting trade?—Yes.

923. The more numerous the signals that a man hears, and the greater amount of confusion there is, would it not be more imperatively his duty to stop, and be cautious in moving?—If he could. You cannot always stop.

924. I know that you cannot always stop; but that is a general rule in a fog, to stop if you can, and, if you cannot stop, you can do nothing but go on?—At a moderate speed.

925. But the more uncertain you are, and the greater number of signals you hear, is it not clear that the more imperative is the duty to stop if you can?—It ought to be clear.

926. Is it not clear; a duty may not always be discharged; but is not that duty clear?—Yes.

927. Then the more uncertainty the man's mind is in as to what particular signal it is that he hears, does not that make it more imperative upon him to stop if he can?—I think so; but will people always perform their duty?

928. I am not saying so; but the more imperative becomes his duty to stop, and therefore the more discouraged he is about going on; is not that so?—It should be.

929. So that the tendency ought to be to produce greater caution?—It ought to be.

930. But you fear that the tendency will be the reverse; that it will produce greater rashness?—I am afraid that that will be one tendency. I do not mean to say that they will knowingly commit rash actions, but the tendency will be to go on and on. One view of the signals that I hold is, that it would tempt them to go on.

931. That will only be in case the mariners become convinced by experience that they are able to interpret these signals, and by them to make with prudence greater progress than they now do, will it not?—I am scarcely able to assent to that proposition.

932. I will ask you this: you say that the first idea is that these signals will produce greater confusion, difficulty, and uncertainty in the mind of the mariner?—Yes.

933. All of which makes it more and more imperatively his duty to stop?—Yes.

934. But a happy day may come when he has been able to learn the signals so well, and can find out his conditions and circumstances so much better, that he may be disposed to think he can go on prudently when under the present conditions he could not?—I think that there will be a great many collisions before that happy event occurs, and probably great loss of life.

Mr. Blake—continued.

935. Tell me this one thing more: it would be quite unsafe, would it not, to judge from the interesting figures we have got of losses by collision as to what proportion of those losses were caused by collision in fog?—Quite; I believe that there are no statistics whatever of that.

936. Therefore, we must not in the slightest degree assume, of course, that the whole, nor can you give us any idea of, what proportion, of those collisions are due to fog?—No, there is no table here for collisions in fog.

937. I am told there is none?—There is none.

Admiral Field.

938. A few questions, please, and they will be of a very simple character. You answered the learned Chairman that you apparently are opposed to any change?—Yes.

939. And one answer that you gave about objecting to (b) signal was, that it might cause a seaman to mistake the direction; but you just now, in answer to Mr. Blake, used an expression which, I think, was a slip, that the signals would be beautiful if only two ships were meeting one another. I do not want to pin you to the word "beautiful," but I want to ask you a question or two upon the case that you cited just now, which was left to you by one of their captains as occurring off Shoebury Buoy with 36 vessels about him in a fog. There would be no difference of opinion on the part of anybody that it would be hopeless to distinguish between the signals of individual ships under those conditions; but I want to ask you some questions on behalf of signals, to see what may be said in their favour as well as against them. Would a captain be any worse off if (b) signal were intentionally inserted and adhered to, namely, vessel stopped, two long blasts; would a vessel in a fog with way on be worse off if that signal were conveyed to it clearly?—I would rather that you should hear my captain upon that point, because he is the man who will get confused with the signals; he can explain far better than I can what goes on in a multitude of vessels.

940. Only you stated that just now, so I wanted to challenge you on that point?—It was from information I received from masters of vessels.

941. I think most seamen are of the opposite opinion with regard to that. You stated that (f) was unnecessary; but would you adhere to that when you are informed that the United States will on no consideration give it up?—I trust that Her Majesty's Government will take care of us.

942. It is an advantage, I presume, to be in harmony with other nations?—I have no doubt that the day will come when we shall all be in harmony.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

943. You prefer the rules as they now exist to any alteration whatever?—Yes.

944. Before I go to that I want to get your evidence quite clear upon the matter before the Committee, and I am not quite sure whether it is clear upon the Notes that all the figures that you you have quoted are from Board of Trade returns. They were all Board of Trade figures, were they not?—Yes, they are all Board of Trade figures.

Chairman.

945. They were all taken from Board of Trade Blue Books?—Yes.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

946. Your reason for objecting to the proposed new signals is, that you are afraid that any multiplication of these signals would puzzle a mariner?—Yes.

947. Of course, all your men are certificated men?—Nearly every one of them. I have one man now who has not a certificate.

948. Is he in charge?—Yes, he is in charge; and he is as good a master as you can find, though he cannot pass for the Board of Trade certificate. He is a most fortunate man; he has rarely been in collision.

949. My only reason for asking you that question is, that knowing very well the examination that these men have to go through for mate or master, and the present intricacies and difficulties connected with Merryweather's compasses and stars, and so forth, it seems to me impossible that when a man can pass that examination he should have such great difficulty in understanding these new signals?—They have to learn these new rules first, and then to apply them in moments that require very quick action; in moments of distress and emergency they have to apply them.

950. Then one other question, which is practically more for my own information: what did your captain do on the occasion when 36 vessels were there when the fog lifted?—If you will kindly hear him, he will tell you.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

951. One honourable gentleman has put to you, and it has been the tendency, I have noticed once or twice (one witness was of the same opinion), that the greater the number of sounds going on all round, the more likely were they to make a man cautious; that the greater the number of sounds, the greater caution he would exercise. If that were carried to its logical conclusion, would not that make it better that there should be 90 signals instead of nine all sounding together?—I have heard that the proposed new rules only represent a larger number that have been whittled down.

952. Do not you, on the other hand, think that though they are not actually course-indicating signals, they have a tendency to make a man proceed in fog, whereas if he only heard the one blast he would be likely to bring up?—An Englishman is a go-a-head man, and if he can make his passage he will.

953. But, in spite of the loss of time that ensues, you would rather that your own vessel and others should bring up in fog than proceed, would you not?—Yes; I should save the time in the long run, because if a man gets into collision his vessel is off duty 14 days or three weeks.

954. And your principal objection, I may say, to the new rules is, that you think, in spite of Englishmen being go-a-head men, they will make them still more go-a-head?—I think they will lead a man to go a-head in a fog when, if he has only one signal, he will not do so. I am afraid so. Of course, this is a matter of pious opinion.

Captain MELVILLE TUKE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

955. You are a shipmaster in the employ of the Orient Steam Navigation Company, Limited?—Yes.

956. And have been in command in their service for five years?—Yes.

957. I need not ask you whether you have had a great deal of experience?—I have had 25 years at sea.

958. What do you say about these fog signals; will you tell us your own view in your own way?—I think from the very beginning there is no foundation for them. The whole foundation for fog signals is sound, and sound in a fog is nothing at all; you cannot rely upon it for two minutes together. Therefore, where sound is unreliable a sound signal would be a fallacy; it would simply cause utter confusion. A man would be listening for signals, or he might hear something, and through the sound in the fog he might hear two blasts, or one, or three; he might hear one prolonged blast, but he could not tell whether it was the actual signal blown from a whistle.

959. You think, therefore, that all signals in fog are misleading?—Perfectly misleading.

960. And that would include the present

signals?—Yes, that would include the present signals; they are no use at all in fog beyond that occasionally one may hit upon the right direction of a fog signal.

961. That being the case, the only thing which is important is that you shall hear a noise, I suppose?—But you do not hear the signals; you do not hear the noise.

962. But is it not desirable in a fog to have some noise to apprise you that there is another ship?—Yes, we want that.

963. But what sort of noise does not matter?—It does not matter what sort of noise it is, so long as we can get some noise that will penetrate the fog, which a whistle will not do.

964. That being the case, these new signals, you think, would not assist anybody?—Not in the least; they would help to confuse people.

965. And the old signals only assist people to the extent that they make a noise?—Yes, when you hear the old signals. When you hear the present signals you know exactly what to expect.

966. That is to say, you know that some ship is in the neighbourhood?—Yes, and that you always expect in a fog.

967. Would

967. Would these new signals do any harm if that is the case?—I think so.

968. They would let you know that there was a ship in the neighbourhood, would they not?—Yes, they might; but the screeching and yelling of some 20 or 30 ships around you would be utterly confusing. At the very time that a man wants his brain clear the less noise you have the better. One single steam blast in a fog would be quite sufficient.

969–70. If you had 20 or 30 ships around you, which is often the case, and one of those steamers, for instance, begins to make a signal, and somebody else commences signalling, very soon the whole thing is jumbled up into utter chaos. Is that so now?—Now you hardly ever hear it; it is simply one long blast now; but if you begin one long and two short blasts, and so on, it will be utterly confusing.

971. But if you were in that situation with 20 or 30 vessels around you, and all making the noise you are speaking of, I should have thought your obvious duty would be to stop your engines?—We always do.

972. Then the additional sound cannot hurt you if you do stop your engines?—You know when these things are going on you cannot always stop a ship. For instance, in the tideway it is impossible to stop a ship without anchoring.

973. That is just the same under the present rules?—Yes.

974. The new rules would not alter your power of stopping the ship?—No.

975. What is the danger, then; I want you to put your mind to that?—The actual danger chiefly is in the signals being mistaken, one signal for another.

976. I gathered from you just now that all signals were deceptive in a fog?—Yes, that is exactly what the position is. Supposing that a steamer were to make three long blasts, it would be easy for those three long blasts to be mistaken for one long blast in a fog.

977. Is it easy for one long blast to be mistaken for three long blasts?—It might be, as you will see by my evidence. There is an echo in fog, which everybody at sea knows.

978. Under those circumstances it seems to me that, in your view, no signals are of any real value, except so far as possible to convey to you that ships are in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

979. And the more noise you hear the more ships you suppose are in the neighbourhood?—The more varied noise, because you hardly ever meet two steamers with the same noise.

980. Therefore the more cautious you would be?—No, you would not be more cautious, because a seamen when once he gets near a fog is as cautious as he can be.

981. That is your view of the danger that would be caused?—Yes.

982. Do you think you would have any difficulty, as a practical man, in learning the signals?—Not the slightest; there is no difficulty whatever. I have read them over, and I have not the slightest difficulty in learning them; any child five years old could learn the signals in five minutes.

Chairman—continued.

983. You have to learn a good many difficult things for navigation, and some require rather a special training?—Yes, and it takes many years.

984. And you have to go through examinations of a difficult kind; do you think that any addition to your difficulties would be caused by these few extra fog signals?—No difficulty at all; it is only a matter of time.

985. Your evidence entirely goes upon the fact that sounds are indistinguishable in fog; and you do not want to multiply the sounds, is that it?—Yes.

986. If there are other criticisms that you would like to make about these new signals in your own way, will you kindly do so?—There is simply the point about the sound in a fog; that is the whole basis, I think. If a man were to take the ordinary precautions in fog he needs none of these things.

987. He would not require them?—No, he would not require them; the present existing signals are quite sufficient.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

988. You have seen, of course, these proposed rules?—Yes.

989. Will you look at (f) and (g) for one moment?—Certainly.

990. Seeing that by (f) a vessel when towing has to give one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts, and that by (g) a steam vessel wishing to indicate to another "the way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me," has to sound three blasts, short, long, and short, is there not a danger that in a fog the three blasts might be mistaken for an invitation for a vessel to go past another?—A vessel that was being towed might give two short blasts that might be mistaken for anything. Therefore, it is no signal at all.

991. And you might think that you had an invitation to feel your way past a vessel when it might only be a signal proceeding from a vessel towing?—Yes.

992. Would not that add materially to the danger?—Yes, it would.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

993. Your main objection, I gather, to these new signals, is that they multiply the supposed sound signals, and would be liable to become more dangerous, and be of no advantage?—Yes; I think that they would be more likely to cause danger than to avert it.

994. By that I understand you to mean that a pressing mariner would probably take it that he was at liberty to push on, that he was given the option of pushing on, and would be more likely to do so because of these rules than he does now?—I do not know; I do not feel that.

995. Then why do you think them more likely to increase the danger?—Simply from the amount of noise going around.

996. How would that increase danger. It might increase your uncertainty as to what the vessels were doing; but how would it increase the danger?—Not the actual danger. If your ship was in the same position she would not be any worse. If I was surrounded by four or five vessels, and I was on the bridge, and I heard one fellow beginning to blow his whistle, a danger signal, he might get half way through it, and somebody else take it up, and somebody else begin another, and sombody another, and it would become utter chaos.

997. What would you do?—If one steamer was continually blowing one blast, all you want to know is that the steamers are there, or vessels of any description; but as to signalling in a fog it is out of the question on account of the sound.

998. That is to say, conveying information by sound in a fog is impracticable?—Totally.

Admiral Field.

999. We quite understand your objection to any signals beyond the one, because when you have 20 or 30 ships around you you think that it could only make confusion worse confounded; and we understand your answer to my honourable friend on my left, that with four or five ships it would only add to your confusion?—Yes, or even two or three.

1000. I will take that answer as it stands, and allow that answer to prevail in the argument; but I will bring you to another case where you have only, we will say, one ship somewhere on the starboard, either bow or beam, and another on the port, either bow or beam, would you be any worse off with (b) signal if a vessel made (b) two long blasts, indicating that she was stopped. Surely, as a seamen, you would feel more certain of her position, and of her position, if you could distinguish that she was stopped?—But you cannot with a sound signal.

1001. But I am putting a case which, I think, you will admit, that you can distinguish between one ship on your bow or beam, and another ship on your bow or beam?—You cannot tell whether a ship that signals is on your port bow, or starboard bow, or astern, or ahead.

1002. Narrow it down to one ship?—That is with one ship.

1003. Then if you say that a ship might indicate starboard or a ship might indicate port, still, if you could get (b) signal distinctly made, could you then maintain your position, you would be worse off with (b) distinctly telling you that the vessel had stopped?—If we could get signals which we could be certain of in a fog, the more signals we had the better.

1004. I am only tying you down to this one signal (b). If that is made, indicated to you distinctly by two long blasts that the ship is stopped, would it not be better for you?—If you could understand the two long blasts; but that long blast might be followed by the ringing of a bell, and you would not hear it.

1005. Then, at all events, according to this signal she would be at anchor?—Then suppose I was to act upon it, and when I got up she was ringing a bell when I got alongside, you would not hear the bell before. The waters might be so narrow that you had to go one side or the other, and there was not much room on either side.

1006. But if that vessel indicated to you that she was stopped, by two long blasts?—She cannot stop; you cannot distinguish the blasts in fog.

1007. You just now admitted to one honourable gentleman that you yourself, personally, could have all these signals at your fingers' ends in a short time; you could distinguish two long blasts, of course?—If you heard them.

1008. I am assuming that you would hear two blasts, and you might possibly not be quite certain where they were located?—A ship might blow two blasts, but by the time you got to it, it would be one, very likely.

1009. But supposing you did hear two long blasts, and only from one vessel somewhere about you, would you not, as a seaman, feel happier in knowing that that vessel was stopped?—Certainly I should.

1010. That is evidence then to a certain extent in favour of (b) signal. I would like to ask you about other signals if you follow me. In answer to the Marquess of Carmarthen just now you did not express a definite opinion about (f), but you stated that you did not want any at all; we must try and bring you down to the point. With regard to (f), the United States are very strong indeed for retaining that signal. Do you not as a seaman admit that it would be useful to have that signal if you could be sure that you understood it, a vessel towing?—If you could make sure of hearing it.

1011. Then supposing you were not sure you would not be any worse off for it?—Yes, you would be much worse off.

1012. It would still be a vessel in a fog, would it not?—Yes, it would still be a vessel in a fog, certainly. I might take it for a vessel with one blast in the present regulations.

1013. A vessel in an ordinary fog with way on would give only two blasts?—It might blow two blasts, and you might take it for one. Sound signals, I say, in fog are utterly useless

1014. You hold that opinion very strongly?—I hold it in common with practically the whole of my profession.

1015. I have great sympathy with your view; I was only trying to see whether I could extract anything from you in favour of some of the signals. Take a vessel at anchor at sea; will you look at (e) signal. You know signal (d), everybody does, a vessel at anchor rings a bell?—Yes.

1016. Are you of opinion that you would suffer if you could also know that the vessel was at anchor in the fair-way, and not in the ordinary anchorage; would you not like to know by her being able to make these two long blasts, and the ringing of a bell as well?—I quite admit all these signals if you can hear them. It is an excellent system of signalling if you can make use of them; but when you might use them they would be utterly misunderstood. I should give one signal, and another ship alongside of me might mistake it for another.

1017. I am afraid your answer is too general; I must press you. Where it was only one ship, so far as you understand, somewhere near you in a fog, in that case would it not be an advantage to be able to ascertain whether she was at anchor, or not at anchor, or whether she was stopped stopped or not stopped?—If she blew two blast whistles according to signal (d) she would be stopped.

1018. But according to signal (e), if she added the ringing of a bell she would be at anchor?—Yes.

1019. You would not object to that; she would still be stopped, and it would be an advantage to know that, would it not?—I should say on the two prolonged blasts that you might hear them come to you just as easily as one blast.

1020. But after an interval?—There is no interval in fog—there is, and there is not; you cannot rely upon it.

1021. Every two minutes she is to make blasts?—But I mean the interval between the blasts.

1022. That is supposed to be a second?—That is nothing in a fog; you might hear for five minutes consecutively, and the next five minutes you might not hear it at all.

1023. If you did not hear it you would not be any worse off, would you?—Yes, you would; you would take it for a vessel under way.

1024. As a seaman, would you not like to get the knowledge if you could obtain it?—Yes, if I could obtain it.

1025. Then, if the signal cannot be made, you are no worse off. I would ask you, as a seaman, with regard to signal (h), the telegraph ship, have you any opinion upon that. If we have to eliminate any of these signals, would you propose to retain that or eliminate it?—If you have to make any signals, I should say keep that. Of course, some men might argue that a ship which has hold of a cable is practically a ship at anchor; but that cable would not be in a position in the ocean where a ship could anchor. A ship going across the Atlantic, picking up a cable, might give the anchor signal the same as being fast to a cable of any sort.

1026. Have you ever in your experience met a telegraph ship?—Yes.

1027. Picking up or laying a cable?—Laying a cable; only once.

1028. Do you not think that that signal (h) could be combined under (b), two long blasts, vessel stopped?—It would have the same effect.

1029. If it had the same effect, you might eliminate it; if we are to get rid of any, I would like to know which, in the opinion of an experienced seaman, is the least important?—That is the least important of any.

1030. Then I take you to (i), a vessel not under command, four short blasts; do you not think that (i) might be combined with (b), vessel stopped, supposing that (b) is retained?—They are practically the same thing.

1031. Then you would combine them, or rather eliminate (i)?—Yes, I should.

1032. Then we have two that you would eliminate. Now let us go back to (g), which some experienced men are not very strongly in favour of, "Way off my vessel," one short, one long, and one short blast; do not you think that (g) also might be combined with (b), vessel stopped; it is an optional signal, of course?—I do not think it is a desirable signal at all.

1033. Then you think that (b) would cover it?—I think (b) would cover all that.

1034. Then, if you eliminate any, you would consider (g), (h), and (i) as the least important?—They might all come under the heading of (b), if you have to make signals.

1035. That is a valuable admission from you, as an experienced seaman. I do not think that I need ask you any more.

Mr. Blake.

1036. And after you have put them all under (b) you would strike out (b)?—I would.

1037. I understand you to say, both with regard to the continuity of the sound and the direction of the sound, that your experience is that there is no reliance to be placed upon what you do hear from the bridge?—Not the least.

1038. You cannot tell from what you hear what is actually taking place or where the sound is coming from?—No.

1039. A continuous sound may be apparently divided, and a divided sound may be apparently continuous?—Yes.

1040. And a sound apparently forward the beam may be astern, and a sound apparently astern may be forward of the beam?—Yes.

1041. So that there is really no certainty, no matter how clear and distinct a signal may sound; all you can say is, if you do happen to hear a noise, that there is a vessel somewhere near you?—Yes.

1042. So you think that nothing can indicate more certainly to you on the bridge where a ship is or what she is doing, and what condition she is in, by any attempt to make further signals than the one long blast?—Yes.

1043. And just in the same way, no matter what sounds reach you on the bridge, you would act in the same way, as you know so little from what you hear; that is to say, you do not know where the ship is?—Yes, I say the same of any sound signal, beyond the fact that there is a noise, and you know there is something.

1044. That being your view of the blessed uncertainties of the situation, will you explain to me how you would alter your attitude and alter the management of your ship, notwithstanding that there came a babel of sounds all round you?—The thing is to keep your ship as still as possible.

1045. As quiet as possible?—I mean not as quiet as possible, but in the same position.

1046. I did not mean that; quieta non moreri is what I was thinking of. You mean to keep as nearly in the same position as possible?—Yes.

1047. You would stop altogether if the conditions allowed?—Yes.

1048. And otherwise you would move as little as you could?—Yes. I say that when a ship is at sea in a fog in the ordinary track of vessels, it is better for the master to keep his ship under perfect control: to go two or three knots and then put the engine astern, and she can go astern.

1049. You just keep way on her?—Yes, sufficient way to enable me to handle her.

1050. With reasonable rapidity in case of sudden emergency?—Yes.

1051. Will you explain to me what added difficulty you contemplate will arise under those circumstances from a variety of sounds being projected from ships all round you; you have got one invariable rule, have you not?—Yes, I have.

1052. No matter what you hear or where you hear it, it does not alter your rule of action?—No; but because I do not alter, it does not say that other men would not.

1053. I am speaking of yourself, you know, and your own view. For your own self it would not confuse you or alter your rule of action?—It would confuse me; I defy any one to stand on a ship bridge and not be confused with a lot of steamers yelling all round.

1054. But that may happen as it is now; you may have 30 or 40 vessels round you all yelling at the same time?—They would not make so much noise now.

1055. There would be a little more noise then, that is all?—Yes.

1056. Then the danger that you apprehend would be the confusion in the minds of captains; they would be bothered by this extra amount of noise?—I am sure they would.

1057. Would you apprehend this other danger which has been suggested to us also, that they would be more disposed to push on than they are under the present rules?—I should not like to say that. From my own experience, I have command of a mail steamer, and I have to keep time. I make one rule, and I never abate from it. I know other men do; but I know that some men do go on.

1058. But, judging for others, would you apprehend danger in consequence of the great confusion of sound which you have described as probable with the uncertainties which you have described?—I can quite see that it would give an inclination to a great many to go a-head trusting to the fog signals, not knowing the uncertainty of sound in a fog.

1059. That is to say, to masters who have not had your experience?—They might have had my experience, but not have taken the same notice of it.

1060. Who had not learnt as you have learnt the absolute unreliability of sound, and might be disposed to trust to signals that you believe are utterly untrustworthy?—Yes.

1061. And that so trusting they might act upon a theory that you think it would not be safe to act upon?—Yes, and go at a greater speed, waiting and listening for the signals and expecting to get out of the way on account of them.

1062. I judge that you would not attach any value then to these signals, even in the case of just two vessels meeting?—Not the slightest.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1064. You said that the seaman, when he gets into a fog, is as careful as possible?—Yes.

1065. And what would be dangerous you think would be anything that would tend to make him less careful when he gets into a fog?—Quite so.

1066. Do you suggest that there would be any mistake with regard to these signals?—No, I have no fault to find with the signals at all.

1067. Then you suggest no confusion or mistake in regard to the signals that would make a man less careful than simply hearing the noise of the present signals?—No, it would simply confuse him more.

1068. But if he is confused or made more careful no harm is done?—I do not think that he can be made more careful.

1069. But can you see how he could be made less careful?—Yes, I can.

1070. How?—By simply having a system of fog signals he might go on, and say "Oh, go on; let her go and wait for the next signal." He hears the signal and he acts on that signal, and very likely that signal is totally different from what he took it for; therefore, it is leading him into danger.

1071. Can you suggest any one of those signals upon which, if he believed he heard it, he would act more boldly than if he merely heard a noise?—Yes.

1072. Which?—If he heard a two-blast signal it might be one blast, and he would go on; there might be room, he might hear it broad on his bow and go on.

1073. Of course, he is governed by Article 16 all the time. But about the two blasts, you mean that he would think the vessel was stopped?—If he heard the two blasts he would think the vessel had stopped.

1074. When she was not?—Yes.

1075. And therefore he would go on more boldly?—Yes, he would, certainly.

1076. That you give as one instance in which you think misunderstanding these signals might make a man act more boldly than if the signal did not exist?—Yes.

1077. You have sailed all over the world?—Yes.

1078. Do you attach much importance to having an international agreement?—I do.

1079. A common rule of road?—Yes; without an international agreement no system of signals or anything else could be a rule of the road.

1080. Supposing you were told that the price of getting an international agreement was to agree to these sound signals, what would you say?—I should do without them.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1081. You would let the other nations carry them in spite of us, and use them?—If they use them, we must use them nominally.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1082. But we want to have a general agreement on the rule of the road?—Yes.

1083. Supposing that we find that we cannot get that general agreement except on the terms of assenting to these sound signals, would you accept accept these sound signals?—No, I would not accept them under any circumstances.

1084. You would rather lose the chance of an international agreement?—Yes; I cannot accept anything that I do not believe in.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1085. Supposing that America, Germany, France, Italy, Sweden, and Norway adopt them and use them, and England alone does not use them, you may be in hearing of ships of those countries?—I am quite certain they will not adopt them unless we do.

1086. But supposing they do?—I should say go on not using them. I do not think we ought to go in for anything of the sort.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1087. And also not getting agreement upon all the other points involved in this Code?—I do not see how we can give way one bit.

1088. But you understand that it is a matter of international agreement, where we have to give and take. There are certain things we may give way upon for the sake of getting a general agreement. This you consider is too important to give way on?—I think so. It is based on sound, and sound is nil in fog.

Captain JOHN ROBERT JOBLING, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1089. YOU are master of the steamship "Northdene," I believe?—Yes.

1090. And you have been 36 years at sea?—Yes.

1091. And I believe you make an average of from 50 to 60 voyages in the coasting trade during the year?—Yes.

1092. So that you go all round the coast, I suppose?—Yes.

1093. Will you tell me, do you object to these new sound signals?—Yes, utterly.

1094. Why?—I think when you commence to multiply signals you cause greater confusion, and with the confusion I think you run greater risk of collision.

1095. Do you think you can distinguish sounds at all in a fog?—No, not at all times; the difficulty is to get even two men to give you the same bearings of a sound.

1096. That is a question of direction; you cannot determine the direction; do you think you could determine two long blasts from one long blast or not in a fog?—That would be according to the time they give them; but a short, a long and a short blast, I contend, would appear as one long blast, and a long and two short blasts would appear as two blasts.

1097. Now, when you find yourself with a number of ships in the neighbourhood, and you hear a great deal of noise in your neighbourhood of steam whistles, fog horns, and so forth, your duty, of course, then is to stop your engines, is it not?—Ease her down.

1098. In the ordinary course?—In the ordinary course.

1099. Do you think you would be likely to depart from that duty by reason of the new system?—I think so.

1100. Why?—I think it is an encouragement to masters to run a greater risk.

1101. Do you think that you would be tempted from your duty?—Provided you made the new signals compulsory signals.

1102. That is what I do not quite understand: you would know that it was your duty, would you not, to stop your engines?—Yes.

1103. But what would there be in the new signals to tempt you to depart from your duty when you knew what it was?—Because there is a certain signal there which tells us to feel our way past.

Chairman—continued.

1104. That is not a compulsory signal?—I say provided it was compulsory.

1105. But that is not a compulsory signal; is there anything in the signals as they are proposed which would tempt you to depart from your duty, do you think?—No, not anything further than I have just remarked.

1106. However, your idea is that there would be confusion of sound?—A great deal.

1107. Would there not be some confusion of sound if you had 20 or 30 ships close to you, or 10 or 12, under the present rules?—No, not such a great deal. I have had over 40; I have had 50 and 60 steamers round me.

1108. You could not distinguish one from another then, could you?—I could distinguish the vessels at anchor by their simply ringing their bells, and the vessels which were under way with me by their just blowing the one long blast. I have met with them blowing two blasts, indicating that they had put their head to starboard, that was to turn them head to tide to bring up to them to anchor.

1109. But if you had 50 or 60 round you within a mile or two miles, all sounding their signals; surely you do not mean to say that you could distinguish the one from the other?—No; I think it would have a tendency to drive us mad.

1110. Under the present system, it has not driven you mad yet?—The present system will not, I admit; I am quite content with that.

1111. Would the difference of sound make all the difference?—Yes.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

1112. When you meet these 50 or 60 ships in a fog, is it always in narrow waters, or occasionally is it out at sea?—I may say both ways. The largest amount of vessels I have met in narrow waters; but I have met as far as 30 off the "Longships," between the "Longships" and the "Wolf."

1113. Do you think that it would be possible to have one simple code of fog signals for narrow waters, and another for general use in the ocean?—No,

—No, I do not think we can simplify the matter at all as it is.

1114. You might make it worse?—Yes, I think so; I think it is better to let well alone and let us stick to what we have now; which we have done for so many years.

1115. Supposing that some of the nations which attended the Conference at Washington adopted the new signals, and others kept on with the old ones, would not that be more confusing than any general adoption of the new signals would be?—Yes, it would, but I do not think any of them would go against the European powers. Their fleet is too small to be compared with ours.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1116. You generally are of opinion, roughly speaking, that the present signals are sufficient, adequate, and enough?—Quite sufficient any way.

1117. And require no improvement or alteration?—No.

1118. And your reason for thinking that these new signals would be a disadvantage is that they would lead to increased confusion?—Yes, and collisions of course. I also think that they would have a tendency to affect the hearing and also the sight of both shipmasters and officers.

1119. The sight?—Yes, for the simple reason that if you introduce those signals you will want an extra light on the bridge, and a watch to time them besides; and what is more confusing to the sight than to look into a light, and then suddenly to look into darkness.

1120. It mystifies the eye?—Yes; it mystifies the eye. I say that in course of time you would have all the shipmasters partly deaf and partly blind.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

1121. And mad also?—And mad also.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1122. I only want to put one more question to you. I believe you are the officer that we were told was in a fog off Shoebury Buoy with 30 vessels around you. What course did you practically pursue in your own ship when you heard all those vessels round you?—I ran suddenly into the fog, and I endeavoured to get the vessel head to tide, and then to bring up.

1123. The ebb tide?—No, we were running up the flood tide, bound to London.

1124. What did you do under those circumstances?—I gradually brought the vessel round head to tide, paying strict attention, having both officers on the bridge, and a man on the lookout trying to learn where the different bells were ringing, because there were about 15 steamers under way with me, and we only used the one and two signals; the one and two blasts indicating "I am porting," "I am starboarding."

1125. The reason I asked that question was this, if you can give me your answer: supposing that these new signals had been law at that time, would you have taken a different course from what you did take?—I do not know what we would have done then.

1126. You would have slowed down, and got head to tide anyhow?—Yes, naturally we would have slowed down; but I am afraid to think what would have been the consequence.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

1127. You are opposed to any alterations of the signals as they are at present?—Yes, totally.

Admiral Field.

1129. But the one blast only means that she has got way on; two blasts means that she has stopped?—In the new proposals, yes.

1130. Would you object to know that the vessel had stopped if you could know it?—But why make that alteration when we know already when a vessel has stopped, under the rule that we have now.

1131. At present you have got the (a) signal which, as is universally known by all vessels in a fog, means "way on," one long blast?—Yes.

1132. As to (b) signal, I want to narrow down your objections to a point. You object to all I know; but I want to know, if you could be certain that a vessel near you was making these two long blasts at a second's interval, would you not like to know that she had stopped?—Provided that I could distinctly know positively that she was stopped, then no doubt it might be an improvement.

1133. That is the understanding from the nature of the signal. Then, if you do not know it you are no worse off?—But with the present system, if I heard a vessel with two long blasts I would starboard my helm. I should know that her road was stopped.

1134. But, of course, the helm signals you understand are not to be used in a fog; you may use them, but they are not to be used in fogs by the instructions; if you must have some of the signals, and if some may be eliminated, as the result of this inquiry, would you look down the list and tell me those which you would eliminate in preference to others; take the bottom first, and then run up (i), (h), and (g); as to (i), vessel not under command, might not that be reckoned in (b) as stopped, two long blasts?—Yes.

1135. And the telegraph ship (h), might not that be given up?—Yes.

1136. And way off my vessel (g), might not that be reckoned in (b)?—Does not that encourage a ship's master to proceed on and navigate through that signal in a fog?

1137. We will come to that afterwards; I want to get your opinion as an expert seaman that if some signals are to be got out of the way, which which signals would you prefer to get rid of?—That four blasts is very well; I quite agree with that.

1138. The (h) telegraph ship, might not that be included in (b) as stopped?—Yes.

1139. Then (g) way off my vessel; that is another word for stopping; might not that be included in (b); at present it means, "You may feel your way past me"?—I do not agree with that (g), a short, a long, and a short blast.

1140. Would you consider that those three are the least important; supposing that some must be retained, would you eliminate those three as being the least important?—Yes.

1141. You are in favour of eliminating those three if some must be retained and some may go. I do not want to put words into your mouth, but as a seaman you can tell me which you would rather get rid of?—I would sooner get rid of those three.

1142. As to a vessel towing (f), we are told you know that the Americans will not give it up because they reckon it a very important signal. As a seaman, do you not think it desirable to retain a signal of that kind?—I do not see that it is necessary.

1143. Have you ever been employed yourself much in towing vessels?—No, I have never towed at all.

1144. Nor your company?—The company has, but I am not towing.

1145. Do they do much towing?—Our company has five steamers, I think it is, towing lighters.

1146. Do not you think that that signal is desirable when a vessel is towing a big ship, and cannot handle herself in the way that she can if she is not embarrassed?—I think if she just blows an ordinary blast it is sufficient.

1147. You do not think that an extra signal is necessary for that?—No.

1148. Will you look at (e) as a seaman. An ordinary vessel at anchor rings a bell; but supposing that a vessel, as contemplated by this signal, is at anchor in a fairway, or in a dense fog somewhere out in the open sea, if she is at anchor would you approve of these two suggestions, two long blasts as well as ringing the bell?—Decidedly not.

1149. You would keep her under the bell still?—I would keep her under the bell still.

1150. But the bell does not travel very far?—It travels far enough to clear a vessel. If it answers in narrow waters it will answer in wide as well.

1151. But as a seaman, would you not be of opinion that two long blasts in addition would be a valuable signal under those circumstances?—I should not like it.

Mr. Richardson.

1152. What water do your firm tow vessels in?—From the Humber to the Thames.

Mr. Blake.

1153. I understand you to say that the helm signals, as a matter of fact, are sometimes used in a fog?—Yes, the present code of signals.

1154. The course signals are used in practice, you say?—No, not course signals.

1155. The helm signals?—Yes, just the one, two, or three blasts.

1156. You do not use them as course signals, but you use the signal that you are porting the helm or starboarding the helm?—Yes.

1157. Those are course signals, then, in a sense?—Yes.

1158. And you use them in fog?—Decidedly.

1159. And are able to distinguish them?—Not at all times.

1160. But so often that it is useful to use them?—Yes, it is useful at night time.

1161. Have you used them yourself?—Yes.

1162. And heard them used?—Yes.

1163. And derived benefit from them?—Yes.

1164. And given benefit by them?—Yes, and given benefit by them as well.

1165. Then your opinion is that it is possible to rely in some degree upon them?—To a very small degree.

1166. But to some degree you can rely upon what appears to be two blasts really being two blasts in a fog?—Yes, if they give us a sufficient limit of time; but one or two seconds is not sufficient.

1167. But with a sufficient limit of time you can rely to a material degree, to enough to make it valuable, upon its being what it appears to be, two blasts instead of one, or three blasts instead of two?—If we can determine the locality of the object.

1168. I am not talking of the locality but of the character of the sound that you hear; you think that you can discern whether it is really one, two, or three blasts?—Yes.

1169. Notwithstanding the deception that the fog produces?—That is, if they give a reasonable time between.

Captain WENTWORTH SHIELDS WADE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1170. YOU are, I believe, a Shipmaster of 33 years' experience, and at present in the service of the Waterford Steamship Company, running between Liverpool and the Bristol Channel and Waterford?—That is so.

1171. And you have had 15 years' experience in the coasting and Channel trades?—Yes.

1172. You hold five pilotage certificates from different parts?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1173. Therefore you have had a great deal of experience?—Yes; I have had a fair experience in the Channel trade and others.

1174. You have come as a representative witness, I believe?—I come representing the Shipmasters' and Officers' Federation.

1175. I believe that federation has certain affiliated bodies, has it not?—They are affiliated one with the other.

Chairman—continued.

1176. Different bodies?—The federation consists of four different associations.

1177. I do not want to go into detail; but are there a number of associations, all of them containing certificated officers?—Yes.

1178. And in all is there a membership of about 9,000 certificated officers?—Yes.

1179. What do you say about these new fog signals, generally speaking?—Our view of these new fog signals in a general way is this: we approve of Sub-section (b), the signal under that heading, conditionally that the signals under Sub-sections (e), (g), (h) and (i) are eliminated.

1180. You say that (b) ought to be put in the place of (e), (g), (h) and (i), all of them?—We consider that (b) is a signal that would govern vessels under the conditions of the Sub-sections (e), (g), (h) and (i).

1181. Will you tell me about (a); what do you say about that; do you approve of that?—The signal under Sub-section (a) we would wish to be quickened to one minute, instead of two, between the blasts.

1182. In (a) you want to reduce the interval of two minutes to one minute?—Yes.

1183. The interval is the same as was in the old rule?—Yes, it is the same.

1184. So it comes to this: you approve of (b) conditionally upon the others that you have mentioned being eliminated?—That is so.

1185. You do not appear to have difficulties or objections to adding a new fog signal?—Not to one fog signal. We object to a complicated system of signals, where a number of signals may be made that would be likely to be interpreted wrongly by an officer in charge of a ship.

1186. Do you think this is a point, which has come before us a good deal in the evidence of other witnesses, that if there were misunderstandings of the sound, it would still remain the duty of the master to stop his ship until he could clearly perceive what was the signal that was being indicated?—Under the law as it stands, and under the law under these proposed altered signals, you are still allowed to navigate your ship at a moderate speed in fog, and you are acting rightly within the law in doing so; so that it would be more than you could really do to call upon shipmasters to stop their vessels altogether under those conditions; they would still go on navigating at a moderate speed. There is no question that these signals would confuse an officer in charge of a ship, and specially in crowded waters.

1187. Do you think he would have any difficulty in learning these new fog signals?—I do not think there would be much difficulty in learning them, but I do think there would be great difficulty in retaining them and interpreting them.

1188. You mean in applying them at the moment?—You would be likely to make a mistake.

1189. Supposing you were to make a mistake, do you think that it would not be reasonable to expect that captains of ships would stop their engines in a fog if they thought they were liable to make a mistake by reason of the confusion?—The law says that they can go ahead at a moderate speed, and I presume they would comply with the law under those conditions.

1190. I do not know whether your attention has been called to Article 16?—Yes, it has.

Chairman—continued.

1191. It says that "A steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." Do you think that, however confusing, if the master of the ship was to obey that order the new signals would create any danger?—I think that anything that would cause confusion in the minds of men in charge of a ship is a present source of danger; and further, if this clause in Article 16 is enforced our Channel trade could not be carried on in foggy weather, as you would always, or nearly always, have a whistle before your beam in entering or leaving port; and again, you could not navigate with engines stopped.

1192. I do not know whether you are aware of the position that is taken by many other nations about these rules. Do you attach importance to having an international agreement?—We have that at present.

1193. Yes, but supposing that other nations were to insist upon carrying out these fog signals, do you think that your objections to them are so strong that you would not be willing to give them a trial?—We could not give those signals a trial and draw back.

1194. Why do you say that?—I do not think that it is a thing that would ever occur. If we once adopt those signals they are adopted for good or bad.

1195. But do you mean that you then become satisfied with them if you tried them?—No, but I know none of our regulations where any portion of them have been removed afterwards. We have adopted them, and they have remained with us.

1196. But you would not go to this length, would you, that it would be your duty to cling to a bad thing if you found by experience it was bad?—Unfortunately it is not the shipmasters that cling to these bad things; it is these bad things that are forced upon us. We never asked for these rules; we made no complaint of the old ones. We were quite satisfied to go on in the way we were doing.

1198. You would oppose them, cost what it might. I mean that you would not even give up your opposition in order to arrive at international agreement?—We would not.

Admiral Field.

1199. You have already answered the learned Chairman that the signal (e) might be included with (g), (h), and (i) in (b)?—I think that that was not my meaning. I meant that (e) should be eliminated from these signals.

1200. I understood

1200. I understood you to think that (e), (g), (h), and (i) might all be reckoned, you said, in (b), and you are in favour of keeping (b)?—I did not mean that we were to use whistle signals for vessels at anchor in a fairway; but I said that (e) would require to be eliminated if we consented to the other.

Mr. Blake.

1201. You would stick to the bell for (e)?—Yes.

1202. And include the others in (b)?—We would ask for an efficient bell in all ships.

Admiral Field.

1203. You do not approve of (e) at all, but you want a better bell?—An efficient bell.

1204. As for the signal (d), that is an old signal?—Yes, precisely.

1205. You said nothing about (f), "vessel towing"?—We approve of that signal; we think it is necessary that there should be a distinct signal for vessels towing and being towed.

1206. Then I press you again, (g) you have already said must be reckoned as included in (b), but we go on to (h), Telegraph-ship. You said that might also be included in (b) and also (i). But supposing that that view is not taken generally by others, could you in your opinion include Telegraph-ship (h) in the signal (f), as a vessel towing?—I think it would be most misleading to do so; a vessel towing frequently has considerable way on her, and is under control.

1207. So has a telegraph-ship which is laying a cable?—A telegraph-ship picking up a cable would have no way on her.

1208. But laying a cable she would have way on her?—Laying a cable she would have a small degree of way.

1209. But you do not think that signal important enough to retain it; you have already said that?—No, I do not think so.

Mr. Blake.

1210. I understand you, then, to approve of (a), the old signal?—Yes.

1211. And also of (b), which is two prolonged blasts, and of (f), the towing signal, which is one prolonged blast, followed by two shorter ones?—Yes. I approve of (a), which is the ordinary signal at present in use, subject to the interval being shortened.

1212. Then your experience, and the experience of those whom you represent, is that those three signals would be valuable?—We consider it so.

1213. Then your practical experience is that there would be a fair and reasonable opportunity in a fog of distinguishing the one blast, the two blasts, and the three blasts from one another, and relying to some extent upon them?—That is the opinion of the associations that I represent, and it is also my own opinion from practical experience.

1214. We have had some evidence which seemed to indicate that the peculiarities and eccentricities of fog were so great that you could not tell two blasts from one, or one blast from two, in the slightest degree. What is your view with regard to that?—My view, from my own experience, is that sound in fog made from vessels clear of the intervention of land is reliable as to the position, and as to its clearness of note; but sounds made from land stations are frequently deflected, and they sound from a different point from where they are made.

1215. There have been two points stated to us, and I should like to know your view upon them as a practical man. The first is, that it is quite impossible to depend in the least degree upon the apparent quarter from which the sound comes, and that in the case of a sound made by the vessel itself, not by a syren. Does that accord with your experience?—That is not my experience.

1216. You think there is a fair chance of knowing where the sound comes from?—I think so, within a reasonable distance, a half point or so.

1217. The second point is, that when there is one whistle it is said that it may just as likely as not come to you as a broken whistle—as two blasts or more; and that when there are two blasts, or more, they may come as one continuous blast. What is your view about that?—I am afraid a good deal of misapprehension arises, not through the fact that sound does not travel correctly, but through the defective instruments that convey the sound to you. The whistles being defective in construction do not give a clear note.

1218. They perhaps do not give an absolutely continuous note?—As you say, a continuous note is not always to be relied upon.

1219. But you think where an effective whistle gives one blast it would come to you as one blast, and if it gives two blasts it would come to you as two blasts?—Yes, I have found it so.

Mr. Richardson.

1220. How many members are there in the federation which you represent?—About 9,000.

Chairman.

1221. Is there anything else you would wish to say?—There is just one other point which you have not touched upon, which perhaps I might be excused for mentioning; that is in Article 28. I understand that is under your consideration.

1222. We are dealing only with sound signals in fog?—I thought Article 28 was also under the Committee's consideration.

1223. Will you tell me what it is?—"The words 'short blast' used in this article shall mean a blast of about one second's duration. When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way, in taking any course authorised or required by these Rules, shall indicate that course by the following signal on her whistles or syren."

1224. That is, vessels in sight of one another; it is not in fog?—No, it is not in fog; but I understood that it was to be considered in conjunction with these fog signals.

1225. Yes, Rule 28, in so far as it bears upon fog signals, is within our reference. What have you to say with regard to it?—These are signals which are well known in the merchant service, and I may say are very generally used now in fog; although according to the legal aspect of it they are not recognised, as a matter of fact they are very generally used by seamen round our coasts when meeting with one another in fog. It is the view of the federation that I represent that these signals ought to be made compulsory, and to apply to fog.

1226. Compulsory in a fog?—Yes, that they supply the key to indicate to another vessel that you are doing something definite that he knows, and that will probably result in your clearing him; and he can also act in such a way as will further assist you in doing that.

1227. Those are helm signals?—Helm signals.

1228. You recommend, therefore, that the helm signals of Article 28 should be used in a fog?—We do that, seeing that if these other signals are eliminated we get then a working code which we could really do something with. That, in connection with better instruments for denoting signals at sea, we think would help to reduce the number of collisions very materially. If our suggestions are accepted we would ask that the sound signals be remitted to a small committee and recast, so that the best possible may be adopted.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

1229. I do not understand how your suggestion would be possible where two ships do not exactly know where either of them is?—Our contention is that, so far as sound at sea is concerned, we can locate sound fairly well.

1230. Then you differ entirely from some previous witnesses?—That is my view, and that is our view upon the question, that the difficulty of sound is owing to land stations. I might say from my own personal experience of certain rock lighthouses, where detonating signals are used, that you are able on all occasions (and I have passed the places under those conditions so frequently that I have tested it) to fix your position by the sound very closely; and, taking that in conjunction with your soundings obtained by the lead, there is little or no difficulty. Of course, where sound signals are made where there is land at the back of them immediately, then they are deflected in such a way that frequently a signal made on the starboard bow is heard on the other bow, and vice versâ; but I think it is not the fog that does it, it is the land that causes the deflection of sound; at least, I have never found from light-ships or rock lighthouses the least difficulty in fixing the position of the sound.

1231. Or from a ship?—From a ship.

1232. Or the sound from another ship?—Or the sound from another ship.

Admiral Field.

1233. Would not the wind have some effect?—In fog we rarely have much wind.

1234. Under the head of fog, you include thick weather, you know?—I always call it fog when the atmosphere is so thick that you are not able to see a sufficient distance to clear a vessel with your helm without using your engines.

Mr. WALTER HOLLAND, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1235. YOU are a member of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, and were Chairman last year?—Yes.

1236. And you have been asked to come and lay the view of that association before us?—Yes.

1237. I believe that in your association the tonnage of your vessels is 1,588,312 gross?—Yes, and about 1,000,000 net tonnage.

1238. And that includes vessels of every class; all the large liners, cargo vessels and coasting vessels?—Yes; and I should just like to add to that that the vessels trading from Liverpool of the classes you have named have perhaps the highest value of any ships that trade out of this country, and therefore the more importance attaches to this question on behalf of my association. Both as regards the value of ships, some of which cost more than half a million (some of our large liners trading to New York), and as regards the value of the cargoes and the number of lives on board, we feel that that renders the question to us one of more vital importance than perhaps to any other association in the United Kingdom.

1239. I believe you are a member of the firm of Lamport and Holt, who own or manage 64 steamers?—I am.

1240. And you are your own insurers, are you not?—Almost entirely.

Chairman—continued.

1241. Your association has considered these new rules, I believe?—Yes; we have given the most careful consideration to this question.

1242. Have they passed any resolutions upon it?—No, not actually passed any resolutions upon it; we have had a long communication with the Board of Trade during the past year on the subject. You would wish me to state the objections that we raise to the proposed rules, I have no doubt.

1243. If you please?—Our objections to the new regulations are perhaps, first of all, that we do not consider that the steam whistle affords any means of producing accurately the sound it indicates. As to that, I would like to say that the steam whistle very often gets choked for one thing, and it cannot be relied upon to produce the short and the long blasts which are required under these new regulations. Then, again, there is no certainty, especially in foggy weather, that these sounds when produced will be conveyed over any definite area. That, I should take it, is an established fact. We have the evidence in the courts, which no doubt you have. I have here a note in our last report, which I shall be glad to hand in, from a judgment given by Lord Hannen, after sitting for 16 years as judge in the Admiralty Court. In giving judgment, in 1888, in the case of the "Rosetta," he said: "I desire to say emphatically, cally, that it is impossible to infer from the fact that a whistle is not heard in a fog that therefore there is an inefficient look-out on the vessel which does not hear it. It depends on other circumstances. It is not to be inferred that because from a particular distance at which in clear weather a signal could be heard it is not heard at that distance in a fog there is a bad look-out. I have specially consulted the Trinity Brethren on this subject. They have given me the benefit of their large knowledge and experience, and they say that what may be called the vagaries of sound in a fog are of a most astonishing character. They tell me that sometimes, where a signal has been given, which it was expected would be heard at a distance of four or five miles, it is not heard at a distance beyond a couple of cables' lengths. I have heard illustrations given by men of the highest eminence in science of a more extraordinary character even than that. It cannot, therefore, be taken that because a fog signal is not heard at the particular distance it is expected to be heard there is a bad look-out." I have had various other verbal statements made to me of the same kind. I am not an experienced navigator of any sort, and I have no practical knowledge of the subject myself; but all the evidence I have managed to obtain has tended to confirm that view, that in foggy weather there is no reliance whatever to be placed upon the position of sound or the way in which it travels. I am not at all sure whether that does not even apply to a state of things where there is no fog at all.

1244. You mean that sound may be inaccurately conveyed over water?—If you were to blind your eyes it would be very difficult indeed for you to tell where the sound came from.

1246. I observe, in the précis of the evidence which you have been good enough to send me, you refer to your communications with the Board of Trade, and apparently you consider that you did not have a sufficiently early opportunity of bringing your witnesses and your evidence before their notice. I do not want to go unnecessarily into that; but if you desire to say anything on that question to the Committee will you do so?—We do not think there was sufficient consideration paid to the shipping interests by the Board of Trade. We think that having consulted the shipping interests in the first instance before going to Washington, and having obtained a report which was practically adverse to these new regulations, and also having got the opinion of the Admiralty against any alteration in the present system, it would have been the proper course on the part of the Board of Trade, on coming back, when they appointed another Committee after the Washington Conference, to have again consulted us upon the subject as to what our views were in regard to these new regulations. As it was, we did not learn anything about them until the Blue Book was published showing the correspondence with foreign governments and the way in which the decision as to these new regulations was arrived at.

1247. There was one passage referred to, I think, in a letter of your association before this Committee, stating that the governments of Germany, the Netherlands, and the United States objected to the introduction of the proposed sound signals?—Yes.

1248. I think you will agree that those governments did express their approval of these rules, but you consider that they really did not wish for them, and that they gave way to pressure from the British Government?—That is the impression conveyed by the correspondence in the Blue Books. I think the only country that really consulted its shipping interests was that of the Netherlands. You will see, on page 43 of the Blue Book, that they distinctly differ from these sound signals, and take a very strong view upon them; and they still, I think, reserve their right to re-consider the matter. Then Germany has also done so.

1249. You probably agree with me in this: that in estimating the real view and feeling of the foreign governments the Foreign Office, after all, must be relied upon as being the best judge, because they have better means than we have to obtain information as to the true feeling of foreign governments?—Certainly, as the medium for finding out the opinions of those governments.

1250. What you say about that is, as I gather, derived from communications with persons of practical experience in these affairs?—Yes; we each of us in Liverpool, who have anything like a line of steamers, select from amongst our staff the men whom we consider of the greatest experience and intelligence; there are no men in the country, even in the Admiralty, that are equal to them in experience; they have probably had 25 or 30 years' experience at sea themselves, and are continually alive to everything that is going on around them; and we select them as our marine superintendents, and rely greatly upon their opinion first of all. Then we rely, secondly, of course, upon the most experienced of our masters of our ships. I have plenty of masters who have been over 25 years in my service, and I can only say that with that great number of vessels running I have never known any instance of a collision or a loss or an accident arising under the present existing regulations from fog; from sound signals used in fog there has never been one instance within the 30 years of my experience of an accident. I think it is recognised that these existing regulations came in about 1863.

1251. You mean that you have never known a case of collision in fog arising from any defect in the present system?—That is what I mean.

1252. You say, however, that the evidence you give is derivative evidence from the experience of people whom you have consulted?—Entirely. I would like to add to evidence that I have listened to in this room certain evidence that has not come before the Committee. For instance, it is only within recent years that there has been a great pressure of steam upon boilers. That has been laid great stress upon by several of my captains. A pressure of 180 lb. is a very common pressure, against less than half of that five or ten years ago; and the moment a vessel comes into a fog she lets go the steam, and the noise from this excessive pressure is so great that you cannot possibly hear any signals around you at all; any signals of any possible kind. There are some other points that will occur to me, I daresay, later on, but that was one that occurred to me particularly.

1253. You, I believe, consider that the United States Government have repealed their action of bringing the new rules into operation?—Yes.

1254. I do not think we have heard that before; can you give us the reference?—Yes, I have got a letter from the Board of Trade, dated the 6th March, stating this: "I am directed by the Board of Trade to acquaint you that they have now received, through the Foreign Office, a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, who reports that a Bill to adopt special rules for the navigation of harbours, rivers, and inland waters has been agreed to by both the House of Representatives and the Senate." And I understand that since then they have repealed the order to take place on the high seas.

1255. The letter you refer to is a notification that an Act has been passed, is it not; or have I not accurately understood it?—It was that an Act had been passed with regard to the navigation of harbours, rivers, and inland waters; but I understand that since then there has been an Act passing it with regard to the high seas.

1256. But since then an Act has been passed, you say, to the same purport with regard to the high seas. Be it so. The point was that I thought you said they had been repealed?—No, they never were put into force in American waters. They proposed to put them into force on the 1st March; but when they found that this country proposed to postpone the operation of this Act until the autumn, they not only postponed them altogether, but I think they actually withdrew them.

1257. They have postponed bringing them into operation pending the decision of the British Government?—Yes, I think so.

Mr. Blake.

1258. I think they have passed an Act suspending the operation of them for awhile?—Yes.

Chairman.

1259. Then probably that is the explanation?—Yes.

1260. You probably assent to that which I am informed is the case?—Yes.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.

1261. When was your first communication to the Board of Trade on this subject?—The first communication was in June 1891.

1262. Have you a copy of it there?—Yes, do you wish to have it?

1263. Yes, please?—Certainly (handing in the same).

1264. In that communication you objected to two points. You said: "The association see strong objection to the adoption of the proposed addition to Article 21, which they think very likely to lead to collisions, and they are very doubtful as to the proposed regulations with regard to the sound signals for fogs, which they think likely to be confusing (Article 15)"?—Yes.

1265. The first point has nothing to do with the Reference to this Committee, I think?—I do not recollect quite what that first point was; but it has nothing evidently to do with this Committee.

1266. You have not pressed your objections, I think, on that?—No, we have not.

1267. Did you proceed to specify your objections to the proposed regulations with regard to sound signals?—Not until March of last year, when we became aware that these regulations would be put into force. We were led, perhaps innocently, to conclude that it was not possible that the Board of Trade, after the advice it had received from its own committee and from the Admiralty, would proceed to enforce these regulations until the early part of last year.

1268. But was not a Paper presented to Parliament and published in the Autumn of 1892, including the Second Report of the Committee which sat after the Washington Conference, and showing the probability that these sound signals would be adopted?—Was that 1892 or 1893?

1269. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two?—There was a Paper, I believe, in 1892 or 1893, page 115 (it was March 1893) referring to the circular to the Foreign Office.

1270. I find that the Board of Trade, in February 1893 (it is page 124 of the Blue Book, C. 6869, 1893) wrote to you acknowledging your letter of the same month and enclosing a copy of the Parliamentary Paper to which I have alluded; so that you were fully acquainted with the state of affairs at that time?—We were evidently informed in February 1893, but we were put off by the statement that any decision to be arrived at would be dependent upon the concurrence of the foreign governments.

1271. But what I want to ascertain is why you did not formulate your objections to these sound signals until 1894, having in February 1893 a knowledge of the position of the subject?—Because we were not aware that they were going to be enforced in February 1893. There was a Committee appointed after that.

1272. But you knew that the Committee that sat after the Washington Conference had reported; you knew what that Report was, and you you knew that the Board of Trade were in communication with foreign governments on the subject, and yet you did not specify your objection; I merely ask if you can explain that anyhow; I do not understand the reason?—I can only conclude that these regulations were not actually enforced until after February 1893. There was no statement handed to us that they would be enforced until 1895. They were not to be enforced till 1895. The first intimation that we had was in the autumn of 1893, when we were requested to send witnesses to attend at a Committee to consider the subject again. That was in August 1893, I think you will find.

1273. You complained of the neglect of the Board of Trade to consult the English shipowners upon this subject, and I want to ascertain how it happened that, as the English shipowners were acquainted with what was going on, they did not put their views before the Board of Trade a year or two before they did?—Because the Board of Trade had certainly told us in 1893 that whatever result would be arrived at would be dependent upon the replies they got from foreign governments; and it was not until November 1893, when the negotiations with these foreign governments had been brought to a conclusion, that the Board of Trade invited the association to produce before their Committee any witnesses, or any evidence which they had to offer.

1274. You thought that you could not communicate your views without being asked to do so?—Well, we were not consulted at all on the subject. The shipping interests throughout the country were not consulted after the Conference until November 1893. No intimation was given to them that their opinion would be of the slightest value.

1275. Until November 1893?—No.

1276. Do you not think it is obvious that it would have been more convenient for all parties if your views had been in detail before the Board of Trade before the communication with foreign countries had been brought to a conclusion?—I think it would have been decidedly very much better. I am quite prepared to accept any blame on the part of our association for not having been more expeditious in the matter, but at the same time I must repeat that there was no request made upon them to enunciate their views in any way.

Mr. Richardson.

1277. Are we to understand that in your opinion the Board of Trade neglected their duty in not communicating with such important interests as yours?—I do not say ours in particular, but the whole of the shipping community. I think they did. I take a strong view on the subject, because we are the people who are really directly interested in the question.

1278. In expressing that view, are you expressing the view of the very important body of steamship owners at Liverpool?—Yes, entirely; the whole body.

1279. Did they make any protests?—They made protests in their letters last year. The letters were protesting strongly last year in correspondence.

Mr. Richardson—continued.

1280. Are the letters in the Blue Book?—I have copies of them here, and they were published in "The Times" newspaper. We thought it was only right, as our letters were so utterly neglected, and treated with such apparent, I will not say contempt, but so cavalierly, by the Board of Trade, to take that opportunity of putting them in "The Times" newspaper; and "The Times" newspaper wrote one or two leading articles on the subject, which were very much to the point, I think.

1281. In what month and year was that?—That was last year.

1282. What month in 1894?—The beginning, in March; the first correspondence began on the 21st of March, and then went on until September and October.

1283. In the same year?—Yes; and finished off in November.

1284. And ultimately an agreement was come to about these fog signals, practically without the sanction of so important a body as yours?—Certainly.

Chairman.

1285. I would like to ask you a question about that; you wrote a letter setting forth your views on that subject on the 9th February 1895; have you got it?—Yes; that was after a deputation which I attended.

1286. You say, "The shipping interests feel most strongly that they have not been consulted in this most important matter as they should have been." I will not read the whole letter; but that is the substance of your communication?—Yes.

1287. Then, in answer to that, there was a letter of the 19th of February 1895 from the Board of Trade, in which the Board of Trade put their view, in fact?—Yes.

to enter upon that. I only thought it was just to read the other side of that statement; but I think we should all regret, and yourself also, if any collision or discord upon this matter with foreign nations arose, because of our internal differences in this country. You would regret that, would you not?—Yes.

1289. If it were considered expedient to give these new rules a trial, in view of the strong opinion of other countries, do you not think that the officers in your association, and the members of it would all do their best to try and make it work if they could?—I think they would do their best to try and make it work. I do not, of course, think it would be practicable, and I should be very sorry to see the experiment tried, because I am quite certain that it would involve great loss of life and property.

1290. Is there anything else that you wish to state to the Committee?—I should like to place before the Committee the following letters from the Admiralty to the Board of Trade, and from Trinity House to the Board of Trade, bearing upon the subject of my evidence.

1291. Will you do so, if you please?—The first is as follows: "Admiralty, 6th February 1873. Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 22nd ultimo, M. 736, enclosing copy of a universal Code of Fog Signals, by Mr. William Jamieson, a commander in Messrs. Inman's line of steamers, Liverpool, and requesting to be informed whether distinctive phonic fog signals are necessary, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you, for the information of the Board of Trade, that owing to the difficulty of determining with sufficient certainty the direction and distance of sound from moving objects during a fog, the system proposed by Mr. Jamieson offers no advantages over the 'Rules concerning Fog Signals' at present in force. I am, &c. (signed) Robert Hall. To the Assistant Secretary, Marine Department, Board of Trade." The second is from the Admiralty, and is dated the 28th of February 1873. It is as follows: "Admiralty, 28th February 1873. Sir,—I have received, and laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, your letter of the 19th inst., enclosing a copy of a report from Mr. Rothery, Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty, wherein he remarks upon Mr. Jamieson's proposal for establishing a new code of fog signals, and he himself suggests another code. (2.) In accordance with the request of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, my Lords direct me to communicate their views as to Mr. Rothery's proposed code. (3.) Whilst Mr. Rothery's proposed rules appear to be, as he states, clear and simple, my Lords fear that they could not, with any prospect of increased safety to vessels in a fog, be put into practice. (4.) In endeavouring to establish regulations for the prevention of collisions in a fog, it appears to my Lords that the points to be considered involve more difficulty than those connected with the dangers of night navigation where lights are the signals to be employed. (5.) In a clear night, however dark, the position of one ship approaching another is shown by the comparatively unmistakable evidence of the eye, whereas any signals which can be devised to effect the same object when a fog prevails must appeal to the far less reliable sense of hearing. Doubtless, as Mr. Rothery observes, the danger of collision between vessels in a fog would be greatly lessened if each knew the position of the other, and the course she was steering: my Lords, however, do not think that any fog signals which can be devised will ever actually indicate the position of one ship to another unless the two be in very close proximity. (6.) Considering the rate at which sound travels, and the obstructing or diverting influence of the wind or other medium, it appears probable that in many instances a sound heard, say, on a vessel's port bow, might not in reality be coming from a vessel in that position, and my Lords fear that the establishment of a code of signals which professed to give accurate and timely information of the position and movements of vessels in a fog might lead to undue confidence on the part of officers, and to a relaxation of the only safe rule, that in such circumstances vessels should proceed only at the very slowest speed, and thus collisions might be multiplied instead of diminished. (7.) It appears to my Lords also that, as in the case of lights, projectors of new fog signals generally lose sight of the circumstance that in crowded highways a dozen vessels may be in close proximity, instead of two as assumed in the proposed rules, and that collisions rarely occur from fogs except under such circumstances. (8.) If there be any position in which personal vigilance is necessary and may be expected to be in exercise on board a ship, it is in a thick fog, and my Lords consider that the best safeguard consists in the strict observance of the existing rules, stopping or proceeding at the slowest speed, and use of the simple signals, to show that a vessel is in the neighbourhood, a gun also being ready on each side, and there being, by those in charge, ever a readiness to act on the instant as circumstances may render expedient. —I am, &c. (signed) Robert Hall. The Under Secretary, Marine Department, Board of Trade." The last one is from Trinity House, and is as follows: "Trinity House, London, E.C., 3rd March 1873. Sir,—I am directed by the Board to acknowledge receipt of your letter (M. 2147) of the 19th inst., enclosing a copy of observations by the Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty upon Mr. Jamieson's proposals for a universal code of signals, which have already been laid before the Elder Brethren, and upon which they have reported their opinion, at the desire of the Board of Trade; the Registrar at the same time substituting a system of his own on which their Lordships request also the opinion of the Elder Brethren. Although the rules suggested by the Registrar are evidently the result of careful study and consideration, they are based upon an assumption, which is, in point of fact, a fallacy, viz., that it is possible to determine accurately the quarter from which a sound heard during fog proceeds. This is a point upon which actual experience only can be admitted as a guide, and the Elder Brethren from

from constant and repeated observations believe that during fog it is always most difficult, and frequently impossible, to make out the direction in which a sound approaches. When a mariner is approaching a fog signal upon the shore his partial knowledge of its vicinity and supposed bearing aids him, and the unassisted sense of hearing is not so entirely relied on. This is not the case with vessels at sea, and it follows, therefore, that if the quarter from whence the sound proceeds cannot be fixed with certainty, the manœuvres to avoid it must also be undefined. But, beyond this consideration, another serious objection arises, viz., that in crowded waters, such as the estuaries of the Thames and Medway, and the channels of the east coast of England, not only the case of two vessels, but of a number of vessels in proximity, must be considered, and of what effect a number of differing signals in apparently different directions would have on an officer in charge of a vessel. The Elder Brethren fear that he would be brought into bewilderment and hopeless confusion, and, tied by a stringent rule, in trying to avoid one danger he would fall into another. The Elder Brethren do not think that any positive rule, international or otherwise, can or should be enforced upon vessels in fog, save that generally acted upon and provided for in the rule of the road, viz., the nearly constant sound of the fog signal, and the slowest rate of speed consistent with the ship being kept in hand; the greatest danger in fog is attempting to do too much, and any rules such as those suggested by Captain Jamieson or Mr. Rothery would, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, inevitably tend to increased action, and increase instead of prevent collision and disaster. I am, &c. (signed) Robin Allen, The Assistant Secretary, Marine Department, Board of Trade."

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain JOHN CLEARY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1292. YOU come on behalf of the Clyde Steamship Owners' Association, I think?—I believe so, but I really do not know who sent me here; I do not know whether it is not the Scottish Shipmasters.

1293. But you are a captain in the merchant service?—I am in command of one of the Clyde Steamship Company's steamers.

1294. Where does your ship trade?—Glasgow to London viâ the different ports, Southampton, Plymouth, Waterford.

1295. Have you had long experience in commanding a vessel?—I have been 12 years in command, 26 years at sea.

1296. You hold a master's certificate?—I hold a master's certificate.

1297. Will you tell us what you think about these proposed new rules for sound signals in fog; you are acquainted with them, I presume?—Yes, I have seen them, but I really do not know the numbers of them.

1298. You do not know the details of them?—No.

1299. Have you considered them closely?—Yes, I have.

1300. What do you say about them?—Well, I say they are good on the whole.

1301. In the first place, I will ask you generally about them; do you think that you would find any difficulty, or that any master of a ship would find a difficulty, in mastering the rules so as to be able to apply them?—Not the slightest.

1302. You are not at all apprehensive of that?—No, only there are three that, I think, should be put into one.

1303. That I will ask about in a moment; I will go into the detail; but in the first place, upon the general question, do you think, supposing any captain in a fog did misunderstand one of these sound signals, that it ought to lead to danger?—I do not think it.

1304. Will you state why in your own way?—Because the ships are so close to one another that are communicating with each other; they do not communicate with each other until they get within at least a quarter of a mile. When they are half-a-mile, or a mile away, they are simply ships at a distance; you do not want to know what they are doing until they get close. It is only when two vessels get very close to one another that they would communicate by those signals.

Chairman—continued.

1305. If there was a vessel with 20 or 30 other steamships round her, within the radius of a mile we will say, in a dense fog, and they were all sounding their steam whistles, do you think yourself, in any circumstances, it would be prudent to go forward in such a state of things as that?—Yes.

1306. You might go gently forward?—You might go gently forward; you could distinguish every vessel. There are no two notes of a vessel's whistle alike that ever I heard sounded.

1307. But you would come to know that a ship was near you, at all events, whether you could discriminate the particular signal or not?—Certainly; they could not all be in one single line; they must be at different distances.

1308. Therefore, generally speaking, you are in favour of these signals?—Of some sound signals.

1309. Of some fresh sound signals?—Yes.

1310. And do you think they would be useful for preventing collisions?—I believe they would.

1311. That being so, you have a recommendation to make about three of them being put into one?—Yes.

1312. Will you tell me which those three are; you have got them before you; tell us the "a," "b," "c," or whatever they are?—A vessel at anchor has two long blasts and ringing the bell; a vessel stopped has two long blasts and no ringing the bell; and another vessel that is disabled, or cannot get out of the way, has four short blasts and no ringing the bell. To the man who hears those signals (all the three of them), they all

all mean the same thing; that is, that he must keep out of the way.

1313. And therefore you would like, if you could, to see those signals all put into one signal?—All under one.

1314. So that the three vessels in the different situations you have described should all sound one signal?—They all mean the same thing to me. The four short blasts, "I cannot get out of the way," has been in use in the Thames for some years down to the Nore.

1315. That is a suggestion for consolidation of three rules into one?—Yes.

1316. Apart from that, do you approve of the rules?—Yes.

1317. You know, of course, that this is a matter for international agreement?—Yes.

1318. Upon that particular point, supposing that we could not get international agreement, do you think it would be better to have those three rules as they are, instead of consolidating them, rather than risk not having them at all?—Certainly.

Admiral Field.

1319. You would prefer to have them?—Yes, I would prefer to have them.

Chairman.

1320. You would prefer to have them as they are in that print which is before you?—Yes.

1321. If you could not get the modification you would prefer to have them as they are rather than have no amendment of rules?—Rather than have none.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1322. How many years experience have you had altogether?—Twenty-six.

1323. As master how many?—Twelve years.

1324. And then, as mate?—As mate, five years before that.

1325. Constantly on the bridge in both capacities?—Yes.

1326. I want just to ask you, in your experience do you find that the French, Italian, and Spanish vessels rigidly, as a rule, comply with the rules of the road at sea as now existing. Have you ever come across one in a fog; if so, do you find they are as accurate and exact as English ships in complying with signals?—I could not say that, because we can never distinguish what the ship is.

1327. When the fog lifts you see the colours?—I do not think there is any difference; I never found any; I never came across it.

Admiral Field.

1328. Was yours a foreign-going ship?—Coasting at the present time; this last six years.

1329. Generally?—In the Channel now.

1330. Do you carry cargo or passengers?—Passengers and cargo.

1331. I understand that you have no objection, is that so, to the signals, provided you could eliminate "e" and "g"; did you specify what you would eliminate?—"e," "g," "h," and "i," "Stopped and anchored," and "I cannot get out of the way."

1332. You are in favour of keeping the "b" signal to which some object?—Yes.

1333. You are not opposed to "e" being eliminated; or, are you in favour of retaining it?—The three to the man hearing them would all mean the same thing. It does not matter to him whether they are anchored, stopped, or broken down; it all means the same thing to him—that is, that he has to keep out of the way.

Mr. Blake.

1334. So you would have one signal for all these?—One signal for all of them.

Chairman.

1335. It is "b," "e," and "i" you want to combine?—Yes.

Admiral Field.

1336. You would put "b" and "e" under "i"?—I would put those with the four short blasts.

1337. Is that all you wish to combine?—Yes; I say those three signals mean to a person hearing them in a fog the same thing; it does not matter to him whether the ship is anchored, broke down, or stopped, or anything else.

1338. What do you say about "f," a vessel towing, are you anxious to keep that?—A vessel towing needs something.

1339. As to "g," "way off my vessel," are you in favour of keeping that?—Yes.

1340. Is not that the same thing as "b" almost, stopped?—No; that means that he is only waiting for you to get past; the two of you have been approaching one another, and he says, "I will let you pass."

1341. Then we must take you back to the blasts, "way off my vessel" in "g," short, long, short; and a vessel towing, one long and two shorts?—One long and two shorts.

1342. Do you think the mariner would be able to distinguish them readily?—Certainly.

1343. May I ask as to the "h" (the telegraph ship), three long blasts; do you care to retain that?—I think that need not be spoken about at all. I have been 26 years at sea and never saw a telegraph ship at work yet; I may be another 26 and may never see or hear one in a fog.

1344. Then you would eliminate that signal?—I do not think it matters much.

1345. If there is confusion, would not it add to the confusion in a mariner's mind by retaining unnecessary signals, in your opinion?—Certainly; I do not see that it is of any use at all.

1346. May I take it that you would eliminate it?—I would put it into the place of "broken down" or "cannot get out of the way."

1347. I must ask you, as a mariner, is it not in your judgment desirable to have as few fog signals as possible?—Yes, as few as possible.

1348. Would not you, with that conviction in your mind, be willing to eliminate this; or do you wish to retain it?—I believe there must be something to distinguish them.

1349. You have just now told us that you never met a telegraph ship?—No, I never have. I might meet one to-morrow, though I have not met one for 26 years.

Mr. Moorsom.

1350. You think there would be no difficulty in distinguishing these proposed new regulations with the combination you suggest?—No.

1351. No difficulty to a smart man looking out or listening; would it be a difficulty to a somewhat dull man, if there be such a thing in the merchant service?—I do not think it.

1352. Do you agree that in a fog it is very easy to mistake a sound ahead of you for a sound astern of you?—No. I do not think fog has any more power to deflect sound than sunlight.

1353. You do not agree with that at all?—No.

1354. You never were yourself confused in a fog by the locality of a signal?—Yes; I was.

1355. You have been?—Yes; I have been.

1356. Under what circumstances?—You could not get the bearing of a sound signal in the case of a light ship's horn; you could not be sure within two or three points in a fog or clear if you were about three or four miles off, but if you are within a mile there can never be any mistake within a point, as far as I have seen, certainly never with any vessel I ever saw.

1357. Then whatever other seamen may think you do not think that any ordinarily intelligent seaman will be practically confused as to where the signal is?—I do not think it, unless there is an echo of the land, or something.

Mr. Blake.

1358. That is a difficulty sometimes when you are close under the land?—Yes.

1359. There is an echo?—There is an echo.

1360. And there are confusions?—Yes.

1361. But these do not extend to the sea when you are free from the land?—No, I do not think it.

1362. I would like to ask you this: You said that certain signals had been used, and in practice found convenient; will you just describe what kind of signals have been used in your practice in fog?—Not in fogs.

1363. We were speaking of fogs?—I was asked whether I could distinguish one long and two shorts; or a short and two longs.

1364. Apart from a fog, you said other signals are used of this class, short and long; two longs and a short, two shorts and a long?—Yes.

1365. You have not experienced any difficulty in distinguishing them, but you have had no experience of the signals in fog?—Only the one long blast.

1366. So that it is a question simply of whether there will be a greater difficulty in distinguishing in the fog these more complicated signals than when there is no fog?—Yes.

1367. Now, as to the long blast, have you found any difficulty in distinguishing that in the fog, in hearing it; have there been occasions when you thought you heard it, and you found afterwards that you had not heard it?—No, from a certain distance; of course if it is outside of a mile.

1368. Inside of a mile you would hear it?—I do not think it is possible always to hear every horn, even inside of a mile.

Chairman.

1369. Are you speaking of a fog-horn now?—No, the ships' horns; the steam whistles.

Mr. Blake.

1370. When you get inside of a mile your experience is that you can hear, and, apart from questions of the deflection of the sound by the land, you can locate it pretty accurately within a point or so?—Within a point or so.

Mr. Cayzer.

1371. I would like to ask you to read these regulations for a signal. I understand you wish to combine "e" and "i" with "b";—Yes, "b," "e," and "i."

1372. And you approve of leaving the towing signal?—Yes, the towing signal.

1373. I may take it, then, that with that combination you would leave these sound signals: "a," "b," "g," "f"; you would do away with all the rest?—Yes.

1374. That is to say, you think it would be quite sufficient with "a," "b," and "g," or "a," "b," and "f"?—No, "a" and "i."

Chairman.

1375. I understood you to say that you wished "b" and "e" and "i," those three?—"B" and "e" made into or combined with "i."

1376. That is what I said; "b," "e," and "i" made into one?—Yes, under "i."

1377. It does not much matter which?—No, only the "i" signal is in use in the Thames, and has been for years, meaning the very same thing.

Mr. Blake.

1378. Your reason for choosing "i" is because that particular signal has been used in your waters?—No, it is useful; all the pilots use it, and have found it very useful. "A" is simply a signal that is in use now.

Mr. Cayzer.

1379. Have you any difficulty on account of the steam whistles not being uniform in size; some are weak, and the blasts are not distinct in consequence?—Yes, you can never distinguish whether it is a big ship or a little ship simply by the sound of her steam whistle.

1380. Then, would you recommend that attention should be paid to the uniformity of steam whistles?—It would be better, so that you could know the distance you were off by the sound.

1381. There would be no difficulty if the Board of Trade would undertake it in having whistles of one uniform size and sound?—No, I do not think it.

Mr. Stephen Williamson.

1382. I think you gave evidence to the effect that you are strongly in favour of having a distinguishing sound for a tug, a vessel towing another?—Very.

1383. I fancy your reason for that is that if the ordinary signal of a tug and that of another steam vessel not towing is the same you might naturally try to get round astern of the tug; and if you did not know that she had possibly a large ship in tow with 150 fathoms of cable in between, you might escape the tug but you would run down the ship possibly?—It is not six weeks ago, sir, since I nearly ran down a ship through that very same thing; I did not hear the ship's horn going.

Mr. Stephen Williamson—continued.

1384. I am very glad you corroborate the testimony already given in favour of a distinguishing signal for a vessel towing?—Yes, I do.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

1385. As to the possibility of always detecting the exact bearing from which a sound comes, you think that is possible provided the vessels are pretty close?—Provided they are pretty close it is possible.

1386. Did you ever have in your experience a mistake made between similar sounds from two different steamers?—No.

1387. Have you ever heard of a case?—No; I never did.

1388. You think you can always distinguish by the sound of the horn; I mean, if you hear a sound say on the starboard bow, and you hear a similar blast on the port bow a little time afterwards, you can always distinguish between the two steamers?—Well, the officers on the bridge will always say, "That is the one on the starboard side blowing;" no matter how they blow you can always distinguish them I think. I do not think there are two notes alike; it is very seldom they can be exactly the same distance.

1389. The two steamers?—The two steamers that are signalling to you.

1390. You do not think that would cause any confusion?—I do not think it.

1391. The ships of different lines have private signals; do you ever use those in fog?—No, never.

1392. Would it be necessary to state in the regulations that private signals must not be used in fog?—I do not think anyone would ever use them; we simply use them for pilots or to call attention at harbours on a clear night.

1394. You do not think these private signals are ever used in fog?—No.

1395. Not when you think you must be passing near one of your own steamers?—No.

1396. Did you ever hear of any line that did use them in fog?—I never did.

1397. Do not you think it necessary to have that provided for in the regulations?—I do not think it.

1398. As to these rules, you think, as far as I understand, that for vessels not at anchor, but which have no steerage-way on them, you would have one uniform signal?—Yes.

1399. No matter what the cause of not having steerage-way is?—Yes.

1400. In addition to that, do you think that vessels at anchor ought to have a special signal?—No, only the bell.

1401. Do you think the bell would be sufficient for a vessel at anchor, whether a sailing vessel or a steamer?—I think so.

1402. Provided she is at anchor?—Yes, if she is not anchored in a fair-way; of course then you might call attention.

1403. You think that a vessel at anchor ought to ring a bell; and if she is at anchor in a fair-way would you have a separate signal for that?—She should blow a whistle if a vessel was coming near her.

1404. But if she is at anchor ought she to make a separate signal because she is in the fair-way?—I should say it needs something. If you are at anchor in a fair-way, and you know you are right in the path of steamers passing up and down, you want something to call the attention of a steamer that is coming too fast. I have often done it by the whistle blowing three or four blasts.

1405. And that three or four blasts you would use to signal, "Out of control and having no steerage-way on you"?—Yes.

1406. Though you happened to be at anchor?—I think that would be very good. To that man it means only the same thing: "Keep out of my road."

1407. One has in one's mind especially the estuaries of rivers?—The Gull stream.

1408. The Gull stream, for instance; there is very often a strong tide?—Yes.

1409. What I want to get at is whether you think it is necessary to have a separate signal for vessels at anchor, especially in a tide-way, and a separate signal for a vessel which has not steerage way on her, and which is drifting with the tide?—I do not think it.

1410. You do not think there need be a difference?—I do not think it.

1411. You think one signal to say that a vessel has not steerage way is enough?—Is not under control; it does not matter whether she is anchored or not.

1412. You think one signal should suffice?—I think so, because if the vessel is not under control and has anchorage ground under foot in a fog, she is sure to drop her anchor; and if there is no anchorage ground there, a man coming up will know that there is no anchorage ground, and that she could not drop her anchor.

1413. You think one signal would suffice for all these causes so long as the vessel was not under control?—Yes, I am sure it would.

Chairman.

1414. I want to get your opinion upon this clear: when a vessel is at anchor in regular anchorage ground, a proper anchorage ground, you would be content, as I understand, that she should ring her bell?—Ring her bell.

1415. Without any sounding of the steam whistle?—Yes.

1416. But where she is at anchor in a fair-way, then you think some more sound is necessary?—Yes; because vessels are likely to be passing rapidly up and down.

1417. Which they would not be in ordinary anchorage ground?—Yes.

Admiral Field.

1418. I want to press you a little; I quite understand your view about combining "e," "i" and "b," but you are of opinion that these three should be combined under "i" rather than under "b"?—Rather than under "b."

1419. In other words, you prefer four short blasts to two long blasts, your reason being because you are in the habit of using four short blasts for pilots?—No; four blasts will stay longer in your ear than two; it is like striking a bell; you could strike eight bells and count them after it was finished.

1420. I understand you say you commonly use it now, the four blasts?—No, I said it is used in the Thames by all the pilots.

1421. Then, if it is constantly used by the pilots and others, is not that a reason for not using this to combine under?—No, it means the same thing to them; it is for barges to get out of the way. It means: "I cannot get out of your way"; and the barge goes about and gets out of his way; he cannot port or he cannot starboard.

1422. I am only pressing you upon the point because other seamen, I may tell you, prefer "b," the two long blasts. You start with one long blast for an ordinary fog signal, and two long blasts would imply stopped; the two long blasts would therefore carry "e" and "i," but you still hang on to four short blasts in preference to the two long blasts. That is very important?—Yes, I think four short blasts you can make quicker than two long blasts. You could indicate quicker your position: when a man heard two blasts he would know what you were doing.

1423. You maintain that view in opposition to the views of other brother seamen?—Yes.

Mr. Blake.

1424. As I understand, that is a signal for use in waters in which you are at present plying?—From London Bridge to the Nore.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1425. YOU are, I think, the Deputy Minister of Marine for the Canadian Government?—Marine and Fisheries of Canada.

1426. And I believe you are over in this country upon certain other business connected with the Government?—Yes, I am a member of the Board of Trade Committee for the Manning of British Ships.

1427. As I understand, you received a communication from the shipowners at St. John, New Brunswick, protesting against these changes in the sound signals?—I received a communication from the Government which they had received from the shipowners. They did not write me direct.

1428. I beg your pardon, you are quite right. The shipowners of St. John, New Brunswick, communicated with the Dominion Government?—Yes.

1429. And the Dominion Government sent that communication on to you?—Yes.

1430. And the shipowners of St. John, in their communication, protested against the changes proposed to be made in regard to sound signals?—Yes.

1431. Have you got that communication with you?—Yes.

1432. You had better put it in and I will read it. (The document is handed in). This is the communication from the shipowners of St. John. I had better read it to the Committee, it is quite short. "To the Honourable J. Costigan, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa." It is dated "St. John, N.B., 28th February 1895." "Sir,—We understand that new regulations have been prepared by the Imperial Board of Trade to alter the existing rule of the road at sea, and to introduce a new and complicated code of sound fog signals, and that if these are enforced they will apply also to the Canadian coasts and lakes. From what we can learn we regard with strong disfavour the proposed radical changes, and certainly think they should not become operative without further consideration, and our having an opportunity to discuss same. As Mr. Smith, the Deputy Minister, is now in London, we ask you to cable the remonstrances of the Canadian shipowners on the subject to the Colonial Secretary, the Marquis of Ripon, and also to authorise Mr. Smith to protest on our behalf. We beg to remain, your obedient servants." And then there are the signatures of 16 gentlemen?—Those are firms who represent, I may say, all the shipowners of the country. They own large vessels which come to Liverpool.

Chairman—continued.

1433. If you please I will just read the names: "Jos. A. Likely, A. W. Adams, J. B. & H. B. Robinson, Merritt Bros. & Co., Andre Cushing and Co., J. A. Gregory, Carrier & Edwards, Jno. Russel, junr., Wm. Thomson & Co., Samuel Kennedy, Oliver Emery & Co., F. Tufts & Co., D. J. Seely & Son, Charles McLaughlin & Son, Troop & Son, R. C. Elkin." Am I to understand that you say that those are all the shipowners at St. John?—These are the principal shipowners, but they did it in a great hurry; they just got that signed and sent off.

1434. What we have got is here before us, and I am asking whether these gentlemen are the principal shipowners at St. John?—Yes.

1435. They are not all of them, but they are the principal?—They are the principal.

1436. And they all belong to St. John?—I may say that St. John is the centre of the foreign going shipping of Canada.

1437. Upon receiving that communication from your Government, you made a communication to your Government yourself, I see, stating that you considered it advisable that you should be authorised to give evidence before a Committee to be appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into this question; did you make that communication to your Government?—I made that communication when I found that I could not be allowed to speak at the shipowners' meeting.

1438. I am not in the least questioning it; I only want to get the stages to appreciate the position in which you come here. I do not wish to ask you for it if you think it unadvisable to produce it, but if you think it advisable you might give us the communication that you sent to your Government?—I have not it with me; it was just a telegram.

1439. It was a telegram?—Yes.

1440. But it was to that effect, that you considered it advisable you should be authorised to give evidence before the Committee?—Certainly.

1441. You obtained, I think, after that, an order in Council from the Canadian Privy Council?—Yes.

1442. The Privy Council of the Dominion?—Yes, some time after.

1443. Now I think I have got that here; shall I read it out?—If you please.

1444. This is the document: "Extract;" the rest of it was unimportant for this purpose, I suppose?—Just so.

1445. "Extract from a Report of the Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council approved by his Excellency on the 26th April 1895. On a Report dated 2nd April 1895, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, stating that he has had under consideration a communication from shipowners at St. John, N.B. [copy herewith] protesting against changes proposed to be made by the Imperial Board of Trade in the existing rules of the road at sea, and requesting that Mr. William Smith, Deputy-Minister of Marine and Fisheries who is now in London, be instructed to protest on their behalf against the adoption of the proposed regulations, the Minister observes that on the receipt of a communication from Mr. Smith, stating that he considered it advisable that he should be authorised to give evidence before a Committee to be appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the complaint, he (the Minister) authorised him by cable on the 6th March ultimo to give evidence accordingly. The Minister now recommends that Mr. Smith be authorised to act on behalf of the Government of Canada, and to appear before any committee which may be appointed by Her Majesty's Government to give evidence against the adoption of the proposed alteration in the rules of the road at sea. The committee advise that your Excellency be moved to forward a certified copy of this Minute, if approved, to the Right Honourable the Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies. All which is respectfully submitted for your Excellency's approval." As I understand, your position is this: the evidence you desire to give, is to express the protest of these shipowners of New Brunswick?—Yes.

1446. The Canadian Government, as we know, has approved of these rules, as a Government?—Yes. If you will allow me, I may explain that.

1447. I want to get your position first, if you please?—Yes.

1448. The Canadian Government has approved of these rules?—Yes.

1449. And I am not aware that they have taken any steps to depart from that position?—No, except the Order in Council which you have just read.

1450. But you desire to give evidence on behalf of the shipowners of New Brunswick?—Yes.

1451. Now, you want to say something about the Canadian Government?—When these proposed rules were sent out to the different colonies (nearly three years ago I think) they came to Canada, and we did not know that the shipowners of England were taking such a determined stand against the fog signals. We supposed they had consulted the shipping interest.

The Committee-room was cleared, and the Committee conferred. After a short time the public were again admitted.

1452. Mr. Smith, the Committee desire that I should read to you the "certified copy of a report of a committee of the honourable the Privy Council, approved by his Excellency the Governor-General in Council, on the 24th of January 1893." You are probably familiar with it, but I will read it to you: "The committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration a circular despatch hereto attached, dated 29th November 1892, from the Marquis of Ripon, transmitting copy of a letter from the Board of Trade, together with copies of a Parliamentary Paper, containing three further reports of the committee appointed to consider the alterations in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, recommended by the Washington Conference. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whom the despatch was referred, observes that it appears by the letter of the Board of Trade that the committee referred to have made three further reports on the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and that the Admiralty and the Board of Trade have adopted these reports, and an Order in Council has been issued in regard to the lights of British steam pilot vessels, and that if no objections are raised which may alter the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the other two reports, steps will be taken for the issue of an Order in Council giving effect to the recommendation of the committee. The Minister further observes that the Nautical Adviser of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has given careful consideration to the reports in question, and he sees no objection to the slight alterations which have been made in Articles 7, 9, 20, and 30 of the regulations as follows:—Article 7: Rowing boats, whether under oars or sail, shall have ready a lanthorn showing a white light, which shall be temporarily exhibited in sufficient time to prevent collision. Article 9. Fishing vessels and fishing boats, when under way, and when not required by this article to carry or show the lights prescribed for vessels of their tonnage under way, (a) open boats, by which is to be understood boats which have no covered sleeping accommodation for the crew, shall be required to show one all-round white light when engaged in any fishing by night; (b) Vessels and boats when fishing with drift nets shall exhibit two white lights from any part of the vessel where they can best be seen. Such lights shall be placed so that the vertical distance between them shall be not less than 6 feet, and not more than 15 feet, and so that the horizontal distance between them, measured in a line with the keel, shall be not less than 5 feet and not more than 10 feet. The lower of these two lights shall be towards that end of the vessel to which the nets are attached, and both of

Mr. Mowbray—continued.

1306. Do you think that these 43 cases out of the 900 are at the outside the greatest number that could be relieved out of the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund?—Yes; a considerable proportion of the 43 cases have been already relieved by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. The applicants have gone to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners when they found they could not get relief from us, and have been relieved by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

Mr. Mowbray—continued.

1307. I suppose you expect to hear from the Patriotic Fund Commissioners as to these 43 cases in detail?—Yes; we have sent those cases as test cases, and we are awaiting the result.

1308. No doubt the result will be laid before this Committee?—Certainly, if the Committee wish for it.

MR. WILLIAM WOODALL, IN THE CHAIR.

Colonel J. S. YOUNG, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Brodrick.

1309. YOU have kindly handed to the Committee the Thirty-third Report, the last Report of the Royal Commissioners. Now, there are at present, I believe, 32 Royal Commissioners, are there not?—Thirty-one, I think.

1310. This Report is signed on the 9th of April by 29 of them; was that Report signed at a meeting of the Commissioners?—By those that were present at a meeting of the Commissioners, but it was circulated to each individual Member for his perusal before he signed it.

1311. How many Commissioners were present at the discussion of the Report?—I am not able to say without referring to the Minute Book, but, speaking from memory, it was 20, I think.

1312. As many as that?—Quite as many as that, I should think; 19 or 20.

1313. Would that be the ordinary attendance?—In accordance with the wish of the Committee at the last meeting, I have prepared returns of the attendances for the last five years of the Commissioners, the Executive Committee, and such Sub-Committees as there are records of attendances.

1315. That I suppose we may consider as a high ratio of the attendance considering the very busy character of most of your Commissioners?—I should say it was a very good attendance indeed.

Mr. Brodrick—continued.

1316. At all events, what you would convey to the Committee is that there is a considerable interest felt by the individual Commissioners in the whole of the business of the Commission?—Not only is there a considerable interest, but a continuous and active interest on the part of the Commissioners in the administration of the funds.

1317. And it would be erroneous to suppose that the business is mainly transacted by two or three Commissioners; on the contrary, the fact is that a large majority of the Commissioners are present?—It would be absolutely erroneous to draw any such conclusion as that it is done merely by a minority, as the attendances that I have just given show.

1318. Now, taking the general result of your administration of the funds would it be right to consider a fund like the "Captain" Fund, what you may call a temporary fund; it is a fund, is it not, which cannot have any fresh claims on it now?—Exactly so. In answer to the honourable Member for Devonport, I divided the funds into two classes, those which were liable to have fresh annuitants placed upon them in accordance with the conditions, in which category were the Patriotic Fund, the Soldiers' Effects Fund, the Royal Naval Relief Fund, and the Rodriguez Fund; and in the other category were those cases such as the "Captain" Fund, the "Eurydice" Fund, and the "Atalanta" Fund, which were subscribed in the cases of vessels that had gone down, and where consequently no fresh recipients, but those who were dependent upon persons lost in those vessels, could have any claim upon the fund.

1319. Now, I have made a computation here of what are merely terminable funds, that is to say, I suppose I may include in these the "Captain" Fund, the "Eurydice" Fund, the Zulu War Fund, the "Atalanta" Fund, the Ashantee War Fund, the Balaclava Fund, and the "Victoria" it is stated that they make demands upon the memory which could not be responded to by the majority of seamen. I believe the principal shipowners are entirely opposed to them. I state that because I was present when some representatives from German shipowners who were at that meeting stated that that was the opinion of the Government, but that it was not the opinion of the shipowners; that is to say, when they gave their approval. I understand the French Government also raised strong objections to Article 15, but afterwards dropped them for the sake of harmony and securing an international agreement. I put these points in to show that they were not all acceptable at first; they agreed to them afterwards. I notice by the printed papers that in the composition of the delegates and committees who had to do with framing these sound signals, the practical navigators of the Merchant Service were not sufficiently represented. In the body of delegates who went to Washington, there were seven altogether, two only of whom represented the Mercantile Marine. The next committee which was appointed to consider the Report of the Conference, consisted of 10 persons, but I cannot see that there was any one to represent the Mercantile Marine of the day, who was actually engaged in commanding merchant vessels, and was fresh from the sea with mercantile marine experience. The Road Committee was again called together in 1893, and was composed of similar members of the former committee, with the exception that Sir Courtenay Boyle took the place of Sir Henry Calcraft, Captain Angove, Marine Superintendent of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, took the place of Sir T. Sutherland (who is called in Parliamentary Paper [C. 6293], page 6, Thomas Sunderland); it is called "Sutherland" in one Paper, and "Sunderland" in another; but no doubt it is the same gentleman, and Captain Holland, of the Royal Navy, took the place of Admiral Bowdon Smith. I think this committee was deficient in representation of mercantile marine practical navigators, as there does not appear to be any on it on active service, except officials, and I attribute a great deal of the present dissatisfaction on the part of navigators to this fact, that the committees were not men who had recent active experience of the working of merchant ships, and the difficulties they have to contend with on certain occasions. The proposed rules might be very suitable for a ship of war, with plenty of highly-trained officers on the watch, but, I think, for a trading sailing vessel, on the coasts of Canada, with a small crew, and the vessel not being easily kept under command, in a thick fog, and in the neighbourhood of icebergs, they are not by any means suitable, and I fear very much for the results if these rules are put in operation. I may also add that when my son was a lieutenant in the Royal Navy he was anxious to get out of it because he thought the pay was so small, and I asked my friend, the late Sir Hugh Allan with whom I was stopping at the time if he could give him a berth on one of his ocean steamers, and he said, 'no, he would not approve of any officer of the Royal Navy being brought into his line of steamers, unless he went in at the bottom and worked up to the top, as the services were entirely different, and an officer of the Navy was not suitable for a merchant vessel.

1463. Hear, hear! "and vice versa" I hope you added?—I need not put that in because they cannot get in, and they cannot even get back when once they leave it. I have lived many years of my life among our navigators when I was Controller in New Brunswick, before I went to Ottawa to take charge of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in 1867, and I understand them thoroughly, and I have no hesitation in saying that these nine fog sound signals are not suitable for them (although they are fine hardy sailors), but may be the means of placing them in more danger than they are in now with the three signals which they understand. The shipping of Canada is now on account of several reasons reduced to 896,624 tons. In 1877 we had 1,310,468 tons register, but recently our shipping has declined on account of wooden shipping being found not so suitable for ocean traffic as steel vessels. At our inland ports, not including Montreal and Quebec, we have registered 830 vessels, 99,092 tons register, and a large number of these are steamers. It may be mentioned that one of our principal owners of foreign-going shipping (I am just asking to be permitted to read this although it does not bear exactly on the question, but it shows how our shipping has been gradually reduced) at St. John, New Brunswick, recently wrote to the Department of Marine as follows, which will explain to some extent why our shipping is diminishing; that he was doing his utmost to keep his vessels away from British territory, as it is shown beyond question how British legislation is being made in the interest of foreigners, who can go there (that is can go to England), load as deep as they like, carry what crews suit them, buy what provisions they choose, and no one can interfere, while the poor British craft is subject to their recent unreasonable laws in connection with shipping; and he concludes by stating that he holds tonnage under four different flags (this is why our tonnage is diminishing rapidly), and he is learning slowly but surely that the British flag is the least desirable of the lot. Another shipowner wrote that the load line put upon the "Orontes," one of his ships, cut down her carrying capacity so much that he had no alternative but to sell her to the Norwegians, under which flag she can carry a full cargo. It might be asked why shipowners of Great Britain did not make up their minds definitely as to Article 15 before foreign Governments were asked to agree to concessions for the sake of international agreement. I think the papers show that the Board of Trade and their Committees have all along been fully informed of the unpopularity of the sound signals among the shipowners, but they appear to have been too anxious to secure this international agreement, and have pressed the proposed new rules in Article 15. I think rather than adopt these rules it would in the meantime be better to delay pressing the agreement, but I do not think the foreign Powers will make any objection to the agreement without these rules, but will follow the lead of England, for their own navigators will will probably be just as glad to escape from these new rules as English or Canadian navigators will be, and I believe if they are asked to drop these rules on account of the dissatisfaction they have created in Great Britain, they will promptly agree to it. Even the British Committee, on the 22nd June 1892, page 9, reported, "we retain "the opinion that the multiplication of "sound signals in Article 15 may possibly "result in confusion." In cases of collision in a fog it is probable lawsuits will arise and if taken to court, no doubt the defaulting party will have to pay damages perhaps owing to the master having given a wrong signal. It has been considered by some people as a reflection on the capacity of our navigators to suppose that they could not understand these signals and keep them in their minds when an emergency occurs; but I consider it is no reflection whatever. We have heard able shipmasters give their evidence against them and say they are too numerous and complicated for the memory to retain them, and that they are as a rule quite unreliable in a fog, and may be heard or may not; but no reliance can be placed on them. Much depends on the wind. The most experienced and attentive officer will be at a loss to judge his exact position, and the same sounds heard on board the same vessel will often be thought to be coming from different quarters by different hearers in narrow waters, where a number of vessels are sounding on all sides; confusion would become increased and chance of collision augmented instead of diminished. Steam whistles, when unused for a few hours, often get filled with condensed steam and sometimes produce indistinct sounds, and might be mistaken for a first long blast, and if a sound be made after, it might cause confusion in the mind of the hearer as to whether the orders of Sub-section (a) or (b) were being endeavoured to be complied with. The President of the Board of Trade in his speech to the deputations of shipowners said he had no doubt it would have been better if fewer of these new rules had been introduced, and to those who are not very keen of apprehension they may produce some little confusion of mind and should have been fewer. (That is the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade). He also laid great weight on the fact that they had consulted the Admiralty, which ought to have a reassuring effect on their minds, but some of the shipowners told him that it had none, and that the Admiralty knew nothing about the Merchant Service, and that although the foreign Governments agreed to the new rules, it was only the officials that agreed to them; and they asked if there was any evidence that the shipowners or the people who were going to use them had been consulted. I think if the Board of Trade were to ask the foreign Governments if they would agree to the old rules, as there is so much opposition to Article 15 on the part of shipowners and navigators, they would be glad to do it, as they would probably be quite willing to follow the lead of England, but having already agreed to them, it is not probable they would ask to change their former decision. I understand much dissatisfaction exists among some of the shipowners in Germany, Netherlands, and United States as to the new rules, although the Governments of these countries approved of them. In that paper I have given you I say how there was a perfect storm when they came out in the United States by shipowners complaining against them, and objecting very strongly indeed. It was the Conference, of course, that produced them; but the real men that sail the ships were very much disgusted with them when they became public. That is stated in my paper which is before you. "As already stated, one great cause of the dissatisfaction which exists in the minds of practical navigators is the entire unreliability of the sound signals in fog. An excellent article on this subject in the 'Marine Record' of the 23rd May last, published in Cleveland, Ohio, appeared recently, in which it is stated that mariners differ so widely in capacity, that rules which would be very useful to one, might be misleading to another. No definite instructions can be prepared that will insure against accidents. Even the best of seamen are often harassed by cares and duties that divert their attention for the moment, and in case of disaster the most conflicting accounts have been given of the aberrations of the audibility of fog signals. The United States Government recently issued a notice to mariners for the Great Lakes, and expressed a hope to the British Government that the Government of Canada would adopt like regulations to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes. These are quite different to the rules at present in force, or what they propose to put in force. I have got them here. The fog signals adopted in these inland rules are not identical with the international rules adopted by all the great maritime nations of the world, and which are still in use by Canada, both in the inland waters and in ocean traffic, and they are not identical with the rules which the United States agreed to at the Washington Conference. So that actually there are two rules in operation on the lakes; the old rules which we observe, and the new rules which they have just published without consulting Canada. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada made a Report to Council on the 15th May last to the effect——" I may mention that this part of my memorandum is confidential because I have only got the Ministers' Report to Council. There has not been time yet to receive an Order (if any), and therefore it must be considered confidential because it is a Report to a Government without the Government having made an order upon it.

Chairman.

1464. If that is so, you see your confidential communication is being made in the presence of five-and-twenty people, so that it will not remain confidential if you read it. We cannot receive it confidentially in the Committee.

Mr. Blake.

1465. We cannot receive anything confidential; our business is to report to the House of Commons what we hear; therefore do not give us any confidences?—I may say generally it was a Report possessing——

1466. You

Chairman.

1466. You are now approaching a subject which you state is confidential?—I will take that back.

1467. If you please; do not communicate to us anything in confidence, because we are not authorised to receive confidences?—No; but I expect to get the order from the Colonial Office to-day, and I will bring it if I get it, to show that it is approved.

1468. We cannot accept even the most interesting confidences?—No. I say, "Some confusion may possibly arise on account of different sailing rules" (that is not confidential), "and fog signals being used on each side of the lakes; but Canada was not consulted as to the adoption of these rules before they were adopted by the United States." That is not confidential. "As the application of these inland rules do not apply to ocean traffic, it will not affect the general question of objecting to the increase of sound fog signals which is now being considered by this Committee. I notice that Sub-section (b) of of Article 15, which states that a steam vessel under way, but stopped, and having no way upon her, shall sound at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them. This is one of the new rules, and does not appear to be very important, but if it is to be adopted I think the language might be improved, as it does not appear to me to be very clear, as the vessel cannot be under way if she has been completely stopped." A navigator would not understand that she is completely stopped. It says, "a vessel under way;" then it is "stopped." That should be cleared up a little if it is to remain one of the rules. "If these new rules are to be adopted, as numerous as they are, it will, I think, be a great strain on the candidates who comes up for examination, and may be the means of many of them in Canada being rejected on account of their not being able to remember them, and if they are rejected it is probable they will leave the country and we may lose them. It is generally conceded that all sound fog signals are quite unreliable; and some years ago we had a notable instance of this in the Bay of Fundy, when the United States passenger-steamer, 'State of Maine,' running between Boston, Portland, Eastport, and St. John, was coming up the bay in the middle of the day during a dense fog in charge of the captain and two experienced pilots she ran on the rocks right in front of the lighthouse, and the fog whistle was going at the time. The officers of the ship heard the steam whistle indistinctly, although quite close to it, but could not locate where it was. No lives were lost, as the sea was calm at the time, but if rough weather had set in the loss of life would probably have been very great, as there were 174 persons on board, who all got off. In 1890 the Marine Department of Canada sent two of its best officers to report on the lighthouses and fog alarms in the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Straits of Belleisle, and in their report they mention, inter alia, that the best sound signals in the world will give very different results under varying conditions of the atmosphere. We have heard comparatively weak signals at long distances, while more powerful ones were inaudible at much shorter range. In the official list of lights and fog alarms for the Dominion of Canada, issued by the Marine Department" (I have a list of them here), of which we have 1,192 (including fog alarms and lights) in the Dominion, "a notice is published warning mariners that they must not judge their distance from a fog signal by the power of the sound. Under certain conditions of the atmosphere the sound may be lost at a very short distance from the station, and these conditions may vary at the same station within very short intervals of time. In conclusion, and reviewing the correspondence on record, I cannot find out who wants these complicated fog signals. Certainly it is not the shipowners and practical navigators of Great Britain and Canada that want them. There is ample evidence that there is a strong feeling against them on the part of the men who have to use them. The President of the Board of Trade said in his speech to the shipping interests that the Board of Trade exists for promoting the interests of the mercantile marine, and could not wish intentionally to injure it. The Board of Trade, he said, have no other object, and they are there for no other purpose except the promotion of those interests, so far as they can harmonise them with one another; that is, the mercantile marine and shipowners who conduct the trade, the passengers, merchants, and the seafaring community. The President can have no difficulty now in ascertaining what the views of the great body of the shipowners and navigators of Great Britain and Canada are, with reference to these proposed obnoxious rules; and, as he says, the Board of Trade exists, and are there for the purpose of promoting the interests of the mercantile marine of the country (along with many other interests), I cannot see why there can be any further controversy in the matter, as I feel quite sure the other members of the Board of Trade will not oppose the President in the excellent views he already enunciated with reference to assisting the mercantile marine of this country, and I hope he will grant the request of the men who conduct it. In compliance with my instructions therefore, and on behalf of the shipowners of St. John and navigators of Canada, I have much pleasure in protesting in the strongest manner possible against the adoption of the proposed rules relating to sound fog-signals as contained in Article 15, which I hope will never come into force as they stand at present, as I consider it would be a great misfortune, almost a calamity, if these complicated rules were inflicted on the navigators of Canada."

1469. That paper, as I understand, that you have read contains the substance of the evidence you desire to give upon the subject?—Yes, with that letter that I have handed in; that letter contained what I knew at that time.

Captain ROBERT WATSON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1470. YOU are the master of a vessel belonging to Messrs. Wilson and Company, of Hull, I believe?—Yes.

1471. And you have been a master of steam vessels for how many years; 25 years?—Twenty-five years.

1472. And have had a large experience, of course?—Yes.

1473. What waters have you principally navigated in?—I have been principally employed in the Baltic and North Sea trade, Hull, Scandinavia, Sweden, and the German ports.

1474. I believe you have a Trinity House licence to pilot vessels in the Humber and on the east coast of England from Hull to Hamburg and from Hull to Riga, in the Baltic?—Yes.

1475. You are also, I believe, licensed as a pilot by the Swedish authorities for the coast and approaches to Gothenburg?—Yes.

1476. I need not enlarge upon it; you are evidently a seaman of great experience; now, will you tell us what you think, if you please, about these sound signals?—With respect to the proposed additional sound signals to be used during foggy or misty weather, I am strongly of opinion that they will be both misleading and dangerous, especially in such crowded waters as the coast of England, the North Sea, and entrance to the Baltic, owing to the well-known uncertainty as to the direction and distance sounds travel in foggy weather, in addition to which must be taken into consideration the confusion and noise caused by escaping steam when steamers ease or stop their engines at perhaps a critical moment, making it next to impossible to distinguish between long and short sounds on the whistle for some considerable time, and this goes on continually in crowded waters, where I have counted as many as 46 steam trawlers within a radius of 10 miles, who would in a fog be signalling one against the other, and blowing off steam, so that it would be next to impossible to distinguish the various long and short signals proposed. On the other hand, to the careless navigator, the introduction of such a system of sound signals would encourage the careless commander to navigate his vessel by sound signals at a higher rate of speed, and make navigation in thick weather still more dangerous than it is at present. The fog syren has been so generally adopted by lighthouse authorities in most maritime countries for use on board light-vessels and at lighthouses, that I am strongly of opinion the syren should not be legalised on board steamers, but reserved as a distinctive signal for light-vessels and lighthouses. Several very narrow escapes from collision have come under my notice, where a steamer with a syren in use instead of a steam whistle, in the proximity of a light-vessel also using a syren, has been mistaken for the light-vessel, which is a stationary object, whilst the steamer was moving smartly through the water towards me at considerable risk. From personal experience extending over many years, in crowded waters where fogs are unusually prevalent, I am of opinion that fog whistles of a dull pitch are far better and more effective for steamers generally than the shrill whistle or syren which is so liable to lead the most careful commander into danger. As to Article 28: the wording of this article is so little understood by the generality of seamen that it has almost fallen into disuse; I may say that I have not heard it made use of more than half-a-dozen times during many years past. It is an unnecessary signal, for when a vessel is in sight, by watching the position of her masts, the movement of her helm can be understood immediately at a glance. To make this article compulsory would cause much anxiety to the passengers and crew, owing to the continual blowing of the steam whistle or syren every time it was necessary to alter the helm to pass another vessel.

1477. I want to ask you a question about Article 28. Article 28 is for signals not in fog, but in fair weather, is it not?—That is in fair weather. At present they are optional, and it is proposed to make them compulsory.

1478. Then about the syrens; you think syrens ought to be used merely on light-ships or light-vessels?—Light-vessels. This new Clause 15 legalises the use of the syren; it has not hitherto been legalised.

1479. Article 15: "All signals prescribed by this article for vessels under way shall be given: 1. By 'steam vessels' on the whistle or syren. 2. By sailing vessels and vessels towed, on the foghorn. You think it would be better to confine the steamships to the whistle?—I think it would be far better to confine the syren to light-vessels.

1480. And lighthouses?—I do not see any necessity for it, and from my experience running over a great many years in waters where fogs are very prevalent, I find the double-toned fog whistle can be heard as far as the syren.

1481. Upon the rules themselves, you think they will encourage careless navigators to navigate their ships at a higher speed than they ought to in a fog?—Yes.

1482. They ought not to do so; a proper, sensible man ought not to do it?—No, but I feel within myself that in a short time these will be looked upon as rules to steer by. Of course many captains are very ambitious to make quick passages, and it will be an inducement to them perhaps to go rather faster than they should do.

1483. That rather assumes that the captains will become thoroughly familiar with them and be able to judge them at once?—It would encourage them to do so. They would think that these rules were made that they should take advantage of them.

1484. You think that, notwithstanding the express warning in Article 16. Have you seen Article 16?—Yes, I have seen that, but there are times when you cannot carry that out very well; you may be stopped for a time when you find you are "shoaling" your water; or you may know that there are sandbanks or rocks somewhere near you. Your ship is drifting towards them and you feel it is necessary that you should go ahead.

1485. Quite so; that is allowed for, I think, in this rule?—That being so you cannot say stopped; you must steam ahead, and in steaming ahead some of them will try to take advantage of the signals.

1486. You do not apprehend that the masters of ships will be unable to get up these rules and master them, do you?—Well, you see, it is very easy to understand these rules here, sitting in this comfortable warm room, but when you have been standing on the bridge 24 hours in the cold and damp, your mind becomes a little confused. It is rather a strain upon the memory to remember all these things after having been for long hours exposed to the weather.

1487. Do not you think some other seamen have said to us that you would practically get to know them like you know your alphabet in a very short time?—Yes; but you see the law is required to be understood. If these rules once become the law they will require to be understood by the least intelligent of the class who will have to use them equally as by those who are better informed, or more able to grasp the subject.

1488. However, that is the view you entertain, and that is what you have stated on your experience?—Yes.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1489. You are thoroughly acquainted with the rule of the road at sea as it exists at present, I need hardly ask you?—Yes.

1490. Are there any improvements you would like to see carried out in that?—If it is a question of a compromise, accepting something or nothing.

1491. No, I was not for the moment thinking of that; I meant, in your mind is there any improvement necessary or advisable in the rule of the road at sea as you find it at present?—I do not find any difficulty myself; I have been navigating many years in crowded waters, and I think if the rules are interpreted as they should be they are almost perfect now.

Admiral Field.

1492. Have you a copy of the proposed signals before you?—I have.

1493. Of course, "a" there is no controversy about. The proposed "b" signal, two longs, sounded every two minutes with one second interval between them, have you any objection to that; is it not an advantage to you as a seaman to know, if there is a vessel anywhere near you, whether she is stopped or not?—I should have no objection to "a" if it were by itself.

1494. You mean "b," "a" is already law?—"b" I should have said.

1495. You have no objection to "b"?—"b" is two long blasts. The principal objection I have is where you have a long and short blast of the whistles.

1496. We will come to that presently. You have no objection to "b" as a seaman?—As a seaman I have no objection to "b" by itself.

1497. In fact, you are in favour of retaining "b." Now, pass to the other signals, come to

"e," "a vessel at anchor at sea," that is to say, in the fairway somewhere; she is ordered not only to ring the bell like a vessel in an ordinary anchorage, but she is ordered to make two long blasts every two minutes, as in "b;" are you in favour of retaining that signal, or do you think it might be merged in "b," or allowed to come under "d"?—"d" would scarcely cover the case. A ship may be stopped at sea and still be drifting quickly with the current; she may drift on to a sandbank or on to another vessel at anchor, or a fishing boat fast to her nets, or anything else, although she is stopped.

1499. Yes, I am not going into that. The question is whether you, as a seaman, like extra protection if you are at anchor in a fairway, not in ordinary anchorage ground?—If it is a question of compromise or anything of that kind, I should not lay so much stress upon that, but the whole of the others I object to.

1500. We will come to those presently, if I may fix you to "e." Do you want that extra protection which some seamen say they do want?—I have not found the want of it.

1501. In your judgment, as an experienced seaman, do you think it is desirable to have it?—I say I have not felt the want of it so far.

1502. I am not on your personal experience; but judging from your nautical experience, speaking on behalf of others, do you think it would be a good thing?—I see no great objection to that at all; but I have not experienced any want of it myself.

1503. Still you think it might be an advantage. Now come to "f," a vessel towing; do you think that is a valuable signal; the United States insist upon it?—No, I should object to that on account of the complication of the signals, the short and long sounds; and where steam is escaping, as it is very much when approaching another vessel, a man might get excited and flurried. It is very difficult to distinguish long and short sounds with the boilers roaring and the steam escaping over your head. As soon as ever you ease your engines there is an immense noise, and it would be very difficult to distinguish between long and short sounds with that noise going on; and the sounds would be liable to be mistaken.

1504. That hardly meets my point. Do you think it an advantage to have a distinct signal for vessels towing and for vessels towed?—I think that where there is a complication of signals you would be liable to mistake them.

1505. If you could get a signal to indicate that particular state of thing, would you like to have it or not?—Not a long or short signal.

1506. Now, come to "g," "way off my vessel, short, long, short." In your opinion might that be combined with "b," vessel stopped?—That is already covered by "b."

1507. Then I take it you think "g" might be included in "b"?—Yes, certainly.

1508. Now, come to "h," telegraph ship, three three longs. Have you, in your nautical experience, met a telegraph ship?—Never in my life, and I have been 35 years at sea.

1509. Then do you think "b" is necessary to be retained?—Not at all; I do not think it is necessary to have a distinctive signal; that would be covered by "e;" it would be in the same position as a fishing boat fastened to her net, or as a ship at anchor in the open sea.

1510. Quite so; then you would eliminate "b," the telegraph ship?—Altogether.

1511. Now, come to "i," vessels not under command. Might not that also be combined with "b," vessel stopped, and so get rid of these four short blasts?—That would come under "e."

1512. Under "b," if not under command?—If not under command.

1513. Would not that come under "b"?—It would come under "b."

1514. Then you would eliminate that?—I would eliminate that altogether.

1515. By that means you would get rid of "g," "h," and "i"?—That would eliminate the short, long, short sounds.

1516. It would eliminate three signals, would it not, and 10 blasts?—Yes.

Mr. Cayzer.

1517. I should like you to look at the regulations now in force, the three sounds "a," "b," and "c;" do not you think that those are quite sufficient, and have you, in all your experience as a navigator, ever required any extra sounds?—I have always found them quite sufficient for the purpose.

1518. Then you do not want any of these new signals; or do you want any of them; and, if so, which?—I would rather not have anything to do with any of them; I have found those three present signals quite sufficient for 25 years in very crowded waters, where fogs are very prevalent, and where I have very often had 900 people under my feet.

1519. Do you require any of those on the other side of the paper?—Personally, I do not require any of them; but if it has to be a question of compromise, those two, "b" and "e," are the best of them.

1520. Then you would add those as they are to the other signals as separate signals?—They would be additional signals to the "a," "b," and "c" of the present rules.

1521. Then you have told us that Clause 15 legalised the use of the syren?—Yes.

1522. That is used now without any authority, is it not?—Yes, but I think the question might arise in a court of law if anything happened; it is not legalised; at present they use it at their own risk.

1523. It is in general use on all large steamers, is it not?—It is getting more so every year now, but I have never seen it legalised in any shape or form, and if a collision occurred it might be brought into question.

1524. Then what I understand from you is that you would rather not have the syren, that that would be relegated to the lighthouses and signal stations on land, and that there should be a uniform steam whistle for all steamers?—I think that would be the safest and the best. I was approaching a lightship at one point in the Baltic not many weeks ago, where there was a syren; I heard a syren; it sounded very much like the syren of the lightship; I steered by it, knowing my position, and all at once a vessel turned up under my bows, which was steaming quite fast through the water; I was misled by the signal.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1525. She was blowing a syren?—She was blowing a syren just the same as the light-vessel, and I heard the syren just where I expected to hear the light-vessel's signal.

Mr. Stephen Williamson.

1526. Did you hear Captain Cleary's evidence?—Yes.

1527. Do you agree with him in the desirableness of having a special fog signal for vessels towing?—No, I do not think it is necessary.

1528. You do not think it is necessary?—No.

1529. You have had no experience on the American coast, have you?—No, not on the American coast.

1530. You are aware that they set great store by it in American waters, are not you?—Yes, I have heard so.

Mr. George Thomas Ovenden, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1531. You are a certificated pilot of Dover?—Yes.

1532. Have you come here to give evidence on your own part, or on the part of any large body?—The secretary of our Pilots' Association was requested to name three, and I was one of those three. It was through that means that I offered to come.

1533. The Pilots' Association being an association of the whole of England?—The United Kingdom Pilots' Association, yes.

1534. Will you tell us what your opinion is with regard to the question we have got to inquire into, namely, the alteration in the rules of the road at sea, particularly with regard to the "a," "b," "c" which we have been talking of?—Taking them generally I think we would be much better without them. I think sound signals are very delusive. Of course they are wholly in use at a time of fog, and fog runs in veins. In other words, I will explain it in this way: it is thick in some places and less thick at others, and almost clear at another place, and the fog, or rather, the sound is diverted, and you cannot tell exactly the direction of the sound. I have known three of us on a bridge together, and each one has thought the sound we heard came from a different direction.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

tion. Consequently I consider the sound signal is really not to be depended upon. I remember a case, very recently, in fact not more than 18 months ago, we were in the neighbourhood of the Nore Light, and we were about to anchor. We were anxious to hear the sound of the fog-horn, if we could (we were bound into Sheerness), and if we could find the Nore we would like to be close up to run in in the morning as soon as it cleared or daylight came. The captain declared that the sound he heard bore west and by north half north; I said west and half south; the mate differed from both of us; but when it cleared, it proved that we were neither of us right, for it bore south-west and by west; hence I conclude that a sound signal is not really to be depended upon.

1535. The deduction from all that is, that you do not desire to see the alterations made?—I do not desire to see any alteration made, because I think the present system of sound signals is quite sufficient for us.

1536. I want to ask you one question for the information of the Committee: in any case, although the captain may be on the bridge and the officer in charge, is the pilot responsible not only for keeping the vessel clear of the land, but also for keeping her clear of other navigated vessels?—Entirely responsible.

1537. Both for possible collisions with vessels under way and for the land?—Quite so.

Admiral Field.

1538. How far down channel do your duties take you?—Our licence runs to the west end of the Owers, that is getting down towards the westward, but generally we pilot from Dungeness to Gravesend.

1539. Do you go into the North Sea at all?—No, our licence does not run further than the Galloper. I have been in to the North Sea, to Yarmouth, and so forth, but my licence does not run that far.

1540. Of course it has been your duty to encounter many fogs and overcome many difficulties of the kind. Have you got the rules before you?—I have.

1541. We have been speaking generally, but we want to come to particulars if we can. It is not likely that the whole of these rules will be swept away, but we want to get professional opinion as to what signals can be eliminated and what retained. There is no controversy about "a;" come to "b," please; that is a new signal; that a vessel stopped shall make two prolonged blasts. Do not you think, as a pilot, it would be a great advantage if you were in charge of a ship and there was another ship stopped somewhere on your starboard bow or beam, or on your port bow or beam, that you should know that that vessel was stopped?—Practically, no.

1542. Never mind "practically"?—I can only argue from practice; I can only give my evidence from practice.

1543. That is what we want, because you are a practical man; still I want to bring you a little closer to the point. Have you any objection to receive knowledge if it can be conveyed to you by signal?—I do not think it will be necessary, for this reason: when a steamer is stopped her anchor must go down; you cannot stop a steamer; you must keep way on her.

1544. I ask you: are you opposed to receiving knowledge as to a ship's position or action if it can be conveyed to you?—Entirely so.

1545. Opposed to receiving knowledge if it can be conveyed to you?—Certainly so; I must act on my own judgment in a case like that.

1546. But I want to confirm your judgment; would you be opposed to receiving information by a signal that a vessel was stopped if you could be certain that that information was clearly to be distinguished?—I should say yes; I should be pleased to do so if I thought it practicable; but I do not think it is practicable.

1547. Well, I must take your answer. Coming, then, to the signal "e," a vessel at anchor in a fairway, that means at sea in a fairway, not an ordinary anchorage?—Yes.

1548. Do you as a pilot think it desirable that a vessel in that position where other vessels are passing her, possibly with rapidity, should be able to make known her position by two long blasts in addition to the bell?—There is nothing better in practice than the bell alone, and if the horn is introduced with the bell it will cause no end of confusion; because you see it is like this: there are so many vessels about you. I have seen in the radius of a mile a hundred vessels at once when a fog has cleared off. Now what sort of a position should we be in if all these fellows were blowing and ringing at the same time?

1549. Well, you would have more noise?—And more confusion.

1550. Therefore you would be immensely on your guard?—Yes. It is my humble opinion, and I have had a great practice, that the bell is really all-sufficient, and that it is the best signal we can have at anchor anywhere where there is anchorage.

1551. Do you think the bells vessels carry are good means of signalling?—There we come to something else. They should be compelled to have a good bell that would sound properly.

1552. Come to "f." As an experienced pilot, would not you like to know that a vessel was being towed?—I consider there ought to be a distinguishing signal for the vessel towing a vessel, and that the vessel towed should answer the same signal.

1553. Then you are in favour of the additional signal?—Quite so; I am in favour of that. What the signal should be I will not say; but there ought to be a distinguishing signal for vessels in tow.

1554. It is proposed that it should be a long and two shorts. Now "g," "way off my vessel:" you do not want that, I understand?—I do not want that, not in my practice.

1555. Or the telegraph ship, you do not want that?—At present in the river we are compelled to use that signal when the machinery is broken down or the ship is unable to manœuvre; there are four short blasts for that. The telegraph ship cannot require anything more, inasmuch as she cannot manœuvre any more than a ship that is broken down.

1556. You

1556. You think, at all events, that "h" might come under "i," a vessel not under command?—Exactly so.

1557. If "b" is to be retained, supposing it is to be retained (two long ones), are you of opinion that "i" might be included in "b"?—Yes.

1558. Or "b" in "i," which would you rather?—I would rather have "b" included in "i."

1559. You would rather have "b" in "i"?—Yes.

Mr. Cayzer.

1560. I would like to ask with reference to your experience as a pilot (you spoke about your practical experience) whether you have not a great deal larger experience of fogs than any ordinary ship-masters?—Oh, I should very much think so.

1561. Because of constantly navigating in narrow channels along the coast of England?—Yes, inasmuch as we are so frequently mixed up with fogs.

1562. Therefore your practical experience is very valuable as regards fog signals?—Certainly, I should think so.

1563. You have more experience than people connected with the merchant service or the Royal Navy?—Quite so.

1564. From that experience I understand you consider the present signals "a," "b," and "c" on the paper before you are quite sufficient?—Quite sufficient.

1565. And you require no other?—Only in the towing. I should say that there might be a distinguishing signal for a vessel in tow and towing.

Chairman.

1566. You would like to keep the towing signal?—Yes, sir.

1567. You would also like, as I gather, to keep the signal for a vessel which could not manœuvre?—Yes.

1568. You would like to have a new signal for that?—No, the same signal that we have now, broken down, or practically broken down, four short blasts, "keep out of my way."

1569. That is a rule you have in practice?—We have that in practice now.

1570. In the Thames that is in practice now?—In the Thames it is, and I think that is quite sufficient.

1571. That is not a rule for the ocean, it is only a rule that you adopt yourselves in the Thames?—Yes, the Thames Conservancy compel us to do that; it is not compulsory in broad waters.

1572. It is not compulsory beyond the Nore?—It is not compulsory beyond the Nore.

1573. You would like to make it compulsory beyond the Nore?—I think so.

1574. So that you would really yourself add two new rules, would not you?—Yes.

1575. One of them for a vessel unable to manœuvre?—Yes.

1576. And the other for a towing vessel?—Yes.

1577. Accordingly, you think the present rules might be improved by the addition of the other fog signals?—That is the only addition that I can see that would be at all useful, that is, towing, inasmuch as we have the one row, although it is not compulsory everywhere, the four short blasts; it is only compulsory under the jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy.

1578. Let me ask you this; that is what you would yourself prefer; but you recognise the value of an international agreement, of course?—Yes.

1579. It would be very important to have an international agreement if we could?—Perhaps so.

1580. Do not you think if you were to accept these rules as they stand, that if it was thought necessary to take them in order to get a general international agreement, it would be worth while giving them a trial for so big a stake as that?—Well, I really think, sir, that England, owning such a very large percentage of the tonnage of the world, whatever England adopted other nations ought to "tumble to."

1581. That is a sentiment very few of us would differ from?—Quite so; but I am only giving my opinion in that direction.

1582. But suppose we cannot get absolutely our own way in these things (as we ought perhaps), would not it be worth while giving them a trial?—There are many situations where there must be a give-and-take sort of question, but I am unable to deal with that.

1583. You would be able to manage, I think, with these new rules; if they would not do you much good, I do not think you gather that they would do you much harm?—For myself I am not afraid of them; but for the majority of men I am; they are so careless they would not care to learn, they would not care to attend to them.

Mr. Cayzer.

1584. I would like to ask one question with regard to this international agreement. You are constantly piloting vessels belonging to the American Government, the German Government, and to other foreign Governments?—Yes.

1585. I would like to ask whether you have had any conversation with them about these fog signals, and whether they are of the same opinion as yourself?—I may say briefly that I have talked to scores of different ones, English, American, Canadian, German, and Dutch, and they all say they hope they will never take place.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1586. Did you hear what the last witness said about the siren?—I did not hear all of it.

1587. Is the use of the siren born afloat coming in much, are there many in use now?—There are a great many in use.

1588. Is it, in your opinion, likely to be mistaken for the sound of the South Foreland or Gulf Stream lightships?—Nearly all our steam vessels are being supplied with sirens; consequently if a steamer was using a siren you could not distinguish between a steam vessel and a light vessel.

1589. You would rather stick to the old steam blast?—Yes.

 1590. A question

Chairman.

1590. A question was asked about the lightship at the South Foreland; that has got a siren, has it not?—The lightship on the South Sand Head, almost immediately opposite the South Foreland, has a siren which blows low, high, low.

1591. Do the other lightships differ in the different notes?—Yes, in notes. The South Sand Head is low, high, low; the Tongue Light is high, low, high; then the North Sand Head is low, high.

1592. But supposing you had a siren, or were using a siren instead of a whistle for a steamship, under this rule do you think you would be likely to confuse the sounds with such a signal as that which there is upon the South Sand Lightship?—I do not think I should, simply because I am so accustomed to the sirens aboard the lightships that I do not think I could make a mistake, but I am afraid others might, perhaps.

1593. You know them entirely by heart, I suppose, all those sirens along the coast?—Yes.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1594. Each of these lightships has a siren with a different call?—Yes.

Mr. Parker Smith—continued.

1595. Do you find in a fog that you can always distinguish the calls?—Not as we ought to do.

1596. You find that the fog interferes with the sound?—Yes, we find that the fog interferes.

1597. And you may not be able to distinguish the call?—Not until you are right close up to it. When you are getting close to the vessel you can distinguish it, but when at a distance frequently you cannot.

1598. You hear the noise, but cannot distinguish the call?—We hear the noise but cannot distinctly make out the calls.

Chairman.

1599. Within what distance?—We will call it a mile. It will be rather delusive at a mile distance, but for, perhaps, about half a mile I think you might distinguish them sufficiently to know where you were, so as to be out of danger; I mean to prevent the danger of getting on the sands.

Mr. EVAN T. MORSE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1600. You are a Cardiff and Bristol Channel pilot, and have been a first-class channel pilot for 20 years?—Yes.

1601. You are a member of the Cardiff Pilotage Board, and have been so for 10 years?—Yes.

1602. And you have been 36 years in the pilot service?—Yes.

1603. Of course, you have had a very large experience in piloting steamers and vessels in the Bristol Channel?—Yes; always in narrow waters in the Bristol Channel.

1604. I mean your experience has been entirely in the Bristol Channel, has it not?—Yes.

1605. Of course, you have been many and many a time in fogs?—Yes.

1606. Often, I suppose, with many ships round you, quite close?—Yes.

1608. For a ship towing?—For a ship in tow. I would suggest the prolonged blast of the tug-boat's whistle, followed by a similar blast of a foghorn on board the ship. That would give you some slight idea that there was something there besides the steamer.

Chairman—continued.

1609. Now, what is the reason you have for this objection; do you think that the proposed alterations would do no good?—I believe they would not only do no good, but would do harm.

1610. That is the next question I was going to ask; do you think they would do harm?—They would do very serious harm, in my opinion.

1611. Now, how; just explain?—For this reason: fog is so delusive. I think that has been clearly proved by experiments that have been tried. I read a very exhaustive paper some time ago on experiments that had been tried by the Elder Brethren (the Trinity Brethren), and they proved that the sound waves in a fog are not to be relied upon. Sometimes you can heard a fog signal at a great distance. I have hear a fog signal in the Bristol Channel 10 or 12 miles off; on a similar day, or what appeared to me to be a similar day, I have not been able to hear the same fog signal a mile off; that is a fog signal on one of the lightships; the Scarweather Lightship. As far as I could see, there was nothing to prevent my hearing the fog signal in the one case any more than the other, but there was something in the air which prevented my hearing it.

1612. It is uncertain; but then there is an objection with all fog signals?—Just so.

1613. Now, what is the objection then?—If you increase the number of fog signals and the different sounds, the objection is very much greater. If you have one, two, or three, you know what that means; but if you increase the signals, long, short, long; short and two long; two long and a short; you do not understand those signals, owing to the fact that the fog prevents you you clearly hearing what the person is trying to make you hear.

1614. Will you for a minute apply your mind to this particular point; I see what you say about the uncertainty of sounds in fog; of course that would apply to all sounds?—Just so.

1615. Among other things, it will apply to the fog signals that are now in use?—Yes.

1616. It would not apply any more to the fog signals that are proposed, would it?—Certainly it would; because the fog signals proposed are more in number; they are more complicated. The fog signals at present in use are so simple that you are not so likely to make a mistake with one signal as you would with two, or three, or four.

1617. I suppose the danger, if any, would arise when there was a large number of ships near one another in a fog?—Yes.

1618. From not being able to discriminate?—From not being able to discriminate one from the other.

1620. I will read it to you: "Every vessel shall in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions." Then it goes on as follows: "A steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." Now that is the plain duty of any seaman when he is in the position described; is not it?—Just so.

1621. Supposing he did his duty and stopped her engines and then navigated with caution, how would he be in any greater difficulty if he heard all these different signals round him than he would if he heard all the different ships round him blowing the two long blasts; how would it increase the difficulty; I do not see that?—You are bound to increase the difficulty when you increase the number of sounds. At present I may hear one vessel blowing one blast; I am approaching him, I know what he is doing; I hear a steamboat blowing two, I know what he is doing; if I heard three, I know he is going astern, for fear of a collision. I probably do the same; but if I heard one whistle on one side, two on the other, three on the other, long, short, and long, the sounds would confuse me as a practical person, and I am sure they would confuse anyone. The more you increase the sounds, the greater difficulty you create in finding out what those sounds mean.

1622. I was only trying to get your view. Of course the number of sounds does not increase the number of ships, and if you hear a noise near you, you know where the noise comes from approximately, and will be rather careful?—No; that is a difficulty; in practice you do not know exactly where it is; you have to judge according to the best of your ability.

1623. Is there anything else you would like to say about these rules; we need not go into them in detail, because I think you object to them all except the towing?—I should like to go into one or two of them.

1624. If you please?—I should like to go particularly into "b," "two prolonged blasts," when a ship is stopped. I strongly object to that. A little further down is "g:" "A steam vessel wishing to indicate to another, 'The way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me.'"

1625. That is "g"?—That is "g." I take it that "b," "g," and "i" are three rules made to meet what appears to me to be the same thing. I should eliminate "b" altogether. It is a source of danger, because I might mistake that two blasts for a vessel which tells me, "I am directing my course to port."

1626. You are speaking of helm signals under Article 28, are not you?—I am speaking of the old signals.

1627. That is with fair weather, is not it?—That is for clear weather. Then I say those signals are equally applicable; and they are the only signals we have used for years in fog. Those are so well instilled and drilled into a person's mind that it would be most difficult to understand what is meant by these; so that I object to "b" and I object to "g."

1628. Are not the helm signals prohibited in fog?—According to the new rules they would be, certainly.

1629. As they exist now, you know better than I do?—The helm signals are now the only signals we use in a fog; one, "I am going to starboard;" two, "I am directing my course to port;" three, "My engines are going astern." Those are the only signals we have with fog.

Admiral Field.

1630. That is for sailing ships?—For steamers; sailing ships use fog horns, of course.

Chairman.

1631. Those are, you may say, course indicating signals in a sense?—Practically, yes.

1632. So you find you can work these course-indicating signals in a fog?—Those three; one, two, three; we do not want any more. I have found them sufficient in my experience as a pilot. I have never yet had a collision with another vessel in a fog, I have never fouled a vessel at anchor in a fog, never; but I certainly should fear that I should collide with a vessel if I had to comply with these rules, because, as I say, here are three rules meaning the same thing; a vessel coming down; a vessel employed in laying a cable; "three prolonged blasts."

1633. Do you say that now in a fog there are five signals that you can use?—Three signals.

1634. Are there three helm signals, or how many?—Four, you may say. One prolonged blast; that means the steamboat is under way.

1635. That is not a helm signal?—And short blasts, one, two, three; there are practically four.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1636. That is port, starboard, under-way, and going astern?—Yes.

1637. What the Chairman means is, that the helm signals only mean the port and starboard ones?—That is so.

Chairman.

1638. You think four is enough, and that you cannot work more?—I think four is quite sufficient, with the addition of some distinctive signal for a vessel towing, that is all.

1639. You would like to add that and make it five?—Yes.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1640. Just about this siren question. You know the "Smalls"?—Yes.

1641. Has she got a siren horn?—No.

1642. St. Anne's?—No.

1643. St. David's?—St. David's is rather out of our limit.

1644. The "Scarweather"?—The "Scarweather" has a siren.

1645. What is it?—High, low.

1646. Never mind?—Different blasts.

1647. I am not examining you for a certificate. In your opinion, if sirens were allowed in steamboats, would there be danger, as far as you know, of mistaking a siren in a steamboat for the siren of the "Scarweather"?—Yes, it would be a very objectionable thing. I should like to see all steamers with the old-fashioned whistle, one sound.

1648. Is there one on "Nash"?—No.

1649. One on the Mumbles?—No; there is a bell, there is a rocket.

1650. Your answer is, that if sirens were permitted there might be further danger of mistaking lightships or lighthouses for them?—Yes; we have a siren on "Hartland," high, low, and sirens on the "Bull."

Chairman.

1651. Are sirens allowed now for steamships?—Yes, they are allowed; there is no law to prevent them.

1652. Instead of using steam whistles they do use sirens now sometimes?—Yes; a siren, as far as I understand it, is a horn, something with a different sound to an ordinary steamer's whistle.

Admiral Field.

1653. I notice by the statement you have handed in, and you have already told the Chairman, that you are greatly opposed to rule "b." I want to press you a little more on that point. You say rules "b" and "g" and "i" practically all indicate one and the same thing?—Yes.

1654. Would you not like to have one signal to indicate those three states of a vessel, stopped, way off vessel, vessel not under command; I understand you object to having three separate signals for the same thing, but you do not object to having one signal to represent those three states of things?—Yes, I do; I object to any signal being used except by a vessel that is not able to get out of the way.

1655. Then you would stick to "i," four short blasts?—Yes, "i," four short blasts.

1656. You are in favour of that?—I am not in favour of that. I was coming to that.

1657. You would put "b" and "g" under "i"?—Yes, "b," "g," and "i."

1658. You would put "b," "g," and "i" under the "i" signal?—Yes, "b," "g," and "i," or rather "b," "g," and "h," I would put under the "i" signal.

1659. Coming to "e," you say you strongly protest against "e" as ridiculous?—Yes.

1660. Supposing you are told that some very experienced seamen deem that to be of very great importance?—I should not believe it, sir. I mean I would not question your statement, but I should not believe it was an experienced seaman who made that statement.

1661. That is rather rough, considering they were experienced seamen who were in the chair; "e" is for a vessel at anchor at sea, in a fair way?—I do not care where she is, she has no right to use anything but a bell. Will you allow me to add one or two words? My experience as a pilot has been amongst vessels in a fairway, in tides ranging from one to four knots. When I hear a bell I know what I have to look out for. If I hear two whistles, owing to the difficulty which arises in clearly distinguishing what a person is trying to indicate, I naturally conclude that it is a steamboat under way, manœuvring in some way.

1662. She will be stopped in this case?—We will say she is stopped, if you please. I alter my course to clear that vessel because it is a steamer under way, and after I have altered my course this is what happens; I think I can illustrate it.

1663. Never mind, I follow you quite as far as is necessary?—I alter the course of my steamboat. I conclude the sound is right ahead in the position of the Chairman, if he will allow me to say so. I alter the course of my steamboat, because the two whistles I understand; I direct my course to port. By the time I have altered the course, before I have time to do anything else, I suddenly hear a bell. I hear the whistles again, followed by a bell; I know then that it is a steamboat, or I guess that it is a steamboat, complying with this foolish new rule. I place my steamboat in a position that I cannot get out of because the tide is running three or four knots. I may have very little way on my vessel; before I know what to do or how to do anything to avoid it, I am across that vessel's bow; whereas if I had to depend upon the bell I should know by the course I was steering that I was going as far as possible with the run of the tide, which we always do in a fog; all I would have to do would be to go to one side or the other of the vessel and anchor.

1664. You speak about the bell; are you satisfied with the present bells?—That is another question. If you can improve the sound of the bells to make them heard a little further, very good, but, as a rule, I have no complaint to make against the bells if they are properly attended to.

1665. The telegraph ship, "h," do you think that that signal is wanted; you have never come across one of those ships perhaps?—Not "h." I would have no objection to a telegraph ship using "i."

1666. Then you would combine "b," "g," "h," and "i" all under one signal, "i"?—All under one signal.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1667. About these port and starboard signals, do you use them in fog?—That is the only signal we use at present.

1668. Do you think them safe to use, port and starboard?—Yes, perfectly safe.

1669. Do they keep you in a fog using them?—Certainly they do.

1670. There was a strong feeling at Washington, I happen to know, against using these course signals in a fog?—As far as I understood that objection, it related to signals more complicated; there was a code of signals suggested of about 20 different rules; that I should object to; but three simple signals is a different thing altogether. The course signals are different to those three. It was suggested that you could steer a ship according to the signals, "I am going east"; "I am going north-east"; "I am going west"; "I am going north-west." That is what I understood by "course signals."

1671. These four signals you find it tolerably easy to distinguish in a fog?—Yes, as easy as it is possible to understand anything at all. The fact that I have never had a collision in a fog (having been a pilot for over 20 years in the Bristol Channel) is clear proof that I have understood the signals, and that we understand them generally.

1672. Have you used the port and starboard signals all that time?—Invariably.

1673. For the whole 20 years?—Yes.

1674. Then will you tell me how many signals you would be hearing round you in a fog?—At present?

1675. At present there are these four possible steamer signals?—There is one prolonged blast, a short one, two short ones, three, four.

1676. One prolonged blast, "going ahead"?—Yes.

1677. One short, "going to starboard"?—Yes.

1678. Two, "going to port"?—Yes.

1680. With those four you can keep quite clearly apart?—Yes, without making any mistake.

1681. Then there are the three sailing-vessel signals for the fog-horn?—Yes, that we understand without any difficulty. I see there is one rule suggested here for a vessel when at anchor in a fairway under which she is to use the fog-horn. I protest just as strongly against that as I do against a vessel using her whistle when at anchor.

1682. At present, if there is a crowd of boats, you may be hearing four signals from steamers, three from sailing vessels under way, and the bell?—Yes.

1683. That makes eight signals?—Yes; and we know what they are without any difficulty.

1684. As between the eight you can distinguish without any difficulty?—Yes, three of them are fog horns, and three or four are whistles. If you hear a fog-horn you know it is a sailing vessel.

1685. I suppose there is never any difficulty in a fog in distinguishing between a horn and a whistle?—No, I have never found any difficulty in that way.

1686. Supposing you dropped the port and starboard signal, then you would have under the new rules about the same number of different signals, would not you?—Yes.

1687. Some of them rare ones, that you would not be at all likely to hear much?—Yes; but my argument is that the old signals are clear; the new signals are confusing; that is the difference. It is not the quantity of them so much as the unnecessary way in which the whistles are to be used; the confounding way in which they are drawn up.

1688. But you do manage, with the eight signals that are going on at present, to keep them distinct, even in fog?—Yes, just so. The new signals would be in addition pretty well to all those.

Mr. Cayzer.

1689. You represent the Bristol Channel pilots here?—Yes, Cardiff pilots particularly.

1690. Can you tell me how many there are there; what is the number?—Bristol Channel pilots?

1691. Yes?—We have over a hundred in Cardiff, about 40 in Bristol, 40 in Newport, 35 or 40 in Swansea.

1692. So that it is nearly 250 pilots that you represent?—And about 30 in Gloucester.

Chairman.

1693. But do you represent them?—I represent the Cardiff pilots particularly, the Bristol Channel pilots generally. I have consulted pilots of the various ports.

Mr. Cayzer.

1694. But are you authorised to speak on their behalf?—Not on behalf of the whole of the Bristol Channel pilots; on behalf of the Cardiff pilots I am authorised to speak. I merely state that I have consulted several of the Bristol Channel pilots, Gloucester pilots, Newport pilots, Swansea pilots, not the whole of them. I cannot answer for the whole of them.

1695. I would like to ask whether the Committee may take it that you represent the views of one-half the number of pilots you name?—One hundred Cardiff pilots.

1696. And that they have all agreed with you that the existing rules are sufficient and require no additions except the towing signal and signal "i," the last in the list?—Yes.

1697. You make no objection to those?—No; we use that signal "i" occasionally in the Cardiff Cut-way now as a sort of private signal.

Mr. Cayzer—continued.

1698. Do you know any of those pilots that would like to adopt the new rules?—No, not one of them that I have spoken to; they are all totally opposed to them.

1699. You have heard Mr. Ovenden's evidence, and you heard him talk about a compromise in order to satisfy other nations; more foreign vessels, as we know, load in Cardiff than in any other port of the United Kingdom?—I believe so.

1700. Therefore you have had the opportunity of consulting the Cardiff pilots and of consulting these sailors; can you tell the Committee whether they are favourable to the new rules or whether they wish to abide by the old, from your conversations with them?—They are entirely opposed to the new rules as suggested.

1701. Can you tell me of what nationalities the masters are with whom you have had such conversations?—Germans, Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, Austrians, and one or two Greeks we have spoken to.

Mr. George C. Burn, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1702. You are a Pilot at Hull?—Yes. Here is a summary I have made (handing in a document).

1703. I do not want to go through the whole thing with you over again; but first about your experience; you have been 21 years at sea?—I have.

1704. You have served six years apprenticeship in the Humber pilot cutters, two and a-half years in steam and sailing vessels, and 12½ years you have yourself been a licensed Humber pilot?—I have.

1705. We all know there is a great deal of shipping in the Humber?—Yes.

1706. And traffic?—That is stated there in that report.

1707. Therefore you have had a great deal of experience?—Yes.

1708. I do not want to go through the whole detail of it with you; what is the view you hold; are you favourable, or are you adverse, to the new rules; are you favourable to the new rules?—Certainly not.

1709. You are against them?—I am against them.

1710. You heard the evidence of the last witness?—Yes.

1711. Do you agree with him in his reasons, or would you differ from him at all?—Well, I agree with him.

1712. You agree with him?—Yes.

1713. Would you like to see any change?—No, except in signal "f," vessels towing.

1714. You would like a towing signal?—Yes.

1715. But you do not want any of the others?—Excepting signal "i," that is, the four blasts in case a vessel is disabled; she must be disabled, but only disabled.

1716. Will you look at the list, if you have got it before you; of course you are satisfied with "a," that is an old one?—Signal "a," the prolonged blast.

1717. That is an old one; you are content with that?—Yes, I am contented with that.

1718. Signal "c" is an old one?—Signal "c" is all right.

1719. And "d" is right?—A vessel at anchor shall ring a bell; yes.

1720. You say you are in favour of "f," and of "i"; then that leaves "b," which you object to?—"B."

Chairman—continued.

1721. You would put that in "i," would you?—I should put that under the old rule.

1722. Which is that?—The three blasts, "going astern" and "stopped."

1723. But that is under the helm signal?—We use it in fog just the same.

1724. I want to understand; in addition to the rules that you have told us of, you would go on using the helm signals in a fog?—Yes, we always have done.

1725. You have found no difficulty in understanding them in a fog?—Not at all.

1726. And acting upon them?—And acting upon them.

1727. And you would continue to do that?—We would continue to do so.

1728. In addition to that, you would have "f," that is to say, the new towing signal?—I would have a new towing signal.

1729. And a new signal for a vessel under way, which is unable to manœuvre?—That is it, sir; but excuse me; not unable to manœuvre unless she is disabled. I do not mean to say that a master or a pilot of a vessel might manœuvre the vessel and jamb himself into a corner, and other persons as well as himself, and then blow four blasts to get out of the trouble; I mean when a vessel is disabled (her steering gear perhaps gives way) she should blow four blasts.

1730. You mean when she really is unable to manœuvre?—Yes.

1731. She is not entitled to sound the signal unless she really is unable to manœuvre; that is your view?—Yes.

1732. So you would have some additions?—Yes, the additions I have already mentioned.

1733. You would strike out some of these; you would strike out "b," "e," "g," and "h"?—Yes.

1734. The optional one and the telegraph one?—Yes.

1735. And you would keep at the helm signals?—Yes; the same as we have done hitherto.

1736. And use them in a fog?—Yes.

1737. You know better than I do, infinitely; but is it not much more dangerous to rely on what you may call course-indicating signals in a fog than it is merely to rely upon signals which show the character of the vessel?—Not at all.

1738. It is safe to rely upon course-indicating signals in a fog, is it?—Certainly.

1739. So

1739. So you must be able to understand and hear pretty well what goes on in a fog?—We know, as a fact, that when a vessel is blowing a prolonged blast she is steering a certain course, and that she is all serene; and when we come to close quarters we indicate our course by the helm signals, and they have always answered well.

1740. Do you think it would be difficult to understand these signals in a fog?—The proposed signals?

1741. No, the existing signals?—With the existing signals there is no difficulty at all.

1742. You can hear them perfectly well?—We can hear them perfectly well.

1743. You feel confident you would be able to continue hearing them?—Yes.

1744. One of them, for example, "a," is a prolonged blast at intervals of not more than two minutes; you might have two prolonged blasts, might not you?—Two prolonged blasts.

1745. Or under "c" you might have three blasts in succession?—Yes.

1746. If you can hear that, why cannot you hear long-short-long?—Two blasts may be taken for this signal: "I am directing my course to port"; "I am starboarding." There may be a vessel sounding this signal "e," and at the same time a vessel sounding two blasts: "I am starboarding."

1747. Suppose you did not have your course, indicating signals; that is to say; your helm signals, used in a fog at all, but merely had these (it may be right, or it may be wrong), could not you hear them and understand them?—We could hear them; we cannot get away from that fact, but I do not see how we are going to understand them, having been so long used to these course signals; there are two blasts just the same.

1748. You mean that you have been so long used to the course-indicating signals that you think it would confuse you to use the other signals?—Certainly.

1750. I suppose you would understand it better than a "Philadelphia lawyer," but you think you could not follow it yourself?—I could not really follow it, considering the traffic we have at the mouth of the Humber.

1751. Until you got accustomed to it?—I do not see how we could possibly get accustomed to it. With the babel of sounds that must arise with vessels at anchor and under way I cannot see how we could possibly understand it all.

Admiral Field.

1752. I am not satisfied with your general answer about "e." I may tell you that some very experienced seamen are very anxious for that signal "e" (vessel at anchor in a fair way) to have something besides the bell; you do not share that view?—I think the bell is sufficient.

1753. I presume you have no objection to an improvement of the bell?—They should all have good bells, certainly.

1754. You have been talking to the Chairman about the helm signals in a fog; by these rules, if passed, you are not allowed to use them at all in a fog, but only in sight?—We have always used them in a fog. When we want to communicate to another vessel that we are steering port or starboard we use prolonged blasts.

1755. You have been so long doing it you wish to retain those signals?—Yes.

1756. You have told the Chairman that you want to blend or put signal "b" (stopped), and signals "g" and "h" (a telegraph ship) all under "i," because you are accustomed to "i": four short blasts?—No, we do not use four short blasts; we never have used it in the Humber.

1757. Other pilots have told us that you have used it?—Not in the Humber; there we have the plain Rule of the Road.

1758. Then why do you prefer putting those signals "b," "g," and "h" all under "i"?—I prefer it if it is necessary to have a signal at all for when a vessel is stopped out at sea.

1759. You prefer two short blasts to two long ones?—Yes, to two long ones; it would complicate the signal for starboarding.

1760. These would not be complicated with the helm signals, because you are not to be allowed to use the helm signals in a fog?—I do not see how we are to get out of it. If the vessel is starboarding she blows those blasts.

1761. He would not be allowed to use the helm signals?—I do not see how we are to tell unless he does something to show that he is porting or starboarding.

1762. You want this signal, because you are navigating in narrow waters; the seamen on the ocean do not want that signal, but they do want the signal apparently about being stopped, the two prolonged blasts; do you see any objection to two long blasts in preference to four short ones?—The signal "b" and the signal "g" I object to.

1763. Yes, you have told us so. I want to get you to state definitely whether you still hold to four short blasts if it is necessary to have some signal to indicate that a vessel is stopped, or "way off my vessel," or "not under command." If it is proposed to put those under one you indicate to the Chairman that you prefer "i"?—Yes, if it is necessary to indicate anything at all; but I do not think it is necessary myself. We have worked so long without it that I do not thing it is necessary.

1764. Assume, for the sake of argument, that something will be held to be necessary, then you want the four short instead of the two long ones?—Yes.

1765. Because you say it is less confusing?—It is less confusing.

1766. The four are simpler than the two, you think?—Yes.

Mr. Parker Smith.

1767. Have you any signal you use at present for "not under command"?—No, none at all.

1768. It is simply the one long blast, "going ahead," to the port, the starboard, and the astern signals?—Yes.

1769. Those are the only ones?—Those are the only ones.

Mr. Cayzer.

1770. There are a number of Norwegian and other foreign vessels come into the Humber?—A large number.

1771. Can you tell the Committee from your personal conversations with the captains of those vessels whether they are favourable or not favourable to these new rules?—They are not favourable; I have never heard one of them say that he was.

1772. You have spoken to them upon the subject?—It has been a general subject of conversation with me for the last six months when I have gone on board a ship.

1773. They generally support the views you have given to the Committee?—They generally support these views.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

1774. Did you ever consider the difference in the strength of bells and foghorns in fogs, I mean the different strengths in sound?—Yes.

1775. Do you think that good would come of a regulation which established similarity of power in bells and foghorns in ships?—That would not be any good; that could not be any good.

1776. It could not do any good, you think?—No.

1777. You think those things should remain as they are?—They should remain as they are. My sole objection to having these whistles and foghorns going, on vessels at anchor, is the babel of sounds that will arise from it.

1778. I was not speaking of only "at anchor," but generally of sound signals in fog; do you find any difficulty in a vessel not having a loud horn?—You do at times. A small vessel will have a small tinkling bell, but a vessel of about 300 tons or so, as a rule, will have a good bell.

1779. You do not see any necessity for uniformity in the power of the bell?—Yes, I do. I think that would be a very good thing, certainly.

1780. What I want to lead up to is this: do you find it easy to distinguish, in the Humber, the distance of vessels from you by the number of sounds you hear; can you rely upon that?—It depends on the weather to a great extent.

1781. As between one blast and another in the same hour?—Yes, we should find a difficulty in this, there is no doubt about that.

1782. With the foghorns as they now are, you would not be able to tell the distance?—No, you would not exactly.

1783. You say you use the course signals in fogs?—Yes.

1784. I suppose you are aware that the rule itself is only for vessels which are in sight of each other?—Yes, according to this rule.

1785. According to the old rule?—Article 28, I see, mentions only in sight of each other, but this is the first time I have understood it in that light.

1786. In your experience did you ever find a fog so local that one vessel laid outside the fog giving course signals, and another laid inside, hearing them?—Yes, I have seen a fog like that wall.

1787. You have seen that happen in a fog?—Yes.

1788. So that the two signals might be blowing together?—Yes, easy enough.

1789. I understand your contention to be that if you heard one, or two blasts, in a fog, you would not tell whether they were course signals or fog signals?—Certainly not; it is an impossibility.

1790. I understand you think there might possibly be an additional fog signal for vessels not under control?—Yes.

1791. That is to say, vessels not at anchor but with no steerage way on them?—With no steerage way on them.

1792. There might be an additional signal for that state of things?—Yes.

1793. Do I understand you to say, assuming you had this additional signal, you would prefer four short blasts to anything more elaborate, like long, short, long?—Yes, it is more simple, more plain.

1794. That is what I understand to be your view?—Yes.

1795. If there is to be another signal for vessels not under control you would prefer four short blasts?—Yes.

1796. Are you aware that that is the practice on the Thames at the present time?—Yes, I am aware of it, but I have had no experience of the Thames.

1797. You would have no objection to a signal of that kind?—No, not at all. There is one thing I should like to mention, if you will allow me, with reference to sirens on lightships.

1799. Do you mean to say you might take two blasts of a foghorn and a steamer sound for the lightship?—The lightship blows two low bass notes and one treble note. As a rule, the sirens of these fishermen that I have in my mind are treble notes, and if you are anxiously approaching the lightship and listening for the sound, you sometimes cannot hear the bass notes and may just "catch sight" of the treble note. It very often often happens that we fancy we have got this lightship, and then it turns out that it is a fishing trawler close to, or a mile off, or a half-mile, instead of the lightship. It is very misleading, and we complain very strongly about it.

1800. Are there any other light-vessels you can mention that are similarly misleading?—Not in the Humber.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1801. How far does your limit come down: to Hasleborough?—No, to Dimlington, about 12 miles north of the Humber.

Chairman.

1802. Is there anything else you want to say?—No, I think not.

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. W. COLQUITT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1803. You are a first-class Liverpool Pilot, and Vice Chairman of the United Kingdom Pilots' Association?—Yes.

1804. And you have been a pilot for 22 years?—Yes.

1805. Chiefly in the Port of Liverpool?—Always in the Port of Liverpool.

1806. I think we know the Port of Liverpool means rather an extensive area?—Oh, yes, it is a very extensive area.

1807. You, of course, have had charge of all classes of vessels?—All classes of vessels.

1808. Have you considered all these new sound signals?—I have given the matter very serious consideration.

1809. What do you say. In the first place, have you taken in any formal way the opinion of your association upon the subject?—Oh, yes, in every way, both formally and individually, and privately, and we are unanimously opposed to these new rules.

Admiral Field.

1810. Every mortal one?—Every one, sir. It is a large statement, but it is a correct one.

Chairman.

1811. In the first place, I want to know this: Have you got a particular objection to any individual ones amongst them?—Yes.

1812. Explain to me what you particularly object to in those different rules?—I object to them as a whole.

1813. Now just let us come to the particular ones, please. You see the one called "b"?—Yes, "b."

1814. That is for "a steam vessel under way, but stopped, and having no way upon her"?—Yes.

1815. Do not you think it would be a good thing for you to know when a vessel was stopped like that?—I think it would simply add to the confusion. I do not think it would be of any use to the practical navigator.

1816. Supposing you had not many ships near you, you might very easily understand the signal, might you not. If you heard in a fog a signal of two prolonged blasts with an interval of about a minute between them, you would understand it, would you not?—Permit me to explain. I am giving evidence as a practical navigator in crowded channels, and I object to the rules as a whole, as I have mentioned before; for this reason: that the whole scheme seems to have reference to only two particular vessels.

Chairman—continued.

1817. What vessels?—The rules, as a whole, do not seem to bear in mind that you may be navigating with perhaps 12 or 20 vessels within a radius of half-a-mile.

1818. Will you explain what you mean?—I would like to make myself clear on this point, sir, if I may.

1819. If you please; I want you to?—The rules appear to me as if they were drawn up with only reference to two particular vessels, and as if there were no vessels in that locality except the two vessels approaching each other, whereas, as a matter of fact, in crowded parts like Liverpool, you may have within a radius of half-a-mile 12, 15, or even 20 vessels, all probably making a different course.

1820. Not in a fog?—Yes, in a fog.

1821. They ought to be going very slowly in a fog, ought not they?—Certainly.

1822. Now tell me the situation you are in at the present moment. When you are in the Mersey, or at the mouth of the Mersey, in a fog, and you hear about 12 or 15 vessels sounding their steam whistles all round you (or their fog-horns) you cannot distinguish one from the other, can you?—Well, with what we have under Article 12, it is quite simple. They simply indicate their locality, and then the careful navigator has to look out; but this would be confusion heaped upon confusion, I should think.

1823. I do want to get at the bottom of what you really mean. Take yourself in your present situation, with the present rules being faithfully obeyed; you are in a fog at the mouth of the Mersey, and you have got about 15 vessels all round you sounding their steam whistles or fog-horns, you cannot distinguish between the one sound and the

the other; all you know is that there are a lot of vessels near you, is not that so?—That is so.

1824. And, roughly speaking, you know the direction in which they are?—Roughly speaking, of course. Sound is a very unreliable quantity.

1825. It may be deceptive, if you please, near the land, at all events?—Yes.

1826. But, roughly speaking, you know no more than that at the present time; you hear the sound, you know there are a number of ships near you, but you cannot distinguish one from the other?—Just so.

1827. Suppose they were to sound different sounds in that condition of things, how would it confuse you more?—I am afraid it would add to the confusion. I do not think it would assist navigation in any way.

1829. So you have said. I am trying to find out in what way it would add to the confusion. There must be confusion under those circumstances, must there not?—I will try and make it plain. Take it in detail. I object, first of all, to the introduction of the word "siren." The old article said, "a steam whistle or other steam sound signal." I do not think a siren is an efficient sound signal. I know, as a matter of fact, it is one of the most confusing signals that can ever be put aboard a ship. All vessels, in my opinion (with the exception of one) that carry a siren always carry a fog-horn, at least a steam whistle, rather, and the steam whistle is used for fog purposes, the siren for telegraphic purposes.

1830. But a ship can give a signal by a siren now; is not that the law now; is not that the custom now?—It is a question for you to consider; but the introduction of the word "siren" here seems to me to interfere with the "efficient steam sound signal" under Article 12.

1831. I want to know from you whether or not the siren is now used by a steamship. It is often used, is it not?—For fog purposes never, in my experience.

1832. Is it never used?—Not for fog purposes. It is used for signalling boats, for getting coal, and that kind of business, or to tell the owner when the ship is going to arrive; that is the principal use of it.

1833. That is your first objection?—Yes.

1834. I will not enter upon what other witnesses have told us about the use of the siren. Now, about the rules themselves; do you object to "b"?—I do not object to "a"; that is similar to what we have at present. I object to "b."

1835. "A" is the old rule, is it not?—"A" is the old rule, of course.

1836. "B" is a new rule; do you object to that?—Yes; I object to that, because I think that if a vessel is giving the "a" signal prescribed by that sub-section, it may be taken up by another vessel in her immediate neighbourhood, and be mistaken for the signal prescribed by Sub-section "h," the telegraph ship.

1837. That is Sub-section "h"?—Yes.

1838. Do you think that three prolonged blasts in succession may be taken for two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them?—No. I think it is rather important, and would like to make that clear to you. I think if a vessel is making two prolonged blasts, when she has finished with them, that signal may be immediately taken up by another vessel in the near vicinity, and then another vessel approaching her might mistake it for the signal indicated by Sub-section "h."

1839. You mean a combination of the sounds of the two vessels might mislead a third vessel?—Certainly; you would think it was one vessel, instead of its being two.

1840. I will not enter upon that; but it would be the same thing, would it not, between the two first rules that exist now; Rule A. of the present rules, and Rule B., might be equally confused in that way, might they not?—No, I think Rule A. refers to a steamship, and Rule B. to a sailing ship; one is made with a steam whistle, the other with the fog-horn.

1841. I see your point plainly; the one is made with the fog-horn, the other is made with the siren?—Yes.

1842. Is that your objection; that there might be confusion between one signal and another?—That is one of our objections.

1843. Is there any other objection if——?—If you would permit me to refer to it, there is a most important point I should like to submit. I do not know whether it is pertinent to this inquiry; if it is not on the detail, it is on the principle.

1844. If you please?—You must remember that in connection with the Port of Liverpool the Board of Trade laws do not insist that every person in charge of a vessel should have a certificate of competency, or pass any examination, or give any proof whatever, that he is conversant with the present rules. Now, while we have a class of men like that in existence (and it is certain we have) it is most dangerous to navigation to introduce more complicated signals than we have at present when we have no security that these people will read them.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1845. What are the class you allude to, who have steamships under their command that have no certificate of any sort, either coasting or otherwise?—Coasting vessels.

1846. They have a certificate?—No; subject to correction, I say no. I say that a steamer in the coasting trade not carrying passengers is not compelled to employ a certificated master or officer.

1847. We have got the Board of Trade regulations

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald—continued.

gulations here?—I think I am right; I say that subject to correction.

Chairman.

1848. I am told by the Board of Trade that that is right in the case of coasting vessels not carrying passengers?—If they are not carrying passengers you are not compelled to employ a certificated master or officer.

1849. You mean you might have inefficient men in command?—Certainly; we know, as a matter of fact, that we have these inefficient men in command. The Mersey is inundated with shipwrecks, and one thing and another, through this small class of vessel. The men in command do not know the rules of the road: they know nothing.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1850. The Board of Trade rules are always posted up, are they not?—It is a fact that they pass no examination, and have no certificate.

Chairman.

1851. However, you are afraid that inefficient men might get into a fog?—I am certain of it.

1852. Whether certificated or not, they would do so if they did not take the trouble to make themselves familiar with the rules?—A certificated man is always more efficient than an uncertificated man.

1853. Probably he is; I think you also say that the present mechanical means of producing these sounds are unreliable?—Yes, they are unreliable.

1854. You mean the apparatus is not what it should be?—I do not think that exactly expresses my meaning. What I mean is this: that sound is a very erratic quantity altogether; you can never locate it. I have been coming up with vessels into the Port of Liverpool and have heard the lightship's horn, as I have thought, right ahead; the master has thought it a little on the port bow, and when we have actually sighted the object, we have found that both were wrong, and that the sound was on the starboard bow. You cannot locate sound, especially with a cross wind.

1855. Does not that apply to all sound signals?—Certainly.

1856. The present ones as well as the others?—Certainly.

1857. Therefore the passing of these new rules would not make sound more "erratic" in a fog than it is now, would it?—No, the sound would be the same, but it would make it more complex.

1858. That is what you have said already, it would be more complex. Also, you say, that the proposed signals would create a feeling of safety in the minds of the persons using them when, in point of fact, there was no certainty that they had heard all the signals?—Yes, I think so.

1859. Do you think it would tend to inspire people with great confidence?—I think it would be conducive to navigation when navigation was not safe. People would rely on these signals, and when they got in a mess among a whole lot of vessels, I am afraid they would find their crutch would not carry them.

1860. The opinion you say you express is that of other pilots and of all your association. Have you held any meeting of the pilots?—Yes, we held three or four.

1861. When was that?—I could not give you the dates; it was prior to the holding of the Departmental Committee. We considered the matter most thoroughly.

1862. Prior to the holding of the Departmental Committee?—Yes.

1863. Your view was that there should be no change at all, as I understand?—Well, some; but not this change.

1864. Do you think any change would be desirable; if so, will you kindly tell us?—Well, we have not given any particular attention to that. No; we are quite satisfied with the signals at present in force.

1865. Then you do not want any change?—We do not want any change.

1866. You prefer going on as you are?—We prefer going on as we are; we are open-minded; of course, all seamen are open-minded. You may naturally think we are conservative, but we are not, sir; we are a most progressive body of men. If the Board of Trade or anybody else can give us any assistance superior to Article 12, we would be glad to adopt it; but we say Article 15 is infinitely worse.

1867. Do you know the body of authority by which these rules were supported in America?—Yes.

1868. And you know what is the opinion of many distinguished naval officers; you think highly of naval officers, do not you?—Yes; I think highly of them. I think they have made a sad mess of it, sir; that is all I can say.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

1869. Your evidence applies mainly, I see (in fact, almost entirely) to crowded waters?—To crowded waters entirely.

1870. When you are in crowded waters now, among 12 or 20 vessels, the present signals are very difficult to understand, I suppose, are not they?—No; the present signals are quite simple. They are simply that a steamer in going along blows his whistle not less than every two minutes. That is all you have, with the exception of the optional signals under Article 19. There is only one compulsory steam signal now.

1871. Suppose a great many ships are making the signal all at the same time, or nearly at the same time; is not that confusing?—Of course it is more confusing than it would be if there was only one.

1872. What I mean is, that in any case, without any kind of signals, must there not be a very great difficulty in crowded waters, and with a great many ships near to you, in distinguishing whether one ship is signalling, or two, or three, or four, or how many?—Quite so; I quite grasp that; it is so.

1873. Therefore, what these new signals really do is to add to the confusion which must already exist in the nature of things?—Just so.

1874. Now supposing the existing system could could be retained in crowded waters (by "crowded waters" I mean such as the direct entrance to the Port of Liverpool) and the new signals generally adopted, for all general purposes, what should you say to that suggestion?—Not these, I should say.

1875. You do not like them anywhere?—I do not like them anywhere.

1876. Have you ever had any accident in a fog?—No; I never hit a vessel under weigh in my life.

1877. I suppose when you get into a fog you almost stop your ship, do not you?—I stop, or anchor, or proceed, as judgment directs is proper, but always with care.

1878. Therefore, any amount of noise would not prevent your still being very careful?—I am afraid these rules would be a direct incentive (not to me, because I know the danger of them) to many navigators to proceed when they should not.

1879. But the more confusing the different noises might be the more care would be taken by anybody who really knew his business?—Perhaps not; I think not.

1880. Do you think not?—I think there are a class of mariners who would proceed under the supposed safety of these new rules, and then, when they got in the midst of a lot of vessels, they would find that the new rules, instead of being an assistance, would be an injury to them.

1881. No pilot would do such a thing, I suppose?—Well, there are pilots and pilots, the same as there are captains and captains.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

1882. I think we may take it that your general idea is that the simpler the rules are the better, taking into consideration the fact that many of the men are not experts on the question of fog signals?—Just so: not certificated men; I prefer putting it in that way.

1883. And you have just told Sir Michael Hicks Beach that you think many of the men would look upon these rules as an incentive to go on, when under the old rules they would bring up their vessels?—Quite so.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1884. I just want to ask you about this question of the siren as at present the rules stand. I am not asking to find fault with you, but only to get your opinion?—Certainly.

1885. A siren may be used, may it not, under the present regulations by a steam vessel?—It may be used.

1886. Under the present regulations?—Yes, it may be used. The Article says: "Or other efficient steam sound signal." The new rule says only the whistle or siren.

1887. You can only use it under these terms?—It seems to convert the words "efficient steam sound signal" into the word "siren."

1888. Practically they do use it, do they not?—They do not use it for ordinary fog signals.

1889. They do not?—They do not.

1890. I do not want to go over the ground already gone over; I want you just to confine yourself to this siren?—Just so.

1891. In your opinion, will the admissibility of the siren being used instead of the steam whistle under the new rules be likely to cause any additional danger to the mariner from mistaking it for the siren or horn of a light vessel?—Undoubtedly.

1892. Do you know the north-west lightship?—Yes.

1893. Has she a siren?—No, sir; a mere foghorn.

1894. You know the Skerries?—Yes.

1895. Is there a siren there?—There is a siren there.

1896. What is that; siren?—That is a siren.

1897. Would that be one that would be likely to be mistaken by the mariner for a vessel under way?—It is quite possible; and there is the North Wall fog signal; that is a siren.

1898. Do you know the "Stack"?—Yes.

1899. Is that a siren?—That is a siren.

1900. Do you know Cardigan Bay lightship?—Of course you are taking me out of my district there.

1901. At all events, your opinion is that it increases the danger by allowing the steamer to use a siren, inasmuch as it might be mistaken for the light vessel or the lighthouse foghorn?—Undoubtedly; but in addition to that I have an objection to the siren, because any sound is difficult to localise, even a steam-whistle; but the siren is infinitely more difficult to localise than the steam whistle.

Admiral Field.

1902. You have told Mr. Penrose FitzGerald that you think the siren might be mistaken for the lighthouse or lightship. When you are in pilot water would you not also have your soundings to go by to prevent the possibility of mistaking the one for the other?—Yes.

1903. Therefore, in pilot water you would not be afraid of mistaking the siren of the steamer for the siren of the lighthouse?—I would be.

1904. When you pay attention to your soundings?—Yes, even paying attention to the soundings.

1905. I will take your answer. You told Sir Michael Hicks Beach just now that your experience was mainly limited to crowded waters in the Port of Liverpool?—Yes.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

1906. That is not quite so, is it. I daresay your experience goes all over the world. Your evidence is what I said, not your experience?—I prefer to keep myself to the Port of Liverpool as near as I can.

Admiral Field.

1907. As a pilot in crowded waters your experience has been very large. Have you ever commanded a ship yourself on ocean voyages?—No; I am a first-class Liverpool pilot.

1908. You are simply a pilot performing a most important and responsible duty. I only want to know how far your experience has extended. You have told other gentlemen that you dislike the whole of the signals and will not entertain the question of adopting any of them?—I would entertain them; I have entertained them, but I find I cannot adopt them.

1909. You will not take a favourable view of any portion of them?—No.

1910. We must bring you down to particulars if we can?—Very well, sir.

1911. We will begin with one of the most important signals, one which the United States insists upon; the towing signal "f"?—Yes.

1912. If you were a mariner out in the open sea, do not you think it would be desirable to know whether a ship was being towed or towing?—I have been a pilot for many years, and I have never known yet, or heard anybody express the view, that a vessel towing should have any different signal than a steamship under way. I wish to put this point: Why should a vessel towing have a different signal to a steamship under way; is it on account of the length? I suppose that must be the idea that is permeating people's minds when they wanted to prescribe a different signal; but, as a matter of fact, a vessel towing (an ordinary tug-boat with, say, 30 fathoms of hawser out, and an ordinary ship astern of her) is no longer than any of our ordinary Atlantic steamers. Take a tug-boat 20 fathoms long, with 30 fathoms of hawser out, and a ship 250 feet long astern of that, and then it is only the same length as the "Campania," or less than that.

1913. I will not pursue the question. I will take your answer as it stands. You told the Chairman just now, when he pressed you upon the point of the "b" signal (two prolonged blasts), you objected to it, because you said you might hear another fog blast, an ordinary fog signal, under "a," or it might be a telegraph ship under "h"?—Yes, I said "b."

1914. Then you were asked by the Chairman: "But surely two prolonged blasts could not be mistaken for three?" and your reply was that another vessel might sound a long blast so that you might think it a telegraph ship. Have you ever met a telegraph ship in crowded waters?—Never in my life.

1915. Then do not you think that that objection is not a very forcible one?—I do think it is not a very forcible one.

1916. Therefore that answer would not support your view quite?—No.

1917. May I ask, have you any very strong objection to any other signal which has been advised in these rooms for a vessel at anchor at sea. A vessel at anchor in a fair way is a different thing to a vessel at anchor in an open roadstead?—Do you wish me to explain my views upon that?

1918. No; answer my question shortly, otherwise we shall be so long over the evidence. If other officers of the mercantile marine, as well as of the Royal Navy, have strongly pressed that signal "e" is most important, and should be insisted upon for a vessel at anchor in a fair way (not in an ordinary anchoring ground), and that she should have a right to use her whistle (two long blasts), and also to ring her bell, what would you say to that?—I should say those eminent gentlemen took a wrong view upon the matter. I would like to point this out: Who is going to define what is "ordinary anchorage ground" and what is not "ordinary anchorage ground"? Now, for instance, take the Port of Liverpool, from the Rock Light down to Point Lynus; that is practicable anchorage ground the whole distance, but still it is not "ordinary anchorage ground." I am in charge of a vessel, and am in anchorage ground; I will have to go and have a long legal argument with the captain to get to know whether it is "ordinary anchorage ground" or not; that is one difficulty we should have in the matter.

1919. If you were at anchor in the Port of Liverpool in the approach to the Mersey you would still have only the bell?—I would still have only the bell.

1920. Then you do not care about "e"?—No.

1921. I will pass on to "g," "way off my vessel"?—I think that is a superfluous signal.

1922. May it not be combined with advantage with the "B" signal, two long blasts; would you object to it then?—I would rather give the matter consideration; I would not like to answer that, that is a complication I have not taken into account.

1923. Then I do not think I need trouble you further?—But I would like to point out this: There are three signals here that seem to me to be one. This is one: "The way is off my vessel. You may feel your way past me."

1924. That is "g"?—It is not the duty of one navigator to invite another to feel the way past him; if he signals he is stopped, that is sufficient. If you have "b" you do not want "g."

1925. Then I have got the answer from you that "g" might be combined in "b"?—If you have "b" you do not want "e."

1926. Might not "vessel not under command" also be included in "b" according to your view. If the way is off the vessel she is stopped?—This is a superfluous thing altogether, "i."

1927. Then you say "b" would cover it?—"b" would cover the whole.

1928. I should like to ask a question on just one point: Two ships approach one another; the ships might sound their two long blasts, you say, and you might mistake a third blast where it came from another vessel?—Yes.

1929. Did you ever hear two whistles alike?—Yes, hundreds.

1930. That is a new experience?—Hundreds alike I have heard.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

1931. Did the Committee understand you that, in your opinion, one of the most fruitful sources of collisions at the mouth of the Mersey comes from the class of ship that has not got a certificated master?—Quite so, but for collisions, I would say accidents, caused by uncertificated persons.

Admiral Field.

1932. I forgot to ask about the helm signals. Do you wish to retain the helm signals?—Optional. I wish to retain them as they are: "One short blast to mean 'I am directing my course to starboard.' Two short blasts to mean 'I am directing my course to port.' Three short blasts to mean 'My engines are going full speed astern.'"

1933. Do

1933. Do you wish to keep those helm signals?—As optional signals, and not as compulsory signals; we believe, if made compulsory, they will add to the present confusion.

1934. You use them?—We do use them in case of emergencies, and nearly always in clear weather; in foggy weather we never use them at all.

Captain TAYLOR, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1935. YOU are the captain of a vessel, are you not, of the General Steam Navigation Company?—Yes.

1936. You have been 42 years at sea?—Yes.

1937. In the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, and the Baltic?—Yes.

1938. In fact, I suppose, you have very large experience all over the world, from time to time, all over the seas?—Yes.

1939. Also in the coasting trades?—Yes.

1940. Twenty-nine years in command; and you hold a pilot certificate for the same period?—Yes, that is right.

1941. Have you been in American waters?—Only when I was young.

1942. I believe you appear to give evidence on behalf of the London Short Sea Traders' Association?—Yes.

1943. What do you say in regard to these rules?—I am of the same opinion as all our masters; I object to the new rules.

1944. Will you tell me first your general ground of objection; put your general ground of objection?—I object, because I have always found the old rules sufficient, and I think the new rules would only cause confusion.

1945. You mean confusion in crowded waters?—Yes, in crowded waters, of course.

1946. You do not mean confusion when the waters are not crowded?—No, not when the waters are not crowded.

1947. When the waters are not crowded, do you think there would be confusion then?—Which particular signals do you mean?

1948. I was rather taking you generally. Will you tell me. Do you think that any of them would produce confusion?—Yes.

1949. When the waters were not crowded; if there were only two ships or three ships within hearing, say?—No, I should prefer to have the rules remain as they are.

1950. Yes, yes; but we are trying to get the reasons, you see, captain; what do you say, do you think that if it was not in crowded waters; if there were only two ships within hearing of one another that there would be any confusion then by reason of these signals?—Possibly not.

1951. You do not think there would be any danger?—I do not think there would be if there was only one ship within sound.

1952. In crowded waters you have a great number of ships; we have been told there are as many as 15 sometimes within a radius of a mile?—There, I think, there would be confusion.

1953. There is there already, is not there?—With the one signal?

1954. Yes?—Not so much; because we always stop when we hear another steamer.

1955. Could not you do that if you heard

another steamer, whatever the sound was that the other steamer emitted?—It would double the noise without any benefit.

1956. Would it do any harm. The more noise the more caution?—I do not say it would do any harm; I do not know that it would do any harm.

1957. You do not think it would?—No.

1958. I mean even crowded waters. Do you think any harm would arise from using these new signals. You have got them before you, all of them. Do you think there would be any increased danger arising in crowded waters?—No; I do not think there would.

1959. There would be more noise?—There would be more noise.

1960. That would not terrify you, would it?—It is bad enough as it is. I had 28 hours last week sounding the steam whistle.

1961. You might be more careful, might not you, in consequence?—I do not think so.

1962. Do you think that men would be likely to try and use these new signals, or would regard these new signals as an encouragement to go ahead in a fog?—Yes; I think very likely they would.

1963. They would be very wrong, would not they, if they did?—Yes; I should think so.

1964. Then why do you think they would be led to do that?—I should think they would take it that they were permitted to do it, and that it was intended that they should do it.

1965. You mean notwithstanding they were told in Article 16 that it was not so. It is not said so in terms, but in substance; they are warned in Article 16?—Yes, there is no doubt many of them in their anxiety to get on would do it.

1966. They do it now?—Then they do it with the one signal.

1967. Do you think the alteration of the rules would increase the desire to make a fast passage?—Yes, I think so.

1968. That is strange, is it not?—How do you think that mental operation would come about?—There is the signal to say: "I am stopped; you can crawl past me." A man would be tempted to do that under this rule, where he would not do it with the one blast. He might have 20 or 30 steamers round him. They would be making different signals; he would be confusing them as well as himself.

1969. The fact is that if he was a sensible man, hearing all these new sounds, he would probably stand still; stop his engines?—Yes. Then, therefore, why should we have a new sound; why should we be troubled to have to think about a new sound.

1970. That may be disagreeable to have (to think think about the sounds), but you do not think it would add to the danger?—I think it would.

1971. You think it would?—Yes, I think it would be taken as a signal to the other ship to come on.

1972. And that is the way you think it would add to the danger, because it would operate as an encouragement to a steam vessel to go ahead in a fog?—Yes.

1973. That is not so much the opinion of a nautical expert as of a man of good sense conjecturing what would happen?—I do not say I should do it myself.

1974. I am sure you would not. What do you say about these particular rules? Have you any criticism to make upon the particular rules; in the first place, about the siren?—The siren I object to.

1975. Under the rules now a siren can be used by a steam vessel, cannot it?—Yes.

1976. And is used?—And is used.

1977. I mean frequently used?—Yes.

1978. The last witness perhaps misunderstood me, or was mistaken, but it is the case that that is no change; the siren could now be used, and would be able to be used under the new rules?—Yes.

1979. Would you like to continue that?—Oh, no.

1980. I will take the other rules; are there any particular objections that you have to them, the new ones, I mean, "b," "e," "f," "g," "h," and "i"?—I do not see the necessity for "b."

1981. Is not that information that you would like to have if you could get it in a fog?—If there was only one other steamer within hearing it might be possibly a benefit.

1982. Do not you think it would be a good thing if there was only one steamer?—I think it might be in that case.

1983. It might be valuable to have that knowledge?—Yes, but not when cast among a crowd of steamers.

1984. I quite understand. You say if there was one steamer near you it would be valuable?—Yes.

1985. Or we might, perhaps, say even, if two steamers were near you, at all events, a small number?—It would depend on their position, then.

1986. What do you say about "e"; do you think that would be a good signal?—Not at all.

1987. You have studied what "e" is, have not you?—Yes.

1988. At present, I suppose the signal would be ringing the bell simply?—Yes.

1989. Now, is not it the case that the bell cannot be heard at a very great distance?—We can generally hear it far enough if it is a good bell.

1990. Do you mean in a fairway?—Yes.

1991. Supposing a steamer is navigating in a fairway, and going at a pretty good pace?—He has no business to be going at a very great pace amongst bells.

1992. He has not; still, if he was doing so, he would like to have information as soon as possible of a vessel anchored in a fairway, would not he?—I think the bell is quite sufficient. We come down the Elbe, where the tides run stronger than they do in the Thames, amongst the bells of steamers.

Chairman—continued.

1993. It would do you no harm, at all events, to hear the two sounds followed by the bell?—I think it would.

1994. What harm could it do you?—I might take it for a vessel making the signal that he was starboarding his helm.

1995. As a helm signal in fine weather?—As a helm signal.

1996. You have no right to use that in fogs, have you?—No; but sometimes it is done.

1997. Sometimes ships use the helm signals in a fog, do they?—Sometimes; not in crowded waters; they would not do it there.

1998. Those helm signals really are course indicating signals in fog, are not they?—They are only intended for fair weather, of course, and in narrow waters, where the vessels can see each other.

1999. In regard to the vessel towing: do not you think it would be very desirable to know that the vessel was towing?—I have never found any difficulty; but if I was towing another ship I fancy I should like to let others know.

2000. You would like to have that signal?—Yes.

2001. Would not you like to have that signal?—Yes; but I do not agree with the signal they give here.

2002. You do think you would like to have that signal?—I would like to have something more distinctive.

2003. "One prolonged blast followed by two short blasts"?—I do not think that is clear enough. I think we might have a difficulty in distinguishing that.

2004. At all events, in your view, a signal is a good thing for that situation, only you would prefer a more clear signal?—Yes.

2005. Now, "g," that is an optional signal: "You may feel your way past me." That is not compulsory at all?—No.

2006. Do you object to its being optional?—I do not see the use of it.

2007. Would it do any harm?—I think the two blasts are quite sufficient.

2008. Would it do any harm?—It might do harm; that is, amongst a crowd of ships it might do harm, or it might lead to harm.

2009. Now, "h;" that is a telegraph ship. I do not know that you have often met telegraph ships; some captains have told us that they have never seen one of them?—I have met them on three occasions.

2010. Laying telegraphs?—One was the same ship on two different passages.

2011. Then it would very seldom occur, would not it?—Very seldom.

2012. Do you think it would do any harm?—I do not see why they should have a different signal.

2013. You think it would be well, perhaps, to amalgamate that signal with one of the others, if you could?—Yes.

2014. It would be the same sort of thing as a vessel vessel at anchor in a fairway?—Or not under command.

2015. Or a vessel not under command?—Yes.

2016. So "i," the next one, is "a vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command"?—Yes.

2017. You think that ought to be amalgamated with the telegraph ship?—Yes, I do not see the difference.

2018. But otherwise you think it would be a good thing to have a signal to show that there was a vessel there not under command?—Yes.

2019. So that you do not altogether "curse" these rules; you "bless" them to a certain extent, do not you; there is some good in them, is not there?—I do not see any advantage in them. I am quite satisfied with what we have; I have always found them sufficient as they are.

2020. We are all apt to be satisfied with what we have been working with. Very well, captain, that is your opinion upon these rules?—Yes.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2021. You said that a siren is constantly used. The last witness told us that it is never used in a fog. Do you mean used in a fog, or only in fair weather?—I have frequently heard them in fog on these coasts and been deceived by them. When expecting to hear the Shipwash Lightship, I have heard a steamer's sound, and mistaken it for the Shipwash.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

2022. The Shipwash?—Yes; of course, we soon find out the error, but still these signals resemble those of the lightships.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2023. Does not the siren very often begin low and get loud, so that the captain of the ship who heard the low begin might think that he had made a long blast, whereas to you at a distance it would only sound as a short blast, because you had not heard the commencement of it?—I do not quite follow you.

2024. When they begin to make the sound on the siren, is it not very often at the commencement quite a low sound, gradually increasing in volume?—Yes.

2025. Might not the captain of the ship therefore, he being on the bridge of the ship, and hearing the sound at the commencement, think he had made the long blast, whereas, to you, at some little distance off, it would only sound as a short blast?—Yes; that is quite right. Even with the ordinary whistles in cold weather we frequently make a long blast with the first one; we cannot help it. It might sound short to someone else, but it has to be long to get the water out of the whistle.

2026. But a siren is more likely to do that than a steam whistle, is it not?—Yes; on account of commencing low.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

2027. May I take it that in your opinion there is a danger of confusing the siren horn of the steamship with the siren horn of the lighthouse or lightship?—Yes; I do not think sirens ought to be allowed to be used at sea at all.

2028. One other question: Do you know the innovation that we have had in some waters called the "whistling buoys"?—Yes.

2029. What is your opinion about those. Is there a danger of mistaking the whistling buoy for anything else?—No.

2030. That is a clear distinct sound that you cannot very well mistake for a steamer's horn or whistle?—No; that is more of a groan.

Admiral Field.

2031. About this siren, in answer to my friend on my left, you object to it because you told him it might be mistaken for the sound of a lighthouse or lightship?—Yes.

2032. But if you were approaching land you would also have your lead taking soundings?—Yes.

2033. You would know where you were?—No; you do not always know where you are, sir.

2034. You would know pretty well by your soundings whether you were somewhere near the lighthouse or lightship, would not you?—Oh, no. I am approaching the east coast, say; I might be seven or eight miles from the Shipwash, and I might be mistaken, hearing a steamer's siren, going in for the shore in the same way that I am going in, and think that it was the Shipwash Lightship.

2035. You do not think the soundings sufficiently guard against the siren used at sea being mistaken for the lighthouse sound or the lightship sound?—No; I do not mean to say you need keep the mistaking up long, because as you approached it you would find a distinction in the sounds; the lightships have more than one sound as a rule.

2036. Then you do not think very much of that protection?—No; I have been deceived by it at the first hearing of the sound.

2038. A vessel not at anchor in an ordinary anchoring ground and in a fairway somewhere off the land?—Yes.

2039. You do not think any other signal is necessary than the ordinary bell?—No.

2040. Is not that a very dangerous position for a vessel to be in, in the fairway?—Vessels are going very carefully if you are passing them at that time.

2041. May I ask you this: At present it is laid down that such a ship shall ring a bell, and that she shall also use the two long blasts as in signal "b" for a vessel stopped?—Yes.

2042. If the vessel is at anchor she is also stopped?—Yes.

2043. But she is powerless because at anchor; why, therefore, would you allow her to use the "b" signal as a vessel stopped showing that she is stopped, she being at anchor?—I consider the bell quite sufficient. I should prefer it to remain as it is.

2044. Would you compel a better bell. Some of the bells are very defective?—Yes; I passed a vessel one day that was ringing a crowbar.

Mr. Penrose FitzGerald.

2045. Do you know what his nationality was?—He was a Dutchman. He had one crowbar hanging up, and was striking it with another.

Admiral Field.

2046. Is not that rather an argument in favour of adding two long blasts?—No; with a good bell I should be quite satisfied.

2047. Looking down the list (I do not want to press you too much), the Chairman got from you most of the answers I wanted as to "g," "h," and "i," the three rules: "way off my vessel," "telegraph ship," "vessel not under command." Might all those three signals, in your opinion, be eliminated, as they could properly be placed under "b," "vessel stopped"?—Yes.

2048. Or you might put the telegraph ship under the towing signal "f"?—Yes; the telegraph ship would not be under command.

2049. You would rather have that blended with "f"?—No.

2050. At all events, you would eliminate these three signals if you had a free hand?—Yes.

2051. Suppose we cannot eliminate all. I want to get this from you: those are the most important in your opinion, "g," "h," and i"?—I do not see any necessity for "g."

2052. Nor "h"?—Nor "h."

2053. Nor "i," if you adopt "b"?—Yes.

2054. They might all be included under "b," you think?—Yes.

2056. Just so; but which do you prefer of the two?—The two blasts.

2057. We have had other captains who preferred the four?—I should prefer to use the four, as we do now, in the river.

2058. You cannot have one rule in one place, and one in another?—We already use the two as one signal in the river; therefore, I should like to keep the four blasts for when we were not under command, or if there was anything in the way so that we could not manœuvre.

2059. As you have already stated, you do not think "i" necessary; you think it might be blended with "b?"—In a fog you are speaking of?

2060. Yes; I mean in a fog, of course. All this is limited to fog?—Then I should prefer the four blasts.

2061. You would prefer the four of "i" to the two under "b"?—Yes.

Friday, 28*th June* 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Egerton Allen.
Sir George Baden-Powell.
Mr. Blake.
Marquess of Carmarthen.
Admiral Field.
Mr. Moorsom.
Sir Richard Webster.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain KARSLAKE, R.N., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2062. YOU are now, I think, in command of the "Duke of Wellington"?—Yes.

2063. Have you any statement with reference to the rules that you would wish to make, or would you rather prefer questions to be put to you?—I will make a statement if you like.

2064. If you make a statement it may shorten matters. I daresay you understand we have had a great deal of evidence on various points, and therefore in all probability if you make your statement the Committee will be able to see whether they would like to put any specific questions to you?—I am taking, of course, Article 15; that is the one I am giving evidence upon.

2065. Yes?—I think in the rule of the road at sea the rules should be as few and as simple as possible. You have to make them for all classes of people. I am inclined to think that these rules are rather too numerous. I will take them in succession. The first one "a": "a steam vessel having way upon her shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast." That is practically what is done now.

2066. Yes, that is the old rule?—Then comes the next one, "b," which is: "a steam vessel under way, but stopped and having no way upon her, shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them." That is a new rule, and I think it is a good one. The "sailing vessel," "c," is practically, I think, the same as at present; then "d," "a vessel when at anchor," is the same, but I think that "e" is a very good one. That is entirely a new rule: "a vessel, at anchor at sea, when not in ordinary anchorage ground, and when in such a position as to be an obstruction to vessels under way, shall sound, if a steam vessel, at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts with her whistle or siren, followed by ringing her bell; or if a sailing vessel, at intervals of not more than one minute, two blasts with her fog-horn, followed by ringing her bell." That is a very good rule; it is one I have carried out myself on many occasions when I have been in exposed anchorages. I do not think the bell is sufficient; I have used a siren or a whistle. I think any officer in command of a ship should do what he thinks best, and I have always done that; and, as I say, I think that is a good rule. With regard to the towing (letter "f"), I have no doubt that opinions will differ as to this, but I do not know why a man should want to steer so close to a ship's stern as to shave that ship, but at the same time I believe that, this being an international thing, there must be a certain amount of give-and-take, and I have no doubt there are countries which use towing more than we do; I see no harm in it. Perhaps, on the whole, it is a good rule; I think it is. I think that "g," "h," and "i" may all come under the head of "b"; I think that "b" governs all those; I have been at sea a great number of years, and I have never seen a telegraph ship at all; I mean at work.

Chairman—continued.

2067. Probably that is sufficient at present for your purposes; that is what you would desire to say?—Yes.

2069. I suppose you would agree that "b," showing that a vessel is stopped as distinguished from having way upon her, is of importance?—Yes.

2070. Do you think any difficulty would be found in distinguishing that signal, the two prolonged blasts under "b," or not?—Of course, at times there might be a difficulty in it; this rule appears to be drawn up as if you had only got one or two vessels in sight; we know that constantly (off headlands for instance) there are heaps of vessels.

2071. In your opinion, ought a boat to stop at once if it had a number of vessels round it whistling, whistling, and was not able to understand them?—It should go certainly under very easy steam.

2072. And if in doubt, stop?—And if in doubt, stop. I would prefer just to keep the ship going, I think, because you have in that way got more command over your ship.

2073. Some witnesses have suggested that there is an objection to using both the siren and the bell to indicate anchorage; I understand you to say you do not think there is any objection to that, and that you have yourself used it?—I have on many occasions. I was employed some years ago in the Newfoundland fisheries on the coast of Canada, where fogs are very prevalent. I have constantly anchored in an exposed place, and always kept the siren or whistle going.

2074. With regard to "f," which you have already spoken about, and which you say on the whole is good, I suppose it might be desirable under some circumstances to know whether a ship had got another in tow of her or not?—Yes.

2075. Do you think any confusion is likely to arise by one prolonged blast, followed by two short blasts or not. Can you suggest any other signal better than that?—No, I think that is good.

2077. But, if there was doubt and confusion, it would be the man's duty to act as though under "b," and to stop his ship?—Yes, and I have said from the first that I think "b" governs the whole of these.

2079. You do not think they would be objectionable as a whole, having regard to the importance of getting what I may call international concurrence?—Retaining these?

2080. Retaining "g," "h," and "i"?—No, I should obliterate "g," "h," and "i" altogether, because I think "b" governs them.

2081. One question more, please. Supposing we thought that it was necessary to keep "g," "h," and "i" in order to get the nations to concur, do you think the difficulties that might be caused by "g," "h," and "i" are so serious that we ought to sacrifice all the rules rather than let those stay in? Do I make my meaning clear?—Quite. I think I would prefer to see them abolished.

2082. You would prefer to have them out?—I would prefer to have them out.

2083. You would rather have no international concurrence in the rules than have them in? Supposing you were told that unless "g," "h," and "i" stand the rules must go overboard, what would you say to that?—I should think that it would be hardly likely that that would take place, would it?

2084. You think they are not of sufficient importance standing by themselves to wreck the rules?—No, I should think not.

2085. I want to ask you one question about "e." You said that you considered that a very good one where you ring your bell as well as blow your siren or whistle when brought up in the fairway?—Yes.

2086. Now do not you think there is great danger that the bell not sounding as far as the whistle, which, I believe, is the case, might lead to very great danger, and might very easily be mistaken. Not hearing the bell, and not understanding that you were brought up, the other vessel might think you were coming on; I mean the mixture of the bell and the whistle?—I think you would hear the bell.

2087. As far as you would hear the whistle?—No, not as far as you would hear the whistle; but then you would be approaching, of course, very cautiously, and the bell and the blast would be heard.

2088. Might not the whistle be very easily mistaken for a vessel coming on, and the bell not sounding so loudly, for a vessel that was brought up?—Yes, I think you might alter the number of blasts.

2089. How many would you make it then?—If you obliterated all these I think you might easily have, say, four or five, or shorter blasts. It says "prolonged blasts" here, you know. If you had them shorter blasts that might be better.

2090. Is not it very difficult to distinguish in a fog what is a long blast and what is a short one very often?—Oh, no, not very difficult. We make all our signals in the Navy by long and short blasts.

2091. Yes, but then you are dealing with trained men who are used to them?—Yes, I am aware of that.

2092. Of course you are going on the assumption (in which, if I may be permitted to say so, I quite agree with you) that "g," "h," and "i," should come out and be amalgamated with "b"?—Certainly, I am going upon that assumption. As I have said, I should like to see those proposed rules obliterated.

2094. In very crowded waters?—Yes, on one occasion I groped my way down from St. John's, Newfoundland, to the Buoy off Fairway, the entrance to Halifax, that was pretty crowded; I remained there two days, and I think there were a good many other vessels in the same position; we were all using whistles, I think, as well as bells.

2095. Taking it altogether, what you would recommend is that the rules should be cut down to as few as possible?—Yes, to as few as possible.

2096. And that "g," "h," and "i," should all be included under "b"?—Yes.

2097. You think that would be quite sufficient?—Quite sufficient.

Admiral Field.

2098. You have been led by my noble friend into saying that you would rather favour a change in the blasts for the vessels at anchor in a fairway under "e"?—Yes.

2099. You said that in answer to his question?—Yes, if it is considered at all dangerous. If you obliterated these other rules you might have four or five long blasts.

2100. That would be introducing a new element of discord and trouble; it would introduce a new signal. We are here really to see if we can get rid of any, not to introduce new ones?—Then I should retain it as it is; the danger would be very little. I should retain it certainly.

2101. A vessel towing; I am sorry I was a little late; I do not know whether you have been asked questions about that?—I would keep that.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2102. You spoke of the "e," the "e" being a signal by a whistle or foghorn followed by ringing the bell?—Yes.

2104. On the question of sirens, I want to ask you whether you think it possible to mistake the siren of a lightship or a lighthouse for the siren of a steamer in a fog. The proposal, I daresay you know, has been made that sirens should not be allowed on vessels, that they should be confined to lighthouses and lightships for fog signals?—A lighthouse siren is so very much more powerful than any steamer's siren I ever heard, that I do not think it likely.

2105. You think there is not very much in that?—No, I do not think so. I suppose the sirens we use in our big battle-ships are as powerful as any; in fact, in our ships generally.

2106. The idea being that a steamer should only use some form of foghorn or whistle and not a siren in fog, in order to avoid mistake. What do you say to that?—I do not think there would be any confusion, because the siren of a lighthouse, as regards any I have heard, is a different sound rather; it is more powerful.

2107. Following on that question, have you ever considered the problem of making all forms of bells of uniform force and power?—I have not considered it, but it would be a very good thing if it could be done.

2108. On steamers?—Yes.

2109. By Board of Trade regulations?—Yes; I have not previously considered that, but I think it a good point.

2111. There is only one other question I wish to refer to. It is rather important. With a view to international agreement, did I understand you to say that you wished "g," "h," and "i" incorporated in "b," but that if that would be a block on international agreement you would prefer to leave "g," "h," and "i"?—I am very much opposed to "g," "h," and "i;" very much indeed opposed to them.

2112. You are opposed to them?—Yes. It is a difficult point.

Chairman.

2113. What Sir George wants to know is whether you think it would be too heavy a price to pay for having an international agreement, to keep "g" "h" and "i"; we only want your answer, that is all?—I think it would be a very heavy price to pay for it. I think it would be rather dangerous to retain "g," "h," and "i."

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2114. I suppose you are aware that Germany strongly objects to them?—No. Does Germany strongly object to "g," "h," and "i"?

2115. Yes?—I was not aware of that, but I know that most people are very much against them.

2116. You think it would be positively dangerous to have those three, or that it might create danger?—Yes, I think it most probably would create danger.

Admiral Field.

2117. I want that to be brought out quite clearly; as regards the questions of the learned Chairman and my friend Sir George Powell, about international agreement, is it not your own opinion, as a naval officer of great experience in command of ships, that the first consideration of seamen is the safety of their ships and not international agreement?—Certainly; the safety of the ship is the first thing a man considers or should consider.

2119. Do not you think that many rash men might look upon that as an invitation to proceed, whereas under the old rules they would stop?—Yes, I think that is a danger as regards "g"; perhaps, if I might be allowed to correct myself, I would say that if any nation makes a point of "h," there is no harm in letting "h" remain; because, although I have been in command of ships for something like 15 years, I have never seen such a thing as a telegraph ship employed in picking up or laying cables; therefore, therefore, if I might correct my statement. I would say that "h" might remain, I think, if any nation made a strong point about it.

2120. Although it is useless for all practical purpose?—I think that "g" and "i" should not be retained.

Captain WAIT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2121. You are connected with the Union Steamship Company, I understand?—I am their marine superintendent; yes.

2122. How many years have you been with them?—Nearly 23 years.

2123. Have you been a master mariner yourself?—Yes.

2124. Navigating ships yourself?—Yes.

2125. How many years?—I was a master mariner about 17 years.

2126. In command of Union steamships?—Yes, and others.

2127. You have considered these new proposed regulations?—Yes, very closely.

2128. And I suppose you have had your attention directed to the proposed Article 15?—Yes.

2129. The Committee have had a very great deal of evidence, as you may very likely have been informed; will you kindly tell us as fully as you wish to state it, but still confining yourself to important points, what your objections are, if you have any objections to the proposed regulations?—With regard to Article 15?

2130. With regard to Article 15?—Well, I am clearly of opinion that there should be a stopping signal for ships that are stopped.

2132. Why, please?—I do not think, sir, that that signal is distinct enough for our marine. And touching the question of distinctness, there is a course indicator: "I am directing my course to port;" two short blasts. This is two long blasts for the stop. Now, many seamen would not be able to either blow that signal correctly in my opinion, or understand it correctly; and that to my mind is a great objection.

2133. Those course indicators are only used when vessels are in view, are they?—I should not like to say that.

2134. They are not fog signals?—I should not like to say that, sir.

2135. However, as far as the rule is concerned, they are not intended to be used during fog?—They are not intended to be used? No.

2136. Have you found any practical difficulty in distinguishing between prolonged blasts and short blasts?—Yes, I think I have.

2137. Under what circumstances?—Under varying circumstances of fog and distance; and no doubt in the way in which the signal has been blown.

2138. The Committee have had a good deal of evidence, you know. I should like to ask you, do you consider it is not fairly well understood now. Of course, I am assuming the circumstances under which it is given, of vessels being in view. Do you not think it is fairly well understood now that a ship is giving a short blast or a long blast?—No, I do not think so. I think in the minds of many they think they can blow their signal in fog as well as they can when the vessels are in sight.

2139. I want to ask you whether you consider that there is a practical difficulty in distinguishing between what is known as a long blast and a short blast. Is not the short blast a mere touch on the whistle, and a long blast a sound extending over two or three seconds?—Yes, if the long blast is properly blown, three or four or six seconds, and the short one is one second; there should not be any particular difficulty.

2140. What would you suggest, then, as a better stopping rule than "b?" Just look at "b," please. "Shall sound, at intervals of not more than two minutes, two prolonged blasts, with an interval of about one second between them." What would you suggest would be a better stopping rule than that?—I think three prolonged blasts would be better.

2141. Have you anything more to say about "b;" that is the stopping signal"—No, I think not.

2142. Now are there any of the others you wish to say anything to the Committee about?—I think these signals should be reduced.

2144. Out of command you mean?—Out of command; and one for a vessel at anchor.

2145. With regard to any of these cases, do you wish to say anything on the particular rule applicable; you have spoken about the one signal for a vessel stopped; the anchored one "e": do you wish to say anything about that?—I do not like a whistle and a bell.

2146. Why not?—I think, sometimes, you would hear the whistle, and you would not hear the bell. I think it would be mistaken under certain circumstances, for two ships.

2147. Do you equally object to the combination of fog horn and bell?—I do not like the fog horn and bell either. I think a properly constructed bell is the thing to ring for a vessel at anchor.

2148. You have dealt now then with "b" and "e"; "b" is the stopped one and "e" is anchored. Now, what do you say about the towing signal; have you any objection to that; one prolonged blast and no short ones?—Well, I do not like that combination of longs and shorts for towing.

2149. What would you suggest?—I think it would be better to have, we will say, two prolonged blasts for towing.

2150. If

2150. If you object to two prolonged blasts for a vessel stopped, how can you recommend two prolonged blasts for a vessel towing?—I think of the two evils it is a better signal than the long and the short.

2151. Then your idea is two prolonged blasts for towing and three prolonged blasts for stopped; is that it?—Yes. You must have a signal for towing, I believe; the thing is to have a simple signal.

2152. Now the out-of-command signal: there is no actual rule directed to that except "h" and "i"; "h" is the telegraph one which is not very important. You would rather have the three prolonged blasts for stopping; we follow that. What is your objection to "i;" that is the four short blasts for the vessel out of command?—Yes, I think that will do.

2153. Have you anything to say about the individual signals beyond what you have said?—Well, sir, I think "g" is a perfectly unnecessary and dangerous signal.

2154. "g," you say, is dangerous; that is the signal allowing other vessels to feel their way by?—Yes, and I think with regard to "h" that the wording is not good: "A vessel employed in laying or in picking up a telegraph cable shall, on hearing the fog signal of an approaching vessel" (I do not like those words), "sound in answer three prolonged blasts in succession." I will tell you why: There are many men I feel certain who would go along in fancied security; the fog is not particularly thick; at least they do not think so: they do not blow their own whistle, consequently the other man is in a kind of fool's paradise; if he sticks to the rule he does not blow his whistle because he does not hear the other ship blowing.

2155. You agree, do not you, that under any circumstances of doubt you ought to stop?—Yes, I think you should stop, but I am afraid that they do not do it.

2158. I want to ask you a question about your statement in answer to the learned Chairman. You say you prefer three long blasts in lieu of the two long, under signal "b," to indicate a vessel stopped?—Yes.

2159. The proposed towing signal is "one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts"?—I do not like the combination of the one long and two shorts.

2160. But you did go further than that; you said you would like two long blasts for towing?—Yes, I would prefer that.

2161. Is it not a more common thing to meet vessels that are stopped than to meet vessels that are towing?—Yes, that is so.

2163. So are the two, are they not?—Yes, but the very fact of so many vessels being stopped, in proportion to vessels towing, would lead me to the more distinct signal of the two.

2164. Will you not arrive at this unfortunate conclusion, if you push your argument to its legitimate end, that the greater the number of sounds the less confusion. I always thought that most mariners agreed that the fewer the number of sounds the better, and the simpler for the mariner?—Yes, that is so.

2165. I should have thought you would have been in favour of two prolonged blasts for the stopping vessel instead of three?—Yes; but there is one more reason which I have not yet advanced, that is, that the three blasts are proposed for, "My engines are going astern."

2166. The learned Chairman has told you you must not consider those in a fog?—I know that, but I am afraid that seamen do.

Captain W. R. CATO, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2167. YOU, I think, have commanded some of the telegraph ships?—Yes.

2168. For how long?—Twenty-six years.

2169. For what company?—The Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company.

2170. They have laid cables in all parts of the world, have they not?—Everywhere.

2171. You have commanded a vessel, both ocean-going and in the home waters, I suppose?—Yes, everywhere.

2172. Then you can tell us a good deal about that business. You have had the advantage of hearing Captain Karslake and Captain Wait; the Committee do not want to have the whole ground gone over again, but so far as you think it necessary, if you will tell us anything you wish to say with regard to this Article 15, we shall be glad?—I should like a special signal for telegraph ships. That is what I am specially here for.

Chairman—continued.

2173. You would like "h" then?—Yes.

2174. Do you like "h" or not?—Provided you abolish the two previous ones "f" and "g."

2175. In the first place, state it in your own way. What signal would you like for telegraph ships?—If they were all to be regulated as they are now, I should like a signal of five.

2176. Five blasts?—Yes.

2177. Follow me; take "h": Would you like it to read in this way: "A vessel employed in laying or in picking up a telegraph cable shall, on hearing the fog-signal of an approaching vessel, sound, in answer, five prolonged blasts"?—Five prolonged blasts.

2179. I have something to do with these matters; do not you think that counting five blasts would be introducing an unnecessary difficulty with some of the small ship people who have got to listen to these signals?—I would use the five blasts only when I heard another whistle. At other times I would use the ordinary whistle, just the one blast every two minutes. If I heard another whistle in near proximity to me I would use the five.

2180. You see the longer your signal continues, assuming there are other vessels in proximity to you, the more likely is it not to get mixed up with the signals of other vessels?—Yes, I am aware of that.

2181. However, you say you would like a separate signal for telegraph ships, and you would like five short blasts?—If you please.

2182. Rather than three long blasts?—Rather than three prolonged blasts, provided you abolish the other two.

2183. Do you wish to have five long blasts, or five short?—Oh, five short.

2184. Have you found any difficulty in distinguishing between the short blast and the long blast under the existing rules?—Well, I cannot say I have; amongst ourselves we talk that way you know; we signal to each other by the Morse Code.

2186. And a long one is a blast prolonged for some seconds?—Yes, that is a prolonged one.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2187. When you say: "We talk amongst ourselves in that way," who is the "we"; do you mean only ships of your own company?—The telegraph ships.

2188. You would not find the ordinary merchant ship and "tramp" that is going about the seas sufficiently up in the Morse Alphabet to talk to you?—No, not at all; we never try such a thing.

Admiral Field.

2189. You have not told the Chairman whether you want to eliminate any of these signals; you have only told us you are very anxious to have a telegraph ship signal. Have you looked over the whole of these rules?—Yes, I do not like (f) and (g); I would like those omitted. Then I would take (h) for the telegraph ship.

2190. Are there any of the other signals you object to?—I do not like the whistle and bell; I would abolish the whistle and make the bell sufficient for everyone.

2191. You do not want extra protection for a vessel at anchor?—No, I would have a good bell.

2192. What do you say about the (b) signal?—I would leave that alone.

2193. You like that?—Yes.

2194. Have you ever been in danger of collision when laying telegraph cables; if you have do not you require a fog signal to protect you from such danger?—I have been in very great danger when lying out on the Banks of Newfoundland and out in the Atlantic; but I have never had a collision.

2195. Have you ever felt the necessity of a protecting signal?—No, nothing more than ordinary. If there is a vessel coming towards us we keep the whistle going constantly all the time.

2196. The short blasts?—Yes, we keep the whistle going the whole time until we get clear of her.

2197. You find that enough?—Yes.

2198. If you find that sufficient do you wish to insist on a signal for telegraph ships?—Yes; we have vessels at work in the Channel on cables in narrow waters.

2199. If we have the signal we cannot limit it to any particular place; you have admitted that you find the ordinary signal sufficient protection?—It was a long blowing; it was continuous.

2200. I will take your answer; you know the opinion of your brother seamen; they are anxious to get rid of it?—Yes.

2201. You do not share that view?—No.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2202. I should like to ask just two questions. One is: when you are in a fog attached to a cable, that is to say, attached to the bottom so to speak, what signal do you use on your ships?—Nothing more than, as I tell you, the prolonged blast, if we hear another whistle.

2203. Do you use any signal if you do not hear any other signal?—We use the ordinary signal every two minutes.

2204. As if under way?—As if under way.

2205. You do not ring a bell?—No.

2206. When attached to a cable you blow the whistle as if under way?—As if under way.

2207. In your own experience have you had any vessels come near you?—Yes, that is the unfortunate part of it. Our signals were very much resembling those of a vessel broken down in daylight.

2208. What do you consider the signal of the vessel broken down; I mean fog signals, by sound?—There are four short blasts.

2209. I understand when you are attached to a cable in a fog, you blow a series of prolonged blasts blasts?—Yes, if I hear another ship's signal, but if not, one blast every two minutes.

2210. That is practically the same signal as for a vessel under way?—Yes, the same; it does not make any difference in that way up to the present time.

2211. Do you think you have ever had vessels dangerously near you?—Well, it is dangerous to come near, even within half-a-mile of us, because we may have a cable suspended to a buoy, say, in the Atlantic, and we may have the end of it on board half-a-mile from that buoy.

2212. In that sense you are attached to the bottom by the cable?—Yes, through the buoy.

2213. But you are making the signal as if you were under way?—Yes.

2214. At present?—At present.

2215. You would like to alter that?—I should like to alter that, and make five blasts of it.

2216. One more question about long and short. You speak to your other ships by means of long and short blasts?—Yes.

2217. Do you consider for that reason that the long and short should not be introduced as plain fog signals?—I think they would not be correctly done; I am afraid so; I think they would not be accurately carried out.

2218. Do you think they would be mistaken for the ordinary Morse Alphabet signals?—Yes.

2219. I daresay you know that the long and short proposed in these rules have special significations under the Morse Alphabet as well?—Yes.

2220. They might be mistaken for those?—They might be; I have not gone into that.

2221. You have habitually used the Morse Alphabets, the same blasts?—Habitually; we often go in pairs on an expedition.

Captain MCKIRDY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2222. I THINK you are connected with the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company?—Yes.

2223. How long have you been connected with it?—Eleven years.

2224. What are you now, superintending or master mariner?—Marine superintendent at present.

2225. Were you yourself previously a master mariner?—Yes, for 10 years.

2226. In command of steam ships?—In command of steam ships.

2227. How many years?—Over 10 years.

2228. The Committee have had a good deal of evidence, but we, of course, wish to hear anything you think of importance. Will you kindly tell us, taking them by the letters, if you can, or if it is convenient to you, what you wish to say about these various rules?—I have a distinct objection to multiplying sound signals at sea.

2229. The numbers of them?—Yes.

2230. On the ground of the difficulty of locating the position of the vessel from which the signal comes?—Yes.

2231. I should like just to ask you there, do not you think any captain of experience hearing more than one or two fog signals round him would stop immediately?—I do not think he should; his duty is to get out of the fog.

2232. Do you confine that to cases where you cannot anchor, or do you also include cases in which you can anchor?—I should be inclined to put it to all cases.

Chairman—continued.

Let them anchor if they think it judicious to anchor; let them anchor and ring the bell.

2234. Have you anything to say about (b), which is the signal for a vessel stopped, two prolonged blasts; do you object to that?—Yes; I object to (b), because (b), (g), and (f) are all three signals which might be taken advantage of by a steamer to the prejudice of another one.

2235. Just take (b) by itself, if you please; do you think there should be a signal that a vessel is stopped or not?—I think not. We could get on without it.

2236. It is not necessary at all, you think?—It is not necessary. I wish to confine the signals as close as I can to what they are at present.

2237. If it were thought desirable to have a signal to indicate that a vessel is stopped, do you object to two prolonged blasts?—My object all through is not to multiply the signals or to have more than we have at present; I have the same objection to (b) that I have to (g) and (f); there is the objection that each of the three may be taken advantage of by a man who is in a critical position.

2238. You have told us that, and I think we understand it; but what we do wish to know is this: if there is to be a signal indicating that a vessel is stopped, do you object to two prolonged blasts?—I should rather not have the signal at all.

2240. You prefer the bell only?—Yes.

2242. The towing signal; do you agree that there ought to be a signal to indicate that a vessel has got another in tow or not, that is (f)?—The towing signal is the only one in the lot that I have any sympathy with; but whether I should go to the length of saying "construct another signal for towing," is doubtful.

2243. But just tell us: Assuming that you thought there ought to be a towing signal, do you object to the one prolonged blast and the two short blasts?—No; I have no special objection if there is to be a distinctive signal for the purpose.

2244. Have you found any difficulty in practice in recognising the distinction between long blasts and short blasts under the existing rules?—I have not heard them used "under the existing rules."

2245. I am speaking of the optional signals. Were the optional signals not in use when you were at sea?—The sight signals?

2246. Yes. Have you found any difficulty in distinguishing whether a vessel was blowing a long blast or a short blast in those signals?—I do not know that I have: One short blast for "I am directing my course to starboard"; two short blasts for "I am directing my course to port," and three short blasts for "my engines are going full speed astern."

2247. Those are all short blasts?—Those are all moderately short blasts.

2248. Have you ever had any difficulty in distinguishing whether the vessel was giving a short blast or a long blast?—There may be some difficulty in distinguishing short blasts from long owing to water accumulating in the whistle pipe.

2249. I am speaking of the distinction between blasts?—No, certainly not.

2250. You have experienced no difficulty?—No.

2251. Do you wish to say anything about (g), the optional rule: "A steam vessel wishing to indicate to another 'The way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me' may sound three blasts in succession, viz.: short, long, short, with intervals of about one second between them"?—That (g) is one of three signals which might be taken advantage of by a nervous man when he wished to shield himself from blame, and throw the responsibility on the other ship.

2252. You object to it?—I do, distinctly.

2253. (h) the telegraph ship rule, do you think that is of importance?—Well, as to the telegraph ship, I had the curiosity to compare notes with some men who had pretty well as much experience as myself at sea, and really a telegraph ship laying cable was a thing neither of us had ever seen; it is a very very rare thing.

2255. Do you object to three prolonged blasts if the signal is to be given or not?—It would be a matter of indifference if you decided on having a signal for the purpose, whether it was three or five.

2256. Now, the last one: "A vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel, through being not under command, or unable to manœuvre as required by these rules shall, on hearing the fog-signal of an approaching vessel, sound, in answer, four short blasts in succession." Do you object to that?—That I have all through grouped together with the other two, with (b) and (g); it is one of the signals that may be taken advantage of for a purpose.

2257. Is there anything else you wish to say?—I wish to draw attention to the word "efficient."

2258. Where is that; do you mean at the beginning of Article 15?—Yes; that, in my opinion, contributes a great deal to the trouble.

2259. "A steam vessel shall be provided with an efficient whistle or siren"?—Or provided with an efficient bell and an efficient fog-horn. These things, as a rule, are not supervised as they ought to be supervised; if properly constructed they would be of more service than they are at present. It is an elastic term that is used.

2260. You think it wants more definition?—It does distinctly want more definition.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2261. You said the one rule you were in sympathy with was the one for towing?—Yes.

2262. Do you approve of the particular form of this rule as it is here?—The short blasts?

2263. I do not mean the sound so much. I will point out what I mean: "A vessel towed may give this signal, and she shall not give any other." "May give this signal"; Do not you think that is very likely to lead to mistake. Suppose the vessel towing and the vessel towed gave that signal, might not that lead to the belief that there were two vessels towing ships?—Certainly, it might carry that construction with it.

2266. You say you are in sympathy with the rule?—I am in sympathy with it, but I cannot say that I have sufficiently made up my mind or looked at the thing as I should like to do. I would be inclined to think that if anything was to be done in these rules at all, if that one were taken and debated by a competent commission I should be inclined to abide by the result whatever it might be. To that extent it has my sympathy.

2268. Yet you are in favour of the vessel, when towing, giving a distinctive signal?—We have got along well, I think, without it in the past, and shall in the future if left alone. If our whistles and bells are supervised a bit, and our speed defined, I think we can get along perfectly well.

Admiral Field.

2269. As you have sympathy with the towing signal "f" it may assist you to come to an affirmative conclusion when you are told that the United States will not part with it. Would that change your opinion; would that have some influence on your mind?—I do not think it would.

Chairman.

2270. Admiral Field suggests that you should consider that for a moment?—I have considered it throughout. It is a matter of deep moment to us, because a steam-tug with her tow are a very awkward couple to come across, awkward to themselves, and awkward to other people to keep out of their way.

Admiral Field.

2271. I wanted to get an absolute approval from you. However, I will give that up. You have told the Chairman and others that which rather exercises my mind, to put it mildly, that is, that you do not want a signal for a vessel stopped; you do not want it at all, I understand you to say?—No, I do not want any of these three signals which may be made use of for a purpose.

2272. I have got your answer, but I want to press you a little on the point. Surely, as an experienced mariner, if you had vessels near you in a fog, would not it be an advantage to you, and would it not give you more confidence in handling your own ship, if you knew that a neighbouring vessel was absolutely stopped. Would you not desire to know that if it could be conveyed to you?—I would rather be without the means of giving that information.

2273. Rather be without the knowledge?—

Yes; if I knew that he was stopped I should probably stop.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2274. Let me ask you this, merely on the question of the bell being heard: I think I understand you to say that it is essential that the instruments that make the signals should be efficient?—Yes.

2275. Have you ever considered the question of the possibility of making them uniform in power, that is to say that every vessel should have a fog-horn, and bell, more or less of uniform power?—I should be very delighted indeed to see such a rule as that brought into force.

2276. Do you think it would add very much to the expense of outfit?—No, it certainly would not.

2277. Only one other question; I believe the fog-horn itself and the fog-whistle of steamers is sometimes abaft; at all events, one of the funnels, and sometimes in front of the funnel; do you think that would make a difference in judging of the sound as regards whether it was behind or in front of you?—Yes, I think it would.

2278. Do you think any good end would be served by a regulation which would place the whistle or signal by steam either before or abaft the funnel always?—I see no reason why the whistle should not be removed from the funnel altogether. Why it was put there I do not know. It has been placed like the waste-pipe beside the funnel, and there it has remained.

2279. I suppose it should be sufficiently near to the officer on the bridge to be under his control?—Yes; as near as possible.

2280. Would the same considerations apply in the case of a vessel with two funnels as in the case of a vessel with one?—As a rule the funnels are so widely spaced apart that I do not think the other funnel would interfere with it.

2281. Then you think there is something in the suggestion which has been made?—I do not think there is very much in it; for instance, in the "Teutonic" and the "Majestic" the funnels are 100 feet apart.

Captain James Smith, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2282. You are with Gray, Dawes, and Company, I think?—Yes.

2283. You have been in command of steamships?—Yes.

2284. How long?—Nearly 18 years.

2285. What sort of voyages have you made; ocean voyages?—Ocean voyages.

2286. You have heard, I daresay, what has been said by some of the gentlemen to-day; tell us in your own way, do you you object to these rules as a whole, or to any of them in particular?—I am rather in favour of them.

2287. Which ones do you object to?—I do not object to any of them in Article 15.

2288. You think there would be no difficulty about the two prolonged blasts for a vessel stopped?—I think a signal of that sort is required.

Chairman—continued.

2289. You think it desirable to have a means of telling another ship that you are stopped?—Yes.

2290. Do you think there is any difficulty about two prolonged blasts being readily understood and recognised?—I do not see any difficulty whatever.

2291. Now, about the anchorage one "e," the mixture of the bell and the whistle, and the bell and the fog-horn, in case of a sailing ship; what do you say to that?—I think that is all right.

2292. It has been suggested by some witnesses that you might hear the whistle further than the bell?—So you would.

2293. You do not feel any difficulty about that?—No.

2294. Why not?—Because the two blasts you would hear indicate that the vessel is stopped in any case.

Chairman—continued.

2295. That is a good point; your two prolonged blasts would indicate a stopped vessel, and the two blasts, followed by the ringing of the bell, would indicate a stopped vessel?—The two prolonged blasts would mean a vessel that was stopped; and when she rang her bell it would mean that she had let go her anchor.

2296. That applies to steam vessels; I am not aware that it applies to sailing vessels, though I do not know that that takes away the strength of your answer; the two blasts with the fog-horn, followed by the ringing of the bell, would mean a sailing vessel stopped; I am not saying that you are not right; I only call your attention to that?—I should like to hear that question again.

2297. In the case of a sailing vessel the two blasts with her fog-horn would not indicate that she was stopped, would it?—No; she would give two short blasts when under way on the port tack. When the sailing vessel is at anchor she gives two long blasts, and rings her bell. I think that it is desirable to state in Article 15 the length of a short blast as well as the length of a prolonged blast, also the duration of the interval between successive blasts.

2300. Do you object to the one prolonged and the two short blasts, or not?—I think it is a very good signal.

2301. The noble Lord on my right, Lord Carmarthen, suggested, and it is worthy of consideration, that if the towed vessel should also give a signal it might be misleading; what do you say to that?—A vessel being towed would give it with her fog-horn, and the towing steamer with her whistle or siren.

2302. It might be a steamer that is being towed as well as the steamer you are referring to?—Yes.

2303. Just consider: supposing you have got two steamers, one towing another, what is suggested is that the signal should only be given by one of the ships, the vessel that is towing, we will say; what do you say to that; the latter part, you see, is the part you should look at, "a vessel towed may give this signal"; perhaps you have not considered that?—Well, if the vessel towed would sound it on the fog-horn I think it would do. The steamers have fog-horns as well as whistles.

2304. What do you say to "g"; a great deal of objection has been taken to "g," three blasts in succession: "The way is off my vessel, you may feel your way past me"; you do not object to that?—I do not object to that.

2305. Why not. What do you say about it?—There are some in a fog who do not care about going on, and if they do not care to go on they sound that signal; then the others can go past.

2306. Do not you think that, to some mariners who are not very careful, it might be an inducement to navigate in a fog, or that it might be an encouragement to navigate in a fog if they heard that signal?—No.

2307. The fact of the rule being there, saying that under some circumstances they were allowed to feel their way past another ship; do not you think that would rather be a sort of inducement to proceed, the statement that you were allowed to navigate in a fog. You do not feel that?—No, we would use our own judgment in any case.

Chairman—continued.

2308. You do not think it would mislead?—No, I do not think so.

2309. The telegraph signal: do you object to that?—I do not object to that.

2310. Then as to the one for when the vessel is out of command, four short blasts?—I think that is necessary. We have it now on the Thames.

2311. You think that these signals would not increase danger?—I think they would be an advantage; I do not think they would increase danger at all.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2312. In regard to this question of a vessel being towed, as the rule stands at present it is that she "may give this signal." You have admitted that if she might give the signal and did give it, it would lead to confusion if both she and the vessel towing her gave it on the whistle?—If they were both steamers and they both sounded whistles.

2313. And you have given us the suggestion that the vessel towed should do it with her fog-horn?—With her fog-horn, yes. I think that would get over the difficulty.

2314. The signal she would give would be one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts?—Yes.

2315. Might not that very easily be mistaken for another sailing vessel in the neighbourhood coming on with the wind abaft the beam; she would give three blasts?—There is the difference in the length of the blasts.

2316. But is not that signal, when given by inexperienced men, fishing vessels and that kind of thing, extremely difficult to distinguish?—I think they would signal as well as anybody else.

2317. You do?—Yes.

2318. And you think the "tramps" coming round the coast, or anywhere, would be equally able to understand that as well as men that had great experience?—Just as well. I know they would. I live at Gravesend, and you hear them there (tramps and colliers) every night whistling all sorts of signals for their pilots, short and long blasts of all kinds. They do it as clearly as possible.

2319. There are many cases (in most cases, no doubt) in which they would be clear and distinct; but it is just in exceptional cases, when in a thick fog, that a signal like that might lead to a great disaster. You do not agree, then, that the greater the number of rules the more difficulty will arise?—There are so very few rules that I do not think that that would be a source of danger at all.

2320. Do you or do you not agree with those witnesses who have recommended "g," "h," and "i" being amalgamated under "b"?—I am in favour of the addition. My opinion is that they are all right.

2321. Take "g" for one moment, and compare it with "b": "(b)" is "a steam vessel under way, but stopped" (I will not read it it all through), and "(g)" is "A steam vessel wishing to indicate to another 'The way is off my vessel; you may feel your way past me.'" There is very little difference there, is there not?—There is very little difference there.

2322. Why could you not amalgamate those?—Those two might be amalgamated; I thought of that myself at first.

2323. Now we will take "(h)" and "(i)." "(H)" is "A vessel employed in laying or in picking up a telegraph cable"; "(i)" "A vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command, or unable to manœuvre as required by these rules." Surely a telegraph vessel, and one under way, not able to manœuvre, are in exactly the same position, are they not?—They seem very much the same.

2324. Then you would not be strongly opposed to amalgamating "(h)" and "(i)"?—If "(h)" were sounded, you would know exactly what it meant; the other steamer would know that it was a telegraph ship.

2325. But for all practical purposes of navigation, the fact of knowing that it was a telegraph ship would not make it any different to knowing that it was a ship unable to get out of your way?—No. If "(i)" were sounded, it would let you know that there was no possibility of her being under command. In the case of a telegraph ship, all she has got to do is to let go her cable, and then she would be all right.

Chairman.

2326. Do you mean let go the cable of her own anchor?—No; let go her telegraph cable.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2327. She would not do that would, she?—Yes, rather than be run down, I should think.

Admiral Field.

2328. As a seaman would you not have some sympathy with the feelings of your brother seamen who are opposed to a great number of these signals; do you think there is no ground for their feeling alarmed at such a number of signals being put on paper for the first time?—I know that it is the general feeling among seamen.

2329. They are strongly against it?—Yes.

2330. You have admitted just now, in answer to Lord Carmarthen, that "(g)" might go under "(b)"?—Yes.

2331. That is a great thing gained. Now how about the telegraph ship; have you ever met a telegraph ship?—Yes, I have.

2332. In a fog?—No, not in a fog. I may have met one, but I did not know that it was a telegraph ship.

2333. You said just now that if these three long blasts were retained the approaching vessel would know that it was a telegraph ship?—Yes.

2334. Does it matter much whether she does or does not know that it is a telegraph ship. You would not care; your curiosity would not be so raised as to want to know whether it was a telegraph ship or not, so long as you knew whether she was stopped or not?—As Captain Cato mentioned, if she was a telegraph ship it would be my duty to keep at a good safe distance from her in case she had buoys attached.

Chairman.

2335. The duty of the telegraph ship, you mean?—The duty of the other ship to keep a good distance from the telegraph ship in case she had telegraph buoys about in her vicinity.

Admiral Field.

2336. You would also endeavour to keep a considerable distance off any vessel that you knew was stopped?—You need not keep quite so far. If you knew that the other vessel was stopped with nothing in her vicinity, you could go on.

2337. You quoted the telegraph captain just now, but did you also hear him state that he had never felt the necessity of any further protection than the ordinary fog signal of "way off." Is not that rather strong evidence against retaining it or including it under rule "(b)"?—I thought he was in favour of a signal for telegraph ships.

2339. He stated so in answer to me; do you think it important to retain that when it adds to the number of signals?—If you admit that "(g)" might go under "(b)", will you not admit that "(h)" might go under "(b)" also. If you had a free hand, would you not put it there; or would you insist on keeping it where it is?—I would not insist on keeping it; but if it remained, I do not see that any harm would arise from it.

2340. As to "(i)"; did I understand you to admit to Lord Carmarthen that that might be included under "(b)"?—No.

2341. You want to keep "(i)" do you?—I think so.

2342. Although it causes four extra blasts to be added to the number?—Yes. "(B)" is a vessel stopped when she is under command.

2343. Yes, I know that that is so?—In "(i)" she may have something wrong with her rudder or with one of her engines.

2344. If that were so, would you be able to render her much assistance in a fog?—I think it is possible.

2345. I ask you generally, do you think it desirable to diminish the number of fog signals as a whole, to bring them down to the lowest point, in the interests of the seamen who have to navigate their ships, or do you think it does not matter how many there are?—I should say that we could do with a few more than we have at present.

2346. A few more than the existing ones?—Yes, more than the existing ones; and I do not think that there are too many by Article 15, as proposed.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2347. Merely a question on these signals; there are three of them indicating vessels under way, but with no steerage way upon them (I will put it in that way). You think it necessary to have those three distinctions in "b," "g," and "i"?—Well, if they remained, I do not see that any danger would arise.

2348. But you think it necessary to have a distinction between those?—"B" and "g," I think, might be amalgamated as I have said.

2349. You think that "i" is necessary?—I think so, yes.

2350. You think it would not be sufficient simply to make the signal on your vessel that she is under way; that is to say, that she is not at anchor, yet, nevertheless, she has no steerage way upon her?—You would get more information by having the "i."

2351. You think it is desirable, in the interest of the safety of ships, to have the "i" as well as the "b"?—Yes; "i" as well as "b"; I think so.

Captain GEORGE C. CUNDY, Lieutenant, R.N.R., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2352. ARE you a master mariner?—Yes.

2353. How long have you been in command of ships?—Eighteen months. I have had my masters certificate for 10 years.

2354. You have been a master for 10 years; have you been sailing as first officer?—Yes.

2355. In Westray's ships?—I have been five years with Westray.

2356. And who were you with before?—I was 10 years with Tatham, Bromage & Co., of 9, Gracechurch-street.

2357. Where do Westray's ships go to?—Queensland.

2359. You would give her four sounds?—Yes.

2360. Four long ones or short ones?—Short ones.

2361. You told us just now that in your opinion a vessel which has stopped, and has not got way upon her, ought to make as much noise as possible; therefore you suggest four blasts; do you mean four prolonged blasts or four short blasts?—I should certainly say four short blasts.

2362. The next rule you wish to observe upon is, which?—"C." Of course that is very good; that is an old one. "D" is very good. I do not think there is anything more required in the case of any vessel at anchor.

2363. What do you say about "e"?—Well, I cannot speak in favour of that. I think it would only lead to confusion where a number of ships were, and it also might be mistaken for "a."

2364. Have you anything to say about "f"; that is the towing rule?—In my opinion I do not think there is anything necessary more than one blast; that is "a"; I think it is.

Chairman—continued.

2365. "G," three blasts, short, long, short; what do you say to that?—That is to advise another ship to pass you. I think that is a great mistake. I should certainly never advise another ship to pass me; she might run into me.

2366. As to "h," the telegraph one, what do you say?—Well there are so few telegraph boats about, it is so seldom I have seen one, that I do not think that at all important. I have been at sea 20 years, and I do not suppose I have seen five in my 20 years experience.

2367. If you heard a telegraph ship in a fog you could not tell that it was a telegraph ship?—I could not tell of course. The three blasts I should certainly adopt I think.

2368. "I," the "answer" signal, four short blasts, what do you say to that?—That is very good sir, that ought to be adopted instead of the long blasts.

2369. Unfortunately you see you have already taken up your four short blasts; however, you think it would do for the "not under command" ships to have four short blasts?—Yes.

2370. Is there anything else you wish to say?—Nothing.

Admiral Field.

2371. Your evidence means that you would get rid of "i," and you would get rid of "g"?—I would get rid of "g," certainly.

2372. And you get rid of "i," and you get rid of "f" I understand you blend "i" and "f" with "b"?—Yes, I would get rid of "i" and "f."

2373. Those two?—And I should get rid of "g."

2374. And you also say you would get rid of "f"; a vessel towing?—I would get rid of "f."

2375. If you were told that the United States would not give it up, would that alter your opinion?—Of course we having nothing to do with the United States.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2376. One question about "d," a vessel at anchor; do you consider the bell of itself sufficient?—I should think so.

2377. You would not prefer to have any form of blast?—Nothing whatever. I have been anchored anchored under Dungeness in a sailing ship a number of times, and steamers have been passing not very far from us and they have always heard our bells.

2378. Do you consider that a blast upon the fog-horn or steam whistle, used by a vessel at anchor, with the bell, might be mistaken for another vessel not at anchor close by?—Yes.

2379. You think there would be a danger in that?—I think so.

2380. You prefer the bell by itself?—The bell alone.

Captain J. G. GROOMBRIDGE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2381. Are you a master mariner?—Yes.

2382. How long have you been in command of ships?—Twenty odd years.

2383. You have heard Captain Curdy's evidence; do you wish to add anything to it?—No, I do not wish to add anything to it.

2384. Do you wish to say anything independently about the rules?—Yes, there are one or two things that I should like to speak about. In the first place, I should like to do away with the siren altogether and use the whistle alone for steamers, because, in many instances, the sailing ship's fog-horn is very similar to the siren in sound in a fog, and very often may be mistaken. I have mistaken it myself on two occasions; I have taken a vessel's fog-horn for a steamer's siren, and it might be just the other way about. I say the same also about the bell and the whistle in fog.

2385. The bell and whistle together?—The bell and whistle together.

2386. You object to that?—I object to that; I prefer the bell alone.

2387. The bell alone?—The bell alone for anchorage. And another thing, I should think that if a telegraph ship, or a ship stopped, rang her bell the same as a vessel at anchor it would be sufficient.

2388. How would you treat the telegraph ship?—Just the same as a vessel at anchor; especially in a fog.

2389. Of course, a telegraph ship is not under command?—A telegraph ship is not under command.

2390. Still, she has got way upon her?—It is very little; she is tied up, you know; she is not really under command; she cannot be without slipping her cable; and, supposing a steamer's machinery has broken down, in the same way, she would not be able to get out of the way. It would be a well-known fact that if the ship was not in anchorage ground there would be something wrong with her if she rung her bell, even if she was not at anchor.

2391. You would keep clear of her?—We would keep clear of her,

2392. Anything else?—No, I think the rules we have are quite sufficient.

Marquess of Carmarthen.

2393. About the siren: is not the length of the blast very much more likely to be mistaken on a siren than on a steam whistle; is not there very often too much steam generated?—It seems so. The sound seems to be prolonged more; you seem to hear it longer; it echoes, as it were.

2394. You think they might easily take long for short, and short for long?—I think so; you are apt to mix them up.

2395. More than you would with a steam whistle?—More than with a steam whistle. The blast with the steam whistle is done immediately.

2396. It is clearer and more decisive than on the siren?—It is clearer and more decisive.

Admiral Field.

2397. I understand you do not object to the "b" signal of two prolonged blasts for a vessel stopped?—I object to any sound (the less we have the better), except what we have already.

2398. Then I must press you on it?—We have at present our three sounds, one blast, two blasts, and three blasts; I think that is quite sufficient, with the whistle. I do not think we want anything more than that.

2399. If a vessel was stopped near you in a fog, would not you like to know the fact that she was stopped?—But, supposing half-a-dozen vessels are all blowing their whistles at the same time, how is it possible to tell?

2400. In case you cannot discern that a vessel is stopped, and the fact can be conveyed to you by a sound signal, would not you like to know it. Would it not give you more confidence in handling your own ship?—If he is stopped let him ring his bell; that will give us a very good idea that he is stopped.

2401. As to "e"; a vessel at anchor in a fair way; do not you think the vessel requires extra protection in that perilous position?—I think a good bell is sufficient. That has carried me through a good many years, and in very narrow waters.

Sir George Baden-Powell.

2402. I should like to ask you one question on the subject of the siren: you say the siren on the steamer, as opposed to the steam whistle, might be mistaken, or part of it, for the fog-horn of a sailing vessel?—Yes.

2403. Where has your experience been chiefly?—In the English Channel.

2404. Not in ocean voyages?—No; not ocean; coasting.

2405. Do you know the mouth of the Thames?—Yes.

2406. And the Harwich River?—I have never been to Harwich.

2407. Do you know whether any complaints have ever been made of mistaking the sirens of light vessels for the sirens of steamers?—No; it has not come under my knowledge; but I should certainly think that the sirens ought to be done away with in steamers altogether.

2408. As fog signals?—As fog signals, decidedly.

2409. You would rather have the one signal as you have it now?—Yes.

APPENDIX, No. 1.

PAPER handed in by Sir George Nares, 28 May 1895.

Present Attitude of Foreign Governments (May 1895).

In 1889 an International Conference at Washington recommended several alterations in the rule of the road at sea ; and the British Committee appointed to consider these recommendations advised, in January 1891, that they should be adopted with five amendments [c. 6293]. [c. 6869], pp. 7–17.

These five amendments were, however, not accepted by the Governments of all the maritime states represented at the Washington Conference, many of whom put forward proposals of their own. In the hope of securing a settlement the British Committee in 1892 [c. 6833] modified the amendments they had previously suggested, and the Washington Regulations in this slightly modified form (shown on pp. 147–158 of [c. 6869]) had been generally agreed to by foreign Powers by the end of 1893.

In December 1893 the British Committee, after again considering the whole question, confirmed their report of 1892 ; and the Board of Trade, after communicating with the Admiralty, wrote to the Foreign Office on 5th March 1894, suggesting that the several foreign Governments should be invited to definitely adopt the new regulations in this form, and to enforce them on and after the 1st March 1895. [c. 6869], p. 141.

The correspondence up to this point is contained in Parliamentary Paper [c. 6869], and that which followed has now been printed for the use of the Committee. [c. 6869], p. 144.

Early in April 1894 a Circular Despatch was sent to Her Majesty's Representatives for communication to the Governments of the following Powers :— No. 11 of proo

Argentine,	France,	Portugal,
Austria-Hungary,	Germany,	Roumania,
Brazil,	Greece,	Russia,
Bulgaria,	Guatemala,	Spain,
Chili,	Italy,	Sweden and Norway,
Colombia,	Mexico,	Turkey,
Denmark,	Netherlands,	United States,
Ecuador,	Peru,	Uruguay.

This Despatch suggested the definite adoption of the regulations as finally approved by Her Majesty's Government, and their enforcement from the 1st March 1895.

By December 1894 the Governments of

Belgium,	Russia,	Norway,
Portugal,	Austria-Hungary,	Sweden,
United States,	Spain,	Chili,
Denmark,	Greece,	Peru,
Italy,	Netherlands,

had definitely adopted the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, and were prepared to carry the rules into effect from the date suggested. France accepted the text of the rules, but stated that the date was still under consideration ; Germany accepted the date, but decided to make some slight modifications of the text (not affecting the question of sound signals), and Mexico and Egypt accepted the text without definitely specifying any date. Nos. 41 and 81 of proof.

The result was, that at the end of 1894 all the more important maritime Powers had agreed to sink minor differences, and had definitely accepted the text of the regulations proposed by Great Britain, and they were ready to enforce these regulations on and from 1st March 1895. But the replies from some of the foreign Governments had been so long delayed, that it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to adhere to that date and at the same time give sufficient notice to mariners of the impending change in the rules.

A postponement was therefore asked for, and was with some little difficulty obtained, but the re-opening of the question of sound signals has rendered this postponement indefinite. Germany, while deprecating delay, has taken advantage of the postponement to again put forward her objections to paragraphs e, g, and i of Article 15, and to Article 26 (rule of the road for sailing fishing boats), and the Netherlands have expressly reserved the right to propose further amendments to the regulations. No. 199 of proof. No. 212 of proof.

With these exceptions the accord amongst the important Powers is still complete, and it would appear that they are now waiting for Great Britain to fix the date on and from which the new rules are to come into operation.

APPENDIX, No. 2.

PAPER handed in by Mr. William Smith, 14 June 1895.

Dear Sir, Craven Hotel, Craven-street, London, 14 February 1895.

I WAS much pleased at having the honour of being present with the deputation of the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, the Steam Shipowners' Association of Liverpool, and numerous other associations of shipowners, shipmasters and underwriters, representing practically the mercantile marine of Great Britain, at the Board of Trade on the 5th instant, to protest against the proposed regulation as to sound signals in fog, and the Order in Council relating to the screening of side lights ; and I beg leave to state that I was there by invitation of Sir Donald Currie, who represented these interests, and who spoke for them on that occasion. I had some hesitation in accepting this invitation, being an officer of the Canadian Government and also a member of the Board of Trade Committee for the manning of merchant ships.

During my visit to this country I had occasion to be in Liverpool and other large ports in the United Kingdom, and came into contact with many persons interested in the great shipowning business of this country as well as of Canada ; and I did not fail to notice the grave dissatisfaction which existed in the minds of many in reference to the proposed alterations ; and during the three voyages made across the Atlantic since last June, and in the many interviews I had with practical navigators and shipowners connected with the Canadian trade, I have not heard anyone approve of the proposed changes, but on the contrary, have heard them condemned, more particularly with reference to the proposed sound signals, as too complicated for the memory, and if insisted upon, likely to lead to confusion and disaster.

Under these circumstances, I considered the matter too serious to admit of delay, as the interest of Canadian foreign-going shipping is much the same as that of the United Kingdom, and I therefore cabled to my chief, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is a member of the Canadian Cabinet, and he immediately replied to me by cable that I was authorised to accompany the deputation, and that was the reason why I was one of the deputation which waited on you on the 5th instant.

When I accompanied the deputation, I was well aware that the papers concerning the proposed changes had been referred by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Governor General of Canada, as well as the Governors of the other British Colonies and to the foreign powers, for their approval, and that the Government of Canada approved of them as satisfactory upwards of two years ago. I was not surprised when you suggested that it would be a little irregular for me to speak at that meeting, as I represented a Government department, but you said that you would be happy to hear my representations in private, and would give them the great weight which are their due ; and I avail myself of this opportunity of thanking you for your kindness, and will state in writing my views on the subject, instead of troubling you with a personal interview at a time like the present, when you are so much occupied with your public duties.

With reference to the approval of the proposed change by the Canadian Government, I may explain that when the papers in this case were received by the Marine Department, they were referred, as is usual in such cases, to the nautical adviser of the Department, who is a practical navigator, and who gave them consideration ; but, not being aware that the shipowners and shipmasters of Great Britain would take such strong ground against them, and seeing that they were approved by the Imperial Board of Trade, in whose judgment he has great faith, he recommended them for approval. If he had known that the shipping interests of Great Britain would object to them as they have done in such a determined manner, he might probably have hesitated before recommending them for approval : at all events, if I had been aware of the great dissatisfaction which they would give to the men who control in a great measure the carrying trade of the British Empire, I would myself have hesitated before I would have recommended them to my chief for approval.

With reference to the approval of these changes by the foreign Governments who attended by their representatives the Washington Conference, it is quite true that the Board of Trade took every precaution to ascertain their views and to obtain their consent to the proposed changes ; but the unfortunate part of the matter is that the shipping interests of Great Britain, and even some foreign Governments which had already given their consent, have discovered that they were objectionable, and, on account of their complication, might become dangerous in cases of emergency.

This is clearly a case where a great divergence of opinion exists between officialism and practical sea-going experience, the officers of the Board of Trade doing everything they could, as they thought, in the interests of shipping, while practical navigators and shipowners, who carry on the trade, differ in opinion from the Board as to what was best for them. Which of these two views should be taken in this controversy ? I feel sure that you will have no difficulty in coming to a fair conclusion as to which view you take of the matter if it were not that the Board of Trade had asked foreign Powers to consent to the adoption of these proposed changes before it was aware of the views of the shipping interests referred to ; and you may very naturally ask why the shipping interests did not make known their views on the subject to the Board of Trade before it had gone so far in the matter and had asked the foreign Powers to consent to this arrangement.

It would now appear that the Governments concerned acted in this matter on the advice of their officials, without making sure that they had the shipping interests with them, and it is quite true that the British Government could only obtain the views of foreign shipowners and shipmasters through their Governments. There was undoubtedly no other course open to obtain the views of foreign shipping interests, except through their respective Governments, and no reflection could be thrown on the Board of Trade for adopting this course ; but the shipping interests state they have since informed you of their objections to them during the last two years.

I was very glad to hear you mention, in your speech to the deputation on the 5th instant, that you would appoint a committee of experts to consider the question of the side-lights ; and it is to be hoped that a satisfactory conclusion may be arrived at between the Board of Trade and the shipowners, otherwise we shall continue to have an unseemly controversy.

Sir Donald Currie mentioned, in his forcible speech before yourself and the deputation on the 5th instant, that the Government of the Netherlands have stated that the proposed signals would present a real danger, and that their adoption is certain to cause deplorable confusion in much-frequented channels. He also stated that he had communications from practically all the German shipping interests protesting against the adoption of these new rules in the strongest manner, although their Government had a desire for an international uniformity.

I notice

I notice by the Liverpool "Journal of Commerce" of the 9th instant that recent newspapers received from New York show the proposed rules have raised a perfect storm of opposition from the shipping interests there, and that while the Government were urging the adoption of these rules, they could not have been aware that they had not the American shipowners with them, but that on the contrary they now denounce them in the most unmeasured terms. This newspaper quotes some of the headings in the American newspapers, to show the state of feeling in that country to be just as strong in opposition to them as it is in this country. They are as follows: "They prefer the old way"; "Prophesies of disaster"; "Fog signals are too complicated," and "Side-lights are placed in a "dangerous way"; "Seamen oppose the change"; "Skippers say the proposed new rules at sea would cause "confusion"; "Under such a system accidents would probably be greatly increased." The experienced captain of the steamer "Portland," running between that city and Boston, says, "The new fog signals are a complicated mess, "and will be fruitful of disasters—they should be entitled 'A Code to Effect Collisions at Sea.'" Another writer says the new-fangled fog signal code has slumbered for months, and no sailor or pilot believed the President would ever put his name to it. Another captain of one of the Fall River steamers, constantly navigating narrow waters, says: "I am unalterably opposed to the so-called new rules of the road at sea." Captain Herbert, an experienced captain of a wrecking company, says: "The fewer signals used in navigation the better." Many accidents are due to the fact that the present signals are not understood, and not from the fault of the rules, or captains, or officers, but oftener of the prevailing conditions. The Liverpool "Journal of Commerce" says the agitation in the States has grown so suddenly and strongly, that a Bill was introduced and passed in the House of Representatives on the 26th ultimo excluding vessels coming from or departing for the high seas, or domestic harbours, rivers or inland waters, from the operation of the revised international rules, and that if this is passed by the other House and approved by the President, it is evident that, in their own parlance, "the Americans have both scotched and killed "this obnoxious measure." This is strong language; but it shows that the Government of the United States, while adopting these new rules, was not carrying the shipowners with them, and that there is a prospect of the rules being repealed or modified by their Parliament.

A short time ago I had a letter from a New Brunswick captain who I have known intimately for many years as one of the ablest and most competent shipmasters belonging to Canada, although now commanding a large steel sailing ship of over 2,100 tons belonging to Liverpool, trading to the Pacific and the East Indies. He says in his letter to me: "With regard to the new fog signals and screening of lights I believe them to be bad in theory and "worse in practice; my first experience as a shipmaster began in 1859, and since then have never seen the dark lane, "though lately have done my best to find it; if there is one, it must be so infinitesimally small that it is not "perceptible to the eye, however slowly the ship may be altering her head, and this last is a constant factor. As "for the new fog signals, they have a great tendency to my mind to increase the risks of collision, and if enforced "see no other recourse for ships if the captains wish to prevent disaster, but to anchor where possible, or where this "is not possible stop the vessel's way altogether; I think it would be a more sensible proposal, that an entire stop "should be put to all traffic during fogs. How any man will be able to decide among the multiplicity of sounds "proposed is a puzzle to me. Perhaps some day we may have an Act of Parliament that will enable us to act "automatically. During all the years that the present rules have been in practice, they have been found to work "well; the whole mercantile marine are thoroughly ground in them, and any attempt to modify them may be "disastrous, particularly with officers whose perceptive faculties are not over bright."

I notice also that Captain McKay, Master of the Cunard steamer "Lucania," was at the great meeting of shipowners and shipmasters at Liverpool a short time ago and spoke strongly against the proposed change, and I feel sure you could not possibly get a higher authority in this country, or any other country, than the master of this great American Liner. A press dispatch cabled from London appeared recently in the "Montreal Gazette," one of the principal commercial papers in Canada, headed "Rules of the Road at Sea," announcing that the great meeting of shipowners had taken place, and that "it is believed it had driven the last nail in the coffin of the New Rules of "the Road at Sea, and in view of the enthusiastic unanimity of condemnation with which all interested seem to "view these proposed alterations, one is forced to wonder how on earth the Board of Trade ever entertained them "favourably. It is understood that Professor Bryce, who is now at the head of that department, sympathises with "the protests, and it is expected that he will definitely announce their abandonment." You will see, therefore, that the shipping interests of Canada, misled by this dispatch, will probably be looking forward to their withdrawal and may be taking no steps to make their wishes known either to the Government of this country or in Canada.

I have just received a letter from Messrs. T. Soley & Co., of Liverpool, who act as agents for the owners of a number of Canadian vessels, who say, with reference to the proposed rules, "anticipating the views of the owners "on the subject, we beg to protest against such proposed change as being both unnecessary and undesirable, and we "are writing to our correspondents, urging them to communicate direct with your department at Ottawa, and "request it officially to object to the new rules being put in force." The Allan Royal Mail Steamship Company, which has a large portion of the carrying trade between Great Britain and Canada is also entirely opposed to the change and wish to adhere to the present rules.

I much regret to differ from the views of your Board, but this is too important a matter to allow any personal feeling to stand in the way of a great public question, affecting the safety of the lives of many people, as stated by the practical navigators themselves.

I am well aware that it would be very unpleasant for the Board of Trade to recede from their present position and to explain to the Foreign Governments interested that, owing to the objections made by the shipowners and shipmasters of this country, and some other countries, the proposed rules would be abandoned for the present, but far better to do that than to force them on the mercantile marine of this country, which are so distasteful to them, and which they believe (rightly or wrongly) would be fraught with great danger. I respectfully beg leave to say, that I do not think the dignity and high status of the Board of Trade would be affected in any way by adopting such a course, and explaining to the Foreign Governments, through the proper channel, the reason of the withdrawal of these rules.

I need scarcely say that all laws, rules, regulations, and orders in council, are liable to change when necessity arises, and in this case the Board of Trade has enough evidence to convince it that, if enforced, these rules would be most distasteful to the shipping trade, and a constant source of annoyance and worry.

In 1876, when the Merchant Shipping Bill was under consideration, it passed the House of Commons here with some provisions which were very objectionable to the shipowners of Canada, and as I was then a delegate from the Canadian Government to the British Government on the subject, I explained to a number of Members of the House of Lords that the Bill as it passed the House of Commons, prohibited limited deck loads in winter, while the Canadian Act, approved by Her Majesty, allowed them, and with the assistance of the late Earl Carnarvon, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the late Earl of Shaftesbury, and some other Noble Lords, the Bill was changed in the House of Lords to agree with the Canadian Act, and finally passed the House of Commons, and is now the law of the land both in the United Kingdom and in Canada.

Another very objectionable provision in the Bill of 1876 referred to was a clause imposing severe punishment on a shipowner unless he could prove he had sent his ship to sea in a seaworthy condition. The shipowners of this country protested against it, and the shipowners of Canada, for whom I acted, also strongly protested against it, and upon the joint representation of Sir Donald Currie and myself, the objectionable clause was removed from the Bill in the House of Lords, and it was finally passed in the House of Commons as amended by the Lords, and is now the law of the land. I mention these cases to show that changes have sometimes been made in the shipping laws without the approval of the Board of Trade, and that as there is no finality in legislation, or rules and regulations, when a mistake has been made, as appears to be the case in the matter of the proposed rules of the road at sea, the best plan would be to remedy it before it goes any further rather than to force the rules on dissatisfied shipowners and shipmasters.

I do not fail to notice that the Governments of Egypt, Peru, Siam and Argentina, with certain other States represented at the Washington Conference, are of the same mind as the Board of Trade on this subject, but these countries can hardly be said to be important maritime powers ; indeed, I understand that the fleet of steamers in which my friend Sir Donald Currie is interested shows a larger aggregate tonnage than that possessed by the four powers referred to.

I think it is not advisable to press upon British or colonial shipowners and shipmasters at the present time an obnoxious rule, based on any argument that it was approved by a majority of the members of the Washington Conference, as some of these countries, such as Turkey, Portugal, and those I have named, are really not within the category of great maritime powers ; and, looking to the fact that Great Britain is the most important shipowning country in the world, I submit, for your favourable consideration, whether great weight should not be given to the views and wishes of the men who control this great industry in our own country, and who have the principal part of the carrying trade of the world ; I trust that upon reconsideration you may be able to come to a satisfactory decision, favourable to the representatives of British shipowners, and shipmasters upon whom rests the responsibility and safety of so many ships, and the lives of those who navigate them in every part of the globe.

I am, &c.
(signed) Wm. Smith,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada, and a Member of the Board of Trade Committee for the Manning of Merchant Ships.

The Right Hon. James Bryce, M.P.,
President of the Board of Trade.

A footnote in the Wreck Abstract states, includes 555 passengers lost in the ss. "Utopia," of Glasgow (run into at Gibraltar while at anchor).

APPENDIX, No. 4.

PAPER handed in by Mr. J. Fenwick Fenwick, 11 June 1895.

THE Board of Trade compiles Tables year by year under the name of—

1. Wreck Abstracts, dated from 1st July to 30th June of each year, and dealing with sea casualties, loss of life at sea and inquiries into casualties, besides other information.

2. Annual Return of Navigation and Shipping, dated from 1st January to 31st December in each year.

Combining the information given in these tables, I find under Loss of Life, Collisions, Home Trade only, Steam, the following Tables :—

(a.) The date of the year.

(b.) The total loss of life, sail, steam, sea casualties, home and foreign trade, crew and passengers.

(c.) Loss by collision only in the home trade, crew and passengers.

(d.) Total loss of life in the home trade, crew and passengers, steam only.

(e.) Number of vessels and tonnage in collisions in which there were loss of life, home trade, steam only.

(f.) Total vessels and tonnage entered at all ports in the United Kingdom, sail and steam, on repeated voyages.

(g.) Coasting trade only, included in the above.

The Table thus constructed for the years 1890-93 inclusive, is as follows :—

ANCHORAGE GROUND. Difficulty in connection with proposed signal E in defining ordinary anchorage ground, Colquitt 1917–1920.——See also Anchored Vessels.

Anchored Vessels. Sufficiency of the bell without blasts for a vessel at anchor (signal E), Webster 564. 623, 624; Duncan 685–690; Jobling 1148–1151; Ovenden 1547–1551; Taylor 1986–1995. 2037–2046; Wait 2145–2147; Cato 2190, 2191; Curdy 2376–2380; Groombridge 2384–2387. 2401.——See also Bell and Blasts.

Answering Signals. Explanation of Rules H and I, both of which are answering signals, proposed at the Washington Conference by Germany, and finally carried by the Conference, Sir G. S. Nares 242–249. 294.

B.

Bell and Blasts (Signal E). Evidence favourable to the bell without blasts, as regards signal E; Webster 564. 623, 624; Duncan 685–690; Jobling 1148–1151; Ovenden 1547–1551; Taylor 1986–1995. 2037–2046; Wait 2145–2147; Cato 2190, 2191; Curdy 2376–2380; Groombridge 2384–2387. 2401——Opinion that signal E might be eliminated, Duncan 696–698——Possibility that signal E might give rise to some confusion, Colomb 741, 742; Curdy 2363——Conclusion that the bell is a bad signal, Colomb 764——Attention called to signal E; possibility of the two blasts being mistaken for one, Tuke 1015–1024.

Desirability of an interval of one minute only between the blasts in signal A, Wade 1185, 1186——Necessity for an efficient bell for ships, ib. 1200–1203——Sufficiency of the bell for a vessel at anchor, provided she is not in a fairway, Cleary 1398–1417——Suggestion that four blasts should be the signal for a vessel that could not manœuvre, Ovenden 1567–1577——Disapproval of the use of blasts in addition to the bell for signal E, Morse 1659–1664——Advantage of bells of a uniform power, Burn 1774–1782; Karslake 2107–2110.

Preference given to the bell only, without the fog horn, M'Kirdy 2239–2241——Approval of the bell and blasts for signal E, Smith 2291–2298.

Board of Trade. Examination as to the communications of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association with the Board of Trade, with reference to the proposed new signals; opinion that sufficient attention was not paid to the shipping interests by that Department, Holland 1246. 1261–1289——Suggestion that the anxiety of the Board of Trade to secure an international agreement has led to the adoption of the new rules in spite of their unpopularity, W. Smith 1463.

only; opinion that B, E, G, and H should be eliminated, 1715–1723. 1729–1736. 1752, 1753. 1756–1769. 1790–1797.

Statement that it is customary to always use helm signals in a fog, 1724–1727, 1737–1739. 1754, 1755. 1783–1785——Opinion that foreign sailors disapprove of the new signals, 1770–1773——Desirability of making bells of a uniform power, 1774–1782——Danger of allowing steamships to use sirens, 1797–1801.

C.

Canada. Authorisation given witness by the Government of Canada to act on their behalf in regard to the rule of the road at sea and the question of new signals, Smith 1437–1450.

Letter from Mr. Smith to the President of the Board of Trade, dated 14th February 1895, containing explanations and suggestions in detail on various points, App. 126–128.

Captains (Mercantile Marine). Evidence showing that captains of the Mercantile Marine were represented on the Washington Conference and also on the Board of Trade Committee, Molyneux 353–355——Opinion that the practical navigators of the Merchant Service were not sufficiently represented at the various committees for considering the new rules, W. Smith 1462——Statement as to the incompetency of the men in command of steamers not carrying passengers, Colquitt 1843–1852. 1931.

Cato, Captain R. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has commanded ships for the Telegraph Construction Company for twenty-six years, 2167–2172.

Necessity for a special signal for telegraph ships; suggestion that it should be five short blasts, 2172-2183. 2194-2215——Practice of telegraph ships to signal to each other by the long and short blasts of the Morse Code, 2184–2188. 2216–2221——Undesirability of signals F and G, 2189——Opinion that the bell alone is sufficient for signal E, 2190, 2191——Approval of signal B, 2192, 2193.

Cleary, Captain John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is in command of a Clyde Steamships Company's steamer; has been twenty-six years at sea, 1292-1296. 1322-1330.

Opinion favourable to the proposed rules, 1297-1310——Recommendation that signals B, E, and I should be combined under the I signal, 1311–1316. 1331–1337. 1371–1378. 1418–1424——Advisability of retaining these three signals rather than risk the loss of international agreement, 1317–1321——Grounds for believing that signals F and G are necessary, 1338–1342. 1372. 1382–1384——Examination as to signal H, telegraph ships; probability that they need some distinguishing signal, 1343–1349.

Experience that sounds are only liable to be mistaken in fog when land intervenes, 1350–1370. 1385–1390——Necessity for steam whistles to be of a uniform size, 1379–1381——Statement that private signals are not used in fog, 1391–1397——Sufficiency of the bell for a vessel at anchor, provided she is not in a fairway, 1398–1417.

Colomb, Vice Admiral Philip Howard, R.N. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Opinion that the new signals, although not perfect, are an improvement and are not likely to cause harm, 721–734. 736–740. 745. 768——Improbability of men experiencing any great difficulty in learning the new signals, 735. 746. 770, 771——Redundancy of signal I, whilst signal E might give rise to some slight confusion, 741, 742.

Statement that not one single case of collision has been due to mistaken direction of sound in a fog, 743, 744. 749, 750——Advisability of passing the revised regulations rather than risk the International Agreement, 748. 751–755. 765–767——Opinion that signal I might be merged in signal B, 756——Discussion as to the expediency of blending signals H and F, 757–761.

Belief that G, being an optional signal, need not be taken away, 762–764——Conclusion in regard to signal E, that the bell is a bad signal, 764——Improbability of the signals F, G, and B giving rise to difficulty, 772.

Colquitt, W. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness is a first-class Liverpool pilot, and is vice chairman of the United Kingdom Pilots' Association; he has had twenty-two years' experience, 1803–1807. 1869. 1905–1908.

Grounds for the unanimous objection of the association to the proposed new rules, 1808–1812. 1816–1828. 1853–1856. 1869–1883. 1908, 1909——Examination as to signal B; belief that it will lead to confusion, 1813–1815. 1834–1843. 1913–1916. 1928–1930——Conclusion as to the undesirability of the siren for steam vessels, 1828–1834. 1884–1904.

Statement as to the incompetency of the men in command of steamers not carrying passengers, 1843–1852. 1931——Evidence respecting the difficulty of locating sound, 1853–

1853–1857——Satisfaction of the Pilots' Association with the rules at present in force, 1860–1868——Opinion that it is unnecessary for a towing vessel to have a special signal, 1911, 1912.

Difficulty that would arise in respect of signal E as to defining "ordinary anchorage ground," 1917–1920——Opinion that signal B would cover G, E, and I, 1921–1927——Advisability of retaining helm-signals; they are not used in foggy weather, 1932–1934.

Combination of Signals. Question raised as to the possibility of blending D and E; reasons which led to their being treated separately, Sir C. Hall 157–160——Inexpediency of combining H with I or B. ib. 173–175——Dissent from suggestion for blending signals B and I, Sir G. S. Nares 271–278——Conclusion adverse to a combination of signal F, vessel towing, and H, telegraph ship, ib. 279–282.

Opinion that signal G could be blended with B, Duncan 702, 703——Concurrence in the view that signal I might be merged in signal B, Duncan 707–711. 741; Colomb 756——Practicability of combining signal I with signal G, Tuke 1032–1036.

Recommendation that signals B, E, and I should be combined under signal I, Cleary 1311–1316. 1331–1337. 1371–1378. 1418–1424——Suggestion that signals B, G, and H should be included in I, Morse 1623–1627. 1653–1658. 1665, 1666——Opinion that B would cover E, G, and I, Colquitt 1921–1927——Grounds for the conclusion that signals G, H, and I might all be included in one, Taylor 2005–2020. 2047–2061.

Opinion that the number of signals should be reduced to five by combination, Wait 2142–2144——Conclusion that G and B might be amalgamated, but that I should be kept separate, Smith 2320–2327. 2330. 2340–2344. 2347–2351——Examination as to the practicability of blending H with I and B; belief that it might be retained without harm, ib. 2323–2327. 2331–2339——Opinion that signals I and F might be blended with B, Cundy 2368–2375

Details respecting the reports of the Sound Signal Committee in 1889; unanimous decision against course-indicating signals, Sir G. S. Nares 200–209——Belief that course-indicating fog-signals would be dangerous, Wharton 393–395——Possibility of confusion arising between course-indicating and fog-signals, Webster 647–650.

Cundy, Captain George C. (Lieut. R.N.R.) (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a master mariner in Westray's ships, trading to Queensland, 2352–2357.

Approval of the old signals A, C, and D, 2358. 2362——Suggestion that four short blasts should be the signal for B, "vessel stopped," 2358–2361——Belief that signal E might lead to confusion, 2363——Unadvisability of signal G, 2365. 2371.

Unimportance of signal H for a telegraph ship, 2366, 2367——Opinion that signals I and F might be blended with B, 2368–2375——Sufficiency of the bell without blasts for a vessel at anchor, 2376–2380.

Currie, Sir Donald (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is the representative of the shipping interest of London; has great interests in the Castle Company's Cape Line, and in the management of the Cape mail service, &c., 444–446.

Information as to the strong expressions of disapproval on the part of the captains and different trading firms with which witness is associated in regard to the proposals under the Washington Conference, 447. 490——Reference to the unanimous resolution against the proposed regulations, passed at a large meeting summoned by the Committee of the Shipping Exchange; previous to the meeting there had been friction between certain companies, 447–460. 502——Evidence showing that an outcome of the above meeting was a deputation representing numerous associations of shipowners to enter a protest to the Board of Trade; details concerning this protest, 447–449. 458–463. 473, 474. 491. 496–501. 503.

Authorisation given to witness to represent the German shipowners in the protest to the Board of Trade, 447. 463——Letter read by witness from Mr. Laeisz, President of the Hamburg Nautical Union, stating that Germany would be glad to see the rules revised; grounds for believing that this represents the views of Siam, the Netherlands, and other countries, 464–472. 488, 489. 495. 508, 509——Reference to the vagaries of sound in a fog, 473——Conclusion that confusion of sound entails danger, 473, 474.

Examination as to the desirability of giving the rules a trial in the event of there being a consensus of opinion amongst foreign powers, 475-479. 487——Letter read from Mr. Woermann, chairman of the German Shipowners' Association, stating specifically their reasons against sound signals, 510.

D.

Danger (New Rules and Signals). Grounds for the conclusion that the new signals, though they may cause some confusion, will tend to greater caution and less danger, Sir C. Hall 78. 114–120. 126–130. 147. 161–172——Attention called to the confusion likely to ensue from the similarity of signals F, G, and H; opinion that alteration is unnecessary, ib. 161–172 — Conclusion that the proposed signals will give rise neither to danger nor to any great confusion, Sir G. S. Nares 253–258. 289–293. 302, 303. 327. 333–336.

Belief that the proposed rules will not involve danger, Molyneux 344–346 ——Question as to the difficulties that may arise through the similarity of the signals F, G, H; improbability of their proving serious, Wharton 390–398. 402, 403 ——Objection to the new fog-signals on the ground of increase in the risk of collision owing to the confusion of sound, Webster 516–521. 524–529. 534–542. 554–560—— Discussion respecting signal G; belief that it gives encouragement to navigate in a fog, ib. 543–548. 625——Admitted advantage in knowing whether a vessel had way upon her or was stationary, ib. 601–617.

Discussion as to the new signals forming an element of danger; opinion that they are unnecessary, Duncan 664–684. 712–718——Improbability of men experiencing any great difficulty in learning the new signals, Colomb 735. 746. 770, 771——Objection to the proposed signals on the ground that they will create confusion, and will also tend to lead captains to attempt navigation in fogs, Fenwick 783–819. 822. 881–902. 910–934. 946–949. 951–954——Belief that the learning of the signals would present no difficulty, Tuke 982–984.

Possibility that the new rules might tend to make mariners push on, Tuke 994. 1057–1061——Objection to the new sound signals on the ground of greater confusion and risk of collision, Jobling 1093–1115. 1118–1127——Opinion that signal G is unnecessary and dangerous, Wait 2152–2157——Belief that B, G, and F might be taken advantage of by one steamer to the prejudice of another, McKirdy 2234. 2237. 2251. 2256.

Draft Report. Adoption, without amendment, of Draft Report as proposed by the Chairman of the Committee, Rep. vi.

Duncan, Captain Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness, who is in the Castle Line, has had twenty-four years' experience, 661–663.

Discussion as to the possibility of the new signals forming an element of danger; opinion that they are unnecessary, 664–684. 712–718——Inadvisability of both bell and blasts for signal E, 685–690——Admission that signal B might be advantageous, 693–695——Opinion that signal E might be eliminated, 696–698.

Willingness to accept signal F for vessels towing, 699–701——Belief that signal G could be blended with B, 702, 703——Possibility of eliminating signal H, 704–706—— Desirability of including signal I in signal B, 707–711.

E.

Existing Signals. Desirability, if further signals are necessary, of adopting the three which are in use at present for vessels in sight of one another, Webster 549–553. 626–633——Testimony to the sufficiency of the present fog signals, Fenwick 779–782. 820, 821. 943; Jobling 1116, 1117; Holland 1250–1252; Watson 1489–1491. 1517; Morse 1607. 1633–1639——Approval of the old signals A, C, and D, Cundy 2358–2362.

F.

Fenwick, John Fenwick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the firm of Messrs. John Fenwick and Son; represents the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, 774–778.

Conclusion as to the sufficiency of the present fog-signals, 779–782. 820, 821. 943——Objection to the proposed signals on the ground that they will create confusion, and will also tend to lead captains to attempt navigation in fogs, 783-819. 822. 881-902. 910-934. 946-949. 951-954——Probability that a captain might mistake the direction of signal B, 797-803. 939, 940——Opinion that the towing signal F is unnecessary, 823-827. 941, 942.

Detailed information as to the lives lost annually in the foreign and also in the home trade, showing that in the home trade about one-third of the lives lost are due to collisions, 828–880. 935-937. 944–945.

Fog-Horn. Desirability, if possible, of placing fog-horns further forward and making them of a uniform size and power, Sir G. S. Nares 295–301.

Fog-Signals (Generally). Enumeration of the members of the English Committee appointed to decide the principles that should guide the British delegates at Washington; the Committee recommended the adoption of a new fog-signal B, but objected to any alteration in the principle of the existing rules, Sir C. Hall 13–17. 29. 35–37. 181–183——Evidence showing that all the fog-signals approved by the Washington Conference were prepared by sailors of great experience, and have been adopted only after the greatest consideration, ib. 17. 178, 179.

Course adopted by the Conference in dealing with the Second Report of the Committee in regard to fog-signals; while the three existing fog-signals were not to be interfered with in principle six new signals, B, E, F, G, H, and I, were adopted, Sir C. Hall 48–52. 57–59——Constitution of a Committee appointed in England in 1890 to consider the recommendations of the Washington Conference; details of the suggested amendments, two only of which were adopted owing to the objection of foreign countries, ib. 66–76.

Conclusion of the Committee of 1890 that the new signals might give rise to confusion but could not create danger as they all tend to greater caution, Sir C. Hall, 78. 114–120. 126–130. 147. 161–172.

See also the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Fog-Whistle. Difficulty sometimes experienced in hearing the fog-whistle, Webster 638–642——Necessity for a better definition of an "efficient" whistle; approval of the suggestion that they should be made uniform, McKirdy 2257–2260. 2274–2281.

Foreign Countries. Explanatory statement respecting the representation of foreign nations at the Washington Conference and the action taken generally by foreign countries with reference to the proposed new signals, Sir C. Hall 23 et seq.——Information as to the objections to fog-signals raised at the Washington Conference by the Netherlands and Germany; these were ultimately waived, but have recently been again put forward by Germany, ib. 136-142.

Examination respecting the list of foreign countries objecting to the new rules which was given in a letter of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association dated September 1894; evidence showing that not one of the four countries named can be said to offer any great objection, Walker 409, 410. 425–435. 438–443——Reference to letter from the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association stating that foreign Governments objected to the proposed signals, Holland 1247–1249——Evidence showing that several Canadian Captains, Naval Officers in the United States, the Netherlands Government, &c., disapprove of the new signals, Smith 1458–1468.

Paper handed in by Sir George Nares respecting the present attitude of foreign Governments on the questions at issue, App. 125.

See also International Agreement. Washington Conference.

Foreign Sailors. Conclusion that foreign sailors are not in favour of the new rules and signals, Ovenden 1578–1585; Morse 1699-1701; Burn 1770-1773.

G.

Germany. Authorisation given to witness to represent the German shipowners in the protest to the Board of Trade against the proposed new rules, Sir D. Currie 447. 463.

Groombridge, Captain J. G. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a master mariner; has been in command of ships for twenty years, 2381, 2382.

Objection to the use of the siren for steamers, 2384. 2393-2396. 2402-2409——Preference given to the use of the bell only for anchorage, 2384-2387. 2401——Suggestion that the telegraph ship should be treated as a vessel at anchor, 2387-2392——Disapproval of signal B, for "vessel stopped," 2397-2400.

H.

Hall, Sir Charles, K.C.M.G., Q.C., M.P. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness, who is Recorder of London, has had much experience in fog-signals, and is one of the leading counsel in the Admiralty Court, 1-3.

Statement that the fog-signals now under consideration were first definitely put forward in 1889, at Washington, where, owing to a proposal of the United States, in 1888, an International Conference was held, at which witness was a British delegate, 4-8——Reference to a Board of Trade Circular issued prior to the conference, and addressed to shipowners and shipmasters; majority of replies opposed to the introduction of any new system, 9-12.

Enumeration of the Members of a Committee appointed to decide the principles that should guide the British delegates at Washington; the committee recommended the adoption of a new fog-signal (B), but objected to any alteration in the principle of the existing rules, 13-17. 29. 35-37. 181-183——Evidence showing that all the fog-signals approved by the Washington Conference were proposed by sailors of great experience, and have been adopted only after the greatest consideration, 17. 178, 179.

Particulars as to the constitution of the Washington Congress; names of the seven British delegates, 19-23——Statement that owing to the unwieldly size of the conference, sub-committees had to be appointed for different subjects, 21-24——Names of the members who formed the Committee on Sound Signals; information showing that this committee expressed an opinion against course-indicating sound signals for fog, and recommended the use of four new signals, 25-29. 32-34. 176, 177.

Reference to two additional signals—H for a vessel laying cable and I for a vessel not under command—which were adopted by the conference, 29-31——Details respecting a second sitting of the Committee on Sound Signals, 38-45——Unanimous decision of the conference against course-indicating signals, 46. 98, 99.

Course adopted by the conference in dealing with the Second Report of the Committee in regard to fog-signals; while the three existing fog-signals were not to be interfered with in principle six new signals, B, E, F, G, H and I, were adopted, 48-52. 57-59——Evidence showing that signal E relating to a vessel at anchor in a fairway at sea was not adopted with practical unanimity, 51. 53-56.

Constitution of a committee appointed in England in 1890 to consider the recommendations of the Washington Conference; details of the suggested amendments, two only of which were adopted owing to the objection of foreign countries, 60-76——Explanation of the reasons which led the above committee to suggest that vessels provided for in I should be included in B, 66-72. 76. 153-156.

Particulars of a Second Report issued in 1892, in which the rejected amendments were withdrawn in order that the International Rule of the Road at Sea should not be jeopardised, 76-79——Conclusion of the committee that the new signals might give rise to confusion but could not create danger as they all tend to greater caution, 78. 114-120. 126-130. 147——Unanimous Report of a further committee held in 1893, advocating the adoption of the revised rules which had been generally accepted by foreign powers, 80-89. 131-136. 143. 184, 185.

Information as to the objections to fog-signals raised at the conference by the Netherlands and Germany; these were ultimately waived, but have recently been again put forward by Germany, 136-142——Particulars respecting the objection of shipowners' societies to the proposed rules; opinion that this was merely due to the dislike of sailors for any change, as in many cases the representatives of the companies had not read the rules, 95-113. 180——Information as to the optional course-indicating signals for vessels in sight of one another, 96, 97. 121-125.

Examination as to the possibility of danger arising from a misconception between course-indicating and fog-signals, 144-152——Question raised as to the possibility of blending D and E; reasons which led to their being treated separately, 157-160——Question of confusion through the similarity of signals F, G, and H; opinion that alteration is unnecessary, 161-172.

Experience that new fog-signals can be learnt more rapidly than sailors apprehend, 162. 191——Inexpediency of combining H with I or B, 173-175——Explanation that in order to attend the conference witness gave up his practice at the bar for a term and a half, 194-196.

Helm-Signals. Statement as to helm-signals being sometimes used in fogs, Jobling 1153-1169; Taylor 1994-1998——Contention that helm-signals should be made compulsory in fog, Wade 1221-1234——Constant use of helm-signals in foggy weather, Morse 1625-1632. 1667, 1668; Burn 1724-1727. 1737-1739. 1754, 1755. 1783-1785——Advisability of retaining helm-signals, Colquitt 1932-1934.

Holland, Walter. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representation by witness of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, 1235–1240. 1250–1252.

Statement that the association object to the new signals on the ground of the inaccuracy of the steam whistle, 1241–1243——Explanation of a second objection, viz., the uncertainty of sound in a fog, 1243–1245——Examination as to the communications of the association with the Board of Trade; opinion that sufficient attention was not paid to the shipping interests by that Department, 1246. 1261–1289.

Reference to a letter from the association stating that foreign governments objected to the proposed signals, 1247–1249——Testimony to the sufficiency of the existing signals, 1250–1252——Evidence respecting the supervision of the new rules by the United States, 1253–1260—— Letters from the Admiralty and Trinity House read by witness in support of his evidence, 1290, 1291.

I.

International Agreement. Particulars of a Second Report issued in 1892 by the English Committee of 1890, in which the rejected amendments were withdrawn in order that the International Rule of the Road at Sea should not be jeopardised, Sir C. Hall 76–79 ——Opinion that the B and E signals are beneficial, and that the others as they do not give rise to danger should be accepted in order to obtain an International Rule of the Road at Sea, Wharton 374–384. 386–389.

Examination as to the desirability of giving the new rules a trial in the event of there being a consensus of opinion amongst foreign powers, Sir D. Currie 475–479. 487—— Advisability of passing the revised regulations rather than risk the International Agreement, Colomb 748. 751–755. 765–767.

Argument that International Agreement should be risked rather than accept the new rules, Tuke 1077–1088——Advisability of retaining the three signals, B, E and I, rather than risk the loss of International Agreement, Cleary 1317–1321——Importance of International concurrence in regard to signals, Karslake 2068.

See also Foreign Countries. Washington Conference.

Interpretation of Signals. Opinion that difficulty would not arise in learning the new signals but in interpreting them, Wade 1187, 1188——Probability that the rules might, in some cases, prove difficult to apprehend, Watson 1486–1488.

See also New Rules and Signals.

J.

Jobling, Captain John Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is master of the steamship "Northdene;" has been thirty-six years at sea, and is engaged in the coasting trade, 1089–1092.

Objection to the new sound signals on the ground of greater confusion and risk of collision, 1093–1115. 1118–1127——Testimony to the adequacy of the present fog-signals, 1116, 1117——Discussion respecting signal B, for a vessel stopped, 1128–1134 ——Possibility of eliminating signals I, H and G as being the least important, 1134–1141.

Belief that signal F, vessel towing, is unnecessary, 1142–1147. 1152——Sufficiency of the bell without any blasts for signal E, 1148–1151——Statement to the effect that helm signals are sometimes used in a fog, 1153–1169.

K.

Karslake, Captain, R.N. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is in command of the "Duke of Wellington," 2062.

Approval of the proposed fog-signals with the exception of G, H and I, to which witness is strongly opposed; opinion that they should be included in B, 2063–2067. 2076–2084. 2095–2097. 2111–2120——Experience as to the desirability of signal E; statement that witness has often used both siren and bell, 2066. 2073. 2085–2094. 2098–2100. 2102, 2103——Belief that the towing signal F is unnecessary, but might be retained as it does not entail danger, 2066. 2074, 2075. 2101.

Importance of International concurrence in regard to signals, 2068——Discussion respecting the expediency of signal B, 2069–2072——Improbability of confusion arising between the siren of a lighthouse and that of a steamer, 2104–2106——Desirability of making all bells of uniform force, 2107–2110.

L.

Laeisz, C. Fred. Letter from Mr. Laeisz, President of the Hamburg Nautical Union, stating that Germany would be glad to see the rules revised; grounds for believing that this represents the views of Siam, the Netherlands, and other countries, Sir D. Currie 464–472. 488, 489. 495. 508, 509.

Liverpool. Representation by witness of the views of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, Holland 1235 et seq.——Letters from the Admiralty and Trinity House read by witness in support of his evidence, ib. 1290, 1291.

London Short Sea Traders' Association. Witness, who is in command of a vessel belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company, and has been forty-two years at sea, submits the views of the London Short Sea Traders' Association, Taylor 1935 et seq.

Loss of Life. Paper showing, for the several years 1890–93, the total loss of life in the foreign trade, and the loss by collisions only, in the foreign trade (steam only), App. 128——Further statistics of the Board of Trade respecting the loss of life yearly from wrecks and from collisions, including the home and foreign trade, ib. 129, 130.

M.

McKirdy, Captain. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is marine superintendent connected with the Shaw, Savill and Albion Company; was previously a master mariner for ten years, 2222–2227.

Objection of witness to multiplying sound signals at sea, 2228–2233——Belief that B, G, and F might be taken advantage of by one steamer to the prejudice of another, 2234. 2237. 2251. 2256——Undesirability of signal B, "vessel stopped," 2235–2239. 2271–2273——Preference given to the bell only without the fog-horn, 2239–2241——Grounds for approving of signal F, 2242. 2261–2270.

Statement that no difficulty has been experienced by witness in distinguishing between long and short blasts, 2244–2250——Indifference as to the form of signal to be adopted for a telegraph ship, 2253–2255——Necessity for a better definition of an "efficient" whistle; approval of the suggestion that they should be made uniform, 2257–2260. 2274–2281.

Moderate Speed. Necessity for a definition of "moderate speed," Webster 588–592.

Molyneux, Vice Admiral Sir Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness was one of the delegates at Washington and has been a member of the various Board of Trade Committees, 340, 341.

Opinion that some of the proposed rules are most beneficial and that others which are not of vital consequence should be retained without alteration rather than risk wrecking the International Rule of the Road at Sea, 342, 343. 346–352. 356 359. 362–366——Improbability of the new rules proving difficult to master, 343——Belief that the rules will not involve danger, 344–346.

Reference to the great point made of the towing signal F by the United States, 348. 367–372——Evidence showing that captains of the mercantile marine were represented on the Washington Conference and also on the Board of Trade Committees, 353–355——Statement that the B signal was the only one proposed by England, 359, 360.

Morse, Evan T. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a Cardiff and a Bristol Channel Pilot; has been thirty-six years in the pilot service, 1600–1606. 1689–1698.

Belief that the rules at present in force are sufficient, 1607. 1633–1639——Objection to the new signals owing to the uncertainty of sound in fog, 1607–1622——Desirability of a signal for a vessel towing, 1607, 1608——Suggestion that signals B, G, and H should be included in I, 1623–1627. 1653–1658. 1665, 1666.

Statement that helm signals are constantly used in foggy weather, 1625–1632. 1667–1688——Opinion that the old steam whistle is preferable to the siren for steamers, 1640–1652——Disapproval of the use of blasts in addition to the bell for signal E, 1659–1664——Experience that foreign sailors are opposed to the proposed rules, 1699–1701.

N.

Nares, Vice Admiral Sir George Strong, K.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness was chairman of the Washington Sound Signal Committee; has for fifteen years been a member of the London Rule of the Road Committee, 197–199.

Details respecting the reports of the Sound Signal Committees in 1889; unanimous decision against course-indicating signals, 200–209——Statement that signal A is practically the present one for a prolonged blast for all steam vessels, 211——Information as to signal B, suggested by the London Rule of the Road Committee, 212——Evidence showing that the Sound Signal Committee was composed, with one exception, of practical seamen, 213, 214.

Examination as to signal C; attention called to the fact that the old rule C included three signals, 215–219——Reference to signal D, which is an old signal remodelled, 220, 221——Illustration showing the desirability of signal E, which created great discussion at the Conference; enumeration of the countries that voted for and against it, 222–232——Particulars respecting signal F relating to towing vessels; great diversity of opinion at the Conference as to sailing vessels being included, 233, 234.

Consideration of signal G, the optional signal; its introduction was advised by the Peninsular and Oriental and the Cunard Companies, 235–241. 313–324——Explanation of rules H and I, both of which are answering signals, proposed by Germany and finally carried by the Conference, 242–249. 294——Opinion that the present single fog-signal is insufficient, and that the proposed signals will be readily learnt and prove a safeguard to life and property at sea, 250. 259. 265, 266. 269, 270.

Examination in regard to the objections raised to the proposed signals; belief that much of the opposition experienced has been due to an erroneous idea respecting the character of the signals as illustrated in the case of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, 252. 264–268. 283–288. 325–327——Conclusion that the proposed signals will give rise neither to danger nor to any great confusion, 253–258. 289–293. 302, 303. 327. 333–336——Document handed in illustrative of the numberless signals in use in New York Harbour, 260–263.

Attention called to the suggestion for blending signals B and I; grounds for personal belief that they are better separate, 271–278——Discussion as to the possibility of combining signals F, vessel towing, and H, telegraph ship; belief that combination is undesirable, 279–282——Desirability, if possible, of placing fog-horns further forward, and making them of a uniform size and power, 295–301.

Statement that the three possible conditions of a vessel, viz., "under control," "not under control," and "at anchor," were fully considered by the Sound Signal Committee when drafting the rules, 304–312——Caution necessary before any alteration of the proposed rules, 337–339.

Netherlands. Reference to a Report issued by the leading shipowners in the Netherlands in which apprehension was expressed that the new signals would cause confusion, Walker 436, 437——See also Foreign Countries. Washington Conference.

New Brunswick. Objection of the shipowners of St. John's, New Brunswick, to the new rules; communication read from the above shipowners to the Dominion Government protesting against the introduction of the new fog-signals, Smith 1427–1436. 1454–1457. 1468.

NEW RULES AND SIGNALS:

Explanatory statements in connection with the discussions and investigations which resulted in the adoption by the Washington Conference of six new signals, B, E, F, G, H, and I, Sir C. Hall 13 et seq.——Explanation of the reasons which led the English Committee of 1890 to suggest that vessels provided for in I should be included in B, ib. 66–72. 76. 153–156——Experience that new fog-signals can be learnt more rapidly than sailors apprehend, ib. 162. 191.

Statement that signal A is practically the present one for a prolonged blast for all steam vessels, Sir G. S. Nares 211——Examination as to signal C; attention called to the fact that the old rule C included three signals, ib. 215–219——Reference to signal D, which is an old signal remodelled, ib. 220, 221—— Opinion that the present single fog-signal is insufficient, and that the proposed signals will be readily learnt and prove a safeguard to life and property at sea, ib. 250. 259. 265, 266. 269, 270.

Statement that the three possible conditions of a vessel, viz., "under control," "not under control," and "at anchor," were fully considered by the Sound Signal Committee when drafting the rules, Sir G. S. Nares 304–312—— Necessity of caution in any attempt to alter the proposed rules, ib. 337–339.

Improbability of the new rules proving difficult to master, Molyneux 343——Information as to the objections raised in Great Britain in 1891, 1893, and subsequently to the proposed rules, Walker 412–424——Belief that the new signals, although not perfect, are an improvement, and are not likely to cause harm, Colomb 721–734. 736–740. 745. 768——Opinion that G, being an optional signal, need not be taken away, ib. 762–764——Improbability of the signals F, G, and B giving rise to difficulty, ib. 772——Possibility of eliminating signals H, I, and G as being the least important, Jobling 1134–1141.

Opinion favourable to the proposed rules, Cleary 1297–1310——Grounds for believing that signals F and G are necessary, ib. 1338–1342. 1372. 1382–1384——Grounds for objecting to the proposed new signals, Watson 1476. 1481–1485——Conclusion that signals B and E might be accepted, but that G, H, and I should be eliminated, ib. 1492–1502. 1506–1516. 1518–1520.

Opinion that signal G is not necessary, and that signal H could be included in I, Ovenden 1554–1556——Approval of signals A, C, D, and also of signal I, for a disabled vessel only; opinion that B, E, G, and H should be eliminated, Burn 1715–1723. 1729–1736. 1752, 1753. 1756–1769. 1790–1797——Reasons for believing that the proposed rules are unnecessary and will give rise to confusion in crowded waters, Taylor 1943–1973. 2019, 2020——Approval of the proposed fog-signals, with the exception of G, H, and I, to which witness is strongly opposed; opinion that they should be included in B, Karslake 2063–2067. 2076–2084. 2095–2097. 2111–2120.

Undesirability of signals F and G, Cato 2189——Evidence in favour of signal F, McKirdy 2242. 2261–2270——Favourable opinion of witness in regard to the proposed signals, J. Smith 2286, 2287. 2311. 2328, 2329. 2345, 2346——Opinion that signal G would not prove misleading, ib. 2304–2310——Unadvisability of signal G, Curdy 2365. 2371.

See also the Headings generally throughout the Index.

New York Harbour. Document handed in illustrative of the numberless signals in use in New York Harbour, Nares 260–263.

O.

Ovenden, George Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a certificated pilot of Dover; represents the United Pilots' Association, 1531–1533. 1538–1540. 1560–1566.

Objection to the proposed signals owing to the delusive nature of sound in a fog, 1534, 1535——Statement as to the impracticability of signal B, 1541–1546. 1557–1559——Evidence as to signal E; belief that the bell is sufficient, 1547–1551——Approval of a signal for a towing vessel, 1552, 1553. 1565, 1566.

Opinion that signal G is not necessary, and that signal H could be included in I, 1554–1556——Suggestion that four blasts should be the signal for a vessel that could not manœuvre, 1567–1577——Experience that foreign sailors are not in favour of the new rules, 1578–1585——Desirability of retaining the old steam-blast rather than the siren for vessels 1586–1599.

P.

Penalties. Conclusion that much of the opposition to the proposed signals is due to an erroneous idea that a penalty would be incurred were the signals mistaken one for another, Wharton 401. 404–407.

Pilots. Witness, who is a certificated pilot of Dover, represents the United Pilots' Association, Ovenden et seq.——Grounds for the unanimous objection of the United Kingdom Pilots' Association to the proposed rules, Colquitt 1808–1812. 1816–1828. 1853–1859. 1869–1883. 1908, 1909——Satisfaction of the Pilots' Association with the rules at present in force, ib. 1860–1868.

Private Signals. Statement that private signals are not used in fog, Cleary 1391–1397.

Privy Council. Consideration of a Report of a Committee of the Privy Council, dated January 1893, approving of the suggested alterations, W. Smith 1451–1454.

R.

Reappointment of Committee. Recommendation that a Committee should be appointed in the next Session of Parliament for the purpose of considering the Evidence and reporting to the House, Rep. iii.

S.

Shipmasters' and Officers' Federation. Representation by witness of the Shipmasters' and Officers' Federation, numbering about 9,000 members, Wade 1170 et seq.——Statement that the Federation would not give up their opposition to the rules for the sake of an International agreement, ib. 1192–1198.

Shipowners. Reference to a Board of Trade Circular issued prior to the Washington Conference, and addressed to shipowners and shipmasters; majority of replies opposed to the introduction of any new system, Sir C. Hall 9–12 ——Particulars respecting certain objections of shipowners' societies to the proposed rules; opinion that this was merely due to the dislike of sailors for any change, as in many cases the representatives of the companies had not read the rules, ib. 95–113. 180.

Examination in regard to the objections raised to the proposed signals; belief that much of the opposition experienced has been due to an erroneous idea respecting the character of the signals, as illustrated in the case of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, Sir G. S. Nares 252. 264–268. 283–288. 325–327.

Reference to the unanimous resolution against the proposed regulations, passed at a large meeting summoned by the committee of the Shipping Exchange; previous to the meeting there had been friction between certain companies, Sir D. Currie 447–460. 502 ——Evidence showing that an outcome of the above meeting was a deputation representing numerous associations of shipowners to enter a protest to the Board of Trade; details concerning this protest, ib. 447–449. 458–463. 473, 474. 491. 496–501. 503.

Siren. Opinion that the siren should not be legalised for steamers, Watson 1476–1480. 1521–1525——Concurrence in the opinion that the old steam-whistle is preferable to the siren for steamers, Ovenden 1586–1599; Morse 1640–1652 ——Conclusion as to the undesirability and danger of the siren for steam vessels, Burn 1797–1801; Colquitt 1828–1834. 1884–1904; Taylor 1974–1979. 2021–2036; Groombridge 2384. 2393–2396. 2402–2409.

Experience as to the desirability of signal E; statement that witness has often used both siren and bell, Karslake 2066. 2073. 2085–2094. 2098–2100. 2102, 2103—— Improbability of confusion arising between the siren of a lighthouse and that of a steamer, ib. 2104–2106.

Smith, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been in command of steamships on ocean voyages for nearly eighteen years; is with Gray, Dawes, and Company, 2282–2285.

Favourable opinion expressed by witness in regard to the proposed signals, 2286, 2287. 2311. 2328, 2329. 2345, 2346 —— Necessity of signal B for vessel stopped, 2288–2290 ——Approval of the bell and blasts for signal E; 2291–2298——Desirability of signal F for a towing vessel; suggestion that the vessel towed should signal with her fog-horn, 2312–2319.

Opinion that signal G would not prove misleading, 2304–2310——Conclusion that G and B might be amalgamated, but that I should be kept separate, 2320–2327. 2330. 2340–2344. 2347–2351—— Examination as to the practicability of blending H with I or B; the former might be retained without harm, 2323–2327. 2331–2339.

Smith, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Deputy Minister of Marine for the Canadian Government; is a member of the Board of Trade Committee for the Manning of British Ships, 1425, 1426.

Objection of the shipowners of St. John's, New Brunswick, to the new rules; communication read from the above shipowners to the Dominion Government protesting against the introduction of the proposed fog-signals, 1427–1436. 1454–1457. 1468—— Authorisation given witness by the Government of Canada to act on their behalf in regard to the rule of the road at sea, 1437–1450.

Attention of witness called to a report of a Committee of the Privy Council dated January 1893, approving of the suggested alterations, 1451–1454——Desirability of fog-signal F, for a towing vessel, 1455–1457——Grounds for the objection of the President of the Board of Trade to allow witness to give evidence except privately by letter; copy of letter handed in (App. 126–128), 1457, 1458.

Evidence showing that several Canadian captains, naval officers in the United States, the Netherlands Government, &c., disapprove of the new signals, 1458–1468——Belief that the practical navigators of the Merchant Service were not sufficiently represented at the various committees, 1462.

Suggestion that the anxiety of the Board of Trade to secure an International agreement has led to the adoption of the new rules in spite of their unpopularity, 1463——Statement as to the unreliability of sound signals in a fog, 1463–1468——Desirability of improving the wording of signal B, 1468.

SOUND SIGNALS:

Names of the members of the Washington Conference who formed the Committee on Sound Signals; information showing that this Committee expressed an opinion against course-indicating sound signals for fog, and recommended the use of four new signals, Sir C. Hall 25-29. 32-34. 176, 177——Details respecting a second sitting of the Committee on Sound Signals, ib. 38-45——Evidence showing that the Sound Signal Committee at the Washington Conference was composed, with one exception, of practical seamen, Sir G. S. Nares 213, 214.

Evidence as to the capricious nature of sounds heard in a fog, and as to the degree of confusion and danger thereby, Sir D. Currie 473, 474; Webster 521-523. 527. 544. 651-653——Statement that not one single case of collision has been due to mistaken direction and sound in a fog, Colomb 743. 744. 749, 750—— Probability that a captain might mistake the direction of signal B, Fenwick 797-803. 939, 940.

Objections to the proposed fog-signals on account of the unreliability of sound in a fog, Burn 1708-1712. 1740-1751. 1786-1789; Tuke 958-981. 985-987. 993. 995-999. 1037-1056. 1062-1076; Holland 1243-1245; Ovenden 1534, 1535; Morse 1607-1622——Examination as to the signals F and G, witness submitting that sound signals in fog are useless, Tuke 988-992. 1010-1014——Opinion that sound, when clear of the intervention of land is reliable in a fog, Wade 1213-1219. 1229-1233——Experience that sounds are only liable to be mistaken in fog when land intervenes, Cleary 1350-1370. 1385-1390.

Statement as to the unreliability of sound signals in a fog, W. Smith 1463. 1468——Difficulty of locating sound, Colquitt 1853-1857——Objection to multiplying sound signals at sea, M'Kirdy 2228-2233.

See also Bell and Blasts. Fog Signals. New Rules and Signals. Telegraph Ships. Towing Vessels. Vessels Stopped.

Steam-Whistle. Objection to the new signals on the ground of the inaccuracy or unreliability of the steam-whistle, Holland 1241-1243——Necessity for steam whistles to be of a uniform size, Cleary 1379-1381.

T.

Taylor, Captain. (Analysis of his Evidence.)— Is in command of a vessel belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company, and has been forty-two years at sea; appears on behalf of the London Short Sea Traders' Association, 1935-1942.

Reasons for believing that the proposed rules are unnecessary, and will give rise to confusion in crowded waters, 1943-1973. 2019, 2020——Objection to the use of the siren by steam vessels, 1974-1979. 2021-2036——Admission that signal B might be useful were there but one other steamer within hearing, 1980-1985——Opinion that the bell is sufficient for signal E, 1986-1995. 2037-2046.

Statement that helm signals are sometimes used in fog, 1994-1998——Advisability of a signal for a vessel towing, 1999-2004——Examination as to signals G, H, and I; opinion that they might all be included in one, 2005-2020. 2047-2061.

Telegraph Ships (Signal H). Practicability of merging signal H (telegraph ship) in another, Wharton 384, 385——Opinion that the telegraph ship signal H should be included under I, Webster 530-532. 568-571——Possibility of eliminating signal H, Duncan 704-706—— Discussion as to the possibility of blending signal H and F, Colomb 757-761——Opinion that signal H is the least important, Tuke 1025-1029.

Probability that telegraph ships need some distinguishing signal, Cleary 1343-1349——Necessity for a special signal for telegraph ships; suggestion that it should be five short blasts, Cato 2172-2183. 2194-2215——Practice of telegraph ships to signal to each other by the long and short blast of the Morse Code, ib. 2184-2188. 2216-2221.

Statement that no difficulty has been experienced by witness in distinguishing between long and short blasts, M'Kirdy 2244-2250——Indifference as to the form of signal to be adopted for a telegraph ship, ib. 2253-2255——Unimportance of signal H, Cundy 2366, 2367——Suggestion that the telegraph ships should be treated as vessels at anchor, Groombridge 2387-2392.

Towing Vessels (Signal F). Particulars respecting signal F, relating to towing vessels, there having been a great diversity of opinion at the Washington Conference as to the signal applying to sailing vessels, Sir G. S. Nares 233, 234——Unanimous adoption of the signal for steam vessels, ib. 233——Reference to the great point made of the towing signal F by the United States, Molyneux 348. 367-372—— Importance of a signal being adopted for a vessel towing, Webster 566, 567. 618-622. 655. 660——Approval of signal F for a vessel towing, Duncan 699-701; Wade 1205; W. Smith 1455-1457; Ovenden 1552, 1553. 1565, 1566; Morse 1607, 1608; Burn 1713, 1714. 1728; Taylor 1999-2004.

Opinion that the towing-signal F is unnecessary, Fenwick 823-827. 941, 942; Jobling 1142-1147. 1152; Watson 1503-1505. 1526-1530; Colquitt 1911-1912——Belief that the towing-signal F is unnecessary but might be retained, as it does not incur danger, Karslake 2066. 2074, 2075. 2101——Opinion that a signal for a towing vessel is necessary, and that it should be two prolonged blasts, Wait 2148-2151——Desirability of signal F for a towing vessel; suggestion that the vessel towed should signal with her fog-horn, J. Smith 2312-2319.

Tuke, Captain Melville. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is a shipmaster in the employment of the Orient Steam Navigation Company, Limited; has had 25 years' experience, 955-957.

Objection to the proposed fog-signals on account of the unreliability of sound in a fog, 958-981. 985-987. 993. 995-999. 1037-1056. 1062-1076——Belief that the learning of the signals would present no difficulty, 982-984——Examination as to the signals F and G; conclusion that sound signals in fog are useless, 988-992. 1010-1014——Possibility that the new rules might tend to make mariners push on, 994. 1057-1061——Discussion respecting signal B, for a vessel stopped; opinion that it would not be distinguished, 1000-1010.

Consideration of signal E; possibility of the two blasts being mistaken for one, 1015-1024——Opinion that signal H, telegraph ship, is the least important, 1025-1029——Practicability of combining signal I with signal B, 1030, 1031——Evidence as to the undesirability of signal G, 1032-1036——Argument that International agreement should be risked rather than accept the new rules, 1077-1088.

U.

United States. Evidence respecting the action of the United States in suspending or postponing the operation of the new rules, Holland 1253-1260.

V.

Vessel Stopped (Signal B.) Information as to signal B, suggested by the London Rule of the Road Committee; constant demand for this signal, Sir G. S. Nares 212——Statement that if some of the proposed signals must be adopted signal B might remain, Webster 561-563——Admission that signal B might be advantageous, Duncan 693-695——Discussion respecting signal B for a vessel stopped, with suggestions on the subject, Jobling 1128-1134; Karslake 2069-2072; Tuke 1000-1010.

Approval of signal B, provided that signals E, G, H and I are eliminated, Wade 1179, 1180. 1184. 1199-1203. 1206-1209——Desirability of improving the wording of signal B, W. Smith 1468——Statement as to the impracticability of signal B, Ovenden 1541-1546. 1557-1559——Undesirability of signal B, "vessel stopped," Colquitt 1813-1815. 1834-1843. 1913-1916. 1928-1930; McKirdy 2235-2239. 2271-2273; Groombridge 2397-2400.

Admission that signal B might be useful were there but one other steamer within hearing, Taylor 1980-1985——Approval of signal B for a vessel stopped, provided the number of blasts are altered; suggestion that three prolonged blasts would be better than two, Wait 2127-2141. 2158-2166——Concurrence in approval of signal B, Cato 2192, 2193; J. Smith 2288-2290——Suggestion that four short blasts should be the signal for B, "vessel stopped," Candy 2358-2361.

W.

Wade, Captain Wentworth Shields. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a shipmaster of great experience; represents the Shipmasters and Officers' Federation, numbering about 9,000 members, 1170-1178. 1220.

Approval of signal B, provided that signals E, G, H and I are eliminated, 1179, 1180. 1184. 1199-1203. 1206-1209 — Desirability of an interval of one minute only between the blasts in signal A, 1181-1191. 1210-1212——Objection to a complicated system of signals, 1185, 1186——Opinion that difficulty would not arise in learning the new signals but in interpreting them, 1187, 1188——Statement that the Federation represented by witness would not give up their opposition to the rules for the sake of an International agreement, 1192-1198.

Evidence as to the necessity for an efficient bell for ships, 1200-1203——Approval of signal F, for a vessel towing, 1205——Opinion that sound when clear of the intervention of land is reliable in a fog, 1213-1219. 1229-1233——View of the Federation that helm-signals should be made compulsory in fog, 1221-1234.

Wait, Captain. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been for nearly twenty-three years with the Union Steamship Company, 2121–2126.

Approval of signal B, for a vessel stopped, provided the number of blasts are altered; suggestion that three prolonged blasts would be better than two, 2127–2141. 2158–2166——Opinion that the number of signals should be reduced to five by combination, 2142–2144——Objection to the bell and blasts in signal E, 2145–2147——Necessity for a signal for a towing vessel; it should be two prolonged blasts, 2148–2151——Opinion that signal G is unnecessary and dangerous, 2152–2157.

Walker, Ingram Bathurst. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Assistant Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, 408.

Examination respecting the list of foreign countries objecting to the new rules, which was given in a letter of the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, dated September, 1894; evidence showing that not one of the four countries named can be said to offer any great objection, 409, 410. 425–435. 438–443——Information as to the objections raised in Great Britain in 1891, 1893, and subsequently, 412–424——Reference to a report issued by the leading shipowners in the Netherlands in which apprehension was expressed that the new signals would cause confusion, 436–437.

Washington Conference. Statement that the fog-signals now under consideration were first definitely put forward in 1889 at Washington, where, owing to a proposal of the United States in 1888, an International Conference was held, at which witness was a British delegate, Sir C. Hall 4–8——Particulars as to the constitution of the Washington Congress; names of the seven British delegates, ib. 19–23——Explanation that owing to the unwieldy size of the conference, sub-committees had to be appointed for different subjects, ib. 21. 24.

Reference to two additional signals, H for a vessel laying cable, and I for a vessel not under command, which were adopted by the conference, Sir C. Hall 29–31——Evidence showing that signal E relating to a vessel at anchor in a fairway at sea was not adopted with practical unanimity, ib. 51. 53–56.

Unanimous report of a Committee held in 1893 advocating the adoption of the revised rules which had been generally accepted by foreign powers, Sir C. Hall 80–89. 131–136. 143. 184, 185.

Illustration showing the desirability of signal E, which created great discussion at the conference; enumeration of the countries that voted for and against it, Sir G. S. Nares 222–232——Opinion that some of the proposed rules are most beneficial, and that others which are not of vital consequence should be retained without alteration rather than risk wrecking the International Rule of the Road at Sea, Sir R. Molyneux 342, 343. 346–352. 356–359. 362–366——Statement that the B signal was the only one prepared by England, ib. 359, 360.

Information as to the strong expressions of disapproval on the part of the captains and different trading firms with which witness is associated in regard to the proposals under the Washington Conference, Sir D. Currie 447. 490.

Watson, Captain Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is master of a vessel belonging to Messrs. Wilson and Company, of Hull; is licensed by the Trinity House, and also by the Swedish authorities, as a pilot, 1470–1476.

Grounds for objecting to the proposed new signals, 1476. 1481–1485——Opinion that the siren should not be legalised for steamers, 1476–1480. 1521–1525——Probability that the rules might, in some cases, prove difficult to apprehend, 1486–1488——Testimony to the sufficiency of the signals now used, 1489–1491. 1517.

Statement that signals B and E might be accepted, but that G, H and I should be eliminated, 1492–1502. 1506–1516. 1518–1520——Belief that signal F, for a vessel towing, is unnecessary, 1503–1505. 1526–1530.

Webster, Captain Matthew Pedden. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is in the Castle Line, trading to the Cape; has had more than twenty-eight years' practical experience, 511–515.

Objection to the new fog-signals on the ground of increase in the risk of collision owing to the confusion of sound, 516–521. 524–529. 534–542. 554–560——Evidence as to the capricious nature of sounds heard in a fog, 521–523. 527. 544. 651–653——Opinion that the telegraph ship signal H should be included under I, 530–532. 568–571——Discussion respecting signal G; belief that it gives encouragement to navigate in a fog, 543–548. 625.

Desirability, if further signals are necessary, of adopting the three which are in use at present for vessels in sight of one another, 549–553. 626–633——Statement that if some of the signals must be adopted signal B might remain, 561–563——Contention that a bell without the blasts is sufficient for signal E, 564. 623, 624——Importance of a signal being adopted for a vessel towing, 566, 567. 618–622. 655. 660.

Necessity for a definition of "moderate speed," 588-592—— Admitted advantage in knowing whether a vessel had way upon her or was stationary, 601-617—— Difficulty sometimes experienced in clearing the fog-whistle, 638-642—— Possibility of confusion arising between course-indicating and fog-signals, 647-650.

Wharton, Rear Admiral William J. L. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is Hydrographer to the Navy; was a member of the British committees held before and after the Washington Conference, 373-375.

Opinion that the B and E signals are beneficial, and that the others, as they do not give rise to danger, should be accepted in order to obtain an International Rule of the Road at Sea, 374-384. 386-389——Practicability of merging signal H, telegraph ship, in another, 384, 385——Question as to the difficulties that may arise through the similarity of the signals F, G, H; improbability of their proving serious, 390-398. 402, 403.

Belief that course-indicating fog-signals would be dangerous, 393-395——Experience that much of the opposition to the proposed signals is due to an erroneous idea that a penalty would be incurred were the signals mistaken one for another, 401. 404-407.

Woermann, Adolph. Letter read from Mr. Woermann, chairman of the German Shipowners' Association, stating specifically their reasons against sound signals, Sir D. Currie, 510.

Wrecks and Collisions. Detailed information (App. 129, 130) as to the loss of life annually in the foreign and also in the home trade, showing that in the home trade about one-third of the lives lost are due to collisions, Fenwick 828-880. 935-937. 944, 945.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Friday, 22*nd March* 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Sir John Lubbock.
Mr. Baldwin.
Mr. Cameron Corbett.
Viscount Cranborne.
Mr. Diamond.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. Frederick Frye.
Sir John Gorst.
Sir Blundell Maple.
Sir Francis Powell.
Mr. Tennant.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES AUSTIN STACEY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1. You are the Secretary of the Early Closing Association?—Yes.

2. And you have been many years in that position?—Nearly 20 years.

3. I need hardly ask you if you have followed the Early Closing Movement with great attention during that period?—In all parts of the country.

4. You are fully conversant of what has taken place with regard to it?—Yes.

5. The Committee have before them the evidence given before the Committee of 1886, and, as I understand, they do not think it necessary to go back before that period. Do you consider that there have been any great changes since 1886 in the length of hours of shopkeepers and shop assistants?—Not in respect to the ordinary hours of closing, but there has been an advance in a mid-weekly closing; that is, progress has been made with the closing at five or two on Wednesdays or Thursdays.

6. You think the half-holiday movement has gained ground; do I understand that, as regards the general hours of closing, they are substantially the same as they were when the evidence was given before us in 1886?—I shall be able to show they are slightly worse in some districts now than they were 10 years ago or even 20 years ago.

7. On the other hand, I suppose there are some districts in which there have been improvements?—Yes.

8. But substantially you would say there is no very material change since 1886?—Substantially London is standing still with reference to improvements on ordinary nights.

Sir Blundell Maple.

9. And the country?—And the country at large.

10. As well as the large towns?—Yes.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

11. Are they going back, do you say?—Receding in some parts. In many parts of London they are worse than they were in 1875; slightly worse.

Chairman.

12. You gave evidence then, that in your opinion, though voluntary action had done much good in many cases, it was not competent to cure the evil as a whole. Is that still your opinion?—Yes. And that, I may say, is the opinion of various traders' associations in various parts of the country.

13. Do you remember the Mansion House Meeting which was summoned by the Lord Mayor, I think, in 1887?—Yes; it was in 1886; I have the minute book here.

14. Have you anything you would wish to say with reference to that meeting?—That meeting was a land-mark as it were in the history of early closing in respect to the demand for legislation. Prior to that time, the Early Closing Association was not acquainted with the really great progress made in the demand for legislation by the traders themselves. We were almost in the dark, owing to want of information, and want of being in touch with the various great centres of the country. We were under the impression at that time that there was no serious demand for legislation, but my visit to the principal towns of the kingdom in 1886-87, and the report I submitted thereon to my Board of Management showed that the Early Closing Association was out of touch with the main body of traders on this question.

15. The result of that meeting and the inquiries made afterwards was to convince you there was a strong desire for legislation on the part of the shopkeepers themselves?—Yes; and that strong desire has since been expressed in resolutions by various representative bodies of traders as apart from assistants.

Viscount Cranborne.

16. Are you speaking of all shopkeepers or of special classes?—Take the grocery trade as an instance as to which early closing difficulties would present themselves very seriously if there were any. The Grocers' Association of Liverpool, which is one of the best organised trade societies in England, have been very keen on legislation. They have been keen supporters of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, and one particularly great meeting at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, which was filled to overflowing, passed a resolution unanimously in favour of an Early Closing Bill.

Sir Blundell Maple.

17. Has the present Bill ever been discussed at any public meeting?—Yes.

18. Clause by clause discussed?—When I say a public meeting, it has not been discussed clause by clause at any public meeting, unless you term the Nottingham Congress a public meeting. The present Bill was discussed clause by clause by a representative congress of merchants and shopkeepers from all parts of the country, the attendance being fairly representative, and was unanimously approved as the most workable measure before the country.

Chairman.

19. That was a Congress held in Nottingham in 1893?—In October 1893.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

21. Could you give us the districts?—No. 1 District was Central London, comprising the thoroughfares of Oxford-street, Holborn, Tottenham Court-road, Goodge-street, and Cleveland-street. Cleveland-street is a very poor street off Tottenham Court-road. Then the next district was South London, and that comprised some very poor thoroughfares, being High-street and Blackman-street, Borough, Newington Causeway, Walworth-road, Camberwell-road, Peckham, the New Cut, Lambeth, the Lower Marsh, Lambeth, and London-road. Then No. 3 District, Hampstead-road, High-street and Park-street, Camden Town, Kentish Town-road, Great College-street, Brecknock-road, Malden-road, Queen's Crescent, Chalk Farm-road, and Haverstock Hill; very poor districts many of them.

Mr. Fredrick Frye—continued.

Sir Blundell Maple.

22. Have you the figures of the canvass?—I will give you those in detail presently.

Chairman.

23. You are now giving us the districts, and will give us the numbers afterwards?—I am giving the districts in which the papers were distributed. Then No. 4 District, East London, comprised the districts of Whitechapel and Mile End-road. We issued altogether 3,871 papers: 1,881 of these, or nearly 49 per cent., were returned signed. Six hundred and nine were rejected—withheld should be the phrase there, perhaps—and 1,374, or 35 per cent., were lost or spoilt.

Sir Blundell Maple.

24. What do you mean by lost or spoilt? Who decides whether they are spoilt?—They did not come back, or if they came back, they came back without signature.

25. There were 609 withheld; therefore they were not returned. The other 1,374 I conclude were all returned?—Six hundred and nine were rejected.

26. You said "withheld"?—I suggested "withheld"; but I see they were rejected by the persons to whom they were offered.

Chairman.

27. Were they distributed by the post or by hand?—By commissionaires from door to door.

28. Would not it mean that they declined to take in 609, and did not return the others?—That I think is the explanation. It wants clearness as it is put here. However, those 1,881 returned were analysed. Question No. 1 was as follows: "Do you think that the Shop Hours Regulation Act"—the Bill which was then before the House—"will effect an earlier closing of shops; Yes or no?" There was a majority of noes against that question of 422.

29. That it would not affect the general early closing?—It was not intended to.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

30. You did not ask them whether they were in favour of compulsory early closing?—I am coming to that. The second question was: "Are you in favour of compulsory closing at 8 p.m. and 10 p.m. on Saturdays? Yes or no?" The majority of ayes in favour of that question was 117.

Sir Blundell Maple.

31. The figures being what?—Nine hundred and fifty-four for, 847 against. Then question 3: "Do you think that Parliament should legislate at all on this subject; yes or no?" The majority of ayes 134; the figures being 966 for, 832 against. I may, with your permission, read this explanatory paragraph——

32. I think

Chairman.

32. I think you are reading from the Report of the Early Closing Association for 1886?—Yes. "An unsatisfactory feature of the canvass is the large percentage of papers lost or spoiled. Every effort was made to secure the return of missing papers, and two or three calls were made for that purpose in each instance. In one case a widow lady stated, 'My poor husband left me strict instructions never to sign anything.'"

33. The result of that inquiry and of the meetings held all over the country was to introduce a Bill giving, as it were, local option to the traders in different parts of the country to settle the hour instead of settling one general hour for early closing?—Yes; but prior to that I should like to mention a great meeting at the Mansion House, which was called to consider the Shop Hours Regulation Bill by a Traders Committee, formed from traders in various parts of London. The feeling of a part of the committee was hostile to legislation; but still the committee, as a whole, drew up certain resolutions favourable to legislation, which were to be submitted to this Mansion House meeting, and I may tell you that 700 representative traders attended that meeting, and next to the London Congress of 1888 it may be taken as the most representative meeting on the question that has been held in London.

Sir Blundell Maple.

34. What year was that?—1886.

Viscount Cranborne.

35. That is the year after this report you have read?—This was before the canvass. The resolutions as submitted by the Traders Committee were these:—"That in the opinion of this meeting the Shop Hours Regulation Bill, as at present framed, would not effect any appreciable good in the interests of youthful employés engaged in shops and warehouses. This meeting believes that no legislation designed to effect a curtailment of the hours of labour in such establishments will effect its object which does not seek to govern the hours at which the establishments are closed." Then the committee went on to submit this very significant resolution: "That, in the opinion of this meeting, the hardships arising from late shopping, and its consequent late closing, can only be removed, in many instances, by a compulsory closing of shops and warehouses (with specified exceptions) not later than 8 p.m. on five days of the week, and 10 p.m. on Saturdays, or such other day as local convenience may determine." I thought I was pretty well in touch with the feeling of the traders on this question, but the result of that meeting was a surprise to me.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

36. Was that the unanimous vote?—I am speaking of the resolutions submitted on behalf of the conveners of the meeting. I will tell you now what the result of the meeting was. An amendment to both of those resolutions was moved by Mr. Stapley, of the well-known firm of Stapley and Smith, of London Wall; and it was carried. Mr. Stapley's resolution ran as follows, "That, while heartily accepting Sir John Lubbock's Bill, though preferring 72 hours a week instead of 12 hours a day, which would undoubtedly confer a great benefit on young persons engaged in shops, this meeting earnestly prays Parliament to go further and to add a clause enabling a compulsory general closing at eight o'clock on five days of the week, and 10 o'clock on Saturdays, which would confer an inestimable benefit on the whole shopkeeping community, and relieve them from the intolerably long hours from which they now suffer."

Mr. Fredrick Frye—continued.

Chairman.

37. If I remember rightly, the amendment was carried by a very large majority?—Almost unanimously. I have a report from the trade paper which says, "The proceedings terminated with hearty cheers for Sir John Lubbock."

38. The Shop Hours Regulation Bill of course only referred to young people, but the resolutions adopted at that meeting were of a more general character?—Yes. The Shop Hours Regulation Bill referred to persons under 18 only, whereas it was felt that, as the oppression of late hours was very great as applying to the whole body of assistants, a greater measure was required to do justice to the issue at stake.

39. Yes, we have evidence of that. It has been submitted to them generally, has it not?—Yes, I may say, that I have been in towns from Dundee to Plymouth; I mean all the important towns, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Liverpool, and so on; and resolutions in many instances have been carried quite unanimously in favour of either of one of the two Bills, that is the Compulsory Bill before the London Congress in 1888, and the Glasgow Congress of 1889, or the present Bill, which is of a less drastic character.

40. I understand you to be speaking of public meetings?—Public town's meetings usually called at the Town Hall, and presided over by the Mayor. I will give you an instance of one.

41. Could you give us a list of them?—Yes, I can give you a list of those.

42. Perhaps you could put that list in?—Yes, I will do so. (Vide Appendix.) I will give an instance of the one at which I met most opposition. I may say it frequently falls to my lot to move the resolution in favour of the Bill, and this meeting at which I met with most opposition was one convened by the Mayor in his official capacity at Portsmouth in the Council Chamber. There was a large attendance of traders and assistants, but during the proceedings the assistants, not being ratepaying traders, were excluded from the inner portion of the chamber. There remained to vote on the question traders only. I moved a resolution in favour of the old Compulsory Bill for an eight o'clock closing and ten on Saturdays. My resolution was seconded, and then an amendment proposed by Mr. (now Sir) William Pink, ex-Mayor of Portsmouth, necessarily a very influential and very leading citizen. That amendment was seconded, and it was put to the vote. I am speaking from memory, but I can give you the facts from the Portsmouth daily newspaper that chronicled the proceedings: but, as far as my memory serves me, 121 traders remained to vote, and 111 voted for my resolution in favour of the Bill and 10 against.

Sir Blundell Maple.

43. In what year was that?—That was in 1890, I think.

44. Not before?—Yes, it was before that.

45. The old Bill was long before?—It must be before that.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

46. It was dead in 1888?—It was at the conclusion of the visits I made after the 1886 proceedings. I will put in the date.

Chairman.

47. That, of course, was a more stringent Bill than the present Bill. It would be fair to say that some of those opposed to that Bill would be in favour of the present Bill, but hardly anyone in favour of that Bill would be opposed to the present Bill?—I think it is very important to point that out, that much of the opposition to the old Compulsory Bill has been discounted now by the permissive and local option character of the present Bill.

48. Now, can you give us any evidence as to the opinion of the Trades Councils in different cities with reference to a Bill of this character?—Yes; the Trades Council of London passed a very important resolution: "That this delegate meeting, representing more than 26,000 adult artizans and mechanics in the Metropolitan district strongly denounces the system and practice of late shopping, as being fraught with injurious consequences, both morally and physically, to a vast portion of the overworked industrial population, and therefore earnestly urges all workers in the constituencies of the United Kingdom to call on their Parliamentary representatives to support Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill, which in its operation and result, is calculated to prove a blessing to those employed in shops, and an advantage to the national welfare."

49. Have any similar resolutions, as far as you know, been passed by other Trades Councils?—Yes; at Birmingham, Liverpool, and elsewhere, and I may say that the trade papers from time to time have reported the resolutions passed of a similar kind. In fact, they have been so numerous that we have not catalogued them. We have catalogued many important petitions that have been presented through the Early Closing Association, and I should like to give you a list of them.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

50. They are not traders?—No; not all.

Chairman.

51. Would you ascertain, and put in the names of the different Trades Councils who have passed resolutions in favour of this measure?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

52. And the dates?—Yes.

Chairman.

53. Then I think you have stated already that as regards the clauses of the Bill they were carefully considered by a congress of representative traders from different associations throughout the country that was held at Nottingham in 1893?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

54. And they were adopted by that congress?—Yes.

55. In your opinion the Bill is calculated to effect its object and work well?—It is the most workmanlike and practical measure that has been before the country.

Dr. Farquharson.

56. You have stated that a voluntary effort would be incompetent to grapple with the evils you have described. What are your reasons for that?—The Early Closing Association has had an experience of 50 years, and has expended 100,000*l.* in promoting voluntaryism, and we find, while many great and enduring reforms in respect of the half holiday by the entire wholesale trade and the principal retail houses have been effected, that in regard to the poorer districts we make no appreciable impression. But I should like to except from that statement our experience with regard to the introduction, during the past 10 to 15 years, of a weekly half-holiday; that is, a five o'clock closing, or two o'clock, in some districts, on Wednesdays or Thursdays. Except for that improvement we find that in many districts, for instance, Clapham, and Brixton in the south, and some of the northern suburbs, the hours are rather worse now than they were 10 years ago, and even 20 years ago; and to verify that statement I can compare letters from representative firms that I have received within the last few days, and I can turn to our 1875 report and show the hours at which the same firms were then closing, and they show a slight improvement on the hours of to-day.

57. What are the worst hours as a rule?—Take suburban London as a whole, and the average hours of closing are half-past nine amongst the rank-and-file of the retail shops. For instance, I find our friends who do not sometimes agree with us as to legislation, but who prefer altogether voluntary effort, were calling a meeting the other day to effect a nine o'clock closing in place of ten o'clock in Lambeth.

58. How many hours of work does that amount to in the day?—I have here the hours in 1887 for pretty well all the main metropolitan districts, Brixton, Brompton, Camberwell, Deptford, Edgware-road, Fulham, Hackney, and so on, and we find that they average about 83 or 84 hours per week before the introduction of a five o'clock closing.

Sir Blundell Maple.

59. In 1887?—I would say 80 to 85, and in some cases more.

60. Was there any Thursday closing whatsoever in 1887?—Yes, it was introduced in 1880.

61. Could you give the districts?—Yes. Beginning with Brixton, I find that in the Atlantic-road District for some time there had been a Wednesday closing, but it had fallen through. I can show you how it was broken up by a very small minority; but after the Wednesday closing had collapsed owing to this very small minority, the total hours per week reached 86; in Brompton, 80 to 82; and in Camberwell, 80 to 82. That is the average. We have treated them within rather than over the limit. In the Deptford District, allowing for five o'clock Thursday closing, the hours there remained 81. Even in such a West-end thoroughfare as the Edgware-road they were 80 to 82; and in Fulham they were 80 to 82. Then I should like to give Hackney. In Hackney, after allowing for Thursday five o'clock closing, the hours still remained 81, and that is putting in the large and small houses. If you excepted the large houses the average hours would show a higher rate, nearer 85 than 81.

such

Dr. Farquharson.

62. You told us, I think, that an important resolution in favour of early closing from the Trades Congress was passed on the consideration of the great moral and physical evils that resulted; was that a general statement, or was it based on any special evidence of those evils you describe?—I forget using that phrase.

63. I think the phrase "moral and physical evils" was used in the resolution?—Yes.

64. You have given us details of a large number of meetings held in different important centres in favour of early closing. Have there been any meetings held against the principle?—I do not remember any. There was one at the Cannon-street Hotel some years ago, called by a body which styled itself the Anti-Early Closing League, or something of that kind, but they never existed, except on paper, and the opposition, such as it was, died away.

65. Was that public meeting duly reported in the public press?—Probably; it was a trade meeting, and I wished to attend it, but the condition of ticket admission barred me, or at least I thought it would; I did not present myself.

Sir Blundell Maple.

66. Was not there a large public meeting in 1888 in Exeter Hall, at which Lord Charles Beresford presided?—I believe there was.

67. And they were unanimously against legislation?—I do not remember at all; I had forgotten it.

Dr. Farquharson.

68. You have given no evidence of the feeling of the employers; what is the reason for this large expression of opinion on the part of shopkeepers in favour of early closing against their own interests, as one would think, and their convenience?—They do not think so. It is for economical reasons largely and a humane reason as well. They themselves, the small shopkeepers and their wives suffer very greatly from the over strain, and they have said to me again and again, "My wife wants this; I want it; we never go out together except on Sundays or Bank Holidays."

69. Have there been any means taken, perhaps such means would be difficult, to find out the feelings of the shop assistants and workers, the actual people working in the shops on this question?—Yes, they are almost unanimous on it. I never knew of any opposition on the part of the assistants.

70. The small shopkeepers, who are their own servers, I suppose, very often, in small shops, have no one to help them; they do all the work themselves?—Those would be very small shops. Usually they have one or two assistants.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

Mr. Tennant.

71. Have you any opinion as to who the central authority ought to be in this Bill; it is put down in the Bill as "The local authorities"?—In London, the County Council.

72. Do you consider, personally, that it would be advisable for the County Council and the local authority generally speaking throughout the country to be the central authority?—In London, the County Council; elsewhere, in Birmingham, for instance, the Corporation.

73. Do you think that would be advisable?—Yes.

74. Might I ask if, in your opinion, when it comes to be a question of voting, that all shops alike should count as one vote?—One man one vote.

Sir Blundell Maple.

75. One shopkeeper one vote?—Speaking offhand, I should say that would be fair.

Mr. Tennant.

76. Whether the shop happens to be of the size of Marshall and Snelgrove's or a little linen drapers with one assistant?—I have not particularly studied that, but I should imagine you would have to abide by one man one vote.

Sir Blundell Maple.

77. One shopkeeper one vote, or one assistant?—When I say one man, I mean one shopkeeper.

Mr. Baldwin.

78. You mean one establishment?—Yes.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

79. I suppose you would say, that in any district the small shopkeepers, are the great majority?—Yes.

80. And therefore, under the Provisions of this Bill, no injury could be done to the small shopkeepers, in your opinion, because they would have the matter under their control?—Exactly.

81. Then you say, that in certain districts early closing has succeeded for a time; have you heard of any complaint on the part of the public of inconvenience being caused by it?—Never. As against that we have proved public sympathy by the great co-operation we receive from ladies' committees helping us in various districts, and such improvements as have been secured would have been impossible if we had not secured a large amount of public co-operation.

82. Are you aware that legislation of this sort has been carried out elsewhere?—Yes, more drastic legislation.

83. In Victoria, New South Wales, and New Zealand?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

84. In Victoria it has only just come into operation?—No, it has been in operation some years.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

85. Has that been a success?—Yes, I should say so. We had a lengthy correspondence with Melbourne in 1892, and we found there that the Shopkeepers' Association and the Assistants Association co-operated to bring about a a measure to secure those improvements in the then existing measure which are now in force.

86. Is not there, at the present time, a great agitation going on against this compulsory closing of shops in Melbourne?—I would not say a great agitation. There has been some objection, not so much to the principle of legislation as to what is thought to be the defects of the measure on the part of some. On the other hand the Government has so strongly upheld the existing law that it is likely to continue the law of the land.

87. Would you explain that measure?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with its details.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

88. I think if I am correctly informed no proposal has even been brought before the Parliament to modify that measure; the only proposals ever introduced have been to strengthen it?—That is so to the best of my knowledge. In fact, the state of public feeling, not only in the Australian Colonies, but in some parts of Canada, is running entirely in favour of legislation, and Great Britain is behind the Colonies.

Sir Blundell Maple.

89. Is it so in any other colonies besides those in the world; in France or Germany?—I know of no legislation in European countries.

90. None?—I will not say there is none, but I do not know of any.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

91. The early closing legislation in these colonies, I understand, is for a fixed hour of closing?—Yes.

92. And is, in some cases, local option?—Yes.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

93. You said at the beginning of your evidence you did not think there had been any improvements since 1886 in the closing of shops in big towns?—Not in the rank and file of the shops. Take Manchester, the Oldham-street District and many outlying districts. The condition of things is as bad now, as I am informed, as ever it was.

94. But the larger shopkeepers have made vast improvements, have they not?—Yes, I think I admitted that; great improvements.

95. And many of them, even in London, close at two on Thursday instead of five?—Yes, in some districts.

96. Would not you call that a great improvement?—Yes, certainly. Take the East-end of London, for instance. After two years' campaign and the expenditure of over 100*l.* in printing and advertising in respect to the opposition of one man alone, we carried a two o'clock closing in East London. That was for the drapers, not for all trades.

97. Have you any knowledge of how many associations there are in the country in favour of your Bill?—Traders' associations?

98. Yes.—There are very few to begin with, but I think I may say for the whole of the grocery trade, which is the best organised trade in the country (the drapery trade is not organised, and has not representative bodies as the grocery trade has); through its various town bodies and through its federation (all these Grocery Associations, Birmingham, Liverpool, and so on are federated in the Grocery Federation), have intimated that they are almost entirely in favour of legislation, and have passed resolutions to that effect.

99. I do not know anything about it personally, but I suppose you would be very surprised if you found that the majority of Grocery Associations throughout the country were opposed to this; it so happens that the members of the Federation are in favour of it only by a small majority?—My information is rather contrary to that. It is to this effect that if the influence of Sir William Pink, and yourself, and Mr. Cushen, of Mile End, who have been well-known opponents to legislation in the past, had been withdrawn the Federation would have repeated at its recent Congress the Resolution it passed at Birmingham. At the Birmingham Congress you did pass the specific Resolution in favour of the measure, and I think that reflects the opinion of the grocery trade throughout the country.

100. I may tell you that the London Association is not in favour of compulsory closing, and that is a large one?—The London Association is much ruled by one man.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

101. Might I ask you in that connection, if one of the two Grocers' Associations of Glasgow, passed a unanimous resolution, and the other with a minority of one in favour of the legislation?—The Scottish Association of Shopkeepers and Assistants in Glasgow, it must be taken as the Association of Scotland, is as keen as the Early Closing Association of London, in support of this Bill.

102. I am speaking of the petitions we received from the two Grocers' Associations?—Yes. We have in our evidence the resolution of the South Glasgow Grocers' Association, and on the other side, on the north of the river there.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

103. We shall hear of that from the next Witness?—Yes.

104. Is not there an important Voluntary Closing Association in London?—Yes. You say important, but I do not know of any improvement that has been won by it.

105. Do they represent a large number of shopkeepers?—I believe they do. We may differ as to numbers.

106. And I think I may say the great majority of those supporting your Association are the larger traders?—Oh, no. Take our report, you will see that a considerable percentage of our income is in five shillings and half-guineas from the smallest traders in London.

107. Do not you think this would be hard on the small shopkeeper, such as has been mentioned, who works in his shop with his wife and who who does all his business between six o'clock in the evening and nine o'clock at night, to compel him to shut at seven?—Well, you may say seven; but the Bill, you remember, is a permissive Bill and the hour is a movable one. East London might adopt nine, and South London nine, and other parts eight or seven.

108. Would that be a great improvement?—It would be a great improvement.

109. Nine o'clock?—Nine o'clock would be a great improvement in East London, certainly, and also in other parts of London.

110. Then there has been something said about the local authority. Do you think the London County Council would know what the wants of the East-end of London, for instance, were; would not you rather refer it to the local vestries?—No, I would let it remain as it is; but having heard the statement from a Member of the Committee as to the Home Office possibly constituting itself the central authority, that, I think, would be a distinct advantage.

111. How many shopkeepers do you think there are in London; of course you know?—I cannot say.

Sir Blundell Maple.

112. Is it over 100,000?—I should not think so.

113. Is it over 200,000?—I should think it is less than 100,000, employers only.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

114. The canvass you had against the closing of shops by compulsion was only 3,871?—Yes.

115. And they were issued throughout London pretty well?—No, only in those four districts, one middle-class and three poor districts.

116. You would not call Oxford-street a poor shopkeeping street?—No, a middle-class and fashionable area, and three poor ones.

117. Then I take it there were 1,880 returned, and there were 609 withheld, and 1,300 lost, so that more than half did not vote at all?—Fifty-one per cent. did not vote, but had they voted, it is as likely, if not more likely, they would have voted for than against.

118. Has the present Bill been really submitted to these associations and been discussed, or have you simply had resolutions from them in favour of early closing of shops?—What associations do you refer to?

119. The associations throughout the country?—Yes, the Bill has been discussed, and there have been constantly public meetings since 1893.

Sir Blundell Maple.

120. Can you give a single place, excepting Nottingham, where this Bill was discussed in its details?—You say discussed in its details; no.

121. It has not been discussed?—No, the details of the Bill were not considered so much as the general principle. For 10 or 20 years past the Early Closing Bills have been popularly known as Sir John Lubbock's Bill, and have contained very much of the essence of the present Bill. If it were left with the traders alone, I think Sir John Lubbock would get the eight o'clock closing, but to make the Bill less drastic in appearance, and less objectionable, perhaps, to the Legislature, it has been re-drafted, and so now, instead of traders having to get themselves out of it, under onerous conditions, as they would have had to do in respect of the old Bill, it is now of such a reasonable and moderate character that they have actually to vote themselves into it.

122. Would you think that more than 1,000 places in the East-end of London have voluntarily closed since the date you mentioned of 1887?—Not since 1887. Our half-holiday campaign for the East-end of London has extended from 1881 down continuously to the present date, and it was in 1889–90 we carried the two o'clock extension. We had previously carried the five o'clock, not for every trade, but for the principal trades, drapers, grocers, and others.

Mr. Baldwin.

123. I think you said that you had visited all the principal towns in England on this question?—Yes, meaning by that what is usually termed the principal towns.

124. I want to come away from the large towns, of which I know very little; but this Bill may be applied, of course, in rural districts and in small towns?—Yes.

125. Have you any information as to the hour of work, say, in country districts in shops showing the necessity for legislation as affecting those districts?—I have no evidence at my fingers' ends, but the necessity for the Bill would not be so great in small towns and agricultural districts.

126. I take it, the hours of work in rural districts are not long?—No, probably not. Take a town like Gloucester or Hereford.

127. I mean much smaller towns than that, because this Bill might be applied to the whole country?—Yes. Eight o'clock closing on ordinary nights and 10 to 12 on Saturdays would usually obtain in a small town. They might be later on market days.

128. On one day in the week?—On two days; that is on market day and on Saturday nights, market days usually being on Wednesday or Thursday.

129. I think it is very often Saturday?—Very often market day is on Wednesday or Thursday. I may say, as to that, that I edit and compiled "The Commercial Travellers' Guide to the Market Days and Early Closing Days," and I found that in the great majority of cases, certainly in a considerable majority of towns, Saturday is not the market day.

130. Do not you think in the last few years there has been a great extension in small towns of a half holiday in the week?—Within the past 10 years, yes.

131. I know it applies to a large number of small towns in the district I represent?—Yes, that may be so.

132. The authority for closing in a rural district would be the rural sanitary authority; do not you think it would be a very difficult thing in large rural sanitary authorities such as I am acquainted with to apply the same rule to all the different parishes within that authority?—You mean by parishes the small towns.

Mr. Baldwin—continued.

133. The local sanitary authority may include 20 or even 30 parishes?—Yes, they would take each district on its merits.

134. Each parish separately?—Yes. One parish might be a town of 3,000 or 4,000 inhabitants, and others mere villages.

135. Others might be 300 or 400?—Precisely.

136. Have you any evidence as to the feeling in the country districts about this early closing, or in the small towns of 3,000 or 4,000?—Yes, some of them have sent up petitions in favour of the Bill.

137. Perhaps you would let us know what those small towns are?—I will endeavour to do so.

138. Perhaps you will put that evidence in?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

139. I think you have been connected with this Early Closing Association for 25 years?—Not 25, but nearly 20; 19 to be exact.

140. And all the early closing of shops has been by voluntary act, has it not?—Yes.

141. You remember that years ago all shops were opened very late in all parts?—I do not remember as to all. Take the suburban parts of London, I do not remember they were ever later than they are now, and I remember many instances where they were earlier.

142. All the large shops of London where they have a great quantity of employés?—Those were open. I am speaking of the smaller shops, but as to the large shops the Early Closing Association has won, as I said before, a great improvement with regard to them.

143. Do you think the large shops, where there are thousands of employés, could be closed any earlier than they are now?—I do not think the Bill would touch them.

144. The object of the Bill is to assist, is it not, in getting less hours for the employés in shops?—Yes.

145. The great majority of shop assistants are employed in the large shops, are they not?—That has never been ascertained; probably they are.

146. You would say, taking London, that two or three times as many shop assistants are employed in shops employing 10 assistants and over as by all the shopkeepers employing assistants below that number?—Yes, roughly speaking, that is so; that is a generalisation that one might make.

147. You support this legislation because you contend that voluntary action has ceased to have effect; is that so?—It has ceased to make the progress that the traders themselves declare to be necessary for the health and well-being of their assistants, and for economical reasons to themselves.

148. You would say that your Early Closing Association has not been able to get any further early closing by voluntary action?—Not further than we have gone. We have gone a great way.

149. You are at a standstill?—Year by year we bring about a certain number of improvements, averaging over 1,000 improvements during the past four or five years, but then the mischief is, as in the case of Brixton, one or two men come along and upset the whole thing, and the work has to be done over again, not always successfully.

150. It is done over again?—Not always. We have at the moment several metropolitan cases where one man is wrecking the movement. I presided at a meeting of assistants and others at Finsbury Park last week, where early closing was established two or three years ago. Then a business changed hands, and the new proprietor says, "I will not adopt this five o'clock closing." We receive letters from other traders, and they say to us, "We beg to call your attention to the fact that So-and-so has not closed at five o'clock, and unless he closes forthwith we shall abandon the practice." Then we have to go up. In this particular instance I met this man three times myself and exhausted my persuasive powers upon him, and he said, "No; I will let the young fellows off; but the missis and I will run the show ourselves."

151. He would let the men have a holiday, but would keep the shop open?—I said, "So certainly as you do this you will be the occasion of wrecking this movement for hundreds, if not more, of assistants, and for small employers, those persons who approve of it and say it is no loss to them."

152. This Bill is to close shops?—Yes.

153. But supposing that the shop was allowed to be open and the shop assistants to be away, some one part of the week and some another, the shop assistants would get shorter hours?—They would not, unless some compulsory power enacted it.

154. Supposing the Shop Hours Regulation Bill, which regulates the employment of young people in shops was extended to adult labour, would not that involve less hours of work for the shop assistants?—That would do it if it was strictly applied, but it is not believed to be a satisfactory method of procedure.

155. By whom?—By the traders and by shop assistants generally.

156. There is a Bill, the Shop Hours Regulation Act, which was passed in 1892?—Yes.

157. Limiting the employment of young people in shops to 74 hours per week, including the meal hours. Supposing the Legislature considered it advisable to limit adult labour to 74 hours per week, would not that be a better way than forcing the shops to be closed?—It might be, but on the other hand you would introduce a new element into factories and shops legislation that I do not think the House of Commons would ever allow. In factory legislation adult male labour is not interfered with.

158. Are factories closed by legislation?—No.

159. Are mines closed by legislation?—No.

160. Is there any other place employing workpeople closed by Act of Parliament excepting licensed premises, such as public-houses?—I do not know of any.

161. You would suggest that Parliament should introduce the compulsory closing of shops to get shop assistants less hours of labour?—Yes.

162. You

162. You think that necessary?—Yes; being the most practical way out of the difficulty.

163. Out of what difficulty?—The oppression of shop assistants, and the loss of health, and even of money, and to curtail the extravagant method of conducting business, burning gas, and spoiling goods, till 9 or 10 at night, when, without inconvenience to the public or hardship to the shopkeeper, they might equally well be closed at 7 or 8 o'clock.

164. You say without inconvenience; take shop assistants now employed in the large shops; when is he to do his shopping if these small shops are closed at the same time?—At the times they do it now, in the majority of cases; they get out in the early morning hours to do their shopping.

165. During business hours?—Yes.

166. Where?—Take your neighbours, Shoolbred's; one of Shoolbred's assistants finds no difficulty in getting out to buy a hat or get his hair cut.

167. Do they make it a rule at Shoolbred's to allow shop assistants when they come to their business to go out and do their shopping?—There are things that are not put down in rules, and that is one of them.

168. An exception is made, no doubt, in all large shops for a young man to go out, but for a general rule do you mean to say that any shop assistant is allowed after he comes to business to go out and make his purchases?—I will not say as a general rule, but I will say this, that the condition of things generally obtaining would allow those young men's purchases or what not to be made some time during the business hours. They would slip out at a slack moment.

169. Where you have 2,000 or 3,000 people?—Well, I know they do in many cases.

170. You have said just now that the shops that kept open latest were in the suburbs; do you know the reason why those shops in the suburbs are open so late?—I do not think I said that. I did speak of suburban districts as being typically late, but I should say the districts are found even at the West-end.

171. You said that in the suburbs the shops were open later?—Later than at the West-end.

172. Do you know the reason for that lateness; is it not a fact that the shops open there early, and that all the people who reside in the neighbourhood go to their different businesses in the centre of London, and do not return until late at night, and that although the shops are open the employés are some of them away during the middle of the day, and the shops partly closed?—I do not take that to be the explanation.

173. Have you been down in my own constituency, where you will find street upon street where it is like that?—You must remember it is not the people who do the shopping that go to the City. It is the wives, who remain at home.

174. There are the workwomen, and there is no end of female employment now. The women go to business and return in the evening, and do their shopping in the evening?—I regard the number of women who would go from a district like Penge to the City and return late as being very few. Usually the workwomen in the East-end of London, where they are most numerous, live about the factories. Take the large match factories, for instance, and others. There they live close at hand. They live practically in the same districts in which they do their work.

175. Do you contend that shopkeepers keep their shops open because there are no customers?—No, I do not maintain that at all. I maintain this: they keep their shops open because of the idle and vicious practice, the thoughtless and cruel practice, of people doing their shopping at a late hour, who could perfectly well do it at any hour of the day, after their husbands had left for the City and before the time they returned.

176. Then they wait for their husbands to come back?—Yes, in many cases they do, and regard it as a kind of recreation, heedless of the cruelty it entails on the assistants; and then they go out frequently, not so much to shop, as to have a look at the windows.

177. You told us just now that you have been procuring 1,000 early closings every year during the last few years by this voluntary action?—Yes.

178. And everywhere you are prepared to acknowledge that during the last 10 years there has been, amongst the majority of small shopkeepers, the half-holiday given in the week?—Not quite everywhere.

179. Therefore the shop assistants generally are far better off than they were 10 years since?—In respect to the weekly closing, but with reference to the total hours of work they are not.

180. If they have half-holidays, and do not remain open later on other days of the week, surely they must be better off?—They do remain later; that is where the difficulty is.

181. Where?—In Clapham——

182. But generally. Do not point out one street?—I am giving you one at a time. I cannot give them altogether. Years ago two of the leading traders, Mr. Wright and Mr. Barrett, in Clapham canvassed to maintain what for years had been the custom in Clapham of eight o'clock closing. That has fallen through in the last 12 years. The hour in Clapham to-day is from 8 to 9.30, except in the case of Messrs. Grice and Son, who, with their neighbours all round them closing later, maintain an eight o'clock closing. Then we come to Brixton. Brixton is closing later on the Promenade and the better houses, excepting the Bon Marché, than it has been doing at any period that I recollect, and if we go to districts in the north such as Kingsland, Stoke Newington, Hackney, the hours there are, in some instances, going back as a consequence of the half-holiday.

183. That is your experience?—It is not only my experience, but I can give you the hours and the names of firms once closing earlier.

184. Would you bring us a list of all these places, or some of them?—Yes.

185. You are aware that there is a voluntary early-closing association existing in London?—Yes.

186. Of which I happen to be president?—Yes.

187. And which is opposed to this legislation altogether?—Yes; some of them, and others were not always so opposed.

188. They

188. They seceded from you because you took up with compulsion?—I can show you that in your own case, and in the case of your chairman, treasurer, and other officers, you have all stated that you were in favour of legislation of some sort.

189. Not for compulsory closing of shops. Short hours of labour for employés, but not for closing of shops?—However, I will not pursue that.

190. That is the point?—I might show that gentlemen interested in the Voluntary Association have given the strongest evidence possible, and I should like to put in Mr. Pomeroy's evidence, the founder of the Voluntary Association, from the Blue Book of 1886, where he said he had been deadly opposed to legislation, but was now on the side of legislation.

191. Now, as regards this Bill, you have studied it thoroughly?—Yes.

192. I see that it says here that "district" means the area in which the local authority has jurisdiction?—Yes.

193. Therefore, you would propose, according to this Bill, that the whole of the County of London should be one district?—I should not propose that. The Bill says, "Any district, or part of a district."

194. How would you proceed to find out the two-thirds of any particular class of traders?—We would canvass them.

195. Who would canvass them?—The Early Closing Association through its officials, or no doubt bodies of traders themselves would do it.

196. Who would be the authority to certify? Would you get their signatures?—Yes.

197. Who would be the authority to check the signatures to ensure that two-thirds of the shopkeepers assented. For instance, take the bakers; how are you going to test as to the number of bakers in any particular district?—We should have to find that out, and get their signatures.

198. Who is going to find that out?—The canvassers appointed.

199. Who is going to get the signatures?—The persons entrusted with the duty.

200. Who is going to find the money?—Money so far has been found to carry on the voluntary movement, and it would be found to carry this Bill to its logical conclusion; to carry out the Act when it was passed. No difficulty presents itself to my mind in that respect.

201. Take, for instance, round the centre of Oxford-street; there are a large number of small shops in the back streets, are not there?—Yes.

202. A lot of small drapers?—Yes.

203. Take the case of Marshall & Snelgrove; if two-thirds of these small traders in that district desire to close on a Wednesday instead of a Saturday, by your Bill they would have the power of closing Marshall and Snelgrove's on the Wednesday?—Not if the recommendation of the Nottingham Congress is carried out.

204. What is that?—That is that any houses closing not later than five o'clock on Saturdays for a period of three months prior to the passing of the Bill shall be exempt.

Sir Blundell Maple—continued.

205. From the action of the Bill altogether?—In respect of the half-holiday.

206. This deals with every night, does it not?—Yes——

Viscount Cranborne.

207. That resolution is not in the Bill?—The promoters have promised to introduce these recommendations.

208. That is one that is proposed to be introduced?—Yes, that is proposed to be introduced in Committee.

Sir Blundell Maple.

209. The Nottingham Congress took place in 1893?—Yes.

210. And this Bill has been drafted since then?—No, it has not. It stands as it did.

211. Then, again, the classification of trades. How are you going to divide the trades?—I should ask permission to say with reference to Oxford-street, which you mentioned just now, that does present a difficulty in carrying out the Bill, but taking London as a whole there are many districts which lend themselves by their geographical features to the purposes of the Bill. I will give you a number of them; for instance, Balham. I was going through a list of districts in my work during the past year. The Balham district is self-contained, and the Clapham traders would not interfere on the one hand, nor the Tooting traders on the other——

212. Is there not a question of one street in Balham?—The County Council would make an order covering the whole of Balham.

213. To decide where the line should be drawn across streets in a district?—There is no necessity to draw lines through streets.

214. Would you take it according to the Vestries?—We are not talking of Vestries. The London County Council having jurisdiction over the entire district, would naturally include the whole of the district, so far as the shops went. Take the districts of Balham and Battersea, and Battersea Park-road, Bow, Brixton, Clapham, Camden Town and Kentish Town——

215. In Camden and Kentish Towns there are some traders there who now close early on Saturdays?—Only one.

216. And earlier on the other days in the week?—There is very little early closing in Camden and Kentish Towns. I only know of one firm closing on Saturday, and their hours are five on Saturdays and eight other nights. Then we come to Clapham. That is a self-contained area; Clapham Junction is another, Deptford another, Enfield another, Forest Gate, Fulham, Hackney and Clapton, Hammersmith, Holloway, and Seven Sisters'-road, and Finsbury Park——

217. Take Holloway; there are a lot of large places there?—Only two—Messrs. Jones Bros. and Crisp's.

218. But they close early now?—One of them does, the other does not.

219. What time do they close every night?—Jones Brothers' close at four on Saturdays, and seven to eight other nights.

220. Seven o'clock?—I wish to give Messrs. Jones the full credit.

221. And

221. And the other shop — Crisps'? — At Crisps' they are frequently open till nine, and the doors at some times are not punctually closed then.

222. Their regular hour for closing, is what?—They do not appear to have any; at least, I am not acquainted with it. They have frequent sales during many periods of the year. I think they have as many as three or four sales in the course of the year, and they do as much trade as they can.

223. They have a regular time for closing?—It is a late house. Then there are many other districts. I have got 48 metropolitan districts, all of which lend themselves, by reason of their geographical boundaries, to the purposes of this Bill, and in which it could be put in operation.

224. And a large town like Brighton?—Thoroughly well.

225. That would be one town by itself?—Yes.

226. You would canvass the whole of that?—Yes.

227. As to each particular trade?—As to the drapers, or to all trades.

228. I am not talking about drapers, but dealing here with bakers, butchers, and all classes of trades?—Yes.

229. Tell me who is to decide to which trade a man belongs who keeps different things. Take these large places like Whiteley's, in London, or any of the large places all over the country, where they sell butchers' meat, bread and fish, boots and shoes, and drapery. I see by this Bill, in Clause 5: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them." So that if the butchers decide to close on a Monday at four o'clock, Whiteley's would have to close at four o'clock?—Yes, unless——

230. And if the bakers closed at four o'clock on Tuesdays Whiteley's would have to close?—Whiteley's would be exempt if the recommendation of the Nottingham Congress is carried, as we hope it will be—we pin ourselves to that—owing to the fact that for many years past he has closed at two on Saturdays.

231. That is only a question of one half-holiday in the week. Your exemption deals with the half-holiday subject only?—Yes.

232. It does not deal with the other, too?—You were speaking of the half-holiday.

233. I am speaking of early closing. Supposing it is four o'clock, for instance, as regards the butchers, and then the bakers the next night four o'clock, then the bootmakers the next night four o'clock, or for the purpose of my illustration it might be that they closed at five o'clock on these particular nights?—They could not in practice.

234. Well, say six o'clock?—They would not in practice, because there is not a butcher's within reach of Whiteley's which closes until eight or nine o'clock, and his closing hour is seven.

235. My experience is that butchers close on Mondays, or a great many butchers, as early as two o'clock?—Yes, that is their early-closing day in some places.

236. Then, supposing they decide to close on Mondays at two, would Whiteley's have to close?—Whiteley's would be exempt, if our recommendation is carried out, on account of being a Saturday-closing house.

237. If they closed one day a week early, they may open on all other days of the week as long as they like?—My answer is that they have been closed on Saturdays for a period of three months prior to the passing of this Bill, and they get exemption with regard to the half-holiday.

238. But with regard to every night closing?—The existing conditions would exempt them. You spoke of Brighton; take the Hove stores.

239. Keep to Whiteley's for the moment?—He is already hours in advance of the butchers in the locality.

240. Whiteley does not close at six?—At seven.

241. You say in your Bill six o'clock?—Not earlier than six. In practice, the butchers about Whiteley's do not close until two or three hours after he does, so that they are not likely to propose to go up to the seven o'clock closing at a jump.

242. You say, by this Clause 5, that a shop which keeps these different things is to be reckoned as of one particular class. So that Whiteley's or any of these large shops would be all of them recognised as belonging to one of these trades, and would have to close according to the decision of the people in that particular locality. Would not that be so?—As you have mentioned Whiteley's, it is only fair to remember that the existing condition that now obtains would practically exempt him from the Bill, and other similar houses.

243. Not by this Bill?—Because he closes hours earlier than any of them, adding the recommendation I spoke of just now.

244. Again you refer to Whiteley's district. As there is no line laid down, and nothing said in this Bill as to the particular districts, how are you to define this district. How big an area is a district to be?—All that is left to the judgment of the local authority, or rather it is left to those who would initiate the operation of the Bill. Where an area could be defined and the signatures were obtained, the local authority would have power to confirm the districts suggested to them.

245. The local authority is to confirm the signatures in some district. Who is to decide what is the district?—The traders themselves.

246. They might take, for instance, one side of Tottenham Court-road as a district, and in that way it would be a district without touching the houses at the back?—You must have regard to the probabilities of what would be done. There would be no probability, or even possibility, of getting a sufficient majority of traders on one side of the street to put the Bill into force with the knowledge that the other side might remain open.

247. But there are turnings leading out of that street. This Bill is a Bill for giving local option?—Yes.

248. Do not you consider it is necessary to define all the localities?—Not in the Bill; the

Bill is sufficiently good in that respect as it stands.

249. You leave it to the different bodies mentioned in this Bill to define the different lots of houses according to your description, which is to confirm a district?—They would have regard to the petition put before them. The petition, I presume, would settle the boundaries of the district. You would either succeed or fail in getting your petition. If you succeeded, in the petition itself would be set out the district to be covered by the hours of closing. I admitted just now that you put your finger on a weak spot with reference to Oxford-street, and an equally weak spot with reference to Tottenham Court-road.

250. To any of the streets the same argument would apply?—No, not in the districts I have suggested. So far as districts may run into, and would overlap each other, we admit the Bill is weak there, but we say the Bill is strong with reference to areas that are self-contained, and which do not present these difficulties of overlapping. I have mentioned some of those districts, and I have a list of 48 of them in which the Bill could be put in force without presenting any of the difficulties to which you allude.

251. I am going to ask you now a very important question. Is it not the fact that you consider this Bill, with these different districts, would be unworkable in London?—In some central parts of London, perhaps.

252. Have you not expressed it, that it would be unworkable in London?—No, not as applied to London as a whole.

253. It would not really be an effective measure in London?—The answer I gave you just now sufficiently replies to that. I have said to you personally, that a great difficulty does exist with reference to Tottenham Court-road or Oxford-street, but we must not make the most of the difficulties.

254. All over London?—No, not all over London. Take a district like Hammersmith, thoroughly self-contained, or any of these 48 I have here, and I do not see any difficulty with regard to the Bill; but if you speak of Central London, there I admit is difficulty.

255. As regards the grocers who have off-licenses, would you not call them still grocers?—Yes.

256. And grocers that have not got off-licenses would therefore be able to close the grocers that have got off-licenses?—Yes.

257. And by this Bill you do not touch the public-houses?—No, we have regard to the difficulties of the situation.

258. Now, I notice you exempt refreshment houses and places where hot cooked provisions are sold?—Yes.

259. Why not cold cooked provisions?—Then the grocer would come in with his cold tinned food.

260. Supposing a grocer sold hot cooked provisions as well, would he be exempt?—No, he would not be exempt then, if he continued to carry on his primary business of a grocer.

261. Why not; it says here "refreshment houses and places where hot cooked provisions are sold"?—If you go to another part of the Bill you will see that where a tradesman comes under the operation of the Bill with reference to one part of his business he is equally under it for all purposes.

262. Where do you find a trade where hot cooked provisions are sold and not other things sold?—The exemption of hot cooked provision shops has reference to those purely ham and beef warehouses——

263. Do not they sell cold cooked things?—Those ham and beef cook-shops where they have hot sausages and hot what you like in the neighbourhood of theatres, and they are purely refreshment houses.

264. Do not they sell cold ham?—Cold ham.

265. Then would not they come under the provisions of that clause you referred to?—No, because they are wholly and solely refreshment houses. They are refreshment houses, and not grocers or bootmakers, or anything else.

266. But would bakers who sell hot tarts and cups of tea be under this Bill or not?—There are bakers and bakers.

267. I entirely agree. The difficulty is to classify them; and what authority is to classify the trades?—There are many shops, like the Aërated Bread Company's shops and Lyons', where they sell cakes and so on; but they are, as we all know, first and foremost, and almost entirely, refreshment houses.

268. There is a clause dealing with chemists?—Yes.

269. You are going to close chemists' shops?—By the chemists' desire, because when the inquiry was proceeding as to what trades were in favour of this Bill we found from the chemists' trade papers that the chemists themselves were in favour of it. One of the trade papers undertook a canvass of the trade of London, and I forget what the figures were, but the figures were sufficient to justify us in putting chemists into the measure. They had stood exempt before.

270. But a chemist is not allowed to keep his shop open. "This section shall not be deemed to authorise a pharmaceutical chemist and druggist to keep open shop after the said hour"; but he may supply medicines. Where are you going to draw the line?—If he begins to sell packet tea; and that is what they usually do sell.

271. Supposing a patient is ordered tea by the doctor?—Well, it is not a drug or medicine.

272. Is a chemist not to sell eau de Cologne?—I should say not.

273. Though prescribed by a doctor?—Well, I never heard of it being prescribed. It is treated as an ordinary article of scent.

274. Or different articles which are necessary, such as bandages or brushes?—Then you come to what are purely drug appliances.

275. Brushes?—Not brushes.

276. Ice bags or hot water bottles, or cough lozenges?—We seek to minimise the difficulties.

277. If we want to pass a Bill through the House of Commons, and make it an Act of Parliament, it is a serious thing, and we want to examine this thoroughly to see if the measure is to be taken through the House of Commons, that it is a workable thing, and a thing desired by the public generally. We know this Bill is your work, and that you have been agitating for it?—Oh, no.

Viscount Cranborne.

278. I suppose, really, the case which you make is this: that what I think you described as the moral and physical evils of keeping shops open are so great that the public must be prepared to put up with a certain amount of inconvenience in order to stop these great evils?—I hardly admit the inconvenience. I say they are entirely on our side, or almost wholly so.

279. I do not want to press you about it, but the reason for the passing of this Bill is the moral and physical evils of these late hours?—They see the result in broken-down constitutions, and they wish success to our proposals.

280. I do not wish to ask questions about matters which are not within your knowledge, and you will tell me if I am going beyond what you know, but in what respect do the long hours in shops produce moral evils?—The expression "moral evils" is not mine.

281. You would not represent that?—No.

282. It is a physical question?—Physical to the assistants and economical to the shopkeepers.

283. You would not put the economical difficulty so high as the physical difficulty?—No; the health and well-being of these tens of thousands of assistants should, I think, press in the first place on the attention of Parliament.

284. Looked at from a purely economical point of view, the public may be looked upon as on an equal footing with the traders, and their wishes and interests ought to be considered as highly as the traders, inasmuch as the traders make money out of the public?—I think the traders find this, that the public are so keen to make a profit, even of a farthing on the article sold, that they are bound to study their own considerations.

285. I do not quite follow that?—I think this, that the shopkeepers find that the public are so indifferent to them, and so keen to make a saving even of a farthing on a single article sold, and that a lady shopping would rather go into one shop and get a thing for 9¾*d.* than pay 10*d.* for it in another——

286. You would yourself, I suppose?—Well, I need not answer that, perhaps.

287. That is the general view?—You may take it that in these days of keen competition; the shopkeepers finding the customers are indifferent to them, and that they will go where things are cheapest, naturally themselves begin to consider how they can get a larger share of custom by selling their things cheaper, and to sell their things cheaper they must begin and find out every possible point in the economy of conducting business. One great point that presents itself is this, that by closing at eight instead of nine and ten they do make a great saving, and are thereby enabled to compete with the man across the way, who sells an article cheaper than they do.

288. From that point of view, the traders come to Parliament to save themselves money?—Yes. And——

289. And to make them to put, in fact, money in their pockets?—Yes, for one consideration; and as humane men they wish to save their assistants.

290. I wish to leave that question out for the moment. I do not desire for a moment to appear offhand to condemn the view you have put forward, but you are aware that that constitutes an entire exception in legislation to put money in the pockets of a particular class of traders?—I think what you require to know in this Committee is, how far do the traders support this measure, and whatever the reasons, we are bringing out the fact that they do support it.

291. Of course it is most important, and the Chairman would stop me if I were examining you except from a trader's point of view. I want your answer, after all, to this, that the traders have no right to be considered more than the public, have they?—Where their health suffers, I think they have.

292. Leave the health question out for a moment. I want to finish the economical question first. As between the lady who wishes to buy for 7¾*d.* instead of 8*d.*, and the trader who would prefer to sell for 8*d.* instead of 7¾*d.*, the lady has as much right to be considered as the trader?—I do not know what your object is.

293. That is the case you put yourself, but I will not press you. I have, perhaps, gone far enough. I may summarise it in this way. As I understand, one of the reasons you put forward for this Bill was that it would constitute an economy to the trader?—That is one reason. I also mentioned another——

294. I want to ask you whether, as a matter of fact, the economy to the trader would not ultimately come out of the pockets of the public?—I do not say it would, it would go into them.

295. Or out of the inconvenience of the public?—We do not admit the inconvenience. We do not see that it exists. We are told—the shopkeepers say—that they can do their business equally well within 10 hours of the day, or even less than that, as in 12 hours, the present time.

296. Now, let me ask you a question about the other point. You most candidly said you put that matter higher—the health of those engaged in the trade—the traders and the assistants?—Of course, as a philanthropic body, we do, naturally.

297. You put that in the first place?—Yes.

298. I should like to ask you for the moment about the hours. You told us that all over London, or in the suburbs of London, the shops were open on an average from 82 to 85 hours per week?—I gave you the hours as 81 to 82 that they were employed, as being the number after deducting the provision for the five-o'clock Thursday closing. Where that provision does not exist the number may amount to 85, and frequently more.

299. Where it does exist the number is about 80?—Eighty to 82.

300. When you say the shops are open, I suppose the traders are not actively employed the whole of that time?—There is a double answer to that. The first is that there are slack moments of the day. The second is, that there are many busy periods when they are kept in after the shutters are up. The hours I have given are quite irrespective of any work behind the shutters. When the shop is closed there is a vast amount of work done, especially at Christmas and periods of special trade, up to midnight.

301. That is not quite the answer to my question. I want to know whether throughout the whole of the 82 hours during which the shop remains open the employés are actively engaged?—They are supposed to be. If they are not actually serving the customers, they are engaged in various works of preparation.

302. I suppose there is an interval for meals, for example?—Yes, the meal intervals are unsatisfactory altogether. They are usually 30 minutes for dinner, and 20 minutes for tea. That is not enough.

303. Whatever it is, it must be deducted upon the analogy of the Factory Acts from the work, in considering the amount of work which is done by the employés. That must be deducted?—If it is deducted, the over-work must be added to make a fair statement; that is, the work after the shutters are up.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

304. There is a breakfast time as well as a dinner time in many of these shops?—It depends. Sometimes yes, and sometimes no. Where a house opens at nine (that is rather exceptional), the breakfast would be taken before that. Where a house opens at seven to eight, breakfast sometimes is after.

Sir Blundell Maple.

305. When a shop opens at nine, what time would it close?—In an early-closing district or a fashionable district it might close at seven or eight, but in a poorer district nine or ten.

Viscount Cranborne.

306. You will quite understand you are speaking to a person not very familiar with the subject. Take the suburban districts; what hours do they open there in the morning?—In various trades it varies. In the provision trades, where they sell articles of food for breakfast, they open from 7 to 8. That is the grocery and provision trades. In the drapery trades it is more commonly 8 to 9, and in some cases 8.30. I can put in at the end of my evidence the figures of the canvass we took in the Old Kent-road some time ago, and I can show that those hours have remained as late now as they were then.

307. No doubt the Chairman will wish you to put that in?—It supplies a full answer to the question you put to me, and is not only true of the Old Kent-road, but other districts.

308. I only wanted an instance to inform myself and the Committee upon. Let us take the drapery trade. They open at nine o'clock?—Eight to nine.

Sir Francis Powell.

309. When you come before us again I should be glad to know something about mid-day meals. You spoke about half an hour being allowed. I should like some authority for that?—I shall be pleased to give it you.

Mr. HENRY HORSMAN, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

310. You have come here representing the Manchester District of the Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks' Association?—That is so; the National Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks is our title.

311. How long has that body been in existence?—About six years.

312. About how many members does it consist of?—About 600 paying members in Manchester at the present time.

313. Could you tell the Committee what the general hours are of the shop assistants in Manchester?—It varies according to the districts. In Manchester we have some shops which close as early as seven.

314. What time do they open?—We find the shops that close the earliest open the latest, and the reverse is the rule, that the shops that close the latest open the soonest.

315. You have not yet answered the question how long the hours generally are?—It varies; some close at seven, others at eight, others at nine, some at 10, and some at 11 o'clock.

316. You have not told us when they open?—Eight o'clock is the usual time with some of them. To be at business at half-past eight is about the average time of the shop assistants of Manchester.

317. Do I understand, as a general rule, that the shops open at eight, that some close at seven, some at eight, some at nine and ten?—Up to 11 o'clock.

Chairman—continued.

318. Eleven o'clock would be only, I presume, on the Saturday?—Yes.

319. On other days of the week too?—Yes.

320. Are there any large numbers who are open as late as the times you mention?—Yes.

321. There are large numbers open as late as 9, 10, and 11 o'clock?—Yes. There are very large numbers open till nine and a considerable number open to 10, and we have numbers who are open as late as 11 o'clock.

322. Then a large number of the shop assistants are kept till the late hours you mention?—That is so.

323. Do you find in Manchester districts in which there is earlier opening and closing, or is it about stationary, or how is it?—We have not found much improvement of late.

324. You would say that matters are stationary?—There has been a slight shuffling of the cards, if I may use such a term. We have got a weekly half-holiday to some extent, but we find some of the firms have simply adjusted matters by making it a little more on to other days. We have got a Wednesday closing to a considerable extent, but some of the large employers have the men working later on Tuesday and Thursday in consequence.

325. Then you speak of a half-holiday; at what what hour does that half-holiday commence?—One o'clock on Wednesday.

326. Then it would seem rather to follow that voluntary action has not been making much progress in Manchester of late?—It has not.

327. What is the opinion of your association as to the prospects of shortening the hours by voluntary action?—The opinion is that there can be no result from voluntary effort. As fast as we make an improvement in one district it goes wrong in another.

328. Is your association in favour of legislation?—Strongly in favour of it.

329. And is that practically the unanimous opinion of your association?—I think so. We have passed resolutions at our annual conferences for two or three years to that effect, but I can only speak for the Manchester district. That is the only district I am personally acquainted with, and that I have responsibility in connection with in this matter.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

330. Are you an officer of this organization?—Yes, the district secretary at the present time. I have had 30 years behind the counter, and I have been working behind the counter up to within the last 18 months.

Chairman.

331. You represent on the matter the view of the assistants, naturally. Can you speak at all as to the views of the traders themselves of Manchester?—Yes, we came in contact with the Grocers' Association in particular; I am personally acquainted with the president and two or three vice-presidents of the Grocers' Association, and I think they are prepared to give evidence in support of this Bill. I think they are strongly in favour of it in Manchester.

332. Do you think there is any large number of the traders in Manchester who are in favour of legislation?—Yes. We have had financial assistance from time to time, and have received a great amount of support from the traders in Manchester for the purpose of carrying on the shorter hours movement in Manchester.

333. Has your attention been drawn to the provision of the Bill now before the House?—It has.

334. The Committee would be glad to hear your view with regard to the Bill generally, and upon any points on which you may wish to offer any suggestions. In the first place, as regards the Bill generally, what is your opinion?—With reference to the necessity of a Bill, we are very strongly of opinion that something is absolutely necessary that no voluntary effort will bring us any effectual remedy. A young man I saw on Monday of this week is at his business on Monday morning at eight o'clock, and he is there till 9.30 on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, 10 o'clock on Friday, and 12 o'clock on Saturday.

Sir Francis Powell.

335. Is he there on Wednesday?—Yes. This is every day in the week, but he gets half a day fortnightly, and he gets no time allowance for meals. He is a manager under a firm who have a number of shops, and he is expected to watch the shop while he gets his meals. He is not supposed to leave the shop during these hours, from eight in the morning till half-past nine at night, and 10 o'clock on Fridays.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

336. That would be a very exceptional case, would not it?—No.

Chairman.

337. Is that in a small shop?—A grocer's shop. There is a manager and a boy.

338. Is it a small shop, or a large shop?—It cannot be very large with a man and a boy in it.

339. Then, coming to the question of legislation, I think you said just now, your association were strongly in favour of some legislation?—We find that we cannot possibly get any amelioration without legislation. I will give an instance in Salford, which is in our Manchester district. There are 15 boot-shops in a street called Regent-road. The boot-makers in Manchester and the grocers are the trades that have the Wednesday half-holiday one o'clock, but no other trade closes on the Wednesday, excepting furniture shops. There were 15 boot-shops, and 13 of them signed a paper that was carried round by the manager of one of the shops in favour of closing at one o'clock on the Wednesday. One man objected to it, and then another one discovered that he objected to it, and the two of them practically have prevented the others from adopting the Wednesday half-holiday. That was last year, and we know we have 13 out of 15 of the principal of these boot-shops, who are prepared to-day to close for a Wednesday half-holiday, but two of them—and practically it is only one—are preventing them from taking that action, and doing as they would like to do, and the hours in that thoroughfare are nine every night in the week, and very late on the Saturday.

340. With reference to the Bill now before the House, I will give you an opportunity in a moment of making any suggestions as regards details, but the Committee would be glad to know the feeling of your association as to the general tenor of the Bill in the first instance, and then we will come to the clauses afterwards?—We are strongly of opinion that it should apply to all shops.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

341. And to all businesses as well?—All businesses, except those scheduled.

Chairman.

342. So far, you approve of the Bill?—That is so; and we are also in favour, I may say, of it being made general, not particular. Even if you get two-thirds of the grocers, then under that clause you leave out the drapers, and if you get two-thirds of the drapers you leave out the grocers and the boot people. We do not approve of that kind of legislation. If you get two-thirds of the shopkeepers in favour of it you should make it applicable, because we have found that one draper can rule the drapers and one grocer the grocers, one boot-shop all the boot-shops, and therefore it is likely to be very unsatisfactory.

343. I wish to ascertain whether, apart from questions of detail, the general outlines of the Bill meet with the approval of your association?—There are several matters in it that we have had under very serious consideration.

344. We will come to those in a moment. In the first place, I wish to ascertain whether the general scope of the Bill meets with the approval of your association apart from the question of details?—It does.

345. Now come to the details. I understand you to suggest that the different trades should not be allowed to act independently, but the two-thirds should be applicable to all the trades who are in favour of that principle; I suppose you would not regard that as a sine quâ non?—Certainly not.

346. You suggest it?—We think it would be more practical, that it would be a much more satisfactory arrangement.

347. You would rather take it, I suppose, than not have it at all?—Our constituents are members of the various trades. We may have two parties members of our organisation, one in a draper's, and one in a grocer's, and one is as anxious that the drapers should have it as the grocers, and vice versâ.

348. You would prefer to make it general, but you do not wish to make it a sine quâ non?—No. It is exceptional at the present time.

349. You think it would work more satisfactorily if that were done. I do not understand you to say that you would make that a sine quâ non?—We think it would be more satisfactory.

350. You do not wish to do more than recommend it as an improvement in the Bill?—That is our feeling.

351. Is there any other point on which you wish to make a suggestion to the Committee?—We say that if you get two-thirds of those who are interested or who are concerned in this Bill to consent to it, that the local authorities should put it into operation, not that it should be optional with the authorities. It is optional with the people who sign, but if you get the consent of a sufficient number to put it into operation the local authorities should be bound to put it in force.

352. You would wish that to be "shall" instead of "may"?—Yes, in line 16.

353. I may say that the feeling of those who drafted the Bill was that the local authorities probably would put it into operation, and there would be opposition if it was made absolutely obligatory?—That is our feeling very strongly.

354. Is there any other point in that clause?—No. We are also of opinion that it should not be made to affect one part of the year and not the other. That is in the second clause, page 2.

355. Have you considered the question of Christmas, when there is a great deal of pressure, and it would be desirable to provide differently for that period than for the other parts of the year?—Yes.

356. And yet you think there would be no difficulty in early closing at Christmas time the same as at other times of the year?—We do not think we should get local authorities to pass a sufficiently drastic measure to create much inconvenience.

Chairman—continued.

357. Would there be any advantage in times of stock-taking to give more latitude as to the hours?—It would not prevent this Act from operating.

358. You think in any case that six o'clock is late enough to close?—I do not say that. That is as early as we shall get.

359. The Bill makes six o'clock the earliest time?—Yes.

360. You think there would be no inconvenience in closing at six o'clock at any time of the year?—We do not say that. We have never said that we should support the six o'clock closing.

361. Might it not be that it might be quite feasible to close at six o'clock in some slack times of the year, and yet necessary to keep open a good deal later at Christmas time?—We have not anticipated any feeling of that kind at present.

362. You would prefer to make it the same time all through the year?—Yes. Then we are of opinion also that in the sixth clause, at the bottom of page two, the penalty for non-compliance with this Act is utterly inadequate to ensure the purpose for which it is intended. A five shilling fine would not have any deterring effect on anyone who made any profit by keeping open beyond the hour fixed.

363. Our feeling was, that as regards the first offence the fine should be a small one and rising rapidly. Has your association passed any resolution as to the fines you would yourself suggest?—I am not quite clear on that. The Manchester District Committee have gone carefully, clause by clause, through this, and we have discussed it in our branch. We have four or five branches, and they have each had copies of this Bill before them, and I am speaking now of the opinions expressed by our members from time to time on this Bill, and the one that was issued prior to this.

364. Do I understand that you wish that these fines should be made more heavy, but you are not prepared to suggest exactly what the fines should be?—I would have 20*s.* for the first offence; 40*s.* for the second; and 5*l.*, the same as it stands, for the third. That is, we think, a minimum.

365. Then on Clause 7, have you any suggestions?—I have not. I have nothing to say until we come to page 4, defining what "closed" means; that is not open for the serving of any customer, and providing that nothing shall prevent them remaining an indefinite length of time after the shop is closed. I take that to be the tenor of the clause. Our opinion is that there should not be an unlimited time for customers to remain after the shops are closed; that in the third line the continuance in a shop, we say, should not be more than 30 minutes after the hour appointed for the closing thereof, of any customers. We are strongly of opinion that there should be a clause dealing with assistants when the shops are closed, that they should have the benefit which would accrue from this Act. There is nothing in this Bill that we can see that would benefit the assistants if the employers like to take advantage of it. They might support port a Closing Bill, but it would not necessarily mean the assistants getting out of the shop.

366. You would wish us to make it illegal to employ the assistants more than a certain time after the shop was closed?—Yes.

367. Do you think it would be practically possible to put such a clause into effect?—We think so.

368. I am afraid that it would be very often evaded and very difficult to enforce?—It would not. The time is limited in the Shop Hours Act, and the Workshops Act is at present in operation. There might be a limit the same for assistants as for the customers. My long experience was in a house of business, where we had 50 assistants, and when the clock struck the hour for closing the porter went and stood at the door and allowed anyone to go out and no one else to come in, and we had no difficulty in getting out within a few minutes of the time of closing.

369. Is there anything else you want to point out on page 4?—No, I do not know of anything in particular.

370. You think, on the whole, then, that this Bill, especially with the amendments you have suggested, would effect a considerable improvement in the condition of the assistants in your district?—That is the opinion that has been very readily expressed.

Viscount Cranborne.

371. Would you tell me about the condition of things in Manchester; is it the habit in all parts of the city to open and close about the same time now?—No; some close early and some keep open late.

372. Is that according to district or according to trade?—A good deal, according to district.

373. Could you name the districts?—In the central part of Manchester, Market-street, some portion of Deansgate, and St. Anne's-square, which is the west end of Manchester, the hours are shorter much than in the outlying districts.

374. You have made certain suggestions in reference to the alteration of this Bill. I understood you to say that all trades ought to stand and fall together on matters of closing?—I am of opinion that the hours should be made uniform.

375. Would you say that of all parts of Manchester too?—I say, the local authority should have power to carry out the wishes expressed by certain districts.

376. You have told us the centre of Manchester closes earlier than the outside?—Yes.

377. Supposing a majority of the traders in Manchester largely consisting of the traders in the centre came to the local authority, namely, the town council of the city, and said we desire to close all shops in Manchester earlier, and supposing they constituted the two-thirds majority, would you desire then that the whole of Manchester should close earlier at the wish of a portion?—We desire to get as short hours as possible for the assistants whom we represent.

378. So that it might happen that one district of Manchester might force early closing that was not wanted in another district?—I do not think so.

379. As a matter of fact, you say it would not happen, but it might happen?—I do not think so.

380. It might possibly happen. It might be that a certain district in the outlying part of Manchester was forced to close by the centre of Manchester at an hour which did not suit the wishes of traders and of the public; might not it be so?—It is possible. There was one very large trader who refused to adopt the Wednesday half-holiday, and we made a strong move some years ago, and he compromised the matter by allowing his assistants a day a month instead, and kept his shop open. That has prevented us from carrying out a Wednesday closing so far as his trade is concerned in that district.

381. Was that very unpopular amongst his assistants?—They were asked to approve of it; and if a requisition is got up in a house of business, and the men are asked whether they conform to it, those who do not agree with it know that their next business would be to find a fresh situation.

382. I do not think that is my experience of Lancashire people. They are very independent generally?—But shop assistants are not Lancashire people; only a very small proportion of them.

383. They come from elsewhere?—Yes.

384. At any rate, I understand that whatever a two-thirds majority of the traders of Manchester demanded you would leave the council of the city no alternative but to accept whatever they chose to suggest?—I take it that the essence of the Bill would be either an early closing or half a day a week. It would resolve itself into either an early closing measure or a weekly half-holiday measure, or both.

385. We have to look at the provisions of the Bill. You tell us what perhaps you rightly in Manchester estimate would be its special effect, but it might have a different effect in other districts and other towns to which the Bill might apply; and as I understand, it would be possible that the city council of Manchester would be compelled by a majority of two-thirds to close every shop in Manchester at six o'clock every evening. That is possible under the Bill?—It is not possible, because you would have to get the consent of two-thirds of the shopkeepers to that.

386. You leave no option to the city council whatever?—We say it is optional with the people to say, but it should be compulsory as far as the council is concerned to carry out the wishes of those who sign.

387. I do not want to argue the matter with you, but you do not think the city council ought to have a voice in it as representing the public?—Yes, I do. I am in favour of the whole voting power of the constituency being asked to settle this question themselves, outside of this Bill.

388. You know that the city council does represent the public, does it not?—Yes.

389. Therefore, after all, in matters of commerce, there are always two parties, the man who buys as well as the man who sells?—Yes.

390. And the whole of the buyers, and the sellers too, are represented on the city council; all the public?—Yes.

391. Surely they ought to have some voice in the arrangement?—Yes.

392. Have you realised that the amendment you have suggested to the Chairman would deprive the public of any voice whatever in it?—The Town Council have to carry out the wishes of the constituency on any question, if they get a mandate from the constituency.

393. But not only of a certain number of traders in the constituency; I only want to know whether you realise that what you are proposing is that a small portion of the citizens of Manchester, namely, two-thirds of the traders, have the power of dictating to the whole public of Manchester exactly when the shops ought to close within the limits of the Bill?—We are not responsible for this Bill, you must understand that, and we are not responsible for all that is in it, and we are not committed to all that is in it. Our principal idea is that the hours are far too long, and to get a remedy for it is our difficulty.

394. I think I understand that you really do not wish to be absolutely bound by the provisions of the Bill; that is the important point?—We are in favour of the Bill as a principle, and there are details in it which will have to be looked at.

395. And even with the amendment you have suggested you do not think it would be ideal?—I think it would be a great improvement on existing conditions.

396. I understood you fully realised that the citizens of Manchester apart from the traders ought to have a voice in this question?—Yes.

397. I do not think you have realised that by the amendment you have suggested to the Chairman by the insertion of "shall" instead of "may," the citizens of Manchester would be absolutely deprived of any voice whatever except the two-thirds of the traders who are a small minority of the citizens of Manchester, and I want to know whether your association have really considered that they were suggesting to Parliament to take away the voice of the citizens of Manchester, except a small minority of them, in the decision of this question, which is interesting to them all?—We know that the public are with us in principle, but not always in practice, they themselves advocate short hours of labour, but do not have always consideration for those they employ.

398. I am afraid that is a common difference between the principles of measures and the details of them; your view was that there ought to be some better provision to prevent the employment of the assistants or employés in the shops after the closing had taken place?—Yes; it could be met in two ways; either that they should come away at the time of closing, or that they should be paid overtime.

399. That is a great distinction?—Yes.

400. Anybody who comes from Lancashire knows what overtime means; it means that if kept longer they would be paid more; is that so?—Yes.

401. You are rather, perhaps, considering the pecuniary interests of the employés than their health?—We find that, as a matter of fact, their money is stopped for the time they are away from their work, and we are of opinion they ought to be paid for the time they put in over.

402. I do not know what system prevails in Manchester, but no doubt there is a primâ facie case of very great injustice in what you have said; I only wanted to know whether you realised that you have changed the issue from one of health to one of money?—No; we prefer the shorter hours.

403. You say if an employer keeps his men over the time he ought to pay them more?—Certainly.

404. You say the hours are very long already?—Yes.

405. Whether he pays them more or not and keeps them longer the hours would be still longer?—We say we should have the hours shortened, and if an employer wishes to extend them he should pay the men for the extension.

406. It will not do their health any good, if he pays them more?—Certainly not. We should not expect it would extend the hours from the existing ones.

407. I think I have made my point clear to you; you and other witnesses have come to Parliament to say that you want us to consider the health of shop employés, and that the hours are very long; that is a matter for us to consider, and there is a great deal to be said on that side even if there is a great deal to be said against it; but it is a different proposition if you are going to propose overtime, because overtime will increase the hours of labour?—With an Early Closing Bill it does not follow that the assistants get the benefit of it. The shops may be closed to-day at a reasonable hour and the assistants kept in after that time. I am not speaking of those shops which keep open the hours I have alluded to before, 9, 10, and 11 at night. Overtime in those certainly not, but overtime in those which close early who, to conciliate the public, give the shorter hours in the form of either half-a-day a week, or earlier at night, but not the men working to between 9 and 10 at night.

408. You would say to shops who close early, we will allow you, if you choose to pay for it, to work overtime after the shop closes?—It does exist at the present time.

409. But to shops who close late you would say, we will not let you work overtime?—I should say not.

410. You would introduce a provision, that where shops closed late, they should not be permitted to work overtime; but where shops close early, they should be permitted?—I am not in favour of overloading the Bill with a lot of conditions so that Parliament could say, we would not accept the Bill.

411. That introduces a great measure of complication into the Bill, if we deal with the hours that the shop is closed, and then consider the question of where overtime is to be allowed, and where it is not to be allowed, and that would overweight the Bill, would not it?—The question we have to consider is that the hours are very long, and if we get the hours of the shops shortened, we say the assistants ought to have the benefit of it. That is our contention.

412. You

Sir Blundell Maple.

412. You say that the closing of the shops would not necessarily mean less hours of labour for the employés by this Bill?—Yes.

413. Supposing a Bill is brought in limiting the hours of labour for assistants to 74 hours a week, would you prefer that Bill to a Bill closing the shop; a Bill for diminishing the hours of adult labour?—I should like to see the Bill before I expressed an opinion.

414. This is the Shop Hours Regulation Act which prevents the employment of young people under 18 years of age for longer than 74 hours a week?—Yes.

415. If that Bill is simply extended to men and women, would that or not more suit your purpose than the Bill for closing the shops?—If it would reduce the hours from what they are at the present time we should support it.

416. They would not be allowed to work more than 74 hours?—I have not the slightest doubt it would have the support of our members.

417. That would limit the hours of labour to 74 hours a week, whereas this Bill would not so limit them, because the men might be kept working overtime?—We are in hopes it will not be passed without some clause that the assistants should have the benefit of the closing.

418. You wish to have a clause introduced limiting the hours of men's labour per week?—Not necessarily limiting the hours of men's labour; but limiting the time that they shall stop after the shops are closed. The Bill provides for closing the shops, and I say the assistants should have the benefit of that closing, and not be kept in indefinitely.

419. You would get that at once by a Bill limiting the hours of labour without the closing of the shops?—For some classes the Bill you speak of might be of effect, but not for the whole class.

420. What class?—Restaurant assistants and a number of assistants.

421. They are exempt now?—Yes, from this Bill; but they would not be from a Shop Hours Act, or an Act for limiting the number of hours of those employés.

Mr. Baldwin.

422. I take it your experience has been chiefly gained in great towns?—I was the secretary of an association for the purpose of getting the half-holiday movement in Ashton-under-Lyne, which is town of 40,000 inhabitants.

423. You know nothing of small towns and country districts?—No.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

424. How many assistants do you think there are in Manchester; in the various trades in Manchester?—It has been variously stated from 5,000 to 10,000.

425. The members of your own association are about 600?—Yes, in Manchester.

426. In what particular trade are they chiefly engaged?—Grocery, drapery, and outfitting. Those are the chief trades.

427. That would be a small number out of the very large total number?—It is not a large number. We ourselves are the readiest to admit we have not a large proportion of the assistants, but it is a young organization, and the assistants have not yet realised the advantages that any organization would be to them.

Mr. Frederick Frye—continued.

428. They have not considered this question in the interests of the traders at all. They simply have considered it as to getting shorter hours of labour?—Yes.

429. Would not that vary very much in a town like Manchester, where there are many traders with small shops, and obliged to work longer hours?—I say they are not obliged to work longer hours.

430. Then you said that you do not think there would be any advantage in extending the Bill now in force making a law to work a certain number of hours per week. You told us many of those worked from seven to 11?—Yes.

431. How many hours would that be a week?—Not from 7 till 11; 8 to 9.30. These men put in 84 hours in the instances I gave you.

432. Would not it be a great advantage if they could work 74 hours instead of 83?—Yes.

433. Do not you think that would be likely to create less inconvenience to the general public?—How are you going to remedy the hours unless you close the shops. In a case of the kind I gave you the man has no one else; he has no help; he cannot be relieved from his shop without closing it, and we have scores of such instances in Manchester.

434. He is simply a small shopkeeper, and works in it himself, and his wife?—No, these are branch shops; there is one firm who has nearly 20 shops of this description in various parts of Manchester. These men are in as managers in these branches.

435. They simply work it with a man and a boy?—Yes.

436. They are the worst offenders?—This is a very large proportion.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

437. You seem to attach some importance to the fact that the assistants do not necessarily leave when the shop is closed?—Yes.

438. I suppose your experience in Manchester has been very much what it has been elsewhere. If, by arrangement, a shop closed an hour earlier, practically the assistant gets away earlier. The time spent after the shop is closed would not be any longer if the shop was closed an hour earlier than it would be before. If an employé was kept an hour after the shop was closed he would be content still to be employed an hour after the shop was closed?—Yes.

439. So that practically it would work out in this way, that if the shop, by agreement, closes an hour earlier, the assistants practically get away an hour earlier than they used to?—We have not found that work out in practice. We have found a firm that has some 200 employés in Manchester which has conceded the weekly half-holiday, and those assistants practically have not received any benefit from that half-holiday, on account of their extending it to other days. They do not get any benefit from the

Mr. Cameron Corbett—continued.

Bank holidays for the same reason. They are expected to do the week's work in the same way as though there were no holiday.

440. I understand why you make that remark, and I can quite understand with regard to the weekly half-holiday; but supposing the hours of a particular shop on all the ordinary days of the week were made an hour earlier, would not the assistants get away quite an hour earlier if it was included in the Bill?—If it was included in the Bill; not without.

441. You believe that, on the whole, the only plan of dealing with the case of the assistants is to have a definite hour for the closing of the shops as part of the scheme?—Yes.

442. You believe, I presume, that if you merely had a limitation as to the hours the assistant would work there would be a great difficulty in the assistant proving his case and protecting himself?—Yes.

443. That, in fact, it would be a very difficult thing for an assistant to give evidence against his employers to prove he was employed beyond those hours?—Yes.

444. Therefore, whatever limitation you would suggest in addition, you think it necessary there should be a fixed hour for the closing of the shop?—We do.

Chairman.

445. Has your attention been called to the Report of the Shop Hours and Workshops Acts committee of the Corporation of Manchester?—Yes.

446. It is stated on page 8, by Inspector Rowe: "That in the centre of the city the shop hours proved to be within the prescribed limit, except in the case of tobacconists and confectioners, whose hours in many cases extend to 90 and upwards per week"?—It is.

447. Your experience confirms that?—I have proof positive of one of our own members, who replied to an advertisement in a Manchester paper for a situation, and she was answered that the hours of work were from 8.30 in the morning to 12 at night every night in the week, and from half-past 3 to 12 on Sundays, but the employer said with an occasional Sunday out.

448. Then Inspector Coppock reports that she has found female assistants not more than 19 years of age working in confectionery and sweet shops from 90 to 100 hours a week?—That is so.

449. That is this year; and then Inspector Tattersall says: "That among shopkeepers themselves, I believe, the general feeling is in favour of shorter hours than 74 being compulsory, irrespective of age or sex"?—That is so.

450. Is it not an advantage of this Bill over a a Bill which would limit the hours to 74, that you might reasonably hope under this Bill to get shorter hours than 12 hours a day?—Certainly.

451. From that point of view you would prefer the provisions of this Bill to a mere extension of the Shop Hours Regulation Act?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

452. Do you consider that the same difficulties as to healthiness of occupation apply to every kind of shop. I have been on two previous Committees on this subject, and we had evidence of an important character as to the unhealthiness of such shops as drapers' affecting the lungs. Would you apply the same rule to a draper's shop as you would to a grocer's shop, where those mischiefs do not arise?—I think the sanitary laws at present in operation would deal with those. The sanitary committees of our corporations are prepared to deal with such matters.

453. My question is this: that if the different trades are unequal in healthiness as regards the shops from sanitary causes, would you apply the same rule to all shops, or adapt your rule to the circumstances of each occupation or class of occupation?—So far as the hours are concerned we would put them all on the same footing.

454. Then in what respect would you not treat them alike?—I cannot answer that question.

455. Do you think it would be possible, in a town such as Manchester, where so many working people live, to close the shops at six o'clock?—No, not at present.

456. Do you think it ever will be possible, within any reasonable time, where people are employed in industrial pursuits, to close the shops in a manufacturing district at six o'clock?—Probably not; not every day in the week.

457. You say that the hours have been extended on other days in order to make room for the Wednesday half-holiday?—That has been so.

458. To what extent has that been the case?—It has affected some hundreds of shop assistants in Manchester.

459. By how many hours?—They have practically had no benefit from what has been ostensibly to the public recognised as giving the assistants a half-holiday.

460. Do you put it as strongly as this, that what they have gained on Wednesday they have lost in detail on other days?—That is so.

461. Are the hours very long on Friday or Saturday in Manchester?—Yes, in many districts.

462. Are the hours not the same on all the days of the week?—No. I have the details here that show the results in Manchester. Monday and Tuesday, 8 o'clock; Wednesday, 1 o'clock; Thursday, 8 o'clock; Friday, 9.30 to 10; and Saturdays, 11. This is what we call an Early Closing Bill. In some portions of Manchester shorter hours than these prevail.

463. Do you know that amongst working people the Friday and Saturday are great shopping days?—Yes.

464. Because wages are probably paid on Friday or Saturday?—Yes. We know that large sums are spent in our co-operative stores, who set a great example, and the assistants in those stores work only 56 to 58 hours a week.

465. Looking at it from the customers' point of view; I have in my mind a workshop population; do you think it would be a great inconvenience to them to close at 9 o'clock on Friday and Saturday?—No, we say 9 o'clock on Friday, and 10 on Saturday, is late enough.

466. From your point of view doubtless, but I am speaking of the convenience of the class I have have mentioned?—We are of opinion it will be no inconvenience to the public, the very lowest class.

Chairman.

467. Is it not the case that the Manchester Trade Council passed a resolution in favour of legislation a short time ago?—That is so, on the principle of this Bill. They have offered us support from time to time. I have the honour of being a member of that trades council, and they have always through their officers and members assisted us.

Sir Francis Powell.

468. What does the trade council consist of?—Representatives of recognised workers.

469. Trades unions?—Yes, 50,000 trade unionists are represented on this trades council.

470. May they be taken as representing the feelings of the working classes on a point like this?—Yes.

Chairman.

471. Was that resolution unanimous, or was there any opposition?—There was no amendment. It was an unanimous vote of the council, and I think it has been repeated, both before I was a member of it and since.

Sir Francis Powell.

472. When was it passed?—I think last year, and three years ago.

473. Then that represents the present opinion of the class?—Certainly.

Dr. Farquharson.

474. I think you told us that you had yourself served behind the counter?—Yes.

475. I believe you served in a shop in which the hours were very great?—Yes.

476. Did you feel any personal injury done to your health from those late hours?—I think so.

477. Can you state the experience of those who worked along with you, whether those late hours were injurious?—I know a girl who is employed in a shop in Manchester at the present time. My daughter was being served, and I have got it from her, and therefore it is second-hand evidence; but she was being served in this shop, and a customer made the remark to the girl, "You do not look well," and she said, "I feel very well, only I fainted half-a-dozen times on Sunday morning." That is in a shop where they have not got very long hours; but they work at high pressure the whole of the time.

Mr. Tennant.

478. You stated that you had a half-holiday in Manchester on Wednesday, beginning at one o'clock?—Yes.

479. Is that done by a voluntary system?—Yes.

480. I thought it was not, because you said you thought voluntaryism had not done any useful work in the past?—The voluntary Wednesday closing is only of a partial character.

481. It does not apply to all parts?—No.

482. As regards Manchester, supposing this Bill became an Act of Parliament, you would have to divide Manchester into parts of a district; do you consider there would be any difficulty in that?—There is bound to be difficulty.

483. You know, in London, that is one of the great difficulties?—Yes.

484. Do you anticipate difficulties in Manchester?—Yes.

485. Supposing you have a street dividing a district, one side of a street, such as Oxford-street, being in Marylebone, and the other side being in St. George's, Hanover-square. Supposing the grocers agreed to shut up on one side, and they did not on the other?—There would be bound to be a difficulty.

486. You admit that is a great difficulty?—Yes.

487. Has your association come to any conclusion as to how they would meet that difficulty?—I cannot say that it has.

488. With regard to the classification of trades, you are familiar with this Bill?—Yes.

489. If there is any difficulty arises by Clause 4, it is to be referred to the central authority?—Yes.

490. Do you anticipate that there will be many difficulties of that sort; that the central authority will constantly be called upon to decide difficulties?—We do not anticipate it.

491. You know of some shops, such as these very eating-houses that we have had brought before us, where cooked provisions are sold, and in such a place as that, no doubt, they sell bread, but it is not a baker's. Supposing the bakers all agree to shut up their shops. Do you think that will apply to places that would be exempted otherwise?—We think so.

492. You do not anticipate there will be difficulties in such a way as I have described?—We think not, no difficulties that could not be overcome by this Bill.

493. They can be overcome by applying to a central authority?—Yes.

494. That is the way you think it would be overcome?—I should say so.

495. Am I right in understanding that in your opinion it would be advisable, one trade agreeing to close their shops at an early hour, should make it binding on all other trades?—No; my feeling in the matter was that the agitation or the work for the carrying this out, because we shall have a great deal of work if this Bill is passed to-day, would have no result until the Act is put into operation, and our portion of the work would be in getting it, so far as each trade is concerned, uniform. We do not anticipate we should have any more difficulties with one class of traders than another.

496. Supposing the grocers agreed to close, and the butchers did not, do you think the fact that the grocers have made the agreement should make it imperative that the butchers and the bakers, and everybody else should close?—We are of opinion it should be made general.

497. You would not take a census of the various shopkeepers by trades. You would not limit them to their own individual trade, but you would rather take a census of the whole of the shopkeepers in the district?—Yes.

498. With regard to meal hours, what amount of time is it customary in Manchester to give to shop assistants for dinner?—Different customs prevail. In some business houses they live out, and in other business houses they live in. Where they live in, 30 minutes is the usual time allowed for dinner or for tea.

499. Thirty minutes for each?—Yes.

500. If they live out they get an hour, or not so much?—About an hour is usual, I think.

Sir Blundell Maple.

501. Might I intervene for a moment to explain the reason for the half hour. It might be convenient to the Committee. In a retail shop it is impossible for all the assistants to leave the shop at the same time?—Yes.

502. And, therefore, the plan is generally that one-third of the shop assistants leave at a time?—They have what they call first parties and second parties.

503. And sometimes third parties?—Yes.

504. Then, by taking the half-hour at a time, you get the whole dinner time spread over an hour and a-half?—In some of the places they start dinner at half-past ten.

Viscount Cranborne.

505. How long do they go on?—They divide them into parties until they have all dined.

Sir Blundell Maple.

506. I have heard of them starting at half-past 12?—It was an assistant who told me that was the time.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

507. What time do they breakfast?—Before business.

508. But what time in the morning?—In this particular house they do not start before half-past eight.

Mr. Tennant.

509. You said that you thought there would be no difficulty in seeing that the assistants got away from the shop within a reasonable time, say a quarter of an hour or half an hour after the shutters were shut. Who would you make responsible for that; you know perfectly well that in many cases they do stay much longer than that?—Yes.

510. In order to prevent an evil of that kind you must have somebody to go and inspect; you must have a person who answers to what we have in the administration of the Factory Acts, inspectors?—Yes.

511. To whom would you give the power of entry after the shutters were up?—We have shop hours inspectors under the present Shop Hours Act.

512. You would add to the number then?—Yes, I would add to the number. Two of our own members have been elected to that position by the city council.

513. They are the servants of your association?—No, of the corporation. They were members of our association previous to their appointment.

Mr. George Sutherland, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

514. You represent the North Western Shopkeepers' Association of Glasgow?—Yes.

515. Are you chairman of it?—Yes.

516. And you are also deputed, I think, to speak for another grocers' association?—The south-eastern expected to have been cited, and they had appointed one or two of their number to come here, but not having been cited to come, the president asked me if I would emphasise that they were generally in favour of this Bill.

517. Then you are deputed to represent both those associations in Glasgow?—Yes.

518. They are mainly in the grocery trade?—Grocery and provisions.

519. Do they cover the whole of Glasgow?—No.

520. How many are there; I understand there is a north-western and a south-eastern; are there two other associations?—There are other associations, but more or less rather suspended in their work. They are not very active.

521. And those two societies are the principal societies representing the grocery and provision trades of Glasgow?—Yes, the principal active societies.

522. How long have they been in existence?—The society I represent has been continuously in existence, with more or less vigour for over 30 years.

523. And the other society, the south-eastern?—The south-eastern is younger; I am not so conversant with its history.

524. Are they really representative societies of the trade; have they a considerable number of members?—Our is really representative in the north-west. We have districts and district collectors who collect once a year, and a subscription counts for membership. There are very few exceptions of the traders in the north-west but what subscribe to the association.

525. And the great majority of the traders belong to this association?—Yes.

526. It is a traders' association, and not an assistants' association?—Not an assistants' association in any sense.

527. Therefore, you speak for the trade in that particular department of business?—Decidedly.

528. Is it the opinion of your association that the hours at present are unduly and unnecessarily long in business in Glasgow?—Yes.

529. You would be glad to see them shortened?—Yes; we have made many efforts during those years I have spoken of to shorten them, and those efforts have, perhaps, for a month or so, been fairly observed; but with new openings they they drift away again, and back to the old absurdly late hours.

530. You do not find much progress has at present been made towards shortening the hours?—Not in our trade. Probably in some districts there has been progress made, but in almost all districts there are parts of the districts where the hours that have been agreed on amongst themselves voluntarily have been broken.

531. Would you tell the Committee approximately what the hours are at present in your business?—From 7.30 to 8.30 is the general hour.

532. Every day?—Every day; Saturdays, of course, excepted.

533. What are they on Saturdays?—There is no observable hour really for closing on Saturdays. In a good many localities they only close at 12 o'clock. Twelve o'clock midnight in a working-class locality is a general hour; and in some districts, owing to the public-houses not closing till 11, there is a considerable amount of business done between 11 and 12.

534. Do you think there is much prospect of getting a more reasonable state of things by voluntary action?—No, I see no future for further voluntary action. It is five years since we made an effort in the north-west, and got the general assent. I think the dissentients were only three to an eight o'clock hour, and those three in keeping open in one case led to a riot on a small scale, because the assistants tried to coerce these refractory members of our trade to close by crowding in front, and it led to some arrests being made; but it did not cure the difficulty, and in that district we are now nine o'clock.

535. Do I understand all the members of your Association, with the exception of three, were anxious for shorter hours, and that the three kept the whole number open?—Yes, three, within my memory, refused to accede to the eight o'clock hour.

536. Therefore, the great majority of your members are in favour of some legislation?—There are barely any exceptions to compulsory hours.

537. I think I saw in one of the trade journals you had a meeting at which a resolution was moved and seconded in support of this Bill, and that there was an amendment moved which did not even get a seconder?—Yes; one member of our Association, a licensed grocer, moved an amendment, but found no seconder, even though there were several licensed grocers present.

538. Can you tell the Committee what the feeling is of the South Eastern Association?—There is almost no exception in the South Eastern in favour of this Bill.

539. Then I am right in supposing that you have had the main provisions of the Bill before you?—Yes. We called a public meeting in the north-west for two purposes, and one of them was for the special purpose of considering this Early Closing Bill to which your name is attached, and the Bill was fully explained in its various clauses.

540. And approved?—And approved.

541. In the main features we may take it your

Chairman—continued.

Association and the South Eastern Association approved of the Early Closing Bill?—Yes.

542. The Committee would be glad to hear any suggestion you have to make with reference to any point in which you think it might be improved?—That was just our difficulty that we found; it was rather the question whether or not a district included the whole city, because it says, "If an application in writing is served on the local authority of any district praying that, as regards all shops, or any class of shops, within the district," and so on. When you come to the definition, we thought the district might mean Glasgow, and we are afraid that if you mean the whole city there is not any organisation in the whole city. We have what you might call districts of the city which would form districts, but I think the general idea was that our municipal wards would be a very good definition of a district.

543. You will observe in Clause 1, "The district or any part of the district," and therefore the municipal wards would constitute themselves districts?—Yes, if that is so; but when we came to the definition clause of what a district meant, it was a district over which the local authority had power, and we rather thought that the one stultified the other. If that is clear that is all right. We were divided in our opinion in interpreting the clauses.

544. That was the intention of the draughtsmen?—If that is the intention I am quite satisfied, because we can have it in districts.

545. Have you any other remark to make upon it?—We recognise the difficulty of the definition of trades as being a matter that has given rise to considerable difficulty and cross-examination with regard to where the demarcation comes in as to what constitutes the classification of a trade. We recognise the difficulty, and would like clearness so that this Bill might not, like many other Bills, fail for want of being put into operation. There is just one section of the Bill that might afford to be more clear. We really feel that in certain districts they might want to insist that so-and-so was a grocer, because he happened to sell one article a grocer sold, and we ourselves do not recognise him as a grocer, and would never include him; but it would lead to that, and we feel a difficulty there with regard to classification. It was our secretary who was asked to come who raised the question; but I have not thought it out.

546. If any question of that kind arose the Secretary of State for Scotland would have absolute power to determine the question?—If that was so.

547. You have no particular suggestion?—No, we approve of the scope of the Bill. It gives us what we consider the main object, that is we approve of it very much in this sense that it is a purely local option Bill, and then that it is left with the individual classes of traders themselves to regulate the hours, and that it is not the local authority or any other power outside of ourselves that is to regulate our hours; but those interested in the trade and who have their living to make by the trade, and who want to regulate those hours best for everyone concerned in the trade.

548. So far as your Association is concerned, you would like, at any rate, to have the opportunity of trying to shorten your hours by means of trying some such Bill as this?—Very much.

Viscount Cranborne.

549. Will you tell me how large the Association which you represent is. What is the membership?—The contributing membership is between 200 and 300. We really recognise the shopkeepers in the district as being members. The only thing that determines our rule is just this: that we do not require much money for carrying on the Association. The issue of closing bills for holidays and things of that sort is the principal expenditure. What I say might be questioned in this sense, but we can show by our rules the number of members who have contributed during the last year or two exceed 200.

550. You have told the Chairman that your hours are, as I gather, 13 hours a day, 7.30 to 1.30, except Saturdays?—Yes.

551. When it runs to 12 o'clock?—Yes.

552. Can you give the Committee any idea why the shops are open so late at 8.30?—The only barrier to our closing earlier is just the option that any man has of what I might call "playing the pirate" on the trade, insisting on keeping open after others are closed.

553. Why does he insist?—For personal profit.

554. In point of fact he gets a larger number of customers after the early hour?—Decidedly.

555. I want to treat you quite fairly in this matter, and I have an open mind. Why do the public desire to use the services of shops late at night in that way in Glasgow?—I would answer that question generally, that the public are thoughtless. It is want of consideration for those who serve them.

556. I suppose the public are occupied during a great part of the day, and are not able to transact their business?—No, there is no necessity. I do not admit any necessity on the part of the public to shop at the late hour, but I admit the habit.

557. Take Saturday. Why does it go on later on Saturday than any other days?—Just pure force of custom.

558. I suppose in point of fact it is a convenience to the public that the shops should be open late?—It is a convenience in this sense if you consider it necessary. A great many people on Saturday go away and do their holiday, and afterwards come back and do their shopping. In that sense it is a convenience.

559. And very proper that they should?—But on the other hand, if the working-men who are clamouring for shorter hours themselves would consider assistants' hours and do their purchasing earlier it is quite within their power. You may take it that we as traders would never think of proposing an hour that would inconvenience our customers.

560. Would you tell me about these hours from 7.30 to 8.30; I suppose there are the slack times and active times during the day?—Yes.

561. What would you call the active times of sale in your business?—We are very busy in the morning up to perhaps half-past 9 until after the breakfast hour.

562. Why does it stop then?—People then are preparing for cooking their dinner and doing the forenoon work.

563. You customers are occupied after that and cannot shop?—It is not a question of cannot shop; they have shopped already.

564. Then it goes on, and it is perfectly slack till when?—That varies with localities.

565. I am speaking of the locality you know?—In our north-western district we have varieties of hours for closing in this sense, that the difference in your neighbours creates a difference in the way of keeping open.

566. Take a case that you gave me as a general case. Shops open at 7.30 and close at 8.30. You have told me most candidly that 7.30 to 8.30 is an active time. Then there is a slack time. How long does that last?—That is perhaps till 12 o'clock, then for an hour and a-half we are fairly busy, and until approaching the dinner hour. Two o'clock is the general workman's dinner hour.

567. Is it because people buy provisions immediately at the time of the meals?—Not at the time of the meals. A proportion of the people must generally purchase the things they are in immediate need of.

568. That is the time they are in need of them?—Yes.

569. Or is it that they are occupied up to this time?—It is the time they do their shopping. You may take it they are occupied with household duties.

570. After the middle of the day is there another slack time?—Probably till 4 o'clock. From 4 on to 7 or 8 we are fairly busy.

571. I suppose you may say without exaggeration that the real thing is that it so happens by habit or custom, or whatever it is people are otherwise occupied during the hours when the trade is slack, and they have by long habit devoted these particular hours, namely, the hour in the morning and an hour and a-half about the middle of the day, and two or three hours at night to the business of shopping?—That is so.

572. When your speak of hours, of course you have told me very candidly that there are active times and slack times. During the slack time, I suppose, practically speaking, very little work is going on in the shop?—That differs in different districts. In the West End district after the forenoon orders are out there is very little doing up to perhaps five in the evening. The people are then purchasing things for the supper or breakfast.

573. The employés are not hard worked during that time?—No, I do not think the work at our counter could be called at any time hard work.

574. So that it would be the greatest possible mistake to compare the 13 hours, from 7.30 to 8.30, to the hours spent in a factory?—There is no comparison.

575. None whatever?—None.

576. Ten

576. Ten hours is the ordinary time in a factory; I think you have a great many cotton mills in Glasgow?—I am sorry they are decreasing.

577. The operatives work for 10 hours a day, and that is 10 hours' real hard work?—Yes.

578. Much harder than your thirteen hours?—Yes.

579. I can conceive a great many grounds, some reasonable and some unreasonable, but on what grounds do persons you represent desire to shorten the hours?—They desire to shorten the hours, you may take it, out of consideration for our assistants, because though you may say the closing time is 8.30 there are districts where the hour is 9.30.

580. Take an average district, because it is easier to discuss?—There are districts where it is 9.30, and young fellows have to go home for supper after that hour. They cannot get to what you would call healthy amusement earlier than that. There is a tendency to drive them rather into amusements that they would be better without at a later hour. An earlier hour would give a healthier occupation for the evening. That is one particular ground in which I am in favour of it.

581. In fact, what you say is that they get home so late that they devote themselves to relaxation of a less profitable kind than they otherwise would do if they got home earlier?—Yes. It would be much more healthy and beneficial to have an earlier hour. It is a long grind, though not hard work, hanging on on one's feet for thirteen hours every day.

582. There was some evidence before this Committee that the considerations were not merely considerations of health, but also considerations of economy. Do the drapers put forward considerations of economy as reasons?—I do not think there is much in the question of economy. I grant you that with a compulsory hour when all the traders of one class are on equal terms, we should do the same amount of trade within the shorter hours that we do in the longer hours. The economy would take place in the winter time in the paltry economy of gas. That is about the only economy you can really bring in as pure economy that you could put down in figures.

583. You think in the shorter hours you would do as much trade as in the longer hours?—Decidedly; we have proved that by fact under the voluntary efforts when we have had the shorter hours; and although it lasted for some months we had no loss in drawings; the cash turnover was as good; and it lasted till either some one broke away, or some new start went into the later hours.

584. You represent grocers, do not you?—Yes.

585. They, to a large extent, supply necessaries?—Yes.

586. You have no special knowledge, I suppose, but you would not extend the same argument to shops which supply what may be called luxuries. My point is this, that the wares you supply people must get?—Yes.

587. And therefore if they cannot get them at 8.30 they will get them at 7.30?—Yes.

588. That would not apply to everything?—Do you use the term "luxuries" to refer to refreshments?

589. To hundreds of things: ribbons and jewellery?—You quite understand that what we consider the admirable effect of this Bill is that it does not give the grocers the power to close the drapers, or the drapers to close any one else; that it leaves each trade to study its own interest.

590. You would resist the idea that the drapers may close the grocers, or the grocers the drapers?—Yes, unless provided for properly.

591. Then you would take the other view?—I would consider if you wished to monopolise other trades, you must come under the rules of that trade.

Sir Blundell Maple.

592. You have studied this Bill thoroughly, have not you?—Yes, I think I have.

593. And the great question, I think you said just now, on which you do not agree with the Bill is the question of the districts and the classification?—Well, I would like them better defined. Sir John has cleared my mind as to what I thought was not quite explicit with reference to the first clause, and then the definition that it does mean that the local authorities should put the Bill in operation in sections or words—clearly defined words.

594. But the question of districts merely must strike you as being peculiar. What districts, for instance, would you have in Glasgow; how would you divide Glasgow up?—I think the best definition is to take a municipal ward for working purposes; that is, a ward represented by three councillors. It is what you might call a parish, or you would call it in London a vestry.

595. One ward might decide to close at one time and the other wards decide to remain open later?—Decidedly.

596. Then one side of a street might be open later than the other side of a street?—Yes.

597. Do not you see the difficulty in that?—The difficulty would be but of short duration. There would be the force of example. If one district decides to close voluntarily, where they get the general assent of their neighbours, and put it in operation, it has the invariable effect that the other district also moves for the same thing.

598. In fact the voluntary action succeeds?—The voluntary action succeeds for a time, but it always fails ultimately, because of the process I have described.

599. Then with regard to the question of the classification of trades?—I acknowledge there is a difficulty there, and I would like to see a clearer definition.

600. How could you have a clearer definition with reference to shops selling different things. Surely you have some shops in Glasgow that keep all sorts of different stores, have you not?—There are shops of a general nature.

601. How would any authority be able to classify any of those shops, as to which classification they would come under?—I admit there is a difficulty, and that the Bill ought to be a little more explicit on that.

602. Supposing, with your knowledge, you had the whole weight of deciding placed on your shoulders, how should you define one of these stores as belonging to any particular class of trade?—There is no question but what each trader designates himself by a trade.

603. But these stores that keep everything?—Take, for instance, what you would call a greengrocer or fruiterer. I choose to sell fruit in my grocery shop. I consider that if I persist in keeping open if the fruiterer decided to close, he could say: "This man must close, because he sells fruit." I concede the point from my own standpoint, but I can feel a hardship in applying it to others.

604. Take a store that keeps butcher's meat, and then the butchers decide to close one day, and another day the grocers decide to close, and another day the drapers decide to close, and this store has all these different departments?—They would have the option of closing. You are referring to the half-holiday?

605. No, to every day?—If he came under the classification, then, under this present Bill, if he sold beef, and the butchers decided to close at a certain hour, no matter what else he sold, he would have to close, without any hardship.

606. By Clause 5 it is provided, with regard to the closing of a shop where two or more trades are carried on, that the shop is to be closed for all other trades if it is to be closed for one?—Yes.

607. You see no difficulty in that?—There is a difficulty, but if a man chooses to be a general trader, then I think that there is little hardship on him in being compelled to accede to the hours of the trade in which he chooses to deal and make money.

608. This Bill provides a limit. You cannot close a shop earlier than 6 o'clock, but if the bakers decide to close on Monday at 6 o'clock, and the butchers on Tuesday at 6 o'clock?—They cannot do that. They must close every night at the same hour.

609. No, any particular trade can close at any particular time?—Yes, I beg your pardon, that is so. Then the store-keeper would have to close at the earliest hour of any trade that was carried on, or else give up that kind of trade.

Chairman.

610. That would not be earlier than 6 o'clock?—That would not be earlier than 6 o'clock; and if a man wishes to be a monopoliser of all trades he must come under the law.

Sir Blundell Maple.

611. It might be 1 o'clock on one day in the week?—Nobody has made reference to the half-holiday yet.

612. Supposing that the bakers close at 1 o'clock on the Monday, and the butchers at 2 o'clock on the Tuesday, and the drapers at 2 o'clock on the Wednesday, and other trades on other days in the week, this shop that dealt in all these things would have to close at 1 o'clock?—On one day.

613. On every day?—We cannot read absurdity into the Bill.

614. But by the Bill?—You would hardly allow the local authority to commit an absurdity.

615. The Bill provides that if any particular kind of trade decides to close at any particular hour on any particular day, that shop must be closed at that time on that day?—They petition the local authority to grant this law. The local authority "may," and surely no local authority would.

616. But supposing the local authority decide that the bakers close at one o'clock on Monday. By Clause 5 that store shop would have to be closed at 1 o'clock on Monday. Then, the butchers closing on Tuesdays at 1 o'clock, Clause 5 would make that shop close on Tuesday at 1 o'clock, and so on throughout the week?—That is reading an absurdity into the Bill, and common-sense must be allowed to have play.

Chairman.

617. The common sense of the local authority?—Yes, the common sense of the local authority.

Mr. Tennant.

618. Might I ask if Sub-section 2 of Clause 1 does not make that clear: "Save as aforesaid shall not on any day be earlier than 6 o'clock"?—Any one day.

619. Any one specified day of the week shall not be earlier than 1 o'clock, but: "Save as aforesaid, shall not on any day be earlier than 6 o'clock in the evening." Does not that mean only one day?—Yes, I should say so.

Sir Blundell Maple.

620. It is a convenience to different trades to close on different days?—Yes.

621. Furniture shops and large drapers would close on a Saturday, but provision shops would not close on a Saturday?—No.

622. And butchers on Monday. That is their day, is it not?—Yes.

Viscount Cranborne.

623. Is that the custom in Glasgow?—We have no half-holiday in Glasgow.

624. Under no circumstances?—Under no circumstances except the co-operatives. They set us a good example there, and their customers, according to the argument of inconvenience, suffer all that inconvenience or annoyance.

Sir Blundell Maple.

625. You are aware of the fact that it is done throughout England?—Yes, and in country districts in Scotland. With reference to the treatment of our assistants, the general custom in Glasgow—it is my custom, and I have a large number of branches—is to give a full week's holiday in the summer. We have a list of holidays for our assistants.

Viscount Cranborne.

626. I do not think that was my hon. friend's point. If I may venture to intervene, is it the case that in the country districts in Scotland outside Glasgow the half-holiday is given?—In a great many districts that is general.

627. Is the half-holiday always the same in every every trade?—Yes, that is so. The village decides on a day.

628. I was not speaking of a village, but of a town; Glasgow is a great city?—If I may give an illustration of a town, Ayr has a half-holiday, and Kilmarnock a half-holiday and Coatbridge.

629. For all trades?—Yes. All trades close on the one day.

Sir Blundell Maple.

630. But in Edinburgh some large shops close on Saturday, and some on other days in the week?—Certain shops in Princes-street close, but it is not a general half-holiday.

Mr. Diamond.

631. Why do they close on Saturdays; is it that they have a class of customers who do not care for shopping late in the evening?—I fancy that is the reason.

632. And there will be no trade on Saturday evening in their shops, practically; is that the effect in the better class shops?—I am sure that if the shops that closed kept open they would do trade, but those are large firms that act independently of the others and do not allow themselves to be influenced by the general trade. They decide to close and close independently. Edinburgh I know only casually, and I cannot enter minutely into Edinburgh's habits.

633. The question was asked you whether there was much doing in the shop when the people were not buying their goods; is it not a fact that the assistants in most of these places find their time filled up when the customers are not in, even in the grocery business, by doing the packing up?—We have no idle time whatever.

634. That is to say, that when you are not fishing you are mending your nets?—Exactly.

635. So that, what is called, or has been called by the noble Lord, the slack time in the shop, is not really an idle time for the assistants?—Not at all.

636. They are then preparing the goods for the rush that will come later on?—And then when we have a number of windows each day in the week those have to be dressed, and the whole of the work of the place is going on, perhaps it may be even harder work than if they are at the counter.

637. I understood you to say that your desire for shorter hours was that the assistants should have some kind of reasonable recreation; I suppose the complaint is with them now that with a large number of cases it is from bed into the shop, and from the shop into bed; that really the hours are such that they have no reasonable time from morning to night to take any recreation or out-door recreation?—Yes. I have suffered myself, in my early days, from the same habit; and we have the same thing at work to-day. My rule to every manager is that his hour of closing is eight o'clock; he is not compelled by me to keep open a minute later than eight o'clock; but, by the force of circumstances, he follows his neighbour. He will not, even for his own sake, close, and he keeps his hands with him until the hour he chooses to close the shop.

638. When the shops are really closed, is it always the case that the assistants get away?—There will be exceptions to that.

639. That is to say, the shop is closed, but the assistants are inside working away at the business, and, for all practical purposes, the shop might be just as well open?—There are exceptions to that in the city.

640. That is not extravagant?—It is much less general now than I once knew it. Assistants are not now so plentiful as they once were.

641. Can you tell me whether in the larger shops where they do close earlier this habit of keeping the assistants at work after closing is not much more common than it is in the smaller shops; have you any knowledge of your own to enable you to say?—I should be surprised, speaking of my own trade, if there are a score of shops in Glasgow, the hour for closing being so late where the work is not practically done then because they are hanging on burning gas, and the work is being pushed off to the late hour and the door is not closed till the work is done, and if customers come in good and well.

642. You are speaking of grocers?—Yes.

643. Is it not a serious complaint with assistants in the large drapery places that they have to remain in after the shops are closed?—I have not heard of one in Glasgow.

644. There has been some talk about the hardship of classification; would you give a tradesman who had more than one business an option of determining under what trade he would desire to be classified?—I think that is about the best suggestion as to classification.

645. Let him choose his own classification?—Yes.

646. And then can it be said you would do him a grave injustice if you kept him up to the trade he chose?—That is what I think is the best.

Viscount Cranborne.

647. Would not that produce a very obvious difficulty, that if he is partly a grocer and partly a butcher, and he elected to be a butcher for the purpose of this Act, he would have an advantage over all the other grocers in the district, inasmuch as he would be able to keep open to a different hour than the grocers?—If he had an advantage in that, he would have to fall in with the butchers.

648. He would be on an equality with the butchers, but at an advantage as compared with the grocers?—I think if we got each trade to choose one night in the week, we should forgive him that advantage.

Mr. Diamond.

649. You think that it would not be possible to get a perfect Bill that will cover every detail of this sort?—No.

650. You aim at getting a general benefit?—Yes.

651. And you think the mischief arising from such a case as the noble Lord has put is not at all to be compared with the present grievance of the whole body of shop assistants?—We are willing to forgo slight advantages for the sake of the general good which we attain by this Bill.

652. I think it was said that the traders in luxuries, that is to say, in jewellery, and things of that sort, and I think the noble Lord said that ribbons were luxuries, keep open later. Is it your experience that that class of tradesmen do keep open long hours?—In leading thoroughfares, such as our Argyle-street, there are a considerable number of shops that have a passing trade.

653. Whereas in a street like Buchanan-street they are closed early?—At an early hour.

654. Is there anybody to represent the assistants in public houses?—No, they are excluded by the Bill. We, of course, in this Bill, include grocers.

655. There is a matter that one would like to bring out, and that is whether, the licensed grocers being subject to the Bill and the public-houses having an exemption, there is any suggestion you have to make to meet what is an obvious difficulty?—I stated at the public meeting, because a licensed grocer had objected to the Bill, that, putting myself in the position of a licensed grocer who has already to trade under legal restrictions, I would be quite in favour of a licensed grocer being exempt from the sale of liquors; that is, that he would come under the obligation not to sell anything but liquors up to his licensed hour.

656. You would permit the premises to be opened, and the assistants would be there. That would clearly prejudice, and in fact it would nullify the object of the Bill, because if the assistants were to be there for the purpose of supplying liquors, they would not have the shorter hours?—No; but you must take it that at the present time the force of supply and demand of assistants compel those who employ them to concede to their assistants that which is general in their trades; that is done.

657. You did say that, so far as your knowledge went, the half-holiday, when it was adopted in a town, included all the trades in that town?—I speak generally, I might be contradicted on that; drapers, butchers, grocers, all classes in certain towns that I know.

658. And on the same day?—And on the same day.

659. You spoke of the co-operative stores; in Glasgow have you any knowledge of how many people deal at the co-operative stores?—In the north-west, the district with which I am acquainted, the co-operative stores have gained considerable impetus of recent years, and I should be very surprised if their customers were under 30,000.

660. In Glasgow?—In the north-west of Glasgow.

661. And these customers are the average members of the community, the working classes generally?—Yes.

662. And yet they in practice carry out the shorter hours and their half-holiday?—Yes. They close at 7 p.m. and two on Wednesdays.

663. I think that is an adequate answer to the objection that if all the shops were closing early it would be a great inconvenience to customers, seeing that such a large body of the general public deal at shops where already these shorter hours really have been in force?—I speak with a life-long experience of between 30 and 40 years behind the counter in Glasgow and in the country in Scotland, and my decided conviction, based on that experience, is that no inconvenience is felt by the customers through the earlier closing of the shops.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

664. You think that the present habit of late shopping really is more a matter of habit than of necessity?—Yes. If one keeps open late it just conduces to and encourages late shopping.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

665. As you know, by the Schedule of the Bill a certain number of trades are exempt. For instance, chemists are allowed to keep open. The chemists of the present day sell all kinds of things. Would you prohibit them selling articles such as are sold by other trades, or confine them simply to dispensing medicines?—Well, for the sake of meeting the objection that has been urged of the inconvenience of not getting an article which is wanted, or that you are forced to buy, or of necessity must buy, I would be quite in favour of exempting the chemists altogether. It would be an infinitesimal demand after all. I would be quite prepared, unless the chemists wanted it, to exempt them from this Bill altogether.

666. You have said there are many stores that sell everything, meat, groceries, and drapery, and also dispense medicines. Would you allow those stores to keep open in order to be in competition with the chemists?—They would not classify themselves as chemists. Those are all men generally of spirit, and sometimes above seeking to evade an Act by calling themselves a trade that would not claim them, though they sold patent medicines. I myself sell patent medicines, but I should not call myself a chemist.

667. Public-houses are scheduled under this Bill, and there are, as you know, a number of people who hold what are called off-licenses, and sell beer and so on, to poor people to consume at their own homes?—Yes.

668. Do not you think it would be a hardship to shut up these places, and let the public-houses be open to a late hour?—I have said that we are dealing with a trade that is already under legislative enactment, and its hours are restricted by legislation, and to meet the objection I was personally urged at our meeting, and said that I would urge here, that licensed grocers (those holding a license) should be allowed to sell that for which they were licensed, but prohibited from selling grocery; allowed to sell liquors at the later hour. The obvious purpose of this Act is to benefit assistants. Consequently the only protection which the assistants in those licensed places would have would be the force of employment. They would very likely desire to leave a licensed grocer, and he would be left to an inferior class of assistant, and to find inferior assistants to do his work, because we find that assistants are not nearly so plentiful as what they used to be.

669. These traders who hold these licenses are licensed exactly the same as a public-house. Their hours of closing are the same, and they are not not allowed to sell after a certain time. You think it would be a hardship, and you would except those traders from the Bill?—Yes, I would schedule them from the Bill, but exclude them from selling anything but that for which they are licensed.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

670. You mentioned that some three shopkeepers prevented the early closing movement from being carried out?—In the north-west of Glasgow.

671. Am I right in understanding that the reason why a small minority like that can prevent the movement is, not that the other shopkeepers are jealous of the amount of business done at the late hour, but because the men who keep open late take away the permanent customers of the other shopkeepers, and do them a permanent injury in that way; that if a man has been in the habit of supplying a regular customer for years, some time comes when he is closed and the other man is open, and the customer goes to the other man, and the early closing man loses his customer permanently?—The inference would be that if he had laid himself out to give this stranger a special inducement for coming in he might so get a permanent customer who had been another man's customer.

672. I think I am justified in saying that that would be one of the main objections of the main body to having two or three men open after they were closed?—Yes. What you find is that, of course, if one man is blazing away open, and probably some other man feels that the day's turnover has been less than usual, he wants, perhaps, to attribute it to his closing early, and is, perhaps, inclined to hold on a little later to see if the thing can be met, and then they drag on for ten minutes that night, and a quarter of an hour the next, and so they go on from eight o'clock to 10 o'clock again.

Sir Francis Powell.

673. What is the class of population in the north-west district, of which you know most?—The north-west district of Glasgow might be described, taking the one section of it, entirely as just a purely artisan working and labouring class.

674. Then having regard, not to the imaginary wants, but to the real wants, of such a population, what should you say would be the earliest hour at which shops should be closed?—I myself think it would be impracticable to close earlier than seven o'clock. That is to say, my own impression is that we would inconvenience the working classes if we closed earlier than seven o'clock. I am quite willing to close if the general bulk of my fellow traders so desire, and I should not oppose the closing at the earlier hour, but I myself think that seven o'clock is a decidedly good hour, and we should be heartily glad if we could get uniform closing at eight o'clock.

675. Having regard to the habits of the class with which we are dealing, you would not think an earlier hour than seven practicable?—No.

677. Would it be practicable to have a later hour for the Friday and Saturday closing?—It is not felt to be necessary; on Saturday there is a later hour.

678. Having regard to the conditions and the real necessities of the people, it would be desirable to have a later hour for closing on Friday and Saturday, taking seven as the hour for the other days in the week?—Not Friday, but Saturday. An hour earlier than 10 o'clock is impracticable for the present wants of the working classes at Glasgow.

679. On what day?—On Saturday.

680. On Friday you would have the usual hour?—The usual hour. I am speaking from the force of the habits of the people.

681. My question is directed to what I describe as the real wants of the people, and not the imaginary wants, arising out of the present condition of things?—I quite concur that the poor should not be forced, and indeed, unless there was a change in the social condition of the people, I would not be in favour of an earlier hour than 10 on Saturdays.

682. You confine your answer to my question, namely, to the working-class population?—Yes.

683. What are your rules as to the interval for dinner in the middle of the day?—Our rule is an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner.

684. I presume the people take it in detachments?—Yes, one o'clock to two, and two to three. We have exceptions when we know that a young lad is living with his parents at a distance; on engaging him, rather than force him to take lodgings or anything of that sort, we concede, perhaps, a quarter of an hour or 20 minutes to his hour. Then I have one shop just now, through the force of competition from neighbours, keeping open late and closing later.

685. I am speaking of the dinner hour?—They get a tea hour in this case.

686. You give an hour for breakfast, an hour for dinner, and then my question was about to be, do you allow a little interval for some slight refreshment, such as tea, in the afternoon?—Where the hours are extended to nine o'clock they have a short interval for tea. If they live adjacent to where they work, they can run for it, but if they have a distance to go they provide some temporary means of making tea in the back premises.

687. Do most of the assistants in Glasgow live on the premises or at their own homes?—All in their own homes, almost without exception.

688. Do they live with their relations or at the place of business?—With their relations or in lodgings.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

689. Do you say assistants in shops do not live in the shop, do not live with their masters?—It is possible to get an exception, but the universal custom, and the general custom in Glasgow, is that there is almost no such thing as boarding your assistants.

Sir Francis Powell.

690. Have you any further information to give us respecting the intervals?—I am afraid not.

691. What are your rules in Glasgow as to seats for assistants?—Our assistants are all males. Consequently, I never heard of such a thing as a seat.

692. Do you know what the rules are where girls and women are employed?—In our part of Glasgow, unless in cash boxes, there are almost no females employed. In shops such as pork butchers, that are now becoming rather a common class of shop in Glasgow, I see they provide seats for their assistants.

693. You find the wholesome practice of providing seating accommodation is becoming more common?—Yes; in my knowledge at one time there was not such a thing, and now I see it beginning to be observed here and there.

694. May we take your answer as applying to the whole of Glasgow?—Yes.

695. Both in what you describe as the west-end and also the working-class district?—Yes.

696. You consider the hours and intervals for refreshment are pretty much the same throughout Glasgow?—Pretty much the same; the hours of closing differ, if you wish to include that. We have, in Glasgow, districts that have purely family residences in them, and there the hours are much earlier than in the working-class districts. The hours there are seven in the evening, and in the summer time they close, I think, at five, but not on Saturday.

697. The necessity for longer hours on a Saturday absolutely vanishes in such a district?—Their customers are at the coast or in the country. They have no necessity for longer hours.

699. Do you find them improve after the necessary training?—Yes, you improve at any trade to which you go. Your general intelligence and your education may not improve, but your knowledge of your trade.

700. Their technical knowledge increases, but the general education is not improved?—No.

701. Do you think that the long hours have any connection with the difficulties to which you have made reference?—Yes, indeed, we have lads of 14 or 15 beginning, and then giving it up. They will not go into the trade, and tell their parents distinctly they will not go.

702. Then the hours amongst the shop assistants are longer than the hours of their relations and friends, their relations and friends being employed in other businesses?—Yes, and they prefer to go to trades.

703. Then you probably expect that if the hours were made shorter the shop assistants would become more plentiful as a class?—Yes.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

704. Do not you think that by the voluntary system there has been a great improvement in the length of hours in shops in your district?—I observe drapers close generally earlier than what they did in my young days, but in our trade the improvement is hardly perceptible.

Sir Francis Powell.

705. You gave us some information as to the half-holiday in the country districts in Scotland. Is it the case that the half-holiday is a prevailing custom throughout Scotland, leaving out the large towns such as Glasgow and Edinburgh?—Yes, it is pretty general now.

706. I remember some years ago passing through Oban, and there was a complete half-holiday every week?—Yes.

707. Do you consider that a fair illustration of the practice?—Yes.

708. Outside of the great cities?—Outside of the great cities there is a general half-holiday.

Tuesday, 26th March 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cameron Corbett.
Mr. Diamond.
Mr. Edwards.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. Frederick Frye.
Sir John Gorst.
Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.
Sir Blundell Maple.
Sir Francis Powell.
Mr. Samuel Smith.
Mr. Tennant.

SIR JOHN GORST IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN ADAMS COONEY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

709. YOU, I understand, are chairman of the Scottish Shopkeepers' and Assistants' Union?—Yes.

710. That, I understand, is the largest association of employers and assistants in Scotland?—That is so.

711. In fact, it has more shopkeepers within its numbers than any other association?—It has.

712. As well as having more assistants?—Yes.

713. Can you give us the numbers?—About 2,500 members altogether. I may state that we have three classes of members. We have honorary members who pay either an annual subscription, or five guineas at a time and become life members; then we have what we call full members.

Sir Blundell Maple.

714. The honorary members need not be connected with trade at all, I presume?—Yes, they are all connected with trade; they are grocers, provision merchants, or drapers. They are connected with shopkeeping, and from that class of gentlemen we have got honorary subscriptions to the amount of fully 1,200*l.* All that money has been given by shopkeepers themselves towards this early closing association. This entitles them to be honorary members. Then we have what are called full members. They pay at the rate of 1*l.* 7*s.* a year; but when ill they get a certain amount of money, and doctor and medicine free. There is only 7½ per cent. of their contributions added to the Early Closing Fund, which is kept separate from the Benefit Fund.

715. How many of these full members are there?—There are about 2,100, I should say; that is as close as I can go to.

Mr. Diamond.

716. Those are all assistants, I presume?—No; a good many of those are shopkeepers.

717. Who get an allowance when ill?—Yes. The third class of members we call affiliated members. They pay 2*s.* 6*d.* a year, and it goes entirely to management and early closing. Those are the three classes.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

718. Can you tell us about the composition of your board?—We have at present a directorate of 18; nine employers and nine assistants.

719. You have studied this Bill to some extent?—I have personally; and I also had a special meeting of directors, who considered this Bill. We hail it with satisfaction. In fact, we hail any Early Closing Bill with satisfaction, but especially this one, on the ground that it is voluntary, and, if it does not make us better, it cannot make us anything worse.

720. Do you find the shopkeepers themselves in favour of the Bill as well as the assistants?—I do. I have come in contact with a number of employers, and not in one case have I found them objecting to the Bill. The assistants are also unanimous.

721. You think that the best way of dealing with the difficulty of the hours of assistants is by having a definite hour for closing the shops rather than any other limitation of the number of hours per week that the assistants should work?—Yes; this voluntary Bill is preferable.

722. What you mean is this: that this closing of the shops at a definite hour by a local option is what you approve of?—Yes, that is what we are in favour of. There is a great difficulty experienced in carrying out the Shop Hours Act of 1892 as to the inspectors, because the parties have to be watched for a certain length of time—a whole week, say. This is a Bill which puts it in the hands of the shopkeepers themselves to say what time they will close.

723. I suppose, in the case of the limitation of hours, the great difficulty is getting evidence from the assistants themselves, whose position might be imperilled by giving evidence?—Well, yes, that is a drawback; and, besides, it would take five times the number of inspectors that we have in Glasgow to enforce the Act, as one inspector, if he suspects a case, has to start on Monday morning and continue that inspection till Saturday night before he knows how many hours that assistant has wrought.

Mr. Cameron Corbett—continued.

724. I suppose your feeling would be that experience shows that shopkeepers would consider such inspection a far greater infliction upon them than any definite hour of closing which applied to all equally?—That is so. They will object. Well, I do not know that they will object; but I have a sort of feeling that they would.

725. Whereas you find the general feeling is in favour of a definite closing of the shutters by local option?—Quite so. No Bill would be complete that does not include provisions for the assistants ceasing work when the shop is shut.

Sir Blundell Maple.

726. This Bill does not?—No; it does not include provisions for that. The shop may be shut at 7 o'clock at night, and the assistants can be wrought on till 12 o'clock.

727. Then you would not propose a clause limiting the hours of the assistants?—I would have it read that all work ceased when the shop shut.

728. Whether there were any customers in the shop or not?—No; I would give them a reasonable time to be served. A shop might be shut, say, at half-past 9 just now, and it is quite a common occurrence for the assistants to be wrought on till 12 o'clock at night.

729. You say you have studied this Bill?—I have.

730. How would you classify the different trades?—You have provision made in this Bill, I think, for the central authority, who will classify the trades.

731. Then there is Clause 5, which says, "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them"?—That is to say, here is a grocer and a provision merchant. Both the trades are carried on in the one premises; if the grocers decide on closing at 7 o'clock, and the provision people at 8 o'clock, I would say that a man who carries on both trades requires to give up selling provisions, or close at 7 o'clock.

732. Supposing that the grocer decides to close for a half holiday on Monday, and the draper closes on Saturday for a half holiday, and the boot shops close on Wednesday for a half holiday, this clause surely would close the shops every one of those days?—Yes, that is so.

733. How would you get the number of shops of a particular class; for instance, as regards Scotland, the "district" there by this Bill means the local authority; under the Public Health Act (Scotland) these are very large districts, are not they?—Glasgow is a large district; but, nevertheless, I think that it would be much better to have it at Glasgow under the sanitary authorities of the city than to have it divided into wards or districts.

734. Which do you think would be the better?—I think it would be better to have it that it be confined to the borough of Glasgow.

735. The whole borough?—Yes, under the local authorities there.

736. Take, for instance, bakers. How would you arrive at what hour they wished to close; you are going to close them by a two-thirds majority; how are you going to decide as to the number of bakers?—This Bill being passed it would be our, I will say our, that is, the Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union, duty as an early closing association to find out how many bakers there were; then to get the signatures of what we would consider two-thirds of them; then approach our local authorities on the matter, and it would be for them to find out whether it was correct or not.

737. Who is going to certify to those signatures?—I think that that would be the local authority's duty.

738. The local authority would have to go and canvass all the bakers, and where a shopkeeper keeps groceries as well as bread, is he to be considered a baker?—He is both a baker and a grocer.

739. When we come to deal with fishmongers and greengrocers, this Bill includes all the costermongers, for a shop is described as meaning "any building or portion of a building, booth, stall, or place where goods are exposed or offered for sale by retail," and includes a place "where the business of a barber is carried on." So that costermongers you would have to canvass?—Every trade, I might say, would have to be canvassed, and for the first two or three years there would be great difficulty experienced, but it would come right, I believe.

740. The whole of Glasgow you would canvass for all its different trades?—Yes.

741. Who is to pay the expense of all this canvassing?—The union that I am connected with. We have done canvassing almost to the same extent in getting up evidence for the Labour Commission.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

742. You mean you would have to satisfy the local authority that two-thirds of the trade were in favour of the change?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

743. Surely the local authority would want themselves to be satisfied?—Yes, they would go over the area that we had already given them and satisfy themselves. I will not say it would be necessary for them to canvass every shop the same as we do; but they could go and satisfy themselves that the statement we gave was correct by calling at a certain number of places.

744. This Bill places it in the hands of the police, does not it, to carry out this Act?—Yes.

745. The police are to visit all the shopkeepers?—That is what makes it so easily done. A policeman on his own beat could satisfy himself, and hand the whole thing compiled to the chief constable of the district.

746. Then, who is to take action to summon the shopkeeper?—It should be in the hands of the local authorities; but in Clause 1, here, I notice that there is rather large scope left for the local authorities. "The local authority may, if they see fit, make an order giving effect to the application."

application." That is, we might get 99 out of every 100 of any one class of shopkeepers to say they will close at 7 o'clock; you go to the local authorities, and they can still refuse, as far as this Bill is concerned. That is Clause 1.

747. Supposing it is decided that one or more of the shopkeepers keep open their shops beyond the order that is issued, the police here have to take proceedings?—That is so.

748. The police have to summons the shopkeeper?—Yes.

749. You know the Shop Hours Regulation Act, which prevents the employment of young people under 18 years for more than 74 hours?—Yes.

750. Do not you think it would be better to extend that Act, and not close the shops by local option?—If you extend it to all the shopkeepers, and their assistants of all classes, and limit it from a weekly to a daily hour, it would come in, I believe, and help to take the place of this.

751. Your society works to get shorter hours for the shop assistants?—They do.

752. And that is the object?—That is the object.

753. But this Bill would not ensure that?—It is almost certain to do it.

754. It might do it?—Yes.

755. The other direct Act, limiting the hours of labour, would do it, without failing?—Of course, there would be some cases of evading that Act; but, generally speaking, it would.

756. Why more so than evading the Shop Hours Act now?—The constable can see at once whether the door is shut or not. An inspector would have to go into each shop and see whether the assistants themselves were kept late or not. He would have a difficulty in getting the evidence of those assistants, whereas the constable sees at once, whether the door is closed or not, under this Act, and can take proceedings.

757. Do you find that the Shop Hours Regulation Act does not work?—I know that a number of inspections have been made, and some prosecutions; but I rather think that it is a dead letter to a certain extent, owing to it being a 74 hours' week, instead of a daily limitation.

758. This Bill recognises the fact that we have half-holidays, and that some shops may close later on certain days of the week?—I do not catch your meaning.

759. To put it plainly, would you say that the shop is to be closed every night at the same hour?—No; I would say, previous to a holiday it should be kept open a little later.

760. But would you say the shop is to be closed at the same hour every day and every week?—Yes.

761. Every day?—Every day.

762. No late shopping on Saturday?—No, personally I am against shopping on Saturday. I really think that the half-holiday should be on Saturday.

763. That is very well for the drapery trade, is it not, but for provisions?—Any trade you like to take, because I do not believe that any working man's wife requires to wait any longer than 1 or 2 o'clock for his wages; and I have made special inquiries, and the majority of larger works, such as iron works and railway companies, do not pay on Saturdays at all. I would take it as an estimate that not more than 50 per cent. of the working class get their pay on a Saturday.

764. Take, for instance, fish caught on a Friday night and Saturday morning; if all shops closed early on Saturday, in the summer it might be bad before Monday morning?—One week will regulate that, the same as it does just now on a Saturday. I should say the business would be principally done on Thursday or Friday then.

765. That the fish would be caught?—You might as well say it would go bad on Sunday. I can speak from experience. Five years ago our magistrates recommended our spring holiday, which was always held on a Thursday, to be held on a Monday. There was some opposition to it. The first year some closed and some did not, but now it is the most favourite holiday we have in the city. The cry was, "What will the butchers do; what will the fishmongers do?" They are closing on Sunday and Monday, both days together.

766. But they do not close the whole of Monday?—They do. It is the most universal holiday in Glasgow, the spring Monday.

767. Is it the first Monday?—No, it is the 15th of April this year.

Chairman.

768. Easter Monday?—Yes, it is generally held on Easter Monday.

769. What is called Easter holiday in England?—We call it our spring holiday there.

Mr. Diamond.

770. The society you represent, I gather from you, is largely composed of employers, the shopkeepers themselves?—No, there are far more assistants than employers.

771. There are a large number of employers?—Yes.

772. Can you give me any idea as to what class of employers they are; that is to say, whether they are very large employers, or whether they employ, perhaps, an average of one or two assistants; I want to get from you whether they represent the large shopkeeper or the average small tradesman?—There is quite a number of them average small tradesmen. We have, I may say, from the lowest to the highest in most of the trades.

773. And they are in favour of this measure as it was considered by the committee?—They are.

774. It has been suggested that you should say whether you have submitted copies of the Bill to the members of the committee and to the members of the society generally?—Not the members of the society, but to the members of the committee.

775. Half of whom are employers?—And half assistants.

776. You say you are better pleased with this Bill because it is a voluntary Bill, but then later you said you thought that it should be left, even after you got a majority, to the option of the local authority to put the Act into force, was not desirable?

Mr. Diamond—continued.

desirable?—No, I think if the majority of shopkeepers are in favour of closing early it should be imperative on the local authority to enforce the Act that the majority ask for.

777. Then you are in favour in Clause 1, line 9, of substituting the word "shall" for the word "may," so that it should be imperative?—Yes, if they see fit, but they may not see fit.

778. Then you would strike out "see fit"?—Yes, "they shall make an order."

779. If once you got a majority of the shopkeepers on a poll and thereafter the local authority has no option, what is the need for the local authority being invoked, seeing that it has no discretion, and that it must do a certain thing?—Yes; it must force the minority of a third to close along with them. We always find in voluntary early closing it is the very vast minority that breaks up such a thing as that.

Chairman.

780. By "vast minority" you mean a very small minority?—A very small minority.

Mr. Diamond.

781. You think it would be necessary to invoke the aid of the local authority to see that the Act is carried out?—I am quite satisfied that it would be necessary.

782. That is what you mean by substituting "shall" for "may"?—Yes.

783. You said something about working in the shops after closing hours. There was a witness here at the last meeting of the Committee representing a Scottish society, and he said that from his experience there were very few cases indeed of assistants being employed in shops after the shop was closed. I gather that your experience is the very reverse of that?—Yes, quite the reverse. It is not hearsay; I know it for a fact.

784. That some shops close at 9 o'clock?—Nine and half-past 9.

785. And that assistants are kept working up to 12?—Sometimes; very often on a Friday night, preparing for the Saturday.

786. You think that unless the Bill did more than decide about the hour of closing; unless it also put a prohibition against this work after the shop was closed, it would, to a large extent, so far as assistants are concerned, be of very little benefit to them?—Very little. The Bill will not be complete without provisions being made as to that.

787. How, then, would you meet that question of inspection, because a moment ago you said that if it were left to the policeman, he in going his beat would see whether a shop was closed?—Surely there would be light enough? It would be an easy matter for the constable to see whether there is anybody working inside or not; quite as easy as to see whether there was a burglar inside or not.

788. I only want to know how you would meet that difficulty. Would you empower the constable to go to a shop in which he suspected that people were being employed after the shop was closed, and have the door opened for his inspection; would you give that authority to the constable, or would you suggest some other person to whom it should be given?—No, I would hardly give it to the constable. As I have already said, the employers object, or would object, to inspection.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

789. Then, how do you meet the difficulty, because you will at once see there is a difficulty. You want to avoid working after the closing of the shops. You would not allow the policeman to be the agent to see that the work is not carried on. What sort of inspection would you suggest to meet the case?—I would suggest that he reports that to the local authority.

790. Reports what?—That he has a suspicion, and then the inspectors, or the sanitary authorities, who would have the enforcement of the principle, would watch the shop, and if they found them working late there they would have them summoned.

Sir Blundell Maple.

791. The police would summon?—I think it becomes imperative on the police to summon.

Mr. Diamond.

792. As I understand, the question is, would you have this action taken on the initiative of the police officer or by the direction of the local authority?—By the direction of the local authority.

Sir Blundell Maple.

793. The local authority would not know of its existence?—The constable gives the information, and the local authority supplies the inspection.

794. The policeman is to go to the local authority and inform the local authority?—That he suspects there is late work going on in that shop.

795. Before he gets to the local authority the shop is shut up?—Of course, that might be so in one case.

Mr. Diamond.

796. This matter of inspection presents a difficulty, as you will have gathered. There does not seem to be unanimity amongst those in favour of the Bill as to what shall be the power entrusted with the inspection and the carrying out of prosecutions. You object, I understand, to the policeman doing it?—I do.

797. You think the employers would object?—I think they would.

798. Yet you do want to stop working after the shop is closed?—I do.

799. What authority would you suggest to carry out that part of the Act?—This Bill says something about the local sanitary authority. If the constable gave information to the chief sanitary officer, he has inspectors, I know, at his command, under the Shop Hours Act, in Glasgow, and in various other towns, and these same inspectors should watch the shop and see that no late work was going on.

800. Would you give them power to demand admission to the shop?—I think, as I have already stated, they could get information that late work was going on inside without going into the shop.

801. From the assistants themselves?—That information given by the assistants would have to be given under cover.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

802. How could you prove this late work; a witness could not prove the case under cover; he would be compelled to come into the Court to prove the late hours, and I suppose you would be of opinion that assistants would not care to do that?—No, they would not. If there were one or two, with the constable as a witness, would not that be sufficient to procure a conviction against a man if they saw through the glass that late work was going on inside?

803. If they saw that work was going on; but I understood that the difficulty was that they could not see it from the outside. It would merely be the suspicion of the constable?—I did not say that.

Sir Blundell Maple.

804. Do not some shops burn a light inside all night?—They do. It is opposite the safe, and the safe is always exposed to the constable's view.

Mr. Diamond.

805. You said that where a tradesman carried on more than one business, for instance, the selling of groceries and the selling of provisions, if he chose to be tabulated as a grocer or as a provision merchant, he would have to give up the other business, for instance, the selling of provisions?—Yes; he would have to close his shop, giving up selling provisions.

806. You do not mean that he would have to give up the business, but that he could not sell provisions at an hour when his shop would be open only for the sale of groceries?—Yes.

807. You would not ask that he should give up the trade altogether?—No.

808. With regard to the small tradesman, who carries on the business himself, and has no assistants, do I understand you to say that you would enforce the Act with regard to him if he were working in his own shop?—Yes, I would. That is exactly the person who breaks up all the voluntary early closing; the man who has, perhaps, himself and a boy, and, in some cases, a young lad, assisting him. He keeps open to all hours, and he seems quite satisfied while he is working away there.

809. I suppose in his case you would not insist that he should not work in his shop after he had closed it. You would be content if he closed his shop, seeing that your object is to get shorter hours for the assistants in the shop. You would not prohibit the man who worked in his own shop from working as many hours as he liked to work?—No.

Sir Blundell Maple.

810. Small domestic shops employing the family you would exempt from this Act; shops that employed no shop assistants?—I would include them in the Act.

811. You would include all shops, even if they were small domestic shops. You know what I mean by that?—Yes; we call them huckster shops.

812. Shops that are kept by only the shopkeeper and his wife and family?—Just so. I would include those in the Act.

Mr. Diamond.

813. You have already said that you would not prohibit the small shopkeeper from working after the shop was closed. Would you prohibit his wife or his own family from working after the shop was closed; after all, I want to get out what the effect of this is going to be, and if a man has a shop of his own, and is permitted to work after the shop is closed, and his wife and his family are permitted to work, you would not, I understand, object to that?—No, I do not think there can be much objection to that as long as he does not keep it open.

814. You are satisfied to get the shop closed in that case?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

815. This Bill provides for lodgers, people who live over the shop in the same house, being supplied?—I think that is a rare occurrence in Scotland; I do not think that we have any shops that have direct communication and where lodgers are kept.

Mr. Diamond.

816. The question of canvassing was mentioned; that is to say, ascertaining the number of a particular trade. I gather from you that already your association has done a very great deal of work, spending time and I suppose money in endeavouring to get the shops to close by voluntary effort?—No, we sent round schedules asking each trade what time they would be prepared to close.

817. I understood you were canvassing by circular, instead of personally calling?—We had canvassers; they left these circulars, and they called in a few days, when the questions were filled up. In some cases they were filled up, and in others they were not.

818. Naturally, if this Bill were passed, and it became an Act, you would only be too glad to do whatever canvassing was necessary in order to get the two-thirds majority in favour of putting the Act into force?—Yes; it would be our association's duty to do so as an early closing association.

819. That is to say, the assistants themselves would do that?—No; it is composed of employers, too.

820. But the assistants themselves would be quite willing to undertake the work of getting the adhesion of the two-thirds majority. They might assist, but we should engage canvassers, or our general secretary would.

821. Your association would?—Yes.

822. You said something about Saturday closing. Do I gather from that that you think that all the shops should be closed on Saturday; that the half-holiday should be on Saturday?—It there is to be a half-holiday at all I should say it should be on Saturday. The assistants work until 12 o'clock at night, and a holiday coming on Monday, or even on Sunday, it is quite impossible for them to take advantage of the cheap railway fares and cheap sails, and all the facilities that are held out from Saturday to Monday.

823. You said also you had made inquiries as to how wages were paid in the very large workshops, in the railway workshops, chemical works, and places of that description?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

824. And you found they were paid on Friday, I suppose?—A great many are paid on Thursday, some are paid on Monday.

825. Do you know anything as to the general rule in a very large number of places as to the hour of paying on Saturday, which is sometimes one o'clock and sometimes two o'clock?—As far as I can gather there are none which pay after one o'clock; the shipbuilding yards are about the largest.

826. How far would many of these workers have to go on a Saturday after they got their money before they reached home?—In some cases they have a good distance to go.

827. What time do you think they would reach home in a large number of cases?—That is a very wide question.

828. I understood you to say that there was no reason why a workman's wife should not have her marketing done by two o'clock?—I did not mention a time at all. I said on Saturday afternoon. I should be quite pleased to see a four o'clock Saturday afternoon. If any man is paid at one, with the conveniences at his hand, he could, in my opinion, be home from two to three o'clock.

829. When he gets home of course he would have to have something to eat?—Doubtless.

830. And get himself dressed and so forth to go out with his wife, as many of them do, to do their shopping?—Yes.

831. Do not you think that, if the entire working-class community were called upon to do its shopping on a Saturday between two o'clock and four o'clock, it would be physically impossible for the shops to do the whole of the business in those two hours?—No. I believe that it would be no inconvenience to the working class.

832. I am speaking of the possibility of the shopkeepers themselves doing all the business that they now do up to 10, 11, or 12 o'clock on Saturday night between two o'clock and, say, four o'clock on the Saturday, which is the time you suggest. Could they possibly accommodate their customers?—Yes; but look how often a shopkeeper and his assistants are standing idle on a Saturday afternoon.

833. I am speaking of the possibility of these people doing their shopping between the hours at which they get their money and the hour at which you would close the shop; do you think it is possible for all these hundreds of thousands of working people to get their butcher's meat, their groceries, and their draperies, and everything else they require in two hours on a Saturday?—I do.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

834. I suppose that you are aware that in the small shops all the trade really is done on a Friday and Saturday night?—That is so.

835. Do you think that those who buy at that ime would consent to the closing of the shops at two o'clock or four o'clock on Saturday?—I think they would, because there is no class who advocate shorter hours more than the working man, and who have less thought for the assistants, but were it before their notice, I do believe that they would not feel it an inconvenience to have shops closed.

Mr. Frederick Frye—continued.

836. You would close all the shops small and large at the same time?—Of course this Bill allows the shopkeepers themselves to say.

837. You still think the trade might be done, so that the shops should be closed at four o'clock on Saturday?—I do.

Mr. Edwards.

838. When a workman's wife goes shopping in this way, do you know whether it is the custom to give any credit?—There is a lot of credit given.

839. Would it be possible for them to expect a week's credit as an ordinary thing?—That is the ordinary limit.

840. It would not be necessary for them, supposing they were paid on a Saturday to take their money with them on that day?—In some cases, no.

841. They could shop one Saturday and pay on the next Saturday?—Yes. It is done very often.

842. Therefore the wives could go in the morning and shop?—Yes, or on Friday.

843. Is it the custom for the workmen to go with their wives to shop?—Well, some only.

844. Do you think such a system of credit is so universal as to make it possible for Saturday early closing in that sense, the credit being given from one week to another; that the payment of the wages being on one Saturday, payment for the next could be on the following Saturday?—I do not think the credit system is carried on to such an extent, but those who do not get credit are the people who have money about them, and who do not require to wait for their husbands to come home with the money. They would be the thrifty people.

845. Therefore, you think that it is practicable to have early closing on Saturday?—It is; and not only is that so in my own opinion, but I know several employers who say that it could be perfectly well done with no inconvenience to the public, and that they want a half holiday when other people are having it, and when they can take advantage of the cheap railway and steamboat fares, and have their Saturday to Monday, like other people.

Sir Blundell Maple.

846. If all the shopkeepers in any town closed on the same half holiday, there would not be room on the playgrounds and recreation grounds for all the assistants, would there?—Oh, yes.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

847. I suppose you are intimately acquainted with the conditions of the retail trade in Glasgow?—I am.

848. And with that of other Scotch cities?—A little in Edinburgh, Paisley, and Kilmarnock.

849. Is there a great difference in regard to the hours between the working-class and the middle-class neighbourhoods of Glasgow in the closing of shops; for instance, is there a difference in the hour of closing of bakers' shops in the middle-class streets and the poorer shops in the working-working-class streets?—Yes; in the centre of our city I know one or two better-class shops who close from six to half-past six, and a good many at seven o'clock, and further out of the city eight o'clock is a general rule for closing during the week.

850. And on Saturday?—On Saturdays I know one place only which closes about four o'clock, and one or two about nine o'clock. A good many of the respectable shops close about 10 o'clock, and then it comes down to the ordinary run, where it is about 12 o'clock.

851. By "respectable" I suppose you mean large?—Yes; a dealer in a better-class part of the city.

852. As in the case of London, where there are a great number of assistants employed, the hour of closing is earlier in Glasgow than in the smaller shops, is it not?—Yes.

853. Take a typical shop in a typical street in a working-class district, is it the custom to employ hands outside the family?—You sometimes find an elderly gentleman attending to a small shop with the assistance of just a boy or so. The boy may assist behind the counter when they are busy, and go with messages when they are not busy in the shop.

854. Has a man of that kind an absolutely fixed hour of closing?—No.

855. He varies it according to the requirements of the day?—Yes; and according to how he feels himself, I think, in some cases.

856. There was a congress held in Glasgow in 1889, was there not, on this subject?—No, not to my knowledge, there may have been.

857. I think it was so stated in evidence given on the last occasion?—We had two representatives at a congress in Nottingham in 1893.

858. But you do not recollect this congress in Glasgow of which Mr. Stacey spoke?—No, I do not.

859. Were those small traders the men of whom we have been speaking, and those who employ a boy and work themselves in their shop represented?—Do you mean at Nottingham?

860. Yes, take Nottingham, if you like?—No, I do not think so.. There were two of our directors from the Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union; you will be examining one of those a little later on and possibly he will give you more information than I can.

861. You do not know whether there would be much opposition on the part of these small shopkeepers to the compulsory enforcement of this Bill?—That is the only quarter where we may expect opposition.

862. Would that opposition be general?—No.

863. Under the Bill six o'clock is a possible hour of closing. What is the hour advocated by your association?—We should like seven o'clock, and six o'clock, perhaps, in the centre of the city.

864. In the Bill the discretion, of course, is absolutely in the hands of the local authorities?—Yes, but I think, once you get it reduced to seven o'clock all over the city, you will find the shops in the centre of the city commence to close about six. Some of our large drapery warehouses, in fact, the majority of them, close at six now.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

865. Why, if the hour were fixed for seven, would they be inclined to close at six more than they are now; of course they can close then, if they want to do so now?—I do not know what is their idea about it.

866. When you say they would, what ground have you for saying so?—I take it as my ground that they do it now seeing that eight o'clock is a more recognised hour for Glasgow amongst the majority of shops throughout the city. The largest shops in the centre of the city close an hour earlier.

867. Supposing this Bill only applied to shops where more than one assistant was employed, would you say that it would work injustice as against the larger establishments?—Yes.

868. Therefore of course you touch the purely domestic shop?—Yes.

869. Would you interfere with the man's labour except in the shop; supposing, as is sometimes the case, he combined work outside with the keeping of a shop, you would not of course prevent him working outside?—Yes, I would.

870. How, and to what extent?—It is the poor unfortunate message boys who are very often wrought in connection with the shop delivering messages till very late at night.

871. That is not quite my question. The case I was taking was this: supposing a man keeps one of these small domestic shops and his wife does most of the business, and he himself has another occupation outside, all you would interfere with, I suppose, is the shop itself?—Yes.

872. You do not go beyond that?—No.

873. Of course there it would not be a question of anybody's labour; the man himself very likely would not be in the shop more than a few hours; his wife would be managing it?—Yes.

874. You know of cases of that kind, I suppose?—I do.

875. Therefore it would be simply to help the shop assistants in the bigger establishments that you would deal with that particular case, because there could be no question of excessive labour?—No, but before you can assist the assistants in shops, you require to have these shops included so that they may close along with the shops which employ assistants.

876. Therefore really you would compel the smaller shopkeeper because of the needs of the larger establishments; that is what it comes to?—Yes, but the shopkeepers who employ the assistants are very largely in the majority.

877. In dealing with this Bill you propose only to treat of forcing shops to close at a particular hour. Have you considered an alternative proposal of extending the old Act so as to bring other people besides young persons under it, and not to allow anybody to work more than, we will say, 74 hours in a week?—As long as it is 74 hours a week, and bringing all people under it, it is useless.

878. Then you are in favour of the Bill as it stands?—With one or two slight alterations.

879. Which, I daresay, you have explained?—There are one or two which I wish to add.

880. What are they?—This Bill does not provide for restaurants, and badly situated although the shopkeepers and assistants are in the grocery and provision trade, they are infinitely superior and better off than are the assistants in restaurants; I know they work from eight in the morning till nine o'clock every day, and till 11 o'clock on Saturday night, and a great many nights throughout the week they have to work late if there is a smoking concert about. Those are altogether excluded; I would not suggest that they should be shut up, but that it should be made a certain number of hours per day.

881. Not per week, but per day?—Per day.

882. Why, if it is good in the case of restaurants, should it not be good in other cases to make a certain number of hours per day or per week the legal limit?—The more holidays and the more leisure there is amongst the general public in a city the more they take to a restaurant; therefore it is almost necessary that they should be open.

883. I suppose still more so in the case of railway refreshment places?—Not so much that. Of course we cannot touch licensed houses; we can touch unlicensed restaurants, but I would not touch licensed houses at all, such as public-houses.

884. You would leave them out?—Yes.

885. You agree to leaving chemists out?—Yes, to save opposition to the Bill, I would.

886. What is the usual time for leaving off work in Glasgow in the factories and workshops on week days?—I think about six o'clock, and two o'clock on Saturday.

887. That applies to all season trades?—I do not know; I am not acquainted with it.

Mr. Tennant.

888. I notice you said that you would prefer to have this vote taken in Glasgow as a whole rather than divided into wards; can you give a reason for that?—Generally, a street divides two wards. You might have a grocer who closed at seven o'clock on one side of the street and another closing at eight on the other side.

889. I suppose you could not give us any evidence with regard to London?—No.

890. Did I understand you rightly to say that you would make your society, the Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union, responsible for finding out the will of the two-thirds of the various trades in the city?—We would make it a point to do so, and in each town where we had a branch. We are a Scottish society, not a local society, you know.

891. In finding out that, would you ask them the hour at which they would wish to close, or would you leave that to the local authorities?—No; the first question which would be asked when you went into a shop would be, "What hour do you want to close?" We must have a set time.

892. You might have a two-thirds majority in favour of closing rather earlier, but you might have a great many opinions as to the hour at which you would close?—Yes, of course; in each case we should get them to sign what hour they would be willing to close at.

893. In the event of your finding that you had a two-thirds majority in favour of earlier closing, but nothing like a two-thirds majority in favour of any particular hour, what would you do?—In going round, it would be necessary for us to state an hour, and to find out and get two-thirds of the whole number for a stated hour.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

894. If you had not a two-thirds majority for any particular hour, although you did have a two-thirds majority for earlier closing, you would not take any action at all?—No; we should just agitate for it till we got it.

895. Suppose you had a dispute as to the signatures; suppcsing that one trader said he did not believe that Messrs. Jones & Co., or whatever the name was, had really signed, what would you do?—It would be necessary to bring some evidence to bear on that man.

896. You would have to do that before the local authority, would you not?—No; after we got sufficient, a two-thirds majority in favour of a closing hour, we should approach the local authority, and the local authority would take measures to see that this was correct.

897. That would cost money, would it not?—They have a number of inspectors under the Shop Hours Act, who, in the meantime, could do it.

898. You have those at the present moment?—Yes.

899. You think those would be the right persons to find out whether these signatures were all genuine, or not?—Yes; they are controlled by the chief sanitary officer.

900. I do not quite understand your answer about chemists. You notice that chemists occupy a peculiar position in the Bill; they are not in the Schedule and they are not exempt?—You do not expect them to keep open, but you would allow them to serve.

901. Do you approve of the provision in the Bill?—Yes, but if there is any objection, and the Bill is going to be lost on that account, I should say exclude them.

902. Put them in the Schedule?—Yes, if the opposition from that quarter were sufficiently strong to endanger the Bill.

Dr. Farquharson.

903. Can you tell us what proportion your membership bears to the whole number of assistants and shopkeepers in Glasgow?—No.

904. Is it a tenth, or a fifth, or 1 per cent., or what?—I do not know exactly how many.

905. You have told us the number; I think it was abont 3,000?—Two thousand five hundred.

Sir Blundell Maple.

906. That is the whole of Scotland?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

907. You think that if this Bill came into operation there would not be a very great opposition on the part of what I may call the larger and better class of traders in Glasgow to the Bill?—No.

908. Supposing the Bill were passed to-morrow, would you think it would make a great difference in the conditions of shop hours in Glasgow?—Not immediately; but later, it would.

909. You have been asked about the working after the closing of the shop. I suppose if this proposal proposal of yours were adopted, and it was made illegal to continue working after the shutters were put up, the better class of traders would loyally obey the law and would not attempt to evade it?—At once. There would be no difficulty with them. The larger places will fall in with it at once. It is the small places which employ one or two assistants which would cause the difficulty.

910. On these people the very fact of its being made illegal would act as a deterrent?—I think it would.

911. You think the fact of the police having power to inspect would act as a deterrent?—I think it would.

912. I suppose the policeman would only act on what you would call reasonable suspicion. He would not burst into their shop without some suspicion of something illegal going on?—He has his beat, and it is his duty to look into the windows of each shop, and he can see whether there is any work going on late or not.

913. If he gave information on a wrong suspicion he would get himself into trouble, would he not?—But he does not take any action. He would only give the information to, we will say, the chief sanitary inspector, who would take measures to have the suspected place looked after.

914. Then your impression is, that voluntary action would not be of much use?—It is useless.

915. For what reason?—It has been so often tried, and has been a failure in each case. The Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union tried some four years ago, and they got them unanimous, all but one grocer, who refused to close, and that broke up the whole arrangement.

916. One man standing out destroyed the whole arrangement?—Yes; that was in a certain district in Glasgow.

917. As to small shopkeepers, about whom Mr. Lawson examined you just now, would you consider it any very great hardship that they should be obliged to fall into line with the others?—No.

918. Is it not the case that in the case of small shopkeepers the evils which you want to stop are the worst?—That is where the evil is.

919. The proposals of this Bill are, of course, based largely on hygienic grounds, on grounds of public health?—Personally, I do not know anything about the health of assistants, whether it endangers their health or not, but, taking a reasonable view of it, it can hardly do otherwise.

920. It is the opinion of a great many people interested in this Bill, including the promoter (Sir John Lubbock), that a great deal of injury is done to health from too long hours. Assuming that, is not it the case that the evil would be greatest in the case of small shops?—Yes.

921. There is more gas burnt, and therefore the air is deteriorated?—Yes.

922. In the case Mr. Lawson put just now of the master of the shop being away and the wife doing the work of the shop, has not the wife got to be protected, perhaps, against her husband, who may make her keep too long hours?—She has, but that is a matter which should strike the individual rather than the community.

DR. FARQUHARSON IN THE CHAIR.

Sir Blundell Maple.

923. You say that the police are to do this on their beat. The number of policemen would have to be increased considerably, would it not?—No.

924. If a policeman stood about a shop and made inquiries about a shop, he could not continue his beat and get round it in proper times, could he?—Quite easily.

925. With his stopping and looking, he could still get on, you think?—Yes.

926. This Bill, you say, would not interfere with the large shops at all?—I do not think it would.

927. Is it only directed against the small shopkeepers?—No; against the middle-class and smaller ones.

928. Shops that keep 10 assistants and under, as a rule?—Oh, no; they go smaller than that, four I should say.

929. From 10 downwards?—I do not think any shop keeping 10 assistants will be affected by this Bill.

930. It is therefore the small shops that will be affected by the Bill?—Yes, those employing one or two assistants.

Mr. Diamond.

931. Arising out of the question put to you by Mr. Edwards, with reference to people getting credit for a week, do you know anything about the co-operative system of trading?—Very little.

932. You do not know whether in that case

cash payment is the invariable rule, and not giving credit?—I do not know.

933. You said something about the number of big shops greatly exceeding the number of small shops. What ground had you for that statement?—I did not say big shops. If I said big shops, I did not mean big shops. I meant shops employing three or four assistants, or say, half-a-dozen assistants, they are in the majority.

934. Can you give me any figures to bear out that statement; can you give me any figures to show that shops employing four assistants are very much more numerous than shops that employ a less number of assistants, or no assistants at all?—No, I merely speak from observation.

935. We should like some definite figures before we could accept a statement of that kind. Another question is this: the class of customers who go to these large shops do their shopping, I suppose, as a general rule, in the middle of the day and not in the evening?—I can speak for one or two, who do a class of trade from the highest to the lowest, and at half-past five to six o'clock the busiest part of the day has passed.

936. Shops situated in the centre of a large town like Glasgow will be, as a rule, not at all so liable to late hours as a shop that is situated in an industrial district where the customers drop in from their houses and get their little requirements just as they want them?—That is so. It is quite a common occurrence for people to sit in the house, and then say, "Oh, well, it is time to get in now, it is a quarter to eight." They wait till the last minute. In the summer time, on Saturday mornings particularly, you are left very quiet, simply because they are all away enjoying a sail or being away in the country, and then they come back, and the last hour or two are the busiest. Again, when people are not leaving the city we find that 11 to 12 o'clock is the busiest hour of the whole day, simply because they come from the public-houses.

937. I will direct your attention to an answer given on the last occasion by a witness who was asked whether it would be desirable to have a later hour for closing on Friday and Saturday, taking seven as the hour for the other days of the week, and he said "Not Friday but Saturday; an earlier hour than 10 o'clock is impracticable for the present wants of the working classes of Glasgow." I take it from a previous answer which you have given me that you dissent very emphatically from that answer?—I do.

938. You think that four o'clock would meet all the reasonable requirements of the working classes on Saturday?—I think so because, having a four o'clock hour on Saturday, you get more business on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Tennant.

939. In taking the vote to which you have referred would you give one occupier, one shopkeeper, one vote, or would you take a poll of the assistants?—The assistants ought to have no say in the matter; I would leave it altogether to the shopkeeper; it is he who suffers if he closes.

940. Do you think that all shops should have just one vote?—A vote for every shop I should say, not individual votes.

941. Having no regard to the number of assistants employed?—No.

942. Or to the size or nature of the shop?—No.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

943. Is it the case in Glasgow, or in other Scotch towns, that the shopping in small and what I may call domestic shops is very slack before the evening?—It is.

944. It is only in the evening hours that there is really brisk business?—Yes, and especially from 11 to 12 at night.

945. When you talk of the hours in domestic shops, do you count as working hours those hours in the middle of the day when there may be somebody minding the shop, but when there is no business done?—Yes, I do.

Sir Blundell Maple.

946. As to this late shopping, does not it often occur with people who cannot do their shopping at any other time?—I do not think it.

947. Such people as cabmen, omnibus drivers, and labourers, who are only paid by the day: all labourers do not get their money by the week?—No; I do not think that in Glasgow any cabdrivers or omnibus drivers are paid daily.

948. You said just now that on Saturday you would close at four o'clock?—I would advocate that hour.

949. In the case of a casual labourer being employed on the Saturday and not getting his pay till after four o'clock, he would not be able to do any shopping?—Provision would be made for that. It would right itself in a couple of weeks.

Mr. Edwards.

950. Do you mean that the employer of the men would find that the shops were closed at a certain hour, and that he would arrange for a different time for paying the wages?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

951. I am dealing with casual labour, labour for one day; at docks and many places a man may not be working all the week, but he gets some work on the Saturday?—Most of the dock labour is finished before five or six, or before four o'clock on Saturday.

952. Sometimes he works until five or six?—Even though there was a casual customer of that sort, it is hardly fair that such a vast number of shopkeepers and assistants should suffer at the hands of such a very small minority.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

953. Would it be possible to have a limited number of shops open, dividing it time about; say there were 50 shops carrying on a particular trade; suppose five of those shops were to be open from Saturday till 10 o'clock to catch these stray people who cannot shop at any other hour, and that that should go round, as it were, so that there should be always some place for people to go to?—I should not approve of that. The difficulties attached to that would be almost insurmountable.

Sir Blundell Maple.

954. Is not that, in effect, what occurs now, that only those shops are open that have got late business in the district?—There is not such a thing as a few shops remaining open in a certain district this week, and another district next week, for the purpose of supplying any wants that there may be.

955. No, but the shops that remain open late now do so because they have customers who come to them late at night?—Yes, but it is only through custom, not through necessity.

Chairman.

956. Are you aware that in some localities in Scotland, in the smaller towns, the shopkeepers have voluntarily combined to shift their half-holiday from Saturday till Wednesday, in order to meet the convenience of the working classes?—I am aware that some have done so.

Mr. Edwards.

957. As a matter of fact, shopping goes on to a late hour on Saturday night, does it not?—It does.

958. And shopping goes on by people who do not live very far from the shops up to a late hour?—Sometimes just two minutes from the shops.

959. That seems not to be due to the inability to get to the shop earlier, but to the habit of going to the shop in straggling hours and not attending to a thing at a particular time?—Just so.

960. There is no necessity for it?—No necessity; it is purely custom.

961. And you think the thing could be done equally equally conveniently for them if they knew that it had to be done at a certain hour earlier in the day?—I am quite satisfied of that.

Mr. Diamond.

962. I suppose when working men get their money on Saturday they very often take themselves and their wives to the coast on excursions?—They do, and leave the poor shopkeeper waiting till they get back after their enjoyment.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

Mr. Tennant.

964. One of the witnesses told us that he would be rather in favour of having it applied to all shops and all trades and not to any particular trade. Is that your view of it?—No; I would not agree with that. It would be most unfair for a hatter to dictate to a grocer what time he should close, or for a grocer to dictate to a draper. Every class of shop should arrange its own hours.

Mr. THOMAS W. FLINT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

965. I UNDERSTAND you represent the same organisation as the last witness represented?—I do.

966. The Scottish Shopkeepers' and Assistants' Union?—Yes.

967. You have, I believe, some evidence to give us as to a plebiscite that was taken on this question?—There was a plebiscite taken two years ago.

968. Where was it taken?—In the City of Glasgow. There were about 10,000 schedules sent out, and the ayes in favour of early closing by means of legislation were 80 per cent.

969. Have you a return which you can put in on that subject?—I have the annual report of the organisation to which I belong, in which there is the following:—

"Only Retail Shops were called on; Public-houses were not called on.

"The Bootmakers do not include shops that are used as Repairing Workshops, of which there are 170."

970. Can you tell us something with respect to your experience as to half-holidays?—I know that shopkeepers feel very bitterly upon the score of not having a half-holiday like other people, and I think there is a very general desire on the part of shopkeepers that they should have one. This Bill, by placing the power in the hands of the different traders themselves to settle their own hours of closing, is very admirable, and I think nothing could be more reasonable than giving the power to fix, by a reasonable majority, the days upon which they would close.

Mr. Cameron Corbett—continued.

971. Then you approve of the option being in the hands of each trade?—Yes, I do.

972. You have, I believe, some knowledge as to the domestic shops which you could give to this Committee?—Of course that is largely from observation, because in my own business I employ a number of assistants, but I can quite understand the very great hardship that it is upon people having to work long hours, husbands and wives, and sometimes sickly children, assisting them, keeping late hours for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood, because their neighbours, with perhaps larger shops, can keep open for the sake of competition and for the sake of getting a living. Of course, if these shopkeepers had a right of saying along with the others whether they desired to close, it would certainly be in the interests of their health to have the places closed.

973. I suppose you find a good many of the domestic shopkeepers are themselves in favour of legislation?—They are included. All classes of shopkeepers were included in the plebiscite to which I referred, and all classes of trade.

974. Your belief would be that you must have had a majority of the domestic shopkeepers as well as a majority of the larger shopkeepers?—Yes. I should imagine there are more small shopkeepers in proportion in a large community like Glasgow than there are large ones.

975. What is your impression as to the suggestions which have been made as to the Bill dealing with work after the shop is closed?—I think it is very difficult to stop work in a shop after it is closed. The Bill provides for closing the shop at a certain hour. That, in my opinion, means dealing with the public, stopping the trade with the public; but it would seem to me to be almost impossible to prevent the assistants from doing certain duties which they have to do for half-an-hour or an hour after the shop is closed. It is the trading, the carrying on of the business with the public, that I want to put a stop to.

976. If the shop be closed half-an-hour earlier, practically it means that the assistant gets away half-an-hour earlier?—That is so.

977. The time he is employed after the shop is closed is the same in every case?—Yes.

978. I think you were present at the Nottingham Congress?—I was.

979. Do you remember a resolution being passed at that congress for the purpose of enabling shopkeepers who had been in the habit of closing on Saturdays, to have an exemption from the half-holiday on any other day which might be voted by the trade?—My memory does not serve me in connection with that particular point, but I can quite understand the reasonableness of it. If there are certain shopkeepers closing on a Saturday afternoon they might apply for exemption, or there might be provisions made whereby they could get exemption.

980. You think that would be a reasonable and desirable provision?—Certainly.

Mr. Tennant.

981. You know that there are certain difficulties which the Committee must feel with regard to the definition of trades, the classification of trades for instance. Can you enlighten us at all upon that?—The trades are pretty well classified in the report in connection with the plebiscite taken to which I referred a minute ago.

982. How did you deal there with the case of a shop which sold various articles?—Of course we were only asking them a question with regard to early closing; whether they approved or disapproved of early closing by means of legislation. That was our query. We did not go into the details of the trading.

983. You see the whole point of the difficulty lies in the details. For instance, by the first clause you will see that you have to find out what the various trades are in favour of?—Yes.

984. How are you going to classify a shop which, as many shops do, especially in country districts, sells anything from boot-laces to cheese?—General traders.

985. Yes: but supposing the bakers agree to close on a Tuesday at six o'clock, and the drapers on Wednesday at six o'clock, and there is a man who sells drapery and bread, are you going to make him close on both days?—I am afraid it might be necessary for him to give up or to close one department. I know it would be so in the case of a large establishment.

986. In the case of a large town, for instance, where you have a great many general merchants (places like Whiteley's in London), and there are a great many in Glasgow, what do you recommend as a method of treatment for those large general trading warehouses?—We should require to define what they were to be permitted to sell.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

987. Would you say that, in the event of one trade wishing to close on a particular day of the week, that applied in this large shop only to that department?—Yes; it would apply to that department.

988. And that department only; is that your view?—Yes.

989. Do you think that is a very practicable proposal?—I see there is a little difficulty.

990. There is surely an immense difficulty, is there not. A man goes in to order something to eat to be sent home that night. He could at the same time very easily order one of the articles forbidden under the Bill. You cannot have inspectors at every corner?—It might be got over in this way: If all the traders in a particular district were dealing in the same articles, if they united to deal in specific articles which were defined, and a majority of two-thirds of those traders came to a decision to close, or desired their places to be closed at a certain hour, and appealed to the local authority, all those shops could be ordered to be closed.

991. Then you would close the general warehouse?—Yes.

992. You would close all the other departments in that case?—Yes, there would be a general understanding among the traders that they dealt in certain articles, that they were grocers and bootmakers and so on, that they were traders in that sense.

993. You would close every department?—Yes.

994. I understood you at the beginning of your evidence to say you would only close the particular department in question?—Yes, I did say so, but I have been thinking the matter out.

995. You have altered your mind?—Yes, I have been thinking it out.

996. You are acquainted with Glasgow?—I am.

997. The first witness we had from Glasgow was in favour, for the purposes of this Bill, of dividing Glasgow into the already existent municipal wards?—Yes.

998. Is that your opinion, or not?—Glasgow will undergo an entire reorganisation within 12 months from now, which will make some difference. The city boundaries having been extended will make an alteration.

999. Has that been done again. It was done the other day, was it not?—No. The Act only comes into operation in 1896, the re-division of the wards of the whole city area.

1000. Do you think that when that is done it would be well to go on those lines with regard to this Bill?—Either upon those lines or upon the larger lines of the political divisions.

1001. The seven political divisions?—The seven political divisions.

1002. You do not agree then with the last witness, who was in favour of unification, if I may so call it, of taking Glasgow as a whole?—No, there are difficulties in connection with that.

1003. Are not the difficulties equally great with regard to the wards where you have a street dividing two wards?—Yes. There are different classes of people living in different districts. For example, in the lower portions of the city the hours

hours of work are much greater, and necessarily so, than they are in the residential western portions of the city.

1004. Take a street like Parliament-road in Glasgow. Parliament-road, as I understand it, divides St. Rollox from Camlachie?—Yes.

1005. You would have all the bakers on the one side shut, and, perhaps, all the bakers on the other side open?—Yes. It is almost an impossibility to get perfection in anything, of course, and we are simply aiming at it. I daresay if the bakers in the St. Rollox Division came to an understanding for that purpose, very probably the bakers in the Camlachie Division would follow suit in a very short time.

1006. Would it not be simpler, in the long run, to have the unification system?—I am afraid there would be more difficulty in getting the majority.

1007. You do admit there is a difficulty?—Undoubtedly there is a little difficulty about it, but I think there is sufficient common sense among them. The shopkeepers want to get their hours reduced; they do not want to labour any longer than is necessary.

1008. You know that the district I have mentioned is almost, if not entirely, occupied by the working-classes?—Yes.

1009. And unless the common sense of the people resident there was so great as to make them agree, there might be some difficulty. You know that people in trades in many cases do not agree. It is not the commonest thing for them to agree?—No, but I think there is a growing tendency to work more harmoniously together.

1010. I am very pleased to hear it, but still that is a matter of opinion, is it not?—Quite so.

1011. Your colleague, Mr. Cooney, was in favour of your society, the Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants Union, making themselves responsible for finding out what is the will of the two-thirds of the shopkeepers in any particular trade. Do you think you could make yourselves responsible for that? It is rather a large task, is it not?—Yes, it is a large task, but at the same time it is a task worthy of being taken in hand, I think. Of course the hardest part of it would be at the beginning; and I think, seeing that the organisation is in existence and has had to take an active part in this work, it would be a natural piece of work to continue, in the first instance at any rate. After that, different divisions might form organisations of their own.

1012. When you say different divisions might form organisations, do you mean organisations of a similar nature to yours?—Yes, or committees subordinate to the central society; a central board of directors, and committees for different divisions possibly.

1013. People engaged in an early closing movement?—Yes, practically.

1014. It is conceivable that there should be other people on the opposite side. Suppose there were a dispute as to whether you had really two-thirds majority or not, to whom would you refer that dispute?—I suppose there should be some provision made for arbitration.

1015. There is the provision in Clause 4 of the Bill, which refers it to the central authority.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

Who would be the central authority? The Bill makes the central authority the Local Government Board; are you in favour of that?—Of course, the Local Government Board is very far removed from a centre like Glasgow.

1016. In Scotland there is the Secretary of State for Scotland, and he has got the Scottish Local Government Board?—Yes; I do not think there is any objection to that at all.

1017. You must anticipate that you will have disputes?—I suppose there may be a little difficulty.

1018. You have just admitted that there are very great difficulties in working out the details. Is it not your opinion that you are pretty certain to have disputes?—Yes. I was thinking more particularly with reference to the two-thirds majority of which you spoke last.

1019. It is conceivable that you should have it denied by a section of the community that you had two-thirds majority, and that all the signatures, for instance, were genuine?—Yes, in that case I should think it might be preferable that the Sheriff of Glasgow instead of the Secretary for Scotland should deal with the matter.

1020. The Town Council?—No.

1021. The Sheriff?—The Sheriff would be a natural and an independent authority.

1022. You are in agreement with the last witness that this Bill should apply, as it does, to trades, and not generally to the whole of the shopkeepers in Glasgow?—I think it should apply to particular trades. Some of them have different hours of closing from others at present. The saddlers, for example, close at six o'clock just now.

1023. Can you tell me how many inspectors under the Shop Hours Act there are in the service of the Corporation of Glasgow?—No, I cannot tell you exactly, because I think they have empowered most of the sanitary inspectors to do that work.

1024. Would you give these inspectors the power of entry to any shop which they had reasonable cause to suspect was being worked in after the shutters were up?—I think so; I think it is reasonable.

1025. You would give them the power of entry; the last witness, I think, was in favour of the constable having that duty?—No, I am more in favour of an inspector than of a constable.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1026. What are you?—I am a merchant in the city of Glasgow.

1027. A retail shopkeeper?—Yes, and a wholesale shopkeeper as well. I am a tea merchant, a wine merchant, and an Italian warehouseman.

1028. You have more than one shop?—I have two shops.

1029. What time do you close?—At eight o'clock in one, and at seven o'clock in the other.

1030. How many assistants have you altogether?—About 20 in the two places.

1031. You just now explained to Mr. Corbett, with reference to the question of the half-holiday, and the congress that was held at Nottingham, as to the shops which now close on Saturday for a half-a half-holiday, not being compelled to be closed on any day for a half-holiday. Do not you see that there would be great difficulty on that point?—Do you refer to a particular class of shops.

1032. Supposing certain boot shops closed for a half-holiday on Saturday now, and the other boot shops in the district decided to close on the Wednesday. Mr. Corbett refers to a clause that a shop now closed on Saturday, should not be compelled to close on Wednesday?—I think what he referred to was a general trading establishment, not a boot warehouse.

1033. Any trading establishment that keeps boots would, according to this Bill, if the other boot shops outside closed on Wednesday for a half-holiday, also have to close on Wednesday, would they not?—To close that particular department?

1034. By Clause 5, they would have to close the whole shop?—There might be a little difficulty.

1035. How could they go, for instance, into Messrs. Shoolbred's, who sell boots, to buy boots on a Saturday and not pass through the other departments? A customer would have to pass through the shop, would he not, to get to the boot department?—I do not think it is likely that any trader would think of closing a number of shops for the purpose of keeping one open. I should imagine he would be more likely to close one department than to keep the others open.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

1036. With what cities or towns are you intimately acquainted?—With the City of Edinburgh and the City of Glasgow.

1037. I may take it the answers you give apply to those places?—They do.

1038. Do you believe that generally the hours of labour of shop assistants in those are excessive?—I do.

1039. Do they extend to such a length as an instance given last time from Manchester, where the witness said that the shop assistants in a grocer's shop worked 104 hours a week, an average of 17 hours a day?—That seems a very large amount.

1040. What would be the average hours worked by an assistant in a grocer's shop in the places you have mentioned?—I have, myself, when an apprentice, worked from eight o'clock in the morning to half-past nine each night in the week, and till half-past eleven on Saturdays.

1041. Is that the custom now in the trade?—Last week I took a walk through a district near my own place of business for the purpose of seeing how late the shops were being kept open, and I noticed that a great many of the provision shops were open till half-past nine, and showed no appearance of closing.

1042. Does that mean that the assistants in those shops would work from eight to half-past nine?—I went into one shop, and interrogated a young man who told me he had gone on duty at eight o'clock in the morning and would not be closing till a quarter-past ten. He had some hours off for meals; but, of course, that is a very long time all the same.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

1043. Have you read the reports of the other Committees of the House of Commons that have inquired into this question?—No.

1044. Taking 1886, the date of the first Committee which inquired, would you say that things have become worse or better since then?—They seem to me at a standstill in certain districts.

1045. In others, then, they are better?—Possibly. In some of the higher class residential districts I think there is a slight improvement.

1046. Is it the custom to adopt the weekly half-holiday in certain trades?—No, we have no weekly half-holiday.

1047. No early closing on special days?—Not in Glasgow, but there are some in some of the country towns throughout Scotland and in several throughout England.

1048. Would you say that there are particular trades that are much worse than others in respect of the length of hours during which the shops are open and the assistants at work?—Yes, there are. The grocery trade and butchers' shops both have to work their assistants very long hours.

1049. Would you confirm what was said by the last witness, that the bigger establishments habitually closed earlier than the small domestic shops?—Yes, I do notice that in Glasgow. The larger shops close earlier, especially in the centre of the city, where they usually are situated.

1050. You are well acquainted with this Bill, I suppose?—Yes, I have gone through it.

1051. Have you considered whether the object aimed at by your association of shortening the hours would not be better met by a provision limiting the hours in shops for all persons on the model of the Act now on the Statute book?—I very much prefer the system of voluntary local option as provided for by this Bill.

1052. It is not voluntary in the sense in which the word "voluntary" is used with regard to legislation. It is rather what is called optional?—Yes; well, local option I prefer.

1053. It is compulsory, in case the local authority decrees that it shall be so?—Yes. Of course the local authority is usually representative of the people.

1054. It is admitted that it is the aim of legislation to prevent these excessive hours of labour. Would that not be better attained by using the existing machinery, created for the old Act, and widening that Act to include all persons, and not only young persons, that is, persons under the age of 18?—I think not. The instance that strikes me just now is this: in the event of that being done, it would not operate in the case of these domestic shops, where the husband and wife, for example, do the work themselves. They would not reap the benefits that this Act would otherwise confer upon them.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

1056. In their case of course there is nobody forcing them to work?—No.

1058. Such a provision as I suggest would of course cover cases that are not covered by this Act, where persons are employed, as the old report said they were, in work-rooms attached to shops, or packing-rooms attached to shops, which would not of course come under this Bill; you might close the shop but you would not necessarily close the packing-room?—If the packing-room were to form part of the shop, I should think it would have to be closed too.

1059. I suppose closing the shop would only be closing it to the public?—Yes.

1060. What do you mean by closing the shop?—I said to begin with that I meant dealing with the public.

1061. It would not cover the case of people employed in packing-rooms?—Would not the Shop Hours Act cover that?

1062. No, I believe not. It would cover work-rooms, but not packing-rooms, I suppose?—I rather think it does.

1063. Anyhow you are not in favour of extending the principle of the Factory Acts and of the old Shop Hours Act, but you prefer to do it by closing?—I do.

1064. You do not think you would be inflicting any hardship on the working population of a place like Glasgow?—No, because the shopkeepers, as far as my experience goes, are all most anxious to consider the interests of their customers, and they would agree to no arrangement that would in any way go against them.

1065. The last witness said that the working people left off work, we will say as a rule, about six; if the shops were closed, as the last witness anticipated in consequence of this enactment, at six, the men or women would not be able to shop except by deputy?—But six o'clock is the earliest hour that can be fixed. One district, for example, a working-class district, which is closing at present at 10 o'clock agreed to close at eight, reducing the hours from 10 to eight. In a western and residential suburb which is now closing at eight, they might reduce it from eight to seven, or from seven to six.

1066. Then you anticipate that under the Bill the local authority would always fix the hour at a time later than the generality of people leave off work?—Yes; that would be the interpretation that I would put upon it.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

1067. The working-men or women would have to go straight to shop from their work?—Working people as a rule do not do their shopping every day. Some days they might have to go straight from their work.

1068. Of course the conditions of trade in a big shop where many assistants are employed, and in a small shop, are quite different, are they not?—They are.

1069. In the one case there might be a brisk business all day, and in the other case there might be no business?—Yes, it varies.

1070. Would you say that the average small shopping trade is only done in the evening; of course, I am speaking of Scotland?—In most shops there is a period in the afternoon where business is in a manner suspended.

1071. Is it the case that a great part of the business of a small shop is done, we will say, after seven o'clock?—I believe that may be so in certain districts. I cannot speak from personal experience of that.

1072. What would you say?—I daresay there is a good proportion of it in certain districts done after seven.

1073. It is quite clear that if this Bill were enacted the local authority would have to be very careful in dealing with working class districts, or else they might exclude trade?—Yes, I should think that considerable care would be taken by the traders themselves. They know what hour would suit the customers to close the establishments, and in considering that they would indicate which hour would suit.

1074. Would it not be a more elastic provision to limit the hours of labour of all persons, not merely young persons, in shops rather than to close the shop?—Well, I do not like it I confess.

Mr. Edwards.

1075. Why do people shop late?—Procrastination has a good deal to do with it.

1076. It is not merely that they only get their money just in time to go shopping late?—No; I think it is only on certain days that that is so.

1077. They get into a bad habit of shopping late?—Yes.

1078. They could very well do it by coming earlier?—Yes.

1079. Without any discomfort to themselves?—Yes.

1080. Is it the habit for a man and his wife often to be so employed as to be away from the house, and to have to go straight from receiving their wages to the shop; is it not oftener the case that a man has his wife or daughter to look after his house?—Yes, that is so.

1081. And they would be able to come and shop at their own time?—Yes.

1082. You were speaking just now about bakers; you would not interfere with work done after shop hours; you only want to close the shop at a certain hour with regard to the public?—Yes.

1083. Would that throw more work on bakers and on shop assistants than closing at a later hour would do?—I fancy by earlier closing the employers would require to provide additional assistants to get through the work within the shorter hours. I would not anticipate that more work was to be done by the assistants after hours than was actually necessary.

1084. You would say this, then, that, although shops close late now, work is going on constantly by the assistants that cannot be done except at a certain hour?—There are certain arrangements that have to be completed after the place is closed occupying half an hour.

1085. Do you think early closing would increase this to such an extent that it would make the difference between the closing of the shop under early closing and the time when these people's work is at an end greater than it would be if the shop were closed later?—No.

1086. Would it be longer after the shop is closed than it is under the present system?—No; there would be no advantage to the assistants if that were so.

1087. It is the desire of these people to have them closed?—Quite so.

1088. And it is the desire of these people to have it closed?—Yes.

1089. Now, what is the general objection that you meet with to early closing in the trade?—There is not a general objection. Take, for example, a certain district; a section of the shopkeepers in a particular district agree among themselves that they should like to close their places of business at a particular hour, and they go round, I have seen the operation tried, and they succeed fairly well until they come to two or three men, who say, "Oh, no, it does not suit us; and we don't see our way to close at this particular hour."

1090. Why?—They do not give a specific reason. They know they possess the power of refusing, and they refuse.

1091. It has never occurred to you to inquire whether they serve a class of people who only do their shopping habitually later, or whether the people holding out against early closing serve the same class of customers as those who agree to early closing?—I am speaking of instances where they are all serving a similar class.

1092. You find the recalcitrant man who will not close and the one who holds out like the obstinate juryman, that he can compel all the rest to fall in with him?—Yes.

1093. I suppose that is the reason why you consider it is not more unfair for the majority who wish to have early closing to compel him to close early than it is for him to be in a position to compel them to close late?—I think the one is as reasonable as the other; in fact, more so.

1094. In small towns you think things are better?—They have half-holidays in small towns that we have not in large cities.

1095. How do you get over the fact that even in small towns you have late shopping on Saturday night?—It is an old custom, of course, this late shopping on Saturday night, which is sometimes a difficult thing to get over.

1096. Is there any reason for the customers staying away till late; is there any advantage to gain?—No, not a bit. We know this, that they take their excursions and go out in the country, and do their shopping when they come back.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

1097. Is there any particular class of goods which a man gets cheaper by shopping late?—There is a little in that. Some perishable goods at the last hour may be got cheaper, but that class of customer is not worth speaking about.

1098. You cannot give any reason why there is the fact that in small country towns shopping is done late on Saturday night?—I do not know that it is done any later in a small country town than in a large city.

1099. Not later, because there would be no reason for that, but it is done at a later hour than usual?—I fancy it is.

1100. You cannot account for that?—No.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

1101. I am not clear about the force of Clause 5, and I should like to ask you a question about it: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them." Take the case of one of these large places that carries on a great number of trades, several shops combined under one head, as it were, with a drapery department, a shoe department, a bookselling department, and so on. Supposing in the town it is agreed by all the booksellers to close on Monday afternoon for their holiday; by all the bootsellers to close on Tuesday afternoon for their holiday, and by all the drapers to close on Wednesday afternoon for their holiday, and so on. According to this clause, it would look as if this large shop would require every day in the week for a half-holiday at one o'clock, because there would be always one of those departments that would have to be closed, which is solely devoted to a particular trade. Am I right in understanding this clause would oblige this large shop to close every day of the week at one o'clock?—A special provision would be required to be made for dealing with those larger shops by some method or other. Power might be given to the local authority to grant a special license for a large establishment like that to close on a particular day; it would never do to have them closing every day in the week.

1102. But there is no provision in the Bill made for this?—That would be something worthy of attention.

1103. Is it not a defect in the Bill not to make provision for a case which is of common occurrence now-a-days in all our large towns where there are shops that carry on quite a number of businesses. It may be a bad thing to do so, but still it is a fact that they do?—Yes.

1104. And according to this Bill, those shops might be closed every day in the week at any moment, because there will be always some of the single shops in the town closed on some day, carrying on a similar business to one of these departments. It seems clear that there is no provision made in that Bill for such a case as that?—No.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

1105. Do you think the Nottingham provision that such shops should have power to appeal to the local authority to fix a special day for them, and exempt them from closing the rest of the week, which was accidentally omitted from the Bill, would meet the case?—I think that would meet the case.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

1106. The next thing that would happen would be this. Supposing the bootmakers' shops all closed on Wednesday, and the other large shop that also sells boots selected Saturday as its closing day, then all the people that wanted boots on Wednesday would be able to go to this large place, and the small shops would lose their customers?—I fancy the percentage of those going to the large shop on Wednesday would not be very great, and the community, if they have any sympathy, would be more likely to sympathise with the bootmakers who close on the early day.

1107. You think you would be willing to accept the result of that?—I think so.

1108. Then with regard to the question of unification as against the division of towns into districts, I think you said you were rather in favour of the division of Glasgow into a certain number of districts?—Yes, I quite approve that.

1109. Each district would select its own half-holiday?—Yes, I prefer that.

1110. So that it might happen, of course, that along one street the shops would be all closed on a certain afternoon and all open in another street alongside them?—Yes.

1111. The result would be that the people would go from the shops that were closed to the shops that were open; but then, I suppose, that would balance itself, because the shops open that day would be closed some other day, and so you consider, perhaps, that on the whole no injustice would be done to anyone?—I think so, and purchasers, as a rule, go pretty much to the same shop regularly and do not deviate from it, and go across the way except under exceptional circumstances.

1112. Even if that shop were closed?—If they knew it was about to close they would make the necessary provision.

1113. Would not it be better for the general public to adopt a system of closing by districts. Supposing Glasgow were put into one district, and the whole of the trade was stopped on a particular day at one o'clock in the afternoon, might it not happen that some people might have forgotten, or might have a special requirement for some extra provision, and find it very inconvenient to find no place to buy bread; whereas if the place were closed in districts they would only have to walk half-a-mile into another district and get the bread?—I said I was in favour of the districts in preference to the unification.

1114. You think it would meet the difficulty I am speaking of?—Yes.

1115. You recognise that that is a real difficulty?—I see very little difficulty in people making the provision. As I say, I have found the people when the shops are closed on certain days make the provision necessary the day before. It is usually intimated to them.

Mr. Samuel Smith—continued.

Customers have it intimated to them regularly by some means or other, either by messengers or notices of some kind.

1116. You have spoken about the great length of hours worked in some shops. Are not all shops at present under the 74 hours' rule for young persons?—Persons under 18; yes. All shops are.

1117. And the dismissal of the young persons must involve the closing of the whole shop?—No; because the number of hours are spread over the week, and an arrangement is made for relieving so many each day.

1118. The 74 hours include the whole hours?—Yes.

1119. How much of that time is given for meals?—Two hours per day I think as a rule, and that number of hours they got off to bring them within the Act.

1120. Is there any provision in this Bill that would deal with a more rigorous enforcement of Sunday closing?—No, I do not think so.

1121. A great many shops are open in some parts of the town on Sunday?—Yes.

1122. Is it not the case that great complaints are made by shopkeepers that they are obliged to open their shops on Sunday to stop their customers going to other shops?—I have not met with shopkeepers who have expressed that opinion.

1123. Have you many shops open on Sunday in Glasgow?—Only of a certain class. There are a few tobacconists' shops; chemists' shops are open between certain hours; and then some confectionery or Italian ice-cream shops, or something of that description.

1124. I have noticed in some of the English towns in the poorer quarters, almost all the shops are open now on Sundays?—I do not see any special reason for their being open on Sundays.

1125. Would you like to have any provision in the Bill more rigorously restricting the opening of shops on Sunday?—I do not know that I would. I think that possibly the power which the Bill would give of ordering the shops to be closed, or agreeing that they should be closed, at certain hours could be made applicable to Sundays as well as to other days.

1126. You think a power of that kind can be made applicable to Sunday?—I think so.

1127. Is it not impossible to make sure whether the Bill would cover that question or not?—That point did not strike me before, and I have not thought it out, but I think it will.

1128. There is a certain discretion to the local authority that, supposing the shopkeepers were to agree by a two-thirds majority to close the shops at six o'clock every night in the week, and the local authority thought that six o'clock was too early, they could refuse?—Yes, that is so.

1129. Would the local authority be generally the town council?—Yes, that is recognised in the Glasgow scheme.

1130. That would be a certain security against any too arbitrary a change?—It would.

Mr. Diamond.

1131. What do you think would be a reasonable hour to close in a working class district on Saturdays?—

Mr. Diamond—continued.

Saturdays?—If we had another half-holiday during the week, I should say 10 o'clock on Saturday night.

1132. There was a witness here from Glasgow on Friday, who said 10 o'clock, as you say, but the previous witness to-day thought that four o'clock on Saturday would not be unreasonable. You are inclined to agree that 10 o'clock would be a reasonable hour on Saturday?—Yes; I think it would be so difficult to change the habits of the people so suddenly from so late an hour on a Saturday.

1133. You do think that this late shopping is purely a matter of habit?—Very largely.

1134. And is entirely a matter of habit?—Yes.

1135. Do you not think there are many people so circumstanced on a Saturday with reference to the payment of their wages, that they would find it difficult to do their shopping or impossible to do their shopping in all its branches before four o'clock on Saturday?—I think it would be difficult to get it all done before four o'clock on Saturday. I am not familiar with the hours at which the different payments are made.

1136. Do you favour the view that the assistants themselves should have no voice in determining this matter, but that it should be left to the tradesmen to say?—Yes; I think it is a matter more affecting the shopkeepers themselves.

1137. You would give one man one vote for each shop?—I say, one man one vote.

1138. I know some of the large towns in England and Scotland, and I will take, say, a draper's. Supposing there were five large drapers' warehouses, employing perhaps 200 or 300 assistants each, and there were 10 small drapers who did not employ 20 assistants altogether. Under the system of a vote for each shop, and the assistants having no voice in it, would not these 10 small shops be able to determine the hours for closing and the day for the half-holiday for the five large shops employing fifty times as many assistants?—Possibly the case of the large shops to which you refer might be met in a similar way to those large general stores that were referred to as dealing in so many different articles, and they could come under a different category.

1139. I am dealing with shops where they deal only, say, in drapery. They are like some of those shops in Buchanan-street, Glasgow, or some of the large drapers in Argyll-street, where they employ a vast army of assistants. The two-thirds majority of the small people would be able to determine the half-holiday for the large shops and also the hour of closing. Do not you think that the assistants being so numerous, and seeing that it is for their convenience and their comfort you are legislating, they should have a voice in a question of that kind?—Well, of course, experience at the present time is that the large warehouses are closing sufficiently early, or nearly so; much earlier than the small shopkeepers.

1140. The large warehouses close early on Saturdays?—Yes.

1141. Supposing that the small shopkeepers in the same trade determine that the half-holiday should be on Wednesday?—Then, if the resolution which was agreed to at the Nottingham Congress is embodied in the Bill, it would provide for these warehouses getting the half-holiday on a Saturday instead of, as determined by the majority, on another day.

1142. But the result of that will be that the five large drapers would be open on Wednesday?—Yes, that is so.

1143. And the 10 small drapers would be closed?—That is so.

1144. And the five large drapers would be closed on Saturday, and the 10 small drapers would be open?—Yes, but it would be a matter of public convenience.

1145. I thought we were legislating for the welfare of the shop assistants?—It is for the community as a whole, but we are specially interested in it; we must not do anything that would militate against the interests of the community as a whole.

1146. You are in favour of giving this option to the local authority. Can you imagine a case where the local traders might pretty well decide by the requisite majority to close the shops at a certain hour, but the local municipal representatives actually interested in the trade themselves might be able singly, or by a small majority, to place an embargo on the decision of the majority of the tradesmen in the locality. Would you not rather be in favour along with the first witness to-day of making this word "shall" instead of "may." If you pass an Act of Parliament and get the requisite two-thirds majority in favour of a certain hour, why should you then go to the town council and say: "You have it in your power to determine that this Act shall not be put in force at some other hour rather than the hour agreed on by those who are affected by the measure." How do you defend giving a town council the option of not putting the law into force after the tradespeople have asked that it should be put in force?—I do not know that there would be much objection to altering the word "may" to "shall."

1147. Making it compulsory on the local authority to carry out the decision of the two-thirds majority of the tradespeople?—I do not think there would be much objection to altering it fairly.

1148. One hon. Member asked you about fixing the hours at so many per day, and leaving the shopkeeper to decide whether he opened or closed his place of business. It has been suggested by some people interested in the question that unless something to this effect is inserted in the Bill: That it shall be unlawful to employ an assistant before the time of opening which shall be specified, or after the time of closing, it will do the assistant very little good. Is that your opinion?—No, I do not think so. People do not want to get into their establishments before the necessary opening hour.

1149. Do not they bring in some of the assistants in large drapery establishments to dress the windows and prepare the stock before the shop opens?—Not as a rule. There are exceptions, as there always are, in any general rule.

1150. This exception would take place principally in large establishments where a large number number of assistants are employed?—I am not so sure about that.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

1151. And they work the shortest hours in the largest establishments?—Yes, they do.

Mr. Diamond.

1152. Do I understand you to say they work the shortest hours absolutely for the assistants, or that the shops are open the shortest number of hours; the previous witness stated he knew shops that were closed at nine o'clock, but in which the assistants were worked up to half-past 11 and 12 o'clock; you would not call that in the proper sense of the word early closing, and it certainly would not be the shortest number of hours' work?—No; that is not early closing in the sense I should call it early closing.

1154. Why will not that suit you, to get an extension of the present Act making it illegal to employ persons in a shop more than a certain number of hours per day; would you not practically get everything you want for the assistants in an easier way than you will get under this proposal which is to close the shops; but the men may be employed before the hour of opening, or after the hour of closing, for an indefinite period, and you can only check that by a system of inspection about which there is a great difference of opinion; one man being in favour of the police, and another in favour of the local authority, and another in favour of factory inspectors or shop inspectors; do you not think that the weight of evidence seems to be that it would simplify the whole proceedings, if you made it illegal to employ any shop assistant more than a certain number of hours per day, leaving it to the employer to say whether he will keep his shop open and work in it himself for the convenience of the public or not?—I prefer the principle as embodied in this Bill.

1155. For what reason?—My own inclination and feelings in the matter. I do not like to be hedged in by factory inspectors, and all that sort of thing.

1156. Do not you see that under this Bill as it is, you must empower some person to see that the law is carried out, and instead of having a factory inspector perhaps you would have a policeman, who is generally not a fitter person than a factory inspector to deal with the matter?—That is very true. Supposing that were done it does not make provision for the half-holiday, which we are as anxious to have as other people.

1157. You could get legislation for the half-holiday as well?—Then it is embodied here, and we are getting both things at once, or at least we hope to.

1158. With regard to the health of the shop assistants, do you know anything as to the Registrar General's Returns?—I have seen some figures which are satisfactory.

1159. What is the effect of those figures?—It is only from memory I am speaking, but the health seems to be fairly good.

1160. Is it a fact that the Returns put the health of shop assistants at the very top of the tree?—No, I think not quite at the top. There are several others higher, but they occupy a fairly good position, I think.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

1161. You were asked just now whether it would not be as well to make it illegal to employ shop assistants before the time of opening and afterwards; are not there certain businesses which at certain times of the year may be obliged to work after certain hours, such as at Christmas time?—Yes, I believe there are certain businesses to which that applies.

1162. Would not that put them to a great deal of inconvenience?—I am not in favour of having the hours limited like that.

1163. Then about the local authority, you suggest that the word shall be altered from "may" to "shall," but there are other people interested in the matter besides the shopkeepers, are there not, namely, the people who use the shops?—I do not make the suggestion that it should be altered, but I thought there would not be much objection to its being altered.

1164. Do you think it would be an advantage to the people who use the shops that they should have some sort of say in the matter through the local authority?—There are always two sides to a question. That might be worth consideration.

1165. Then you said that you would give one shopkeeper one vote?—Yes.

1166. If the man had a number of shops you would give him one for each shop, would you not?—I suppose he would be entitled to that.

1167. Then about the question of Sunday trading; are not there many large cities where a great number of Jews live in certain quarters, and do not you think it would be a great hardship on them to prevent them trading on Sundays?—If the principle were applied to Sunday closing, and if the Jewish shopkeepers had power to agree among themselves to close, then I think that would meet the case.

1168. Then there are certain trades scheduled in the Bill as being allowed to keep open as long as they like?—I think chemists and newsagents are specially referred to.

1169. And public-houses?—They are specially provided for by Act of Parliament now.

1170. There are certain trades who sell the same same things as the public-houses for consumption at home; would you allow them to keep open?—They would close at the same time as other trades.

1171. Do not you think it would be a hardship to shut them up, and not the public-houses?—I think not; I speak as one having some experience of that.

1172. And then as to the chemists, now-a-days they sell almost everything?—No doubt they sell a good many more things than they used, I daresay.

1173. Would you prohibit the sale of the other things except dispensing medicines in these shops?—I think the medicines only should be dispensed while the other shopkeepers are closed.

Mr. Diamond.

1174. I understood you to say you yourself as a trader were connected with the wholesale wine trade?—I have a dealer's licence.

Chairman.

1175. I think you advocate early closing on behalf of the general community?—I do.

1176. Which section of the general community is most interested, or is the "predominant partner," to use a fashionable phrase in this case; is the case strongest in the point of view of the shopkeeper, or the shopkeepers assistants, or the general public who buy at the shops?—I think from my observation that the general public would fall in with it; their sympathies being for shorter hours for shopkeepers, but I take it they are not particularly affected.

1177. Then the hygienic part comes into your calculation; the interest of the health of the shop assistants?—In the shops I have had any association with the arrangements have always been satisfactory; but I have not had much experience of other people's. I fancy that a good deal of consideration is given in Glasgow to the health of the assistants.

1178. Do you think a part of the necessity for early closing is based on the fact that later hours in shops mean degeneration in the health of the shop assistants?—I do not know that I would go the length of saying that it affects their health, but it certainly affects their life as a whole. They do not enjoy the same privileges that other people enjoy; they have not the same time for improving their mental condition, or enjoying the other different phases of life that other people have who are off duty earlier in the day.

1179. One honourable Member referred to the Registrar General's Returns, and made out that the shop assistants were about the healthiest and most long-lived persons; I believe those Returns are purely Returns of life and death?—Yes.

1180. They do not give you any notion of what the condition of health of a person is as long as he is alive?—No.

1181. Then a man or woman may be in a bad state of health, though according to the Return of deaths he may be at the top of the list?—That is so. I should like to qualify the reply that I made. I was thinking particularly of the grocery trade at the time, but I understand the drapery trade is a much more unhealthy one than the grocery trade.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

1182. Do not you think there has been a great improvement of late years under the voluntary system, and that the hours are much shorter than they were 20 years ago?—No, I do not.

Mr. Kearley.

1183. Do I understand you to say you have not found any great improvement under the voluntary system?—I do; I have seen no great improvement.

1184. That is why you are in favour of some compulsory measures being adopted?—Yes.

1185. In your experience do you find that one man in a trade is able, practically, to keep open a whole town?—Yes, I have seen it so.

1186. You think if some legal power was given for a uniform hour of closing fixed amongst the traders, that would be beneficial?—I think it would be very beneficial.

1187. Is it your opinion that that would be the only way of shortening these hours?—It is the only method I have seen that is at all likely to be successful.

Mr. EDWARD DAY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1188. You are the secretary of the West Yorkshire Federated Chamber of Trade?—Yes.

1189. I take it the object with which you come here is to give the Committee an account of the mode of procedure as regards early closing and half-holidays carried on in some of our large commercial centres?—Yes.

1190. Before I ask you questions as to individual cases, would you like to make a general statement as regards the opinion of your chamber of trade as regards the question of this particular Bill?—The general opinion of the chamber, which represents some 16 different tradesmen's associations in Yorkshire, has been in favour of the Bill ever since it has been brought before the House. Year after year they have passed resolutions in favour and hoped that it would pass, and I have got now the evidence of the different associations themselves as well as from the general chamber.

1191. Is your association in favour both of the general principal and of this particular Bill of Sir John Lubbock's?—They are.

1192. Then, perhaps, it would be most convenient if I go through the different towns and ask you to give us a short statement of the procedure there as regards half holidays and hours of closing, and the opinion in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill; the first, I think, is Batley?—Yes.

1193. The

Chairman—continued.

1193. The Tradesmen's Association of Batley has made a statement?—Yes.

1194. Perhaps you will tell us that?—The Batley Association close on Wednesdays unanimously with the exception of confectioners and tobacconists and pawnbrokers, but the pawnbrokers close on Thursdays. The hours vary from 8 to 8 during the week except Friday. On Friday, it is 8 to 9, and Saturday 8 to 11. The association is undoubtedly in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, and would gladly welcome it.

1195. Then the next is Brighouse?—The half-day closing is on Tuesdays at 1 o'clock, but there are exceptions, principally the small shops, sweet shops and tobacconists. The association reports that they without doubt are favourable to the general provisions of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, though they perhaps do not agree with all the details.

1196. Then Castleford?—That is principally in the coal mining and glass working district. They say their half holiday is fairly general, and the association is in favour of compulsory legislation on the subject as provided by Sir John Lubbock's Bill. The hours on other nights vary considerably.

1197. Then Cleckheaton?—The half holiday is fairly generally established in Cleckheaton on Wednesdays at 1 o'clock. The drapers, grocers, tailors, boot and shoe dealers and hair dressers close, but the ironmongers, confectioners, and butchers remain open.

1198. Then Heckmondwike?—The half holiday there is at 1 o'clock on Wednesdays except ironmongers at 5 o'clock. The pork butchers and confectioners do not close. The association favour compulsory legislation, and have passed a resolution in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

1199. Then Dewsbury?—In Dewsbury, the half holiday is fairly general on Wednesdays at 1, only a few in various trades keeping open. The hours for other days vary from 8 to 9, and Saturday 8 to 11. The association has been in favour of compulsory legislation, but has just recently passed a resolution not to support Sir John Lubbock's Bill, fearing that if the requisite majority of two-thirds (who are small shopkeepers in the outlying districts) could not be obtained it would disturb the present voluntary arrangement. Perhaps it would be useful to the Committee, so that you may see the principle on which I have done this, to read the letter itself. "Dear Sir,—In answer to yours re the half holiday and Sir John Lubbock's Bill, my committee after carefully considering the matter have come to the conclusion that the association cannot support the Bill, inasmuch as it gives the power to a two-thirds majority, and thus leaves tradesmen in the centre of a town in the hands of the small shopkeepers outside, who by keeping open have nothing to lose but all to gain to the disadvantage of the other tradesmen in Dewsbury. The half-day closing is a mutual agreement and is unanimous, all closing, even the tobacconists; therefore, we as a body, would not like any disturbing element in our midst, as we feel as tradesmen the great boon of the half holiday, and do not wish to place ourselves at the mercy of some unscrupulous small shopkeepers who probably by their vote would take our much-enjoyed privilege from us."

Mr. Diamond.

1200. Does that mean that they are afraid that this Bill would really prevent them from getting their present half holiday?—It might interfere with it. They have it at present, and are afraid it might interfere with it. I think it is a mistaken notion.

1201. Can you see how it would compel them to open if not desirous to open?—It is quite a mistake, but I thought I ought to read the letter. This resolution was passed quite recently.

Chairman.

1202. Then Halifax?—We have a half holiday here. Some trades close on Monday at one o'clock, and the majority of trades on Thursday at one o'clock. The closing is pretty general in the main streets of the town, but in the side streets and the outskirts and suburbs it is neither generally observed nor is it observed at all punctually, many of the shops re-opening at six o'clock after closing at one o'clock. Our association heartily approve of Sir John Lubbock's Bill as far as it goes, as we consider that if it errs it is on the side of leniency, and while averse to any legislation which will at all cripple or fetter legitimate trade, we feel that compulsory legislation would remove what is often considered an injustice and a source of irritation and friction between traders, and that uniformity of closing can only be secured by Act of Parliament.

1204. West Town, Dewsbury?—Our Tuesday half holiday is still in operation, but the movement so far as West Town is concerned is anything but unanimous, the percentage of those who keep open being about half. The time of closing on other nights varies from 8 to 11 o'clock. As the association has not met since the receipt of my letter, my informant cannot say what their views are on Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

1205. Pontefract?—A half holiday was started a few years ago, but one or two kept open, which caused a certain amount of unpleasantness; but another effort was made, and now the principal shops close at one on Thursday with the exception of two tradesmen, one of whom closes at 4, the other at 7 p.m., and although, as an association, we have not supported by resolution the Early Closing Bill, we believe it might probably be beneficial.

1206. Sheffield?—The Early Closing Association have adopted a half holiday on Thursday, at two o'clock, and, outside the grocery trade, this is fairly successful; but in the grocery trade some close at two, others at four, and a great number of off licences not before 11 o'clock and 10 on Sunday. The trade have been called together in order to obtain uniformity, but it was found impossible to succeed with a voluntary arrangement, and the meeting resolved to support Sir John Lubbock's Bill. Hours generally from 8.30 a.m. to 8 p.m.

1207. Bradford?—There is no general tradesmen's association, but there is a grocers' association (Mr. Whitehead of North-parade, Bradford, secretary). The grocers, ironmongers, and pawnbrokers are the only trades who close for a weekly half-holiday. About five-sixths of the shops remain open. The number of hours worked will average 70 hours per week, with one and a quarter hours off for meals each day.

1208. Leeds?—There are a few tradesmen who close a half day per week, but it is not in any way general and must be described as a failure. We have no tradesmen's association and it has to be left to individuals.

1209. Huddersfield?—We have a weekly half holiday at one o'clock in operation but it is not unamimous, several refusing to close, and whilst the grocers, bootmakers, tailors, and hair dressers close at one o'clock, drapers keep open till four o'clock. We have no tradesmen's association here, so no expression of opinion has been made on the subject of Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

1210. Keighley?—The half-holiday movement has been in operation here during the past six or seven years and is a success. It is one of the principal planks in our association, and consequently Sir John Lubbock's Bill is generally approved.

1212. Ossett?—Our association is unanimously in favour of compulsory legislation as proposed in Sir John Lubbock's Bill; we have a half-day closing on Wednesday, but it is not as general as we should like; we hope the Bill will provide that persons are not served at the back door after hours, as we find this is a great drawback to general closing.

1213. Sowerby Bridge?—We have the half-holiday movement in operation in this town amongst the principal shopkeepers and traders, but there are small tradesmen who keep open to the detriment of their neighbours close by; I may say without hesitation our association is in favour of legislation according to the general principles laid down in Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

1214. Shipley?—We have the half holiday in operation here on Tuesdays at one o'clock; the principal tradesmen close, but there are a large number who do not; we are in favour of Parliamentary legislation and have passed a resolution in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

1215. Wakefield?—Tradesmen have for many years tried to get the weekly half holiday without success, until in 1893 a public meeting of traders was held, at which the tradesmen mustered in force, and it was decided to issue a circular to all tradesmen, asking for a reply as to whether in favour or not of a half holiday, what hour they suggested, and whether for the summer months only, or all the year round; The result was that Wednesday at one o'clock was recommended by 140, as against 50 for other days of the week, and as to whether it should be for summer months only, or all the year round, there were 156 in favour of the latter and 36 for the former; there were in round numbers 200 in favour of closing, and about 12 against; in June the closing commenced, though several for a time kept open; but after a few months the whole arrangement fell through, but in the spring of 1894 an attempt was made to close at 4 o'clock, but this is a long way from being unanimous; the hours on other days vary amongst tradesmen; generally 8 a.m. to 7 or 7.30 p.m., except Saturdays 8 to 11.

1216. Now I may ask you this: are these particular associations to your knowledge responsible bodies which fairly well represent the tone of feeling of the commercial trading community of these localities?—I believe they do. In Wakefield we have something like 220 tradesmen who are members of the association and they are all tradesmen and no assistants. The leading tradesmen are really now the backbone of the association and represent the feeling of the tráders generally.

1217. Do you think these statements are not only statements of the opinion of individual associations but in some way reflect the general feeling of the trading community?—Quite so.

1218. Have they taken means to find out by public meetings or otherwise, what the trading community think of this question?—As regards Wakefield the result was as follows. Taking the answers received to the circular for closing at one o'clock there were 138; for two o'clock, 19; for three o'clock, 2; for four o'clock, 31; for the summer months only, 36; for all the year round 156. And when we asked about the different days there were two for Monday; 32 for Tuesday; 136 for Wednesday; 11 for Thursday; and 6 for Saturday; and I think only some 12 or 14 that were against.

1219. Have you anything else that you would like tc state to the Committee?—We are anxious that in any Bill that is passed there should be provision made that customers should not be allowed to be in the shop after a certain hour, and customers should not be allowed to be served after hours, because that is a very important thing. Also we are strongly in favour of the clause which provides that, if there are two trades carried on, they should close for both trades. There are a great many newsagents who are also tobacconists. The tobacconists are all excepted, and where they sell newspapers if they also also sell tobacco, they would be freed from the Bill if that clause did not operate.

1220. You would like some restriction placed on the hours of work after the shutters are put up?—Yes.

1221. That is not in the Bill. Would you like some provision to be inserted, placing some restriction on the amount of work done?—Not exactly the amount of work, but providing that the customers should not be served after hours.

Mr. Diamond.

1222. You said that where there were two trades you would like the shop to be closed for both?—Yes.

1223. Have you considered the number of cases, a small number, where they have half-a-dozen trades carried on in one establishment, drapers, grocers, and provisions, and all that kind of thing. How would you deal with a shop of that description?—We should wish to deal with it exactly the same as it is dealt with in the case of the Co-operative Stores. They have five or six different branches, but they close them all at the same time. If not it would make it probable that they would be able to get their goods from the one shop to the other.

1224. Is your experience to this effect, that in a town where the half holiday takes place, generally all classes of tradesmen join in with it, and generally on the same day?—As regards most of the towns who report, we find no difficulty about their closing at one time, with the exception of the butchers. They close on Mondays because they have got all their meat sold off on the Saturday night, and their market is on the Wednesday for buying the live beasts.

1225. Butchers close on the Monday?—They are in favour of the movement, but they have to have a separate day from the other trades.

1226. That is the point; the butchers close on Monday, and then the grocers and general traders close on Wednesday; in an establishment where they keep butchers' meat and groceries, would you have them close on both days, or how would you manage in regard to that class of tradesmen?—Whatever they did on the one day, if they did such a thing, but we have not such a thing as a grocer's and butcher's, we should expect them to close both departments on one day.

1227. In some of the larger towns they have such things?—I believe there are co-operative societies where they have a butcher's department, but taken generally, it is very rare.

1229. What I want to know is this: the butchers, you tell me, close on Monday; the grocers, you tell me, close on Wednesday. There are men, we will take it, who are both butchers and grocers. Would you make them close on Monday with the butchers, and on Wednesday with the grocers, or give them an option?—Not if he could close one entirely. If he could close the butcher's shop free from the other, we should not expect him then, as long as he closed it for the grocers on Wednesday, when the others closed, but we should look to him to make him close for the purpose of both on the same day—if he had not a separate department so that he could close them separately. I mean, if this was his butcher's shop on one side and his grocer's on the other side, and the public were obliged to come into the same premises for the meat, we should expect him to close on the Monday. If he liked to close on the other, that would be his own option.

1230. You would not expect him to close on two days because he happened to be doing both trades?—No, not without he liked.

1231. You would give him the option of closing on one day only?—We should want him to close on the day that the general trades closed, not on the other.

1232. You mean, close one department?—No.

Mr. Diamond.

1233. You said that where a man carried on two businesses under separate roofs, you would close his butcher's shop on the Monday, and close his grocer's establishment on the Wednesday; but you have not made it clear, where the two businesses are under the same roof, whether you would make him close both places on Monday with the butchers, and both places on Wednesday with the grocers. Try and follow that point, and make it clear, because I have had some difficulty with it?—If he could not close those separately, we should expect him to close on the day the general trades closed. He could please himself about the other day, if he liked to close on Monday as well.

1234. You would allow him to be open as a butcher's on the Monday as long as he closed on Wednesday, with the grocers?—Yes.

1235. You would allow him to keep open, if he liked?—Decidedly, if he closed both establishments on the Wednesday along with the other trades.

1236. What would happen to the butchers; the butchers would say: "Here is a man who is keeping open on the Monday when we are all closed;" and they would say, "That is not fair to our trade;" and then they would begin to break through the general regulation?—Then you would have it, on the other hand, that you would have regulations broken through in the other case because a man who kept a grocer's would break through the other regulation. You are bound to meet it in some way.

1237. That is the thing I am anxious about, to see if you can reconcile these conflicting elements in the Bill?—You could only settle it by putting a partition up and making the two shops separate.

1238. Make him divide the premises?—Yes.

I have

Mr. Diamond—continued.

I have a shop in my mind now, of which there are many instances, where there is a grocer's and a draper's. In many places they have different departments. Sir Blundell Maple was asking this morning about Shoolbred's. There they have different departments, but in some places it is like this room ; there is the draper's on one side and the grocer's on the other. They would have to make some distinct arrangement, either to separate the shop off or else close in both, as the Bill provides.

1239. I saw that one of your societies referred to the selling of beer by the grocers. How would you deal with these people ; a man has a grocer's shop and sells provisions, cheese, butter, bacon and tea; and he has a cellar underneath the shop, and he has beer in the cellar, and a license to sell beer off, and his beer-drawing place is in the midst of his shop, and people come in for beer up till 11 o'clock at night, as I think one of the societies report from Sheffield ; would you allow him to sell groceries and provisions ?—That is the very ground that we go on. If he has two trades he must close for the purpose of both.

1240. Do not you know it is a licensed trade you cannot interfere with; this is a man who has a license, and, as I understand, that is outside the Bill ?—A refreshment house is, but that is not a refreshment house.

1241. You do not interfere with public-houses ?—No.

1242. Nor do you interfere with the man who has a beer license ; and if he deals in groceries and provisions, what I want to know is, how would you meet the case of a customer coming in for a quart of beer for supper, which many people do, unfortunately ; would you allow him to supply bread and cheese ?—No, we should rather put a stop to the other as well.

1243. You would say it should be illegal for him to sell the bread and cheese along with the beer ?—Decidedly.

1244. How would you propose to meet that case in the way of inspecting to prevent the thing being done; how would you deal with the tradesman ; would you keep somebody to watch him to see he did not sell ?—There would have to be a provision made. That is a detail I have not gone into.

1245. It is these very details that present the difficulties. If I could see clearly how it is to be done, I would help you to do it ; but it is for you to satisfy us how it may be done without really making the life of the tradesman a burden ?—They may be wrong, but I can only say the majority of our tradesmen were of opinion that the person who has a license to sell beer off the premises would have to close in accordance with the section ; that, having two businesses, he would have to close for the purpose of both.

1246. Would you make him close his beer-shop and grocer's shop both together ?—Quite so. That is decidedly our idea in the matter, because if not you could get a person who would sell tobacco, and so keep open, and we support the clause strongly that for all the purposes of his trade he should close. If he carries on four or five trades it is all the better for him, if he does carry on so many, and he can better afford to close.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

1247. What is a reasonable hour for closing on Saturdays in an ordinary town like Dewsbury or Sheffield, or Keighley, for an ordinary working-class community ?—In my opinion, from 27 years' experience, the hours generally throughout England are too long altogether. There is no necessity whatever for it. There might have been at one time, but the wages, we know, are paid at five o'clock on Fridays.

1248. Is that the case now ?—Pretty nearly all round the West Riding.

1249. Do I understand you to say that there is no exception, even of a limited character, to the general rule that the wages are paid all over Yorkshire on Fridays ?—Yes. There are a considerable number do not, but pay at 12 o'clock on Saturday. The majority of them, I believe all the manufacturers, pay at five o'clock on Friday. The ironworks and machine shops pay on Saturday.

1250. What would you think a reasonable hour for a shop to be closed in a working-class district on a Saturday. One witness to-day said that four o'clock on Saturday should be the maximum, that all the shops should be closed not later than four, and the other said he would permit them to go on till 10 ?—I could not go so far as to say that, though I may say there is a strong feeling among shopkeepers themselves, if they could only see their way clear, that Saturday would be a better day to close all round; but at present, circumstances will not permit of it.

1251. But you do not give me any light ; you say if they saw their way clear, they would prefer to close on Saturday ?—Yes, at the present time ; I do not think we could close before seven or eight o'clock ; eight o'clock, I should say.

1252. You would say eight o'clock ?—I think that is sufficient for all purposes. The market trains all run in sufficient time from the different country villages ; they begin running from about one o'clock and up to five ; they stop running into the town about 5 or 5.30, and they return by almost any train up to half-past nine.

1253. It is evident from that answer, and I know it to be true, that a large number of the working-class people go from their own town or district by train to market in some other town ?—Yes.

1254. The husband is paid his wages, say at 12 or 1 o'clock on Saturday, and goes home to his house and then has something to eat, and his wife is not ready to go away to the neighbouring town to do the marketing, and she gets there by five o'clock. Do you think it would be possible to have all the purchasing of the community done by seven or eight ?—Yes, quite so. I am certain of that. If you were to see the thousands and thousands that spend a whole afternoon at football you would be quite of opinion that they could do their shopping before that time, because it is over before five o'clock.

1255. Do you think it is usually the people who attend football matches who do the shopping late ?—A good deal of the men do it themselves.

1256. Several

1257. Yorkshire is happy in that respect. As representing tradesmen and not representing assistants (and your opinion would be of the greater weight in that you do not speak for assistants) what would be your method of meeting what, I suppose, you admit is a great grievance, that is to say, that these people should have to stay for an hour after the shop closes. Would you be in favour of making it illegal to keep them in the shop after the hours of closing?—Decidedly so, if they are taking advantage of that, we should.

1258. You say that as a tradesman representing a tradesman's organization?—Simply because it does not come up amongst us.

1259. You would be in favour of securing for the assistants that when the shop is closed they should be free within a reasonable time to go out and enjoy themselves?—Quite so.

Mr. Kearley.

1260. Have your associations that you represent considered the question of small shops which are carried on by people employed all day, and who keep their shops going with the idea of augmenting their income, and carry on the trade after they have done their work?—It has only been considered in this way: that there are many small shops, and a good many more than are really doing any good at all, and it would really be a benefit to them even if it made some of them extinct, because they are only doing harm to other traders, and they do no good to themselves.

1261. You do not suggest that all these shops should be annihilated?—No, but a good many of them might be.

1263. I understand that the strong argument of those in favour of the principle of voluntary closing is, that this proposal would inflict injury on these small shops that necessarily, as they allege, have to be kept open till late at night, because they do a trade of a particular kind that is supposed to be only done late in the evening. I take it you have not considered that aspect of the question at all?—No, I do not think that has been considered, because we do not seem to have been much affected by it. The fact is this, that there is no reason at all even for these small shops to be open so late, because the people have the money; they do not get it just at odd times; but the majority of the people, with the exception of the very poor, who have to beg, have their money from the Saturday to the following Saturday, so that there is no object for them doing it late at all.

1264. You are speaking on behalf of the large majority of shopkeepers?—Yes.

1265. And they are strongly in favour of compulsory closing on the lines suggested in Sir John Lubbock's Bill?—Yes, so far as the places I have mentioned.

1266. That is the opinion?—Yes.

1267. With reference to Saturday closing, you spoke from a long experience, I understood you to say?—Yes.

1268. Is it your opinion, and that of many others you are speaking for, that the hours are unduly long on Saturday?—Yes, that is so.

1269. And that all the trade might be carried out, and still the hours be shortened?—Yes.

1270. Without doing any harm to anybody?—Quite so.

1271. Either to the traders or to the trading community?—Yes; of course, they were formerly much longer than they are now.

1272. What do you suggest as a reasonable time for Saturday closing in a big town; of course it would be different in a village?—I think in most towns it might be done at eight o'clock. In the case of such a town as Glasgow I am bound to admit it would take longer there.

1273. Take Sheffield. That is a fairly big town?—Yes.

1274. You would apply that to Sheffield?—Yes.

1275. What do you consider the average time for closing in Sheffield now on Saturdays?—Up to 11 o'clock at night.

1276. I suppose that frequently means that the shops are open till 12 and after?—Yes.

1277. Is not it a matter of notoriety that shops are kept open till Sunday morning?—I quite believe that, in some towns.

1278. And that arising from the competition, as it were?—I suppose so. One person thinks if he keeps open he will get the trade after the others are closed.

1279. When voluntary arrangements are made with regard to the hours of closing, is it within your experience that those voluntary arrangements frequently break down?—Quite so.

1280. You can never rely on a voluntary arrangement being permanent?—The Wakefield arrangement is not at all unanimous. Some of the people who keep open are offended, because the original arrangement of one o'clock broke down.

1281. Have you had any experience of the limitation of hours for those under 18 years of age to 74?—We have very little working beyond the hours for young people. I gave evidence on the Shop Hours Bill in 1886; but it has been very much improved since that time.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1282. It is approved. It is a great boon?—Yes.

1283. You recognise, I presume, the necessity for separate trades having variations of hours?—Well, that might do in some towns, but in most of the West Riding towns they are so compact, within a short distance, that really the whole of the trades could adopt the same hour.

1284. You would shut the town up at a certain time for trading purposes?—Yes. We find it more convenient to the public, because so many of the public come out to shop, and they find out that one is closing on one day and another on another day, and it makes it difficult for them to know. It makes them forget to order things, because they do not recollect the day on which the particular shop is closed. We find one uniform day for closing is better for business and the public.

1285. That is only as regards early closing?—Both as to the day and the time.

1286. I am speaking about the general principle of closing shops by Act of Parliament, as to whether you would make all shops close at one time, or whether you regard it as a necessity for certain trades having a variation of hours from others. We do not see any necessity whatever in our towns, without it was the exception of these grocers' licenses. We do not like them being exempt, and do not think they ought to have them, but there might be a reason for their time being extended. But taking it practically, the grocers and drapers and butchers have no necessity to be open at night after a certain hour.

1287. With regard to shop assistants leaving at the time of closing, is it within your experience, or within the experience of those bodies you represent, that shop assistants are kept unduly after the shops are supposed to be closed?—Not at the present time. It has been, in times past.

1288. But giving a reasonable time, which could be expressed, you could, of course, make it an offence for assistants to be kept after a shop was presumed to be closed?—I think so.

1289. Would you draw an arbitrary line. Supposing eight o'clock was the hour for closing, would you arbitrarily say that every assistant should be out of the shop at eight o'clock?—No; because there must be some kind of packing-up.

1290. You would fix that by some limit of time?—Yes; half an hour, or something of that kind.

1291. That is necessary, you think, in the interest of assistants?—I think so, in some places; but as regards the different towns I have come in connection with we do not require it, because I believe they get away as soon as ever they close, in the majority of cases.

1292. That is where the arrangement is honestly conformed to; but do you not think it would be necessary to have some provision to ensure these assistants getting the benefit of the alteration?—Yes. I may say we find that there are a great many shopkeepers in favour of the half-holiday movement voluntarily, who are, unfortunately, the greatest sinners with regard to the week, and then we come to the other shopkeepers who are opposed to that, and they say, "We are willing to give our assistants seven o'clock every night, but the others are open till nine o'clock, and it is all very well for them to go in for the half-holiday, but taking it all the week round we work our assistants less hours than they do, and we think it would be a benefit to have an Act of that kind to regulate the other days.

1293. In the absence of an Act there is a danger that one cantankerous man will keep the whole town open, or the whole trade open?—I gave evidence before about two or three traders keeping open in Wakefield some years ago and upsetting the arrangement.

1294. Are you in favour of some concession being made in times of pressure such as at Christmas time?—Yes. I think it has been generally understood, even where they have been having the half-holiday, that for three weeks they keep the shops open on the half-holiday, as well as working their hours in the ordinary way.

1295. That would be necessary?—I think that would be necessary at such a time.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

1296. You are well acquainted with the retail trade of Yorkshire as well?—Yes.

1297. It is your opinion that the passing of this Bill would lead to the extinction of small shops?—I do not think entirely, but I think in some places if they were to close it might affect them. I do not think it would extinguish them.

1298. I thought I understood you to say so?—No; I said even if it did.

1299. Do you think it will to some extent?—I think it might in some of the out districts.

1300. You used a phrase that you would close the town at a certain hour?—Yes.

1301. May I ask at what time the majority of artisans leave off work?—From five to half-past five. Some give up at five, and others work until half-past on Friday night, because it is pay day, and it is a short day on Saturday.

1302. The customary time for shopping is the evening?—During the week; but there is very little shopping done in the week, and even in these country districts I should say that there is very little need now for it. That is one of the reasons, I should say, why we should support the early closing on Saturday night. Nearly every shopkeeper now sends out, even amongst the miners and working classes in all these districts. The artisans and miners are waited on and their grocery is sent to them; in fact it has almost spoiled our markets. We have very little markets now, because the people do not come in as they used to do to the market. The traveller goes and takes their weekly orders and delivers them. There is no necessity to come to market now as there used to be.

1303. Taking the miners, do their womenkind shop during the day or evening?—In the evening, on the Saturday, from the afternoon. They begin about two o'clock.

1304. Take the case of the small shop. I suppose that from what you say during the greater part of the day no business would be done?—Not by the working-class population.

1305. I am taking a shop in a working-class district which, therefore, depends on working-class custom. Would it be fair to say that very little business would be done before six o'clock?—Not during the week. As I say, they get their their wages, and it does not affect them. They are getting various requisites at all hours of the day during the week. They have the money.

1306. Would you count as hours of labour the time spent by a man and his wife in a shop that may be attached to their dwelling when there is practically no trade going on?—Sometimes it is as much labour when there is nothing going on as at others when there is something going on. They are there. Attention has to be paid to the shop all the same. I am afraid it is worse waiting for customers than it is attending to them.

1307. The reason for this Bill is said to be the excessive hours worked by shopkeepers and shop assistants?—Yes.

1308. But do you think you ought to extend it on that ground to the case I have just quoted, of the small shop where a man, with his wife, are the working partners?—It is in this way: We have a good many tradesmen themselves who only keep perhaps one assistant, and many of them not one assistant. I can mention the case of one or two hatters. They have a very fair trade, and they want to keep it; and if we allow other small shops to keep open, it keeps them open. They keep no assistants, and they are bound to keep on the shop themselves.

1309. So far as the evidence before this and previous Committees has gone, it has turned upon the excessive hours of labour of shop assistants?—Yes.

1310. Granted that in many cases they are excessive, would not the evil be met by extending the present Act not only to young persons, but all persons working in shops?—Decidedly so.

1311. You think that would meet it?—But at the same time there is quite a different element in it now to what there was some years ago. The shopkeepers themselves had not entered in any way into this arrangement. It had been got from them by the assistants; but now that they have got it they are quite anxious to have it themselves and extend it, so that the shops might be shut up to let them be at liberty. A good many tradesmen who have the half-holiday say they would not like to give it up and lose the half-holiday, which has been broken up by one or two.

1312. I am speaking of early closing; in this Bill you ask for optional compulsion of all trades?—Yes.

1313. The ground of health is put forward?—Yes.

1314. I want to know whether you do not think it would be sufficiently met by extending the present Act so as to embrace all people, women and all, and limit their hours to 74 a week?—I should think, as far as our town is concerned, with very few exceptions, we do not work over that now.

1315. Are you aware that in this Bill there would be nothing to prevent people being worked in rooms adjoining shops?—Workshops?

1316. Not being workshops under the Act as mentioned in the first Report of the first Committee that sat on the subject; it does not cover that?—No.

1317. It says in this Report that it appears very common for the shopman and for the apprentices and young persons to be detained some time after shops are closed to customers to clear away and pack up goods; this Bill would not touch that?—No, I do not think it would.

1318. Would a provision as to hours of labour meet such a case?—Yes, it would.

1319. You have read the Bill, and the Schedule to the Bill?—Yes.

1320. Are you aware that the Schedule is a much shorter one than that in the Victorian Act on the subject?—I knew it was short.

1321. I find that in their Schedule chemists' shops, coffee houses, confectioners, eating houses, fish and oyster shops, fruit and vegetable shops, restaurants, tobacconists, booksellers and news-agents are all included?—Yes, in the exemptions.

1322. Do you know why this Schedule was drawn in this way; why only four classes of shops were exempted?—I cannot tell, except they must have had the idea that the tradesmen would generally approve of it, because they do generally approve of it. The fewer the exemptions the better they would like it.

1323. You have not yet been able to make any suggestion, with reference to the mixed shops, that would solve the difficulty of a man having to divide his establishment?—No; we have so very few that have those two trades in one, except where it might be done for the purpose. A news-agent might sell tobacco on purpose to avoid the Act. That is the only case.

Mr. Tennant.

1324. You have been familiar for some years with the early closing movement?—No; I have not taken any particular part in it, only that some 30 years ago I was in trade, and I was so dissatisfied with the long hours that I determined, if ever I went into business on my own account, I should never work the hours that were worked then.

1325. Can you tell me when the principle of local option first came into the Bill?—I think it is since 1886, when the Shop Hours Regulation Bill was passed.

1326. I understood you to tell the honourable Member opposite that you were in favour of this Clause 5 being applied to such a shop as the shop he described, where they sold beer, which would come into the Schedule, and also where they sold groceries?—Yes.

1327. Are you aware there would be great difficulty in doing that, because you would not have the power?—If you have not the power it is a different thing.

1328. If you were a lawyer I think you would agree with me that that would be so; all that you do is to express the opinion?—We do think it would be advisable if it could be done, but if it is not legal we could not get over it. It appears to me they should be under the same protection as the licensed victuallers.

1329. We are dealing with licensed victuallers; all who sell beer are licensed victuallers?—I mean the licensed houses where they sell on and off.

1330. The honourable Member, I understood, took the case of a man who had a licence on the premises?—No, he did not say on-licenses; it was what we call a grocer's off-license.

1331. Still, you would have as much difficulty in that case, as I read the Bill, because it is "premises in which any intoxicating liquor is sold by retail for consumption on the premises." Then you have, "refreshment houses and places where hot cooked provisions are sold." Do you imagine that this Schedule excludes off-licences?—Yes. Then if they were in the other trade, we took it like this: we understood if a man was a tobacconist and a grocer, although he was one of the excepted trades, yet seeing he carried on two trades, he would really have to close for both purposes.

1332. To go back to this mixed shop question. I want to get clearly your opinion. Do I understand you rightly to mean that where two or more trades are carried on under the same roof, and you have different days of the week for closing those different trades, you would have that particular store closed on all those days?—No, not necessarily. They would have to arrange about the other day. If one particular trade were closed by the majority of the general trades throughout a town, he would have to fall in with that day, instead of the day that the particular class closed. What I mean is this: at present, although only partially adopted, the half-holiday is carried out by nearly all the trades in Wakefield, with the exception of the butchers.

1333. You are talking now of the half-holiday?—Yes.

1334. Will you go to the early closing?—I do not think they would make any difference in the closing of the different trades with us.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

1335. They do not, but under this Bill I could quite imagine the butchers closing one day, the grocers another, and the drapers a third. What I want to know is, whether you would close the stores that carried on those three businesses on all the three days?—No, I do not know how we should have to deal with it, I am sure.

1336. You admit that that is rather a difficulty?—Yes.

1337. That is all I want to know?—Unless we could get them to close when the majority of the trades do. That, I think, would be got over.

1338. Do you think that in the country districts there is as much necessity for this Bill as there is in populous towns?—I do not know what day they require themselves. They do not keep assistants much in the country, or very few. It is a matter for the traders themselves. We are taking the tradesmen's point of view now. Whether they would be in favour of closing I do not know. I do not think they would.

1339. You have not so much experience of the country district?—No.

1340. Or the villages?—I may say that some of the villages do adopt the half-holiday movement. We have a small one near Wakefield, and there are not above half-a-dozen shops in the place, and yet some close. They are under no arrangement with Wakefield to do it.

SIR FRANCIS POWELL IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Edwards.

1341. WITH regard to this difficulty that has been raised about two businesses, a butcher's and a grocer's, being carried on in the same building, and as to the possibility that there may be different days for the closing; is that really a practical difficulty?—I do not think in some towns that it is; it might be in Wakefield, where I come from, simply on account of the markets. We close on a Wednesday at 4 o'clock, and it is the cattle market day for the butchers.

1342. Do you know of many shops of that kind?—I do not know of one where there is a butcher's and a grocer's together.

1343. Would not that be rather the exception?—I think so.

1344. Would not they be also the shops of men who are well-to-do; and if it was necessary that there should be a separation between each department they would be capable of doing it?—I think so.

1345. It would not be a practical difficulty?—I do not think it would do any harm at all.

1347. That is a very significant fact?—I do not mean to say that the whole of them are. They vary in the hour up to 11.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

1348. The larger establishments close earlier?—Yes.

1349. You find in these towns they are open till 11 at night?—Yes.

1350. Do not you think that that shows a general habit of shopping that it is difficult to get over?—It is a habit, but my experience of it is this: that there are many people who live within three or four doors, who always come the last thing when the tradesman is putting up the shutters. Those nearest to the place are the worst offenders.

1351. You mentioned that some shopkeepers opened at six after closing at one?—That is in one of the towns.

1352. That shows there is a strong tendency to make shopping late. Do you think that is merely a habit?—As, I say, it is only individuals who are anxious to take hold of the trade after the others are shut up.

1353. They would not take the trade if there was no habit of shopping late?—Exactly.

1354. Do you know anything about country towns, or small market towns?—Yes; some of these I have given you are small.

1355. Take a weekly market day. Is the work in the shops over by an early hour on the market day, or does it run as late in a market town on the market day as it does on Saturday

in a large town?—I believe in one or two towns they keep it up till about eight o'clock. In Dewsbury, I believe, they keep their market up late though it is on a Wednesday, but there is no real necessity there at all, because they all have had their wages. Wherever the market is not on a Saturday they have had their wages in the prior week.

1356. You know for certain that they close early, and that the shopping is practically done early on that day?—Yes.

1357. Does that lead you to think that that being so, the same thing would happen on every Saturday if people only wished it?—Yes.

1358. Inasmuch as they go to market and know the things will be there on a certain day, they do not keep it on till midnight, but are done by five, and sometimes eight?—Yes, in some towns.

1359. Your contention is that there is nothing to differentiate the Saturday from ordinary market days, and that they ought to finish on Saturday, the same time as on an ordinary market day?—In most cases that would be so.

Friday, 29th March 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Diamond.	Sir John Lubbock.
Mr. Edwards.	Sir Blundell Maple.
Dr. Farquharson.	Sir Francis Powell.
Mr. Frederick Frye.	Mr. Samuel Smith.
Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.	Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ARCHIBALD VICAR, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1360. YOU are Secretary, I believe, of the Bolton and District Shop Assistants' Association?—Yes.

1361. How long have you held that post?—About six months.

1362. How long has the association been formed?—Seven or eight years.

1363. And does it represent the general feeling of the shop assistants in that district?—We have about 205 members on the books

1364. What are your hours in Bolton?—From 8.30 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. on Mondays and Fridays; from eight a.m. to eight p.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays; from eight a.m. to one p.m. on Wednesdays; and from eight a.m. to 10 p.m. on Saturdays, in the centre of the town, for the leading tradesmen; but in the outlying districts they extend to from half-an-hour to an hour later than in the centre of the town.

1365. Is there any tendency in Bolton to shortening the hours?—There is a desire, both on the side of the shop assistants and on that of the employers, but they find a difficulty through one or two tradesmen keeping open longer than the others do.

1366. You find that a few tradesmen are able to defeat the wishes of the great majority?—Yes.

1367. And you are not very sanguine of being able to shorten the hours by voluntary action?—Not at all; we have tried for a number of years now, and if we have for a certain time got anything like unanimity, we find that in a little while afterwards one or two find some excuse to break through it. There is one firm now in the tailoring trade who are going to extend their time half-an-hour every night, in the centre of the town; whereas all the other tailors in the town and outlying districts are prepared to keep to the hours they have now; but if this firm extends their time, as they say they will, it will mean the other people coming back again to the old time.

1368. Your association is, therefore, as I understand, in favour of some legislation?—Yes.

1369. Have you looked at the Bill now before the Committee?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1370. I will give you an opportunity presently of making any suggestions in detail; but may I ask whether your association has passed any resolution or expressed any opinion with reference to the Bill generally?—There are several alterations which they would like to see.

1371. I am coming to the alterations afterwards; but as regards the Bill generally, what is their view?—They are in favour of the Bill as a whole, thinking that it is a step in the right direction, and will be the first step, we hope, towards further legislation on the subject.

1372. Do they think that it deals with the question in a right manner; for instance, it deals with the closing of shops, and it has been suggested that it would be more convenient to attempt to limit the hours of shop assistants?—We think that this Bill would be a far better method in dealing with the hours, because in some instances there are certain firms who might have some men coming on at eight o'clock in the morning, working till eight o'clock at night, and then another lot coming about 10 o'clock in the morning, and working till 10 o'clock at night; so that that would not stop the evil we have at the present time. All the employers, or the majority of them at any rate, seem to be desirous of a uniform hour of closing; they say it is an absolute necessity.

1373. Then the general lines of the Bill your association approves?—Yes.

1374. Now, I should be glad to hear any suggestions for modification that you may wish to lay before the Committee; we will go through the clauses seriatim; which is the first clause in which you have any amendment to suggest?—In the first clause, lines 2 and 3, we should like to have those words deleted: "or any class of shops within the district." We would prefer it to read plain, "that as regards all shops belonging to all classes not mentioned in the schedule."

1375. You are aware that the Bill is only permissive; therefore, you, in Bolton, might apply it to all shops; but other towns and other classes of shops might wish it to apply to their shops; drapers, for instance, might be anxious to close, and not grocers; or grocers might be anxious anxious to close, and not drapers; why would you prevent them from doing so?—Because we find that there are some people who carry on the two trades in one shop; and if it is left for the drapers to close on one day, and the grocers on another, there would be a difficulty about it.

1376. That is not the point; the point is as regards the hour of closing; there might be a place, and there no doubt will be, in which you could get two-thirds of the drapers to agree to close, but not two-thirds of the grocers; is it not desirable to leave in the Bill, that if two-thirds of the drapers wish to close they should be able to do so by the action of the local authority?—We think we could get two-thirds of the whole of the trade.

1377. You might; and I daresay you would in Bolton?—It would be better, on behalf of our association as well, because we have members of all trades, and they would prefer to have the time stated.

1378. I understand you think that in Bolton you could get that with regard to all shops; but supposing there were other places, as there certainly would be, in which there was a strong feeling amongst the grocers to close early, but not amongst the drapers; or amongst the drapers and not amongst the grocers, why should you wish to prevent their doing that; it would not prevent you in Bolton from applying it to all classes together?—No, it would not; but we think that it would be the means of getting the others to come back again to the old time. Then, if the drapers for a few months decide to close, say at eight o'clock, and the grocers at nine o'clock after this arrangement had been in progress a little while, we think that those closing earliest would get the greatest number to appeal for the order to be reversed, and go back to the times that the grocers or drapers were working; the later hours.

1379. But, if there were a majority in favour of the later hour, I am afraid that leaving out those words would not help matters; you would have them all closing at the later hour; but if you leave the words in you might have the drapers or the grocers, as the case may be, closing at the earlier hour?—It would be much easier to get the whole of the shops in the town, and, I think, it would be much safer and more likely to be lasting and more effective, if we had the whole of the trades.

1380. Passing on from that, what is the next amendment that you wish to suggest?—Coming to line 16, the Bill provides: "The local authority may, if they see fit, make an order." We should like to have those words deleted and to read as follows: "The local authority shall make an order."

1381. Have you any doubt in Bolton that if two-thirds of the shopkeepers wished to close rather earlier, the local authority would give effect to their wishes?—Yes, there may be some of the shopkeepers who are opposed to the order being put in force, who would have the power of not making the order, if they did not see fit, and that might influence some other members of the council or local authority not to make an order, even though they had the two-thirds.

Chairman—continued.

1382. Passing on from that, what is your next amendment?—At page 2, clause 2, sub-section 2 is as follows:—"The Order shall (if the application to the local authority contains such limitation) be expressed to have effect only during any specified part or parts of the year, and shall have effect accordingly, but, unless so limited, shall have effect throughout the year until revoked." We should like the whole of that sub-section, lines 4 to 8, to be omitted.

1383. Is not the work in Bolton much heavier towards Christmas time?—It is a little heavier, but it has always been met, and could be met in the same way as at any other time.

1384. Have you considered that, in other places at any rate, the work is much heavier at Christmas time, and that the effect of leaving that sub-section out would be that at no time of the year could the shops be closed earlier than they could be closed at Christmas?—But there are times when they have sales on when there are special efforts made to confine the work within the hours, and extra men are employed, and we find that they can do the work in the time.

1385. You think that, in Bolton, there would be no difficulty about Christmas time?—No.

1386. Supposing that, in other places, there was a great difficulty about the time, why should you prevent their closing rather earlier for 11 months in the year, because they cannot close at that time towards the end of December?—I am afraid, if it were left optional, they would not try to get over the difficulty.

1387. You see, in parts of London, the work is extremely heavy at Christmas; and the result of leaving that out would be that at comparatively slack times of the year you could not close shops any earlier than you could at the most busy time; it may not apply to Bolton, but why should you wish to prevent other towns from having the opportunity of closing; take, again, a seaside town where the work is particularly heavy during what is called the season; why should they not have an opportunity of closing earlier during the slack months if they wish?—Even in Southport, which is a seaside town, they have very good hours there.

1388. That is no answer to my question, I am quite aware that there are seaside towns with comparatively good hours, but there are other seaside towns in which the work is heavier at one time than at another, and this sub-section is to enable them to close earlier in the slack months than in the busy time; I grant you it may not apply to Bolton; but why should you wish to prevent other towns from having the advantage; or is it merely that you wish the Committee to understand that so far as Bolton and its neighbourhood is concerned it is not required?—We think that other towns could get through the work as well as we do; but even in the seaside towns we find that the whole of the work can be done in less time than it takes at the present time, because the poor are shopping, or the greater part of them, to the last minute, and if the shops were closed at a certain time they would have to come earlier.

1389. I can follow you to the extent that the work work can be done in less time than at present; but where I cannot follow you is, that the work can be done in as little time in the busy time as in the slack time of the year, and I ask whether you observe that if you did not have these words you could not enable a town to close earlier in the slack time of the year than it does in the busy time?—But in the busy time they are not busy all through the day.

1390. Will you please pass on to the next point?—The next point is in clause 2, sub-section 3, line 12; to omit "and as to the classification of shops."

1391. That is a consequential amendment, of course?—Yes. In clause 3, sub-section 2, line 21, it reads: "If at any time it is made to appear to the satisfaction of the local authority, that more than one-third in number of the occupiers of shops"; we think that ought to be altered to two-thirds. If it takes two-thirds to get the order put in force, we think it ought to take the two-thirds to get it revoked.

1392. You observe that the principle was that two-thirds of the shopkeepers should wish to close; therefore the corollary seems to me to be that, if they change their mind, one-third should be sufficient to open again; but you think that, having once closed, they should not be allowed to open without a two-thirds majority again. That is the view of your association?—If they had two-thirds, there would be one-third that objected to the closing.

1393. That is the Bill as it stands?—That is why we want the alteration made, making it two-thirds instead of the one-third.

1394. But you have considered the point, have you, that that is the natural corollary of the first clause, which requires a majority of two-thirds of the shopkeepers to put the Bill into operation?—But nothing is mentioned of any other possible number being required in the first clause. If they had one-third in the first clause, and two-thirds in the second clause, they might have been able to argue that way; but it does not matter whether it is two-thirds or one-third, or two-fifths, so long as we have the same number to get the order revoked as we have to get it in force; that is our main contention: that the same number ought to be got to have the order revoked.

1395. You observe that the principle of the Bill is that it should continue in operation so long as two-thirds wished it. That you would like to see altered, I understand?—We should like it to be made quite plain that the same number would be required.

1396. But it is perfectly plain that they require two-thirds of the shopkeepers to put the Bill into operation?—Yes.

1397. You wish the two-thirds to be continued, to keep it in operation, and as you word it the Bill might continue to be in force although only one-third of the shopkeepers wished it be to so. I only want to know whether you realise the point you are making?—In this clause it says: "If at any time it is made to appear to the satisfaction of the local authority that more than one-third in number of the occupiers of shops to which an order for the time being in force under this Act relates, on of any class of such shops, are opposed to the continuance of the order, the local authority may revoke the said order." We wish it to read: "If at any time it is made to appear to the satisfaction of the local authority that two-thirds in number of the occupiers of shops to which an order for the time being in force under this Act relates, or of any class of such shops, are opposed to the continuance of the order, the local authority may revoke the said order."

1398. I quite understand what you wish; what I wish to ascertain is whether you have realised that the effect of that change would be that the shops might continue to be closed under the Bill, although two-thirds of the shopkeepers wished them to be open longer or wished a change. Some of them would keep to the time.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1399. But do not you see, supposing that, as Sir John Lubbock says, two-thirds of the shopkeepers wanted to change the time to a later hour, by your alteration it could not be done?—It could be done if they got the two-thirds in favour of it.

Chairman.

1400. Would you look at it from this point of view: there are parts of London where the shops are open now to 10 o'clock at night, and probably could not come to a very much earlier hour all at once; but we hope that under this Bill they would close at nine o'clock instead of 10 o'clock, and that when that was gained a great many of them would wish, and I hope the majority of them would wish, to extend it still further after a certain time to eight o'clock instead of nine. Under the Bill as it stands if the two-thirds were not gained again the local authority could revoke the order fixing nine o'clock, and fix an earlier hour; but you would make it very difficult for them to do that; you would stereotype, as it were, the first hour that was fixed, whatever it might be?—We contend that the two-thirds ought to be got for any alteration.

1401. I quite understand what you contend; but I want to ascertain whether you perceive that the effect of what you are suggesting would be, as it seems to me, exactly the reverse of what you desire?—It would not prevent their altering the time.

1403. The effect of the Bill as it stands is, that always two-thirds would regulate the hour, provided that they got the assent of the local authority; whereas the effect of the clause as you you suggest it would make it more difficult to make any change when any hour had once been fixed; but I gather that you have not considered it from that point of view?—I am just beginning to see it now; but still if that one-third were left in as it is, it would read that they could make it possible for the hour to be extended.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1404. Or changed?—Yes.

Chairman.

1405. As it stands, two-thirds of the shopkeepers would regulate the hour; as you propose to alter it, it leaves it to the minority of shopkeepers to regulate the hour; surely that is hardly reasonable; I only wish to know whether you have considered it from that point of view?—The two-thirds would still always control the hour, whatever it was. If they wanted to go back or earlier, it would be the two-thirds that would control it.

1406. They would under the Bill; but you do not appear to see the effect of the suggestion that you make; however, you have not considered it, apparently, from that point of view?—We have taken it to mean that the one-third might be able to have the Act nullified.

1407. Then, I can only say that you have not quite understood the effect of the clause; now pass on to the next point, if you please?—Clause 5 says: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is, by any order made under this Act, required to be closed for the purpose of any of them."

1408. That, of course, would go if you do away with the classification of trades?—That refers to the grocers and drapers who have off licences, and those would come under the scheduled list, would they not?

1409. They could not under the Schedule, of course, go on; supposing there was a grocer who had an off licence, he could not go on selling under that licence?—But could they keep open to sell their intoxicating liquors?

1410. What would you suggest with regard to that point?—We suggest that the two trades should be treated the same as any other trade; that if a drapery or grocery business were carried on in the same establishment they should close.

1411. You are in favour of the clause as it stands, then, because that is what the clause provides?—We should like it to be made clear that the off licences would come under the words "two or more classes."

1412. You wish the off licences to be included in the Bill?—Yes.

1413. Do you see any great objection to the grocers who hold off licences being allowed to go on selling those articles which they sell under the off licence, where they compete with public-houses, after the hour?—The effect of that would be that we should always have to have somebody watching to see that they did not sell their groceries or draperies.

Chairman—continued.

1414. Therefore, the wish of your association is that they should be shut for all purposes?—Yes. Then, with regard to Clause 6, we would wish the fine to be made more. Instead of 5*s.*, we should like it to be 5*l.* for the first offence, 10*l.* for the second offence, and 20*l.* for the third offence.

1415. With what option of imprisonment?—Fourteen days for the first, a month for the second, and three months for the third offence.

1416. Do not you think that it would be very harsh upon a small tradesman, when the Act first came into operation, who very likely had never heard of the Bill, and was not aware that he was breaking the law, if he were to keep his shop open a little beyond the time (it might be only a very short time beyond the time), do not you think really that for a first offence a nominal fine of 5*s.*, which would practically be a warning to him, would be more merciful and more likely to enable the Act to work smoothly than if you were to impose a very heavy fine upon a poor man for a first offence, when he did not even know that he was committing an offence against the law?—There are very few shopkeepers of any class but what have heard of the Bill, and know that it has been proceeded with, and they would watch the time for its coming into law, and there would be plenty of time also allowed for them to get acquainted with the particulars.

1417. At any rate, your association would wish the fines to be made heavier?—Yes.

1418. What is the next amendment?—The next is in Clause 12, line 20, "Shall be deemed to render unlawful the continuance in a shop after the hour appointed for the closing thereof." We would like a fixed time to be put in there, say 30 minutes. We would like it to read, "shall be deemed to render unlawful the continuance in a shop for more than 30 minutes after the hour appointed for the closing thereof."

1419. Do you find, practically, that a customer often remains as long as 30 minutes after the hour of closing?—We have found that, in many cases, they have remained an hour or an hour and a-quarter, and purchasing very little, too.

1420. Therefore, you think it is a practical point to put in some limit like that?—Yes; and we should also like another clause inserted after the 24th line.

1421. What would the effect of that clause be?—That workers in shops under this Act shall not remain more than 30 minutes after the hour of closing.

1422. Might there not be considerable difficulty in that, in very busy times, when parcels have to be made up and goods put away; I can quite understand that in ordinary times 30 minutes would be sufficient; but would there not be times in which 30 minutes would be rather short?—It is only in very rare cases that all the departments are busy at the same time. At one time of the year the dress department in the drapery trade particularly would be busy, and the Manchester department would not be busy; and then the men in the Manchester department might go to the assistance of the men in the dress department or fancy department. Then, in the winter time, when the Manchester department were busier, the men out of the fancy department could go and assist them, and so avoid that.

1423. Do you approve of the Schedule?—I have nothing to say in regard to the Schedule, because the tobacconists themselves say that they cannot come under the Act on account of the public houses selling their articles.

1424. Do I rightly describe the general desire of your association when I say that you thoroughly approve of the Bill, so far as it goes, but that, in some respects, you wish to make it more stringent?—Yes.

1425. And you believe that, as regards Bolton, it would be a good working Bill and would tend to shorten your hours?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1426. You say that you have been secretary of your association for six months only?—Yes.

1427. And, therefore, a great deal of the information which you have given us you have only gained from others, not from your own experience?—The experience of the working of the shops I have gained for myself.

1428. Previously to being secretary?—Yes.

1429. And are you authorised to speak on behalf of your association?—Yes.

1430. What is the total number of the association?—Two hundred and five.

1431. How many shopkeepers are included in that?—There are only two shopkeepers (one shopkeeper and a manager), and they were assistants when they joined first, and we have allowed them to continue members of the association.

1432. Do you not think that if you make this Bill too severe you would stop shopkeepers from asking to be placed under the Act?—No, they would feel they were more protected.

1433. But by this Bill you have got to get two-thirds of the shopkeepers to ask for the shops to be closed, and until they ask for the shops to be closed they do not come under the working of the Act?—That is so.

1434. If you make the Act very severe, you will interfere altogether with that action, will you not, with the shopkeepers coming in?—They think that they will be more protected from the outsiders by having the Act made strict.

1435. But do you think that small shopkeepers anywhere would like to place themselves under the police, and be liable to 14 days' imprisonment, as you say, for a first offence, when they need not run that risk?—They would take care not to break the law. A great many of the small shops are in favour of closing; but they say that it is because the man next door but one, or the man across the street, keeps open that they are compelled to do so.

1436. But do you not see the point?—Yes; but they would know then that if the Act was made very stringent, they would feel more secure that their opponents would not try it on.

1437. But do you not see the point, that by this Bill a shopkeeper is not compelled to sign in favour of closing his shop by Act of Parliament?—Yes.

1438. And that if you make the penalties very severe he will say, "Why should I place myself under those penal clauses"; and, consequently, you would have a difficulty in getting a two-thirds majority of any class of trades to sign in favour of their all being brought under the Act?—I do not think so, because the shopkeeper would not look at it in that light. Not intending to break the law he would think there was no necessity for considering it in that manner.

1439. But surely it would be explained to the shopkeeper that if he signed in favour of being brought under the compulsory clauses of this Bill he would bring himself under the penal clauses?—Yes.

1440. Then a man, as regards himself, might not care about being brought under them, but he must have some feelings as regards an accident occurring to his poorer neighbours, and he might object to sign altogether?—On the other hand, if the fine remained as it is, 5*s.* for the first offence, he might say, "Anybody will break the law, because they might get a customer in and get 2*l.* or 3*l.* profit, and they would not miss the 5*s.*"

1441. You also said that, with regard to Clause 1, you would not give the local authority the option of deciding whether they would issue an order or not, but you would make it compulsory that they should?—Yes.

1442. Then there would be no object in having the local authority, would there?—Yes; the local authority would have to put the Act in force, and see that the law was carried out in the same way that they have to do with other laws.

1443. You have studied this Bill; the police, by this Bill, are to carry out the Act?—When it is put in operation.

1444. But you say that the local authority is to have no option; consequently, why should you pass it through the local authority if the police are to do the work, and the local authority have no option in the matter?—But if the tradesmen are agreeable that this should be put into operation it ought not to be in the hands of the local authority to say that they will not do that. That is what we want to safeguard against.

1445. Again; you said just now, I think, that should the grocers who have not off licences, two-thirds of them, in any district decide to close their shops at a particular hour, the grocers who have off licences should also be compelled to close?—Yes.

1446. Do you not think that that would interfere with their present licences?—No. If it would in any way legally interfere with their licence a clause might be inserted allowing this action to take place.

1447. Allowing what action to take place?—Allowing them to close.

1448. But they want to be open; off licence-holders want to be open as long as the public houses, do they not?—No, not all of them; it is the breweries themselves that have the licence at a shop that compel them.

1449. Do

1449. Do you know of any brewers who hold off-licenses at grocers' shop?—Yes.

1450. Can you name one?—In Bolton in Haliwell-road.

1451. Owned by a private brewer?—Yes.

1452. What brewer?—I cannot mention exactly the name, but I believe it is the Haliwell Brewery. It is in Haliwell-road, and it is a grocer's and draper's shop.

1453. And it is owned by a brewer?—Yes, the property and the license; the property belongs to the brewer and the license also.

1454. That is the first I ever heard of; I never knew that brewers went in for holding grocers' shops for the sake of an off-license?—He is the owner of the house, and the property, and the license; then somebody else goes in and commences a drapery trade, and then opens a grocery trade.

1455. But in the case of off-licensed houses, they are not allowed to sell beer over the counter, are they?—Not to be consumed on the premises.

1456. Nor to sell draught beer?—Oh, yes.

1457. In your opinion, all trades of every class in a town should close at the same hour?—Yes.

1458. And you think that there should be no classification of trades?—None whatever.

1459. You think that that would be the best thing for Bolton?—Yes.

1460. But from your observation, do you think that that would be possible in London?—Yes, I should think so.

1461. That every shopkeeper in London should close at a certain hour?—Yes; or if London is divided into districts, that certain districts should all close at a certain time.

1462. But would you divide districts down certain streets, say down Oxford-street, that one side of Oxford-street might close at one time, and the other side of Oxford-street should close at another?—No, I would make it the West-end and the East-end.

1463. But you must draw the line somewhere?—But that would be left more to people who know London better than I do to divide the districts.

1464. Now, as regards the total number of hours that you make out that shop assistants are employed in Bolton; you say the hours are from 8.30 a.m. until 8.30 p.m. on some nights?—On Mondays and Fridays.

1465. That is 12 hours for two days, that is, 24 hours; and what is the next time?—From 8.30 a.m. to eight p.m.

1466. Eleven and a-half hours: that is one day?—Yes; then from 8.30 a.m. to one p.m.

1467. That is four and a-half hours?—Yes; then 8.30 a.m. to 10 p.m.

1468. That is 13½ hours?—Yes.

1469. That makes a total working altogether then of only 63½ hours per week?—That is for the centre of the town.

1470. And under the Shop Hours' Regulation Act, young people under 18 years of age are allowed to be employed now 74 hours a week?—Yes; but that does not say that the Shop Hours' Regulation Act is what ought to be put in force.

1471. Have you at Bolton any grocers' association?—Yes.

1472. Do you know their opinion at all?—Locally they are in favour of an earlier closing. There are some members of the grocers' association who are also members of the tradesmen's association, which includes all trades; and I have the official organ here, in which the editor, who is also a tradesman, writes an article in favour of lessening the hours.

1473. I can quite conceive it is possible that everybody, it does not matter how long they work, would like to work a less number of hours; cannot you?—Yes.

1474. Do those hours that you are giving include meal hours?—Yes; half-an-hour for dinner and 20 minutes for tea.

1475. Including those times for dinner and tea, all the assistants in your association only work 63½ hours a week, and they would like to work less?—Yes.

Chairman.

1476. But that, you say, is in the centre of the town?—Yes; and we want to bring the others who are outside to our hours.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1477. And in the outside of the town, you told the Committee just now the hours averaged from half-an-hour to an hour more?—Yes.

1478. So that in the outside of the town the utmost would be another six hours; that is, an hour per day?—Yes.

1479. Bringing it to a total of 69½ hours as the total per week?—That is so.

Mr. Diamond.

1480. You said that you agreed with that part of the Schedule of the Bill which kept tobacconists outside the scope of the Act?—Yes.

1481. And your reason for so doing was that public-houses sell tobacco?—Yes.

1482. And that if tobacconists were compelled to close there would be an undue advantage given to the public-houses?—Yes. I should also have said that we were in favour of some arrangement being come to to make it compulsory for assistants in tobacconists' shops and refreshment shops to have a half-day holiday.

1483. But so far as the earlier closing is concerned you would allow the tobacconists to remain outside, for the reason which you have just given?—Yes.

1484. But then, I think, you said in another part of your evidence that where a man had this beer off-licensed, and sold groceries and draperies you would compel him to close for everything at the hour that might be adopted, say, by the grocers?—Yes.

1485. Do you not think that he would reply: "If the tobacconist is allowed to be open because the public-house sells tobacco, I think it would be very unfair to compel me to close, seeing that I sell beer while the public-houses would be selling beer." I merely want to ensure that any discrepancy that may appear in your evidence may be removed, by making clear any point that is now in doubt?—In all towns the tobacconists have kept open, very few of them have closed on Wednesday afternoon; they have always kept open on Sundays, and the off-license places do not keep open on Sundays.

1486. With regard to that statement, that people with off-licenses do not open on Sundays, is that the rule in Bolton?—Yes.

1487. It is not the rule all over the country, is it?—It is not the rule all over Bolton; but in the majority of cases it is so.

1488. How do you make it out that it would be fair to allow tobacconists to be excepted from the operation of the Act, whereas you compel those men with beer off-licenses to conform to it?—For the reason that tobacconists do not generally go into another trade; but if a tobacconist had two trades going he would come under the Act; having two trades he would have to come in.

1489. Then, if a tobacconist had a news agency as well, which is often the case, would he have to close?—A news agency comes under the schedule.

1490. Then, you except the news agency again, you see?—They are excepted.

1491. And very often a hairdresser has also a tobacconists' business and a news agency besides, where would you draw the line with regard to these matters, if you compel men with off-licenses to close at the same hours as grocers?—I should also compel a tobacconist to close if he had a grocery business as well.

Chairman.

1492. As long as he confined himself to a tobacconists and news agency business he would not be competing with other shops unfairly?—Just so.

1493. That is your point?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond.

1494. I suppose that you are aware that nearly every grocer is also a tobacconist?—Then they would come under the operation of the Act.

1496. But a grocer will say: "Here I am licensed for tobacco, but I must not sell tobacco after a certain hour; whereas a man licensed next door to sell tobacco, and having also a news agency and a hairdresser's shop, is at liberty to keep open as long as he likes." What I want to bring out is that you should endeavour to make it clear to the Committee, at any rate to myself as a Member of the Committee, that everybody will be reasonably treated, and nobody will be harshly treated under this Bill if it comes into operation?—If they think they are being harshly treated by having the two trades they must give one of the trades up, because it would be unfair competition with the others.

1497. You will remember, of course, that nobody need put himself under the Act if he does not like to do so; that is to say, it is a voluntary measure up to a certain point?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

1498. If a man had the prospect in front of him that he might have to give up one part of his business, say that of a grocer, with a beer off-license, or a grocer who is a tobacconist, or any of that large number of trades which may come in under half-a-dozen different classifications, or subject himself to three months' imprisonment, after the third offence, for having kept his shop open, do you not think that they would be very unwilling to vote for earlier closing at all?—He would not need to give up the business if he would conform to the Act. Supposing he carried on a grocery business and an off-license business, and the grocers agreed to close at a certain time, he would conform to that and close his shop.

1499. But, then, how about his beer trade for which he pays a license, and for the sale of which the public-house next door would be open to 11 at night; he would have to forego the sale of beer?—Yes, he very often does that now.

1500. As a general rule, do you not think that those people who have off-licenses do keep open the regulation hours?—Yes, the majority of them do.

1501. Then, if this man was compelled to close for the sale of beer while the public-house remained open, do you think it likely that he would vote for earlier closing; do you not think you would rather have a difficulty in persuading such a man to vote for it?—Some of them would not be persuaded, but there are many who are in favour, even with their off-licenses, of coming under the Bill.

1502. Now, there was another matter you mentioned; I do not know that you made it quite clear whether you still hold that view or not; that is, that if you got two-thirds in favour of closing and put it into operation you would then desire that they could not open the shops again unless they got two-thirds in favour of opening?—Yes.

1503. Do you still think that that is your view after the remarks of the right honourable Chairman in regard to it; do you think that it fairly represents your opinion now?—Yes; that if two-thirds are to be required to get the early closing, then another two-thirds ought to be required to have the closing extended.

1504. You still hold to that opinion?—Yes.

1505. In regard to the Saturday closing there has been a good deal of evidence tendered to the Committee; what do you think would be a fair hour to close shops in Bolton on Saturday at, grocers' shops, say, on Saturday night?—That is doing away with the half-holiday during the week?

1506. No, in order to get earlier closing on Saturday; we have had some evidence tendered by witnesses in favour of much shorter hours on Saturday; what do you think would be a reasonable hour to fix for Bolton?—Nine o'clock; that is if we still retain the Wednesday half-holiday.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1507. You have the Wednesday half-holiday now?—Yes.

1508. I do

Mr. Diamond.

1508. I do not know that you made it quite clear whether you still believe that it would be very much better to get the whole of the trades to vote in one body than to get all the grocers to vote on the question as it affected grocers only?—I do.

1509. Then, supposing you got two-thirds of the grocers in favour of closing grocers' shops, but did not manage to get two-thirds of the drapers, you think that that would improve the position of the grocers' assistants, seeing that they would be compelled to retain the hours as at present?—There might be more grocers in Bolton, and they would bring up the average of the two-thirds of the shopkeepers; but we should have no difficulty whatever in getting over two-thirds in all trades, so far as Bolton is concerned.

Mr. Frye.

1510. You have been asked a good many questions about these various trades, such as tobacconists. What definition should you make of a tobacconist. Would you consider that a man who did some hair-dressing and sold cigars would be a tobacconist or not?—Hardly, in the strict sense of the word.

1511. Then he would have to shut his shop?—He would come under the Act for two trades.

1512. He would not be considered as coming under the schedule of exemptions?—No.

1513. Then, in Bolton there are a great many off-license holders, who sell nothing but beer, and sell it late at night in jugs for people to consume at home; would you close those shops, and allow the public-houses to be open?—If they sold nothing else but beer, they would come under the same class as public-houses.

1514. They are not so in this Bill; they would have to close, as they are not public-houses. You would exempt them, would you, the same as you would public-houses?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson.

1515. Could you tell me at what time the operatives in Bolton generally leave off work?—At half-past five.

1516. Is it their custom to shop immediately afterwards?—Not till after they have been home to tea and washed.

1517. Do you mean that all the week, or on Saturdays, they close at half-past five?—It is all the week at half-past five, and from 12 to one on Saturdays; they vary; some give over at 12 and some at one.

1518. I infer from that that Bolton is not a late shopping town?—No, but still we could do with it even less than what it is, and trade could be done.

1519. If you had to specify it, what would you say was the common hour of shopping in Bolton on an ordinary weekday, not on a Saturday that is to say?—Friday night makes a difference, because a lot of them get paid on Fridays, and some of them do the shopping then; but if the shops were closed earlier they would still do their shopping within a less time than they are doing now, because a lot of them are members of the stores and the stores close very much earlier than other shops.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

1520. Would you mind giving the time at which the stores close?—They close at seven, and half-past seven; and half-past eight on Friday night.

1521. I have not quite got an answer to my question. What I want to know is, with your knowledge of Bolton, what do you say is the ordinary hour during which the working classes shop?—There is a little more done about seven in the evening than during the rest of the day.

1522. What is the average hour of closing?—In the centre of the town at eight, two nights; 8.30, two nights; 10 on Saturdays; and one on Wednesdays.

1523. And in the outskirts?—From about half an hour to an hour later.

1524. Then, practically, you do not know, in Bolton, anything in the nature of late opening or late shopping?—We consider it late.

1525. Seven or eight o'clock?—Yes.

1526. Then, would it be your view that the shops should be closed, as is possible in the Bill, at six o'clock?—No, not for a commencement.

1527. When would you close them?—For a commencement we would try to get every shop to close at the present hour.

1528. Then it is a very small matter; it is only a few shops that you have to deal with?—There are a great number of shops in the outskirts.

1529. Would those shops be what I have called domestic shops; that is to say, shops served only by a man and his wife and family?—A large number of them would be.

1530. What do you mean by "the present hour"?—The hour in the centre of the town.

1531. What are the hours in the outskirts?—From half an hour to an hour later.

1532. Then are you speaking of these exceptional shops that are of the domestic character which I have described?—No, there are some with one or two assistants in them. Many of them have one or more.

1533. What is the reason of their keeping open?—Because some little shop, perhaps a house with a shop window, keeps open on the opposite side of the road.

1534. In cases of that kind would it often be true to say that the man had another occupation?—With regard to the house, it would.

1535. Then, practically, what you want to do is to compel the small shops of this kind to come into line with the big establishments?—Yes.

1536. Would not the effect of that be, in most cases, to extinguish the small shop?—No, not at all; because, as several of them have told me, they do not do a cash trade, and it would be as easy for their customers to make the purchases in the daytime as it is at 10 or 11 o'clock at night.

1537. But if it be the general custom to close early, why do they keep open late?—They have got into the habit.

1538. But you say that they would have no objection to close early?—Not if we can get them all to do it.

1539. But you say that in reality they all do close early?—In the centre of the town, not in the outskirts.

1540. Then may I ask you whether you are aware that under the Bill the labour of people who work in rooms adjoining the shop would not be affected after hours; in the packing-room, for example?—Those, I presume, would come under the Factory Act.

1541. Not in packing up; I think it was given in evidence before one of the former Committees; it has been admitted before other Committees that there is a great deal of labour to be done about shops that would not be checked by the closing of the shop itself; are you aware of that?—But that would be put right if we got this clause inserted that no assistant should remain more than 30 minutes afterwards.

1542. But by closing the shop you mean closing the entrance to the public, do you not?—Yes; and also for the assistants to be out 30 minutes afterwards, according to the additional clause I suggest.

1543. Then you are not satisfied with the Bill as it is drafted now?—Not in that respect.

1544. Are you not of opinion that, so far as the health of assistants is concerned, it would be possible to meet the grievances complained of by extending the present Act, and making it cover all persons, not only young persons?—No, we do not think that that would meet the difficulty.

1545. Why not?—Because, as I stated before, it would allow some of the shopkeepers to keep open for an hour or two longer than the others.

1546. But that would prevent them working their assistants longer, would it not?—Yes, that would prevent their working their assistants longer, but it would not have the unanimous support, or so much support as the present Bill has, from the shopkeepers themselves.

1547. You are talking of the big shopkeepers; but with regard to the small shopkeepers I suppose it would have much greater support?—The small shopkeepers would still say that they were under a difficulty, because they would not be able to keep two relays of assistants, and they would have to close under the 12 hours themselves, so that it would make no difference to them.

1548. The point is this: that under the Bill you coerce a man who is employing no outside labour at all, and there cannot be a grievance in his case. If the grievance is (as we all admit) that shop assistants are worked excessive hours in some places, would not that be met by extending the present Act and using the machinery of inspection?—Then you would allow a man who kept a shop himself with his own family to keep open late.

1549. Yes, it is his own business?—That is where we have opposition from the shopkeepers who employ assistants.

1550. But we must think of what is right, not where the opposition comes from. You have no reason to coerce a man with regard to his own work?—You might say we have no reason to coerce a man who was employing an assistant.

1551. I suppose it is contended that the assistant is not free to fix his own hours; that practically he has to work what hours his employer chooses?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

1552. And free contract does not really exist in his case?—No.

1553. I suppose, then, you would say that he is in a different position from that of a man who is keeping a shop himself, and simply working it with his family?—He would be; but the difficulty comes in in those shops being allowed to keep open.

1554. I understand then that really what you want to do is to influence the small shopkeepers. May I ask, with regard to the small shopkeeper, is it not true that during the greater part of the day there would be no work done in his shop at all, especially in the outskirts of towns?—Yes, probably so.

1555. The shop is simply kept open, but there is no trade done?—There is not much done at present.

1556. In any real sense of the term, then, there is no labour employed in that shop at all during a certain part of the day?—No; only keeping the shop open and serving a chance customer coming in now and again, and at night they do the great bulk of their trade. They say themselves that if all the shops were closed it would have no ill effect upon their trade because, owing to their not doing a cash trade, it would be as easy for their customers to shop during the day as late at night; but that so long as they keep open, people will drive it to the last minute.

1557. Is it then a question of the hours of labour, or merely the time at which it is desirable to bring them to an end?—That is the point.

1558. The hours of labour may be just as long under the Bill as they would be under the present system; it is simply a question of when that labour is to be performed?—Yes.

Chairman.

1559. Do you think it is at all likely that the hours of labour would be as long under the Bill as they are at present?—No, they would be very much lessened.

Mr. Lawson.

1560. I do not think you understand my point; my point is this: In the small shop, I ask you whether any work is done at all during the middle of the day, or a great part of the early hours when it is open, and if not, whether it is not simply a question of bringing labour to an end rather than of reducing the actual hours during which it is performed?—It is bringing the work into the middle part of the day.

1561. It is altering the time when the work is done?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

1562. You are familiar with this Bill, I understand?—Yes.

1563. Do you think that there would be any difficulties in working out the details of it?—No, I do not think so.

1564. Do I correctly understand you to wish to make Bolton all one place, or to sub-divide it in any way?—We should make Bolton all one place.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

1565. Do you think that that would be desirable all over the country in every town?—In the towns it would.

1566. Do you think in the large towns, such as London, Glasgow, or Liverpool, that would be possible?—As I said before, in London they might have it divided; but that should be left for the London people, who know the circumstances better than I do.

1567. You cannot speak for London?—No.

1568. I understand that you are in favour of closing all the departments in any large store?—Yes.

1569. Although there should be only early closing with regard to one particular part in that store?—Yes.

1570. You would like to close the whole of a store, for instance, if the drapers were to close only, although that store might sell a great many other things besides drapery?—Yes, but we want to include all these trades; we do not want the trades classifying at all. We want the Act to be put in force for all trades, not for it to be left at the option of the drapers or the grocers to close if they wish it and leave the others open, but we are desirous of having the whole of the shops closed.

1571. Then, in that way you would alter the first clause?—Yes.

1572. Are you familiar with the rural districts at all in Lancashire?—Yes, a little; but not very extensively.

1573. Do you consider that there is much need or requirement for some such legislation in the rural districts?—Yes, there are many shops with one or two assistants in them, and it is as necessary for them in the rural districts to have less hours as it is for those in towns.

Mr. Edwards.

1574. Your association applies to shop assistants only?—Yes.

1575. You do not know anything about the number of small shopkeepers who are anxious for this change; I mean men who keep a shop and work it by themselves and their wives or members of the family without any assistants in the regular sense of the term?—I and two other members of the committee about three weeks ago canvassed Halliwell-road, and we found in Halliwell-road and the bye-streets a large number of those shops.

Chairman.

1576. Can you give us any idea how many?—I could not say the number exactly, but in Halliwell-road and the bye-streets there would be about 110.

Mr. Edwards.

1577. Small shops?—Yes.

1578. Have you canvassed those small shops?—Yes, we have canvassed those small shops, and they all said that if they could get so and so to close they would.

1579. One is kept open by fear of the others, that is to say?—Yes, I think we got 11 out of 12 to agree to close if we could get the twelfth; and many of them told us that they were not cash traders, and that it would be as easy for their customers to come in the day-time, and they would have to come if they were compelled to close earlier.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

1580. It has been suggested that an extension of the application of the Shop Hours Act, 1892, would meet the case of assistants; but does it appear to you that it would meet the case of these small shops?—No, because they would be outside the Act.

1581. In that case, would not the result be that even with small shops that had one or two assistants it would involve their keeping relays of assistants to work the thing properly?—Yes.

1582. But with small shops, where a man and his wife keep the shop, such an extension would not be of any practical benefit?—No.

1583. And the only thing to do for them is to close early, so that they may get the same benefit as other people?—Yes.

1584. You say that you close at one o'clock in Bolton on Wednesdays?—Yes.

1585. Do they all close at one?—In the centre of the town, with the exception of two drapers and one milliner.

1586. But I mean that the early closing applies to all trades, butchers, grocers, and all?—Yes.

1587. Those who do close are trades of different kinds?—Yes.

1588. It does not apply to one trade only?—No.

1589. Have you amongst those trades that close early any co-operative stores?—Yes, they close on Wednesday afternoons.

1590. And do they sell more than one kind of article, as is usual?—Yes, they have grocery, drapery, and butchering departments.

1591. Therefore, the question of different trades being maintained under one roof does not trouble you in Bolton as to the different hours of closing, because you solve the thing by actual practice?—Yes.

1592. You find they close at the same time?—Yes.

1593. You say that if that were not the case it would be impossible to close one department in a co-operative store while leaving the others open?—Yes.

1594. But supposing there was a difficulty of that kind, and that it would be impossible for one shop containing many different trades to close at the hours that the other different trades closed at; assuming that the butchers closed on Monday, the grocers on Tuesday, and the drapers on Wednesday; in your opinion, might not the Bill apply to many other parts of the country where such a difficulty does not exist; and would it not be a benefit to have it as it stands, even with that anomaly?—I do not know that I follow the question.

1595. Your contention is that in a particular town it might be found that the different trades of butcher, grocer, and draper closed early on different days, and that that would make it very awkward for certain stores in that town that had a butchering department, a grocery department, and a drapery department?—Yes.

1596. But do you think that those circumstances so often exist throughout the country generally generally that difficulties of that kind would cause the Act to be nullified?—Yes. Under the Act, as it stands, with the classification of trades, those shops would be always closed if the different trades have different days for early closing.

1597. That would work harshly upon them, you think?—Yes.

1598. And, therefore, the tendency would be not to apply the Act in those cases?—Yes.

1599. But my point is this: do you consider that that is so seldom likely to happen that the Act is of great advantage for the rest of the country owing to its practicability, and being able to be applied in other parts of the country?—No, I think it would be better for the rural districts if it were amended in the way we suggest. There are many shops in the rural districts that have a grocery and a drapery business, and it would be far better not to classify the trades.

1600. But I do not think you quite see my point: that this Bill does not only apply to large towns, where there may be difficulties of this kind, but it applies to the whole country, and therefore in small towns such a difficulty as I am mentioning would not occur, would it?—Yes, in small towns it is of more frequent occurrence that shopkeepers have both a grocery and drapery business.

1601. But the difficulty of closing would not occur, would it?—If the grocer decided to close on one day and the draper on another, those men who had the two businesses would have to close two half days.

1602. Therefore you think, in those cases, the Act would not be practicable?—No, not as it stands.

1603. You suggest that, after the time fixed for closing, the assistants are to go within a certain specified time?—Yes.

1604. Do you think that is a workable provision?—Yes.

1605. How are you to find out whether they are there or not?—By seeing the lights, the shop would be lit up.

1606. But many shops are lit up now without anybody being in them?—But you could see through the windows; and if they are lighted up in the way you suggest it is only in the windows.

1607. It is suggested that a difficulty of this kind might occur; supposing that a porter working on the premises belonging to the shop were sent with parcels after hours, would you apply the Act to him?—His time would not have to extend beyond thirty minutes.

1608. Supposing the Bill were to remain as it stands, do you suppose that there would be longer employment of assistants after the system of early closing comes into vogue than there is now; you have had some evidence, have you not, in Bolton of early closing?—Yes.

1609. There was a time when they did not close early?—Yes.

1610. You know the assistants well in Bolton?—Yes.

1611. Do you find their experience is that they are kept longer after closing hours now than they were before?—No.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

1612. Therefore, the difficulty does not occur?—Only in exceptional cases.

1613. Therefore, you are wanting to provide really for a difficulty that does not occur?—It does occasionally; but it would in other places, more than in Bolton probably.

1614. What do you know about other places?—I was at Newcastle-on-Tyne, for instance, for four years, and very often we find there that they are kept a longer time.

1615. After closing?—Yes.

1616. Longer than they are in Bolton?—Yes.

1617. But they would not be kept a longer time after early closing than they were before, would they?—They might have to stay an hour after, which would bring the time up to the present time.

1618. But why would they stay so long; how could that be. If they closed ordinarily at nine, and were kept in an hour later, that would release them at 10 o'clock; but if you had early closing at eight, even if they were kept the same time as before, that would release them at nine, would it not?—Yes, but it is quite possible that they would be kept an hour later where it is only necessary for them to be kept half-an-hour; and we want to provide for their being kept only the half-hour; we think that is quite long enough.

1619. I am not saying anything as to the length of time, but only how far it can be carried out in practice?—If we say that the shop is to be closed at eight, and everybody must be out of the shop 30 minutes afterwards, then assistants could make appointments with some degree of confidence of being able to keep them; but with no time stated they might have to break them on every occasion.

1620. But, as a matter of fact, you do not apprehend that they would have to be kept longer under the system of early closing than they are kept now. They would be kept in for the same purposes then as now, would they not?—Yes, but the customers themselves might come in just a few minutes after 8 o'clock and stay a longer time than they really need, as they do very often now. We have found them stay an hour and an hour and a quarter.

1621. But the same would happen then as happens now?—Yes.

1622. And as you would gain an hour in closing you would gain an hour in leaving the shop?—Yes, but we want to make it a more definite time for getting out.

1623. Now, take the case of the grocer and tobacconist, about which you were asked some questions. If a grocer sells tobacco, as they do now, and if the grocers close early now, they do not find any practical difficulty, I suppose, from the fact that the tobacconists keep open now while they close early?—No.

Sir Francis Powell.

1624. You have some machine shops in Bolton, ironworks?—Yes.

1625. What are their pay days?—Some on Fridays and some on Saturdays; Friday night and Saturday morning.

1626. Is

1626. Is the usual pay day Saturday or Friday?—Friday is the more general day.

1627. Are they paid weekly?—Yes.

1628. What are the pay days in the collieries?—I cannot say exactly for the collieries; I believe some of them are on the Friday and some on the Saturday.

1629. Are many paid on Saturday?—No, I think the majority are paid on Fridays.

1630. Do you know of any collieries where the men are paid on Saturday?—I do not know of any collieries where they are paid on Saturday, but they are a little out of the town, and I am in the centre of the town.

1631. You stated, if I rightly understood you, that the hours are longer in the outlying districts than they are in the centre of the town?—Yes.

1632. Have you stated the reason why they should be longer?—No; there seems to be no reason whatever, only that they have got into the habit of keeping open late, and customers keep running in to the last minute.

1633. Are you speaking of districts inhabited by the working population, or of what are more generally known as residential districts?—There are many of the working classes living round there in Halliwell-road and Derby-street.

1634. Do these people of the working classes, living in the districts that you speak of, work in Bolton?—Yes.

1635. They have to go home?—Yes.

1636. Therefore, it is probably more necessary that they should be rather later in shopping than it is for those who live close to their work?—But the works are also in close proximity to the homes of the people in these districts.

1637. You did not hear my question. I asked you whether many of those living in the district you speak of do not work in Bolton, but live in the outskirts?—Many of them may; but, if the men work in the town of Bolton, and they live out in these districts, there is the wife to do the shopping.

1638. But does the family never work in factories in Bolton?—Yes, many of them; but there is always somebody at home to look after the home.

1639. But is that, or is it not, the reason why it is more convenient for them to shop later than it is for those who live in Bolton itself nearer their work?—No, I do not think that is any reason.

1640. I only wanted to know if that was present to your mind. Do you admit that the convenience of the public should be considered in the solution of these difficulties?—The convenience of the public is pretty well considered.

1641. Do you think it ought to be considered?—It is provided for; it is the public mainly themselves who say that they could shop earlier, only that they know the shops are open, and they leave it to the last moment.

1642. I received a letter this morning, not from a member of my constituency, but from the Shop Assistants Society, saying that neither the advantage of the public or of the employers, nor the convenience of customers ought to be considered in the slightest degree; that the only thing Parliament ought to have regard for was the convenience of shop assistants. Is that your view?—This Bill is for shop assistants; and the public will look after their interests equally as well as we are trying to do in looking after ours.

1643. But I am speaking of the action of the Legislature. Do you think that the Legislature ought to have regard to the convenience of the shop assistants exclusively?—No, I do not claim that.

1644. But my correspondent did claim that; do you share the views of my correspondent?—To a certain extent I do, because it is thoughtlessness on behalf of the people, they admit it themselves, the majority of the public.

1645. I was not speaking of thoughtlessness, I was speaking of reasonable convenience?—They have reasonable convenience at the present time, and reasonable convenience would be guaranteed under the Act, because the employers would look after that, that they allowed plenty of time for customers to do their shopping in.

1646. But you forget that if Parliament puts its hand down on this, the discretion of employers is gone; they cannot accommodate themselves to circumstances, because the circumstances have ceased to exist if Parliament says you must close?—The employers would consider that prior to getting the Act put into operation; they would consider the time if two-thirds of the employers had to be in favour of the shops being closed or the Bill being put in force.

1647. Do you consider that longer hours are more consistent with a cash trade or with a credit trade?—With a credit trade in Bolton at any rate.

1648. Do you consider that the shortening of the hours would favour cash business and discourage credit?—I do not say it would altogether discourage credit, but these people would have to come in the day-time.

1649. What people?—The credit people. It is they who are keeping the shops open to a very large extent.

1650. Who?—The credit people.

1651. Because they come late?—Yes.

1652. Then the arrangement made for the credit people would be more disturbed by legislation than the arrangements for the cash people?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1653. I suppose it is the very poor who have to buy on credit?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

1654. Do the working people buy on credit?—Yes, in the small shops.

1655. Exclusively?—Not exclusively. When they have the ready money at the week end they go into Bolton to do their shopping; but during the week they get their provisions out of the nearest neighbour.

1656. They get credit during the week, and pay off so far as they can on pay day?—Yes.

Chairman.

1657. As regards the convenience of the public, I believe I am correct in saying that the Bolton Trades Council passed a resolution in favour of the Bill. Are you aware of that?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1658. Do you know how that matter stands?—They have passed a resolution in favour of it.

1659. That might be fairly taken then as an expression of opinion as regards the convenience of the public not being too much interfered with, might it not?—Yes.

1660. You mentioned in reply to an honourable Member that the hours were 65 per week. That was in the centre of the town?—Yes.

1661. And that in the outskirts generally the hours are considerably longer?—Yes.

1662. And you are desirous in the first instance, if I understand you rightly, to reduce the hours in the later districts so as to bring them to the more reasonable hours in the central part of the town?—Yes.

1663. As regards the feeling of small shopkeepers, I gathered that what you found was that they would be in favour of a measure which would close all alike at the same time?—Yes.

1664. There would be no desire on the part of small shopkeepers to be excluded from the operation of the Bill?—None whatever.

1665. Were you in Bolton in 1888, and do you remember a meeting being held there in favour of early closing?—There was one that was addressed by Mr. Stacey and Mr. Rowe of Manchester, and the vicar of Bolton was there and he signed the memorial.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1666. You were not there yourself, were you?—No, I have had that information given me by the committee.

Chairman.

1667. However, you know there was such a meeting?—Yes.

1668. Was a resolution passed unanimously at that meeting in favour of legislation for early closing?—Yes.

1669. That would also imply a general feeling on the part of the public that the hours were unnecessarily long, would it not?—Yes; it was a very large meeting and unanimous.

Mr. Lawson.

1670. In reference to a question put by the right honourable Chairman as to bringing up the later district shops to the level of the big establishments in the centre of the town, may I ask whether it is not the case in the outskirts that very few assistants are employed in shops?—There are many shops where they employ one or two assistants.

1671. But not on a big scale?—No.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1672. In reference to the meeting that took place at Bolton in 1888, was the knowledge that you gained of that meeting gained from the compulsory Early Closing Association with which Mr. Stacey is connected?—No, from our own association which was in existence.

1673. Where did you get your information from?—From the members of the committee.

1674. You were told it?—Yes.

Chairman.

1675. Your own committee?—Yes, who were in Bolton at the time.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1676. The Bill, you say, would not limit the hours of shop assistants, and does not necessarily limit the hours of shop assistants taking parcels home at night?—It would if we had this clause put in, that they must not be employed more than 30 minutes afterwards.

1677. The Bill at present does not limit it?—No.

1678. And young women who are in drapers' shops might be employed upstairs making mantles or trimming bonnets after the shop is closed?—Not if they were assistants working in the shop.

1679. According to the Bill as it is drawn?—Yes.

1680. But if the Shop Hours Regulation Act was extended, then shop assistants could not be employed taking parcels home at night, nor could young women be employed doing work upstairs?—No.

Sir Francis Powell.

1681. Do you know how many members there are in the Bolton Trades Council?—There are about 60 delegates.

1682. From whom?—Representing about from 18,000 to 20,000 operatives.

1683. Operatives of various classes?—Yes.

1684. Including the colliers?—Miners, spinners, engineers, painters, shop assistants, and all classes of trades.

Mr. Diamond.

1685. Could you give the Committee any idea of how many of those operatives in Bolton deal at the co-operative stores?—A large proportion of them.

1686. What would that be?—I should think the majority of them are members of the stores.

1687. And the stores have a half-holiday?—Yes.

1688. And what closing have they during the week?—They close half an hour earlier two nights a week than other shops.

1689. And at what time do they close on Saturdays?—About an hour earlier on Saturdays.

1690. So that a very large proportion of the working-class people in Bolton do not find it impossible to do their shopping, at least on Saturdays, in an hour, and on other days half an hour less than the ordinary shopkeepers keep their business premises open?—That is so.

1691. There is one thing which a witness before the Committee a few days ago spoke about; that is, what he called the back door trade after the shops were closed. Could you say whether you think that where customers really go to a shop which is closed, and they knew beforehand will be closed at a certain time, and yet they go and get served at the back door, that is pure carelessness on their part, or whether in many cases it may not represent the actual necessity of something they may require for the family that may have have been overlooked?—There were two shops that came under our own notice a little while ago that did that kind of trade, and we have written a letter to them asking them to discontinue it, but we have had no reply.

1692. Why do you think they do that trade?—Because the customers know that they can get these things if they go round to the back door.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

1693. And you think there would be no inconvenience whatever to a great many people if it was quite impossible for them to get anything in the way of groceries or such necessaries as they might require after a certain hour at night in a town like Bolton?—No, I do not think there would be.

1694. No practical inconvenience?—No practical difficulty whatever.

Mr. EDWIN LEWIS, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1695. YOU are Secretary, I believe, to the Grocery and Provision Dealers' Assistants' Association in Liverpool?—Yes.

1696. Will you give the Committee the hours which the shops are open in Liverpool?—The hours generally are, for the first four nights in the week, from eight a.m. until 10 p.m.; on Fridays, from eight a.m. till 11 p.m.; and on Saturdays, from eight a.m. till one a.m. on Sunday morning; that is speaking generally.

1697. Is there at present any tendency in Liverpool to shorten the hours?—Yes. Since 1890 we have been doing nothing else but attempting to shorten the hours. In 1890, in order to create public sympathy, torch-light processions were formed by certain employers and continued by other principal employers, after which the association was formed and mapped out into 11 districts, consisting of three assistants and one employer, and a considerable change was made, bringing the hours down then from 10 to 7.30 p.m. for the first four nights in the week. That worked very well for some time; but new men opened here and there, and, no doubt anxious to do as much business as possible, broke through this movement, and it really became worse than before, because it was a case of one man waiting for the other to close.

1698. Then I gather that you have been endeavouring to secure earlier closing without much success?—Yes.

1699. Do you see any prospect of obtaining shorter hours by voluntary action?—No, we do not. For instance, there are difficulties in this way. In Granby-street, Liverpool, there are 15 grocers, all of whom are in favour of a 7.30 p.m. movement; but one man, a new man in the street, keeps open until 9 and 9.30 at night; and, of course, in these days of such keen competition, the others are bound to follow suit; so that it is really 9.30 to 10 p.m. in that district before they are closed. The same thing occurs in County-road, where there are 20 grocers; and in Breck-road there are 26 grocers, and it is upset by two men.

Sir Francis Powell.

1700. What part of the town is that road in?—That is the East end.

1701. In what township; can you describe the district?—It is the Everton district.

Chairman.

1702. Am I right, then, in understanding that your association does not see much prospect of obtaining a more satisfactory state of things by voluntary action?—No prospect whatever. They have distributed during the five years some 500,000 hand-bills, and spent some hundreds of pounds, but it is worse now really than it was when they started. There are just a few principal firms who keep to the movement which was first inaugurated, but they find now, I am assured, that they will have to give way.

1703. Has your association considered the Early Closing Bill generally?—Yes.

1704. I will give you an opportunity of making any suggestions as regards points afterwards; but, taken as a whole, what is the view of your association with regard to it?—They are unanimous in accepting it as it stands, with the exception that they think a clause should be inserted for compulsory Sunday closing.

1705. I understand you to say that your association are unanimously in favour of the Bill as it stands, but that they would like to see a clause extending to Sundays?—Yes, because if we got a requisition signed by two-thirds to close at 10 p.m. on Saturday night, it is just possible that in some parts they would think they could open again at five minutes past midnight, and do an hour to an hour-and-a-half's business.

1706. But probably you would not like to run the risk of losing the Bill by overloading it?—No.

1707. You would rather take the Bill as it is than do that?—Yes.

1708. Have you any minor suggestions you would wish to make on the Bill, that you would like to bring before the Committee?—No, nothing at all.

1709. Can you say anything with reference to the feeling of the shopkeepers in Liverpool; have you any information to give to the Committee upon that point as to their view?—We had a deputation with the employers on Monday last, and they are unanimous, the same as we are, in accepting the Bill, that is, speaking for the Grocers' Association.

1710. The grocers have an association of their own, the employers?—Yes.

1711. And they also are in favour of the Bill as it stands?—Yes; I believe they are going to send a witness to give evidence to that effect.

Sir Francis Powell.

1712. I might ask one question to clear the ground; I take your answers as applying to the grocery trade alone and not to other trades?—Yes.

 1713. I understand

Mr. Tennant.

1713. I understand from what you have told the right honourable Chairman that you are in favour of the Bill absolutely as it stands?—Yes, with the addition of a clause as to Sunday closing.

1714. That is to say that you do not agree with the last witness, who wished to alter the first clause so as to make it general, instead of applying to particular trades?—I do not.

1715. Might I ask whether, either you personally, or your association, think that there would be any friction or difficulty in working the details of the Bill?—I do not think so at all, not after our deputation to the employers, they are decidedly in favour of it.

1716. You speak with regard to Liverpool only, I take it?—Liverpool only.

1717. In order to apply this Bill would you find out the opinion of two-thirds of the inhabitants of Liverpool as a whole, or would you subdivide it?—I would take Liverpool as a whole.

1718. Do you think that is a matter that would be practical?—Yes, I think so.

1719. And easy?—Yes, and easy.

1720. And would you make your association responsible for finding out the will of the shopkeepers?—Yes, that would be the association's work.

1721. In the event of a dispute, supposing such a thing were to occur, as one trader disputing your figures, how would you settle that?—I should let the local athority settle the genuineness of the signatures.

1722. How would you set about doing that; would they have to go and visit the occupier of the shop?—Yes, that would be the only way.

1723. That might cost a great deal of money, you know, if it came to be a constant thing?—I do not think so; they would have an idea at least who they did suspect of being wrong, and they could go to three or four in the requisition and find out whether it was correct.

1724. In the event of money having to be spent, do you think that the local authority might impose a rate?—I do not think that would be necessary; the expense would not be so great as that.

1725. Of course that is a matter of opinion, is it not?—Yes.

1726. With regard to the fifth clause of the Bill, you would leave that as it stands. You see we are assembled here to try and make this Bill a workable Act; and certain members of the Committee have a certain amount of difficulty in working out the details of this thing, and I want to ask you, as a practical man, what suggestions you have to make, or how you would clear up these even trifling difficulties?—I should close each department and cover it up, and make it illegal to sell, whatever trade it was, and leave the others open. That is the opinion of our committee.

Mr. Lawson.

1727. Is the grocery trade, could you tell me, remarkable for its long hours in Liverpool?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

1728. It is exceptional in that respect?—I should say so.

1729. Has that a tendency to increase the size of the grocers' shops and make them on a big scale?—Not generally; it might be in one or two cases, but not generally.

1730. What is the average number of assistants employed in grocers' shops?—The average of assistants, I should think, would be three.

1731. They are none of them domestic shops, I mean shops worked by a man and his family; they are all on a larger scale than that?—Yes; of course there are small shops in the side streets worked by the man himself.

1732. Your complaint is, of course, that the shop assistants are forced to work longer hours than is good for their health or conducive to their happiness?—Yes.

1733. Do you not think it would be possible to shorten their hours by other methods than those proposed in the Bill?—I do not think there is any other way possible; not a fair way.

1734. Why should it not be done by extending the Act of 1892?—You mean the lads' Bill?

1735. I mean the Shop Hours Regulation Act, the lads' Bill, as you call it?—That would hardly be fair. For instance, a large employer, having a lot of branches, would be obliged to close those branches at a certain time, whereas a man working for himself would be able to keep his shop open.

1736. Why should he be obliged to close; he could make arrangements for the assistants not to work an excessive number of hours, could he not?—That would entail a great deal more expense.

1737. It is a matter of re-arrangement, not necessarily of expense, surely?—Yes, I think so.

1738. Say there are three assistants in a shop; you give the example of a man who has a variety of shops in different parts of the town; would it not be possible for him so to arrange the work that no man had more than would be admitted to be the fair amount of work?—Not without an additional staff.

1739. Would the loss, by his having to employ more assistants, be as great as forcing him to close earlier than the population could shop?—Yes.

1740. At what time do the working-class people in the Everton district of Liverpool leave off work?—In the Everton district there are practically very few working men; it is more down by the docks, and that way, and they leave off at half-past five.

1741. Why are shops kept open so late, then—the grocers' shops?—As long as the public will shop, the shops will keep open; but if the public knew that the shops were closing at a certain hour, they would get their purchases in before, or the next morning.

1742. By the Bill, would you deal with that district only, or with the whole town?—The whole town.

1743. Therefore, you would treat all districts as if they were on the same footing as that Everton district?—Yes.

1744. Although it is possible that the hours of labour come to an end much later in other parts of

of the city?—I think the time for leaving off work is pretty general in Liverpool, that is, from five to 5.30 p.m., which would give them plenty of time if the shops close at seven. The communications between different districts are so easy that they could get there in plenty of time.

1745. Do they leave off work as early as 5.30 in all the industries in the town?—Yes, speaking generally, with the exception of clerks, and they leave off about six o'clock.

1746. Do the other shops of other kinds keep open as late as yours?—Not the drapers.

1747. At what time do they close?—About eight o'clock.

1748. Do you believe that the effect of closing all businesses at an earlier time would prejudice the small shopkeepers?—It would, to a certain extent, no doubt; but I think it would only be fair each way, for large shopkeepers as well as small.

1749. On the whole do you not think that this Bill would be a benefit to the large shopkeepers?—No, I think it would benefit both; they would not have such long hours to work, and their health would be better.

1750. But you think the small shopkeeper would be injured to a certain extent?—Very little I should think.

1751. At the present moment I suppose he keeps open rather later than the big shops?—Yes, 1752. In the Everton district are there many small shops where a man works with his family?—Yes, there is a great deal of that.

1753. What is the feeling of that class of men?—We only visited just the main thoroughfares; in the side streets we have not got their opinion.

1754. Do you think they would be against the Bill?—No, I do not think so.

1755. Although it might lead to injuring them in their trade?—It might slightly, but not generally.

1756. What would be the feeling of the general population towards early closing, or towards the Bill by compulsion?—The feeling is in favour of the Bill.

1757. In favour of compulsion?—In favour of legislation.

1758. Has there been any expression of public opinion on the matter?—There was a meeting held of shopkeepers' assistants and the public in January of last year; there were over 5,000 there, and a resolution was passed unanimously in favour of the Bill.

1759. Was that meeting composed of assistants mainly?—No, shopkeepers' assistants and the public.

Chairman.

1760. It was called by the mayor, was it not?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1761. The clauses of the Bill were not discussed?—No.

Chairman.

1762. May I clear the point up about this meeting. It was called by the mayor, and the mayor was in the chair?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1763. And the clauses of the Bill were explained to the meeting?—Yes, generally, but not minutely.

Sir Francis Powell.

1764. Was the mayor in the chair as approving of the Bill or as chief magistrate?—As approving of the Bill.

Mr. Lawson.

1765. How do you propose to deal with mixed shops?—We could only deal, of course, with the case of grocers.

1766. I was thinking that you were going outside your own trade?—No, it is not decided to do so at present.

1767. But in the case of a shop that partly dealt with one trade and partly with another, under the compulsory provisions of this Bill how do you propose to fix the hours of closing?—Each department would close at whatever hour is agreed upon, and leave the others open.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1768. On that point, in a general shop where the things are all over the place, how would you separate the things that belonged to one class of trade from those of another?—We should trust to the employers to cover the things up and say it was illegal to sell after a certain time.

1769. But surely the different goods are all over the place?—As a rule they have the different things together of a particular trade.

Mr. Lawson.

1770. Your main object is to curtail the hours of assistants. The shopkeepers, you think, can look after themselves?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

1771. You told us of one large and apparently representative meeting in Liverpool in favour of this Bill; has there been any expression of opinion the other way in Liverpool?—No, not to my knowledge.

1772. Was that meeting followed up by a meeting expressing an opposite opinion?—No.

1773. I think you say that the meeting was unanimous. Were no amendments moved, and was there no hostile demonstration?—Nothing of the kind.

1774. What steps did you take to find out the opinion of the grocers in Liverpool for or against this Bill?—We take petitions round and get those in favour of a certain hour at night to sign. By that means we can find out which are in favour of early closing and which are not.

1775. Have you got a considerable number of shopkeepers in Liverpool pledged to your opinion?—Yes.

1776. Large as well as small, or small as well as large?—A mixture; small and large.

1777. As regards these very late hours that you describe to us, from eight a.m. to 10 p.m. and one a.m. on Sunday morning, those do not include the time that the shopkeepers may be employed in the shops before the shutters are taken down or after they are put up, I suppose?—That —That is the time when the shutters are put up, speaking generally, in Liverpool.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

1778. You mean that the shops open at 8 a.m., but that before eight the shopkeepers may be employed for some time in the shop arranging the goods?—It is quite possible; but the assistants would not get there till eight o'clock.

1779. What are your main reasons for desiring this legislation?—The health of the assistants.

1780. You think that the health of the assistants suffers from these long hours?—I do.

1781. What do you think interferes with the health of the assistants; is it the bad air?—The confinement for such long hours.

1782. Is it the standing, or the bad air that they breathe?—I think it is the bad air more than anything else.

Chairman.

1783. A combination, probably, of all?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

1784. I suppose in the grocery trade few women are employed; they are nearly all men?—They are nearly all men. There are just a few cashiers.

1785. What is the general standard of health, if we may put it so, of shop assistants in Liverpool, as compared with that of other sections of the community?—I do not quite catch that.

1786. Are the shop assistants of Liverpool more or less healthy than people who are not shop assistants?—I know nothing definite on that point; but I think shop assistants suffer more than anybody who is outside all the day long.

1787. Is that a general impression, or the result of any kind of evidence?—Just a general impression.

1788. It is an abstract idea that long hours and bad air ought to be bad for people?—Yes.

1789. But is it bad for people?—We have no definite proof on that point.

1790. You see a good many of them, I suppose?—Yes.

1791. Have they made complaint to you personally?—Yes, they have made complaints to me personally of the long hours, of their being always confined indoors, and having no time for recreation.

1792. Would you think, from looking at them, that they are less healthy in appearance than people differently employed?—Yes, they are much paler in appearance than people who are employed outside.

Mr. Diamond.

1793. You heard the evidence of the gentleman from Bolton?—Yes.

1794. Did it not strike you that there was a very remarkable contrast between the hours of opening the shops in Liverpool and the hours that prevailed in Bolton?—Yes; Bolton is a much more compact town, and they can work better in Bolton than in Liverpool.

1795. What is your explanation of the fact that in Liverpool you have so much longer hours,

Mr. Diamond—continued.

1 a.m. on Sunday morning instead of 10 on Saturday night?—The general opinion in Liverpool is that there is a certain class of men that get their wages in the afternoon, and go to the public-house, and they are there until late at night, and the tradesmen get only what money is left.

1796. Do you think that such a class of men as you refer to would not be found in Bolton; that go the public-house on Saturday night when they get their wages?—Possibly so.

1797. Do you think that the different class of work that prevails in Liverpool, and the fact that you have a shifting population, a large dock labour population and people dependent upon the shipping, which necessarily causes a greater irregularity in the working hours, and an irregularity in paying wages, has something to do with it?—Yes, that, no doubt, has something to do with it. People in Bolton, I should think, would be employed regularly at Bolton.

1798. In mines and workshops with regular hours?—Yes.

1799. I should like to know this from you: do you think that, if all the shops were open, say, nine hours a day in Liverpool, they would do as much business in the week as is done now; that is to say, would the effect of reducing the hours of shops being open tend to curtail trade at all?—No; people would know at what time the shops closed, and they would purchase before they closed.

1800. Do you think that would have no effect in diminishing the consumption of goods?—Not at all.

1801. Do you think that people would lay in everything in proper time?—They would get it before they closed.

1802. Keeping in view the fact that this Bill opens up, as it does, a new principle in regard to trading, namely, by compelling a man to close his place, which is entirely different from the legislation carried out by the Factories Act, where the tendency was to curtail the hours of labour, and not to close the place entirely, have you considered whether or not the principle of the present Shop Hours Act, if applied to all classes of people engaged in shops, would not benefit the assistants?—I do not think it would. As I said before, a man who works for himself would be allowed to keep open, and other large employers would have to close or go to a large amount of expense for extra assistants.

1803. But you do not think there would be any hardship in telling a man who had a shop that he must close it at a certain hour, and must not even work in it himself beyond that hour?—I do not think there would be any hardship at all; it would be just as well for him as for the assistants, because he would work shorter hours himself, and if everybody closed people would make their purchases earlier.

1804. You have already said that you think there would be no inconvenience?—Not at all.

1805. Now this Bill embodies two principles; it is voluntary up to a certain point, and then it becomes of a penal character. Do you think that if once tradesmen find out that they are subjecting themselves to certain penalties in the event event of remaining open, that will not militate against their being in favour of closing in the first instance?—I do not think so. So far as Liverpool is concerned, they are in favour of closing; they think it is better for them to close.

1806. The penalties proposed in the Bill you think adequate for that purpose?—Yes.

1807. You would not be in favour, as one witness was, of making it for the third offence three months' imprisonment?—No, I should consider that a hardship.

1808. You think that would really have the effect of preventing people being in favour of putting the Act into operation?—No doubt.

1809. In regard to the inspection to see that the shops really are closed, and that work is not going on inside, would you be in favour of that work being handed over to a policeman, or to a shop inspector?—I think the fairest plan would be for another man of the same trade to notify that a certain party over the road is keeping open, to a policeman, and let him deal with it.

1810. How would you allow a policeman to deal with it; would you allow a policeman to enter a shop, knock at the door, and demand admittance in order to see whether work is going on?—Yes, I should think that that would be the fairest plan.

1811. I only wanted to know, because you will be aware that the British public does not quite like policemen prying into its private affairs and going into places of business. Do you not think that tradesmen generally would object to policemen demanding admittance, and going through their premises to see whether people were at work?—I do not think so; I think they would be more in favour of a policeman than of occasional inspectors.

1812. Do you think they would be more in favour of a policeman than of a regularly qualified shop inspector?—Yes, if it was pointed out, as I say, by another member of the trade.

1813. You would leave it to one tradesman to inform against another?—To point out that another was breaking the law, and let the policeman deal with it.

1814. You think that would be found to operate sufficiently; that if any tradesman saw another breaking the law he would direct attention to it?—Yes.

1815. And that you would thus be able to deal with those inclined to break the law effectually?—Yes; and policemen are so numerous that they would have a better opportunity than the inspector would, who would really only go into the district occasionally.

1816. Has it occurred to you in a large town like Liverpool what hours you would be inclined to fix as a reasonable hour for closing on a Saturday night?—Ten o'clock.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1817. Do you speak on behalf of the grocers only?—The grocers' assistants.

1818. You stated just now that shops in Liverpool open at eight o'clock on four days in the week and close at 10; at eight o'clock on Fridays and close at 11; and at eight o'clock on Saturdays, and do not close till one on Sunday mornings?—That is the general rule all round.

1819. For all the shops?—There are some shops in the centre of the town, of course, that close earlier; the average all round would be about 81 hours.

1820. Let me just follow that. Have you any worse cases than those?—No, those are the worst.

1821. But surely you have got many that are very much better?—Yes, in the centre of the town.

1822. Do you mean to say that butchers and bakers, and drapers, all keep their shops open as late?—In the case of butchers and bakers; I would not say with drapers.

1823. Nor ironmongers?—No.

1824. Ironmongers do not?—No.

1825. Then, about off-license grocers, surely they are not allowed to be open until one on Sunday morning?—No.

1826. What time do your public-houses close?—At 11 o'clock.

1827. Do you mean to say that all these small shops are open until one on Sunday morning?—Yes, in certain parts of Liverpool.

1828. Would you say all the shops?—No.

1829. There are few shops, I presume, that keep such late hours?—Yes, in certain parts of Liverpool and the surrounding districts.

1830. But not generally?—No.

1831. There are a few?—A good many, in fact.

1832. A good many in the total; but these are the worst cases?—Yes, a few in each district.

1833. But others close earlier?—Yes; they do not close much before 12, though, the whole of them.

1834. But I have been through Liverpool and have not noticed it?—That was in the centre of the town perhaps.

1835. No, in the outlying districts. Did you say just now, that as regards Clause 5, that you do not agree with that clause in the Bill?—Yes, we agree to that.

1836. I thought you told one of the Members of the Committee just now that you did not?—Applying it to each department, I should say.

1837. That Clause 5 says, that if a shop is to be closed for the purpose of one trade it is to be closed for all. You do not agree with that?—No, I should close the department.

1838. You mean that certain things should not be sold in a shop, because some other shop that sells those things is closed?—Yes.

1839. Surely you must see in small shops the great difficulty that would exist in dividing the things in those small shops into different departments?—There would be a certain amount of difficulty, but so long as the shopkeeper knows it is illegal to sell an article, I think he should not do it.

1840. Are you not aware of the fact that trades run one into another?—Yes.

1841. Are there not many things, for instance, that you buy at the draper's, as the drapery business is done now, that you also buy at the grocer's?—Very little drapery.

Sir Blundell Maple—continued.

1842. Such things as brushes?—That would come in more in the tallow chandler's.

1843. But grocers sell them in small shops?—Yes.

1844. How is the small shop going to separate the departments and cover them up?—In the case of the grocer you could.

1845. But you find all those things in the window, do you not?—Yes; it would be difficult to cover them up in the window; but inside the place, for their own convenience they would have each of the different things together, I should think.

1846. As regards this Bill, have you thoroughly studied it?—Yes.

1847. Do you think that shopkeepers generally are going to approve of this Bill?—So far as Liverpool is concerned, they are going to do so.

1848. You do not think shopkeepers would be diffident about signing, because the Bill cannot be put into operation, as you are aware, unless there are two-thirds of the shopkeepers in a particular class signing in favour of it?—No.

1849. Do you think there would be no difficulty in that?—I think there would be none at all so far as the grocery trade is concerned.

1850. But I am asking you of all other trades?—I cannot speak of other trades; my information is from the grocery and provision dealers alone.

1851. And you think they would agree to close at a certain hour?—Yes.

1852. And you think also that they would agree to close at an earlier hour than 10 at night?—The hours, I think, would be something like seven for the first four nights, eight to 8.30 on Friday, and 10 on Saturday.

1853. And you welcome this Bill as being a great safeguard to shop assistants?—Yes.

1854. But supposing the Shop Hours' Regulation Act were to be made to apply to male and female labour, would not that, if it limited the hours in the week for all assistants to that number be satisfactory?—I do not think that would work satisfactorily.

1855. Why not?—The men that work themselves would work in the shops and keep them open, while other large employers, I said, for instance, Mr. Pegram, who has 61 shops in Liverpool, would have to close.

1856. At what time does he close?—At 7.30.

1857. He does now?—Yes.

1858. Then he would not be affected by this Bill?—If it was seven o'clock he would.

1859. But only to the extent of that half-hour?—Yes.

1860. This Bill, I suppose you recognise, would only touch the small people, who are now the late closers; it would not touch the big people, would it?—There are several of the big people who are against closing, but the majority are in favour of it.

1861. But no big people now, no big shops now, are open so late, are they?—Not the first four nights in the week.

1862. And the other nights in the week, those who are open so late as the smaller shopkeepers would agree with the two-thirds to close them earlier than they now close?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple—continued.

1863. There would be no opposition, would there?—There would be no opposition, I think.

1864. I want to understand this point; the large shopkeepers now close, or most of them, the generality, close much earlier than the small shopkeepers?—Yes.

1865. If the small shopkeepers came down to earlier closing they would not come by any concerted action to such an early closing as now exists with the large shops, would they?—They would agree with the large shops then.

1866. But the large shops would not be affected, I contend, by this particular protection?—They would in the case of Fridays and Saturdays.

1867. You think the large shops would be made to close earlier by the small shops than they now close?—No, because they close pretty early now, the majority of them.

1868. That is what I say, the large shops by this Bill, who signed a requisition to close earlier, would not be affected, but the shops that would be made to close earlier would be the small shops, not the large shops?—But we should have to get a good deal more than we have at the present time to sign the requisition.

1869. But the large shops would not be made to close any earlier, because they now close earlier than the small shops?—They close from 7.30 to eight; but if the Bill arranged to close at seven they would be affected.

1870. But would you get all the small shops to agree to close at seven?—That is doubtful, of course.

1871. Then the result is, as I put it before you, that if this Bill becomes law the large shops would be able to assist in making the small shops close, while they themselves would have no chance of being affected by the action of the small shops?—Then they would have the action of revoking the order if they were over one-third in a majority.

Chairman.

1872. Should you have any doubt as to the Liverpool Corporation carrying out the wish of the tradespeople, if it was signified under this Bill?—I do not think so. I have no doubt at all.

1873. And as regards Clause 5, I think I understood you to say that you did not anticipate any practical difficulty in carrying it out?—No.

1874. I believe I am right in saying, am I not, that there is a well organised association of master grocers in Liverpool?—Yes.

1875. Do you know what the view of that association is, whether it is in favour of legislation?—Wholly in favour of legislation.

1876. And of this Bill?—Yes. We considered this Bill with them last Monday in a deputation from the assistants to the masters.

1877. And they were quite in favour of this Bill?—Quite.

Tuesday, 2nd April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Diamond.	Sir Blundell Maple.
Mr. Edwards.	Sir Francis Powell.
Sir John Gorst.	Mr. Samuel Smith.
Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.	Mr. Tennant.
Sir John Lubbock.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, F.R.S., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. BRYCE GRANT, called in; and Examined.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1878. IN what trade are you engaged?—That of a draper.

1879. Where?—At Penge.

1880. Will you kindly tell the Committee how many years you have been in business at Penge?—Twenty-five years.

1881. And previous to that?—I was at Penge, and in business also in partnership at Forest Hill.

1882. And previous to that?—In the West End, at Marshall and Snelgrove's.

1883. And you have taken a prominent part since then, and while you were in that firm, in trying to get shops closed at an earlier hour?—Yes. I represented that firm in the Early Closing Association for some years; and I was a member and assistant-secretary of the committee that brought about the earlier closing in the West End.

1884. And you still would like to see much earlier closing of shops?—Yes; I think it is very desirable that it should be so.

1885. You also took a very active part, I believe, in the old Early Closing Association; you occupied a position there, did you not?—Yes; I became a member of the Board of Management, and afterwards vice-chairman of that association; that was during the time it was at 100, Fleet-street.

1886. And up to the present time the whole of the early closing that takes place in the country throughout the length and breadth of the land is all voluntary early closing?—I believe so; I know of no instance in any town except of voluntary effort.

1887. Even the holidays, which are bank holidays, namely, the day after Christmas Day, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and the first Monday in August, in London, have been entirely conceded by shopkeepers?—Yes; I consider that one of the finest examples of voluntaryism that we have ever seen in this country or in any other country.

1888. There is no Act of Parliament which compels the shopkeepers to close on those days?—None whatever.

1889. You are still in favour of voluntary action?—I am still in favour of voluntary action.

1890. Do you find the customers and the public more alive generally every year to the benefit of early closing?—Yes; everyone takes a deeper interest in it than they used to do, the public, the shopkeepers, ministers, doctors, and all classes of professional men.

1891. Do shop assistants, within your knowledge, work shorter hours now than when you first commenced work in London?—Decidedly so; there can be no question about the shorter hours in the larger shops, and in a great proportion of the smaller shops. The shop assistants work shorter hours than they did when I came to London first, and, indeed, when I commenced business 25 years ago.

1892. Do you consider the occupation of a shop assistant very unhealthy?—Not necessarily so; on the contrary, I have taken the trouble since this Committee began its sittings to write to our doctors, to find out from the medical men connected with our association how many cases they have dealt with during the time they have been our medical officers. Seven of these gentlemen have replied, and one lady doctor, which makes eight, and they all say (those that have had cases at all) that they are happy to state that they do not think they can attribute the suffering to excessive working in shops, or say that there has been any illness caused by shop labour. I shall be very pleased to hand these replies to any of the Committee. They are the replies of seven representative medical men and one lady.

1893. I suppose you do not contend that there are no people of weak constitution who suffer from the working in shops?—A weakly constitution would break down, of course, in any employment.

1894. But especially indoors?—Yes, especially indoors. Of course, I find that many young ladies are sent to the drapery trade because they are not robust, and there the labour is not excessive. It is rather tedious, but it is not excessive; and at times there is practically no labour at all. If you put a young person in a workroom to sew at a machine, and she uses that machine, that is a continual period of labour; but in a shop there are hours during the day when an assistant practically does little or nothing; the pinch comes, we will say, a little in the morning, and frequently in the evening, after tea.

1895. Young women in shops are treated now with a great deal more consideration than they used to be, are they not?—Yes; I think in the majority of shops they are treated with every consideration, and that a very much better feeling exists between their employers and themselves than used to do.

1896. In 1890, I believe, you were one of the gentlemen who left the old Early Closing Association, and started a Voluntary Early Closing Association?—That is so.

1897. You did so, believing that this early closing could better be done by voluntary action than by legislation?—That is one of the reasons for which I left; of course, there were other reasons.

1898. What other reasons?—Well, the society had commenced to prosecute people, indeed, they were endeavouring to carry out the Act of Parliament by which children and young people should not be employed in shops beyond a certain hour, and I thought a society receiving money for a benevolent purpose had no right to enter into a course like that, and prosecute on its own account. I believe that that view is probably entertained by the society itself now.

1899. Your experience caused you to think that voluntary action is still better than compulsion?—I still think so.

1900. I suppose by that you mean, that if any legislative interference occurred it might make bad blood between the employée and the master?—Yes; I think that for one thing; and I think the tendency of it would be to more and more apply the Factory Acts to shops.

1901. The Shop Hours Regulation Act, you mean?—Yes, that is to say, the principle of paying an assistant by the hour or by the day would be probably adopted in the long run, and the young people would therefore lose the many advantages which they already possess, like weekly holidays, and half-holidays, and holidays in the summer, and bank holidays; those would be deducted from their wages, and in that case the shop assistants would only be paid for the hours they actually worked. I think if legislation were adopted that would be the end of it; it would come to something like that.

1902. Then, in your experience, great improvement has been made in London in the early closing of shops?—There is no doubt whatever about that, not the slightest doubt.

1903. And especially as regards the weekly half-holidays?—As regards the weekly half-holidays, and that has been a thing that our society has worked more upon lately than any other.

1904. The voluntary early closing?—The voluntary early closing; and it is owing to the express wish of many of their subscribers that they seek, if possible, to get the weekly half-holiday. They find the half-holiday in the week to be of great use to them in many ways.

1905. Am I right in saying that 15 or 20 years ago very few of the smaller shops had weekly half-holidays?—Practically none.

1906. Can you give the Committee any information respecting the half-holiday now existing in all parts of Great Britain?—I refer the Committee to a book that I saw the other day and that I have here. This book is a guide, I believe, to the commercial traveller, and I find in this book there are recorded something like 952 towns which are already closing earlier throughout the country than they used to.

1907. Will you put that in?—Yes, I will put that in (the Witness handed in the book).

1908. This is a book not issued by the Early Closing Association?—No, it is not issued by us.

1909. I see it is issued by the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association?—Yes.

1910. It sets forth the early closing day and the market days?—It is for the guidance of commercial travellers, so that they may not go to a town that is closing on the day that they are advised.

1911. I see here by this that there are 952 towns and districts in England, Scotland, and Wales that close earlier than formerly?—That is so.

1912. That is to say, towns that have the half-holidays?—Yes, towns that have the benefit of the half-holiday during the week.

1913. And all that has been entirely got by this voluntary action?—It is voluntary on their part, certainly.

1914. It has been said that the earlier closing of shops on five days of the week is not making the same progress that it did; is that because shops now generally close as early as they can, having regard to suiting the convenience of the public and the requirements of their business?—Yes, I think there is some truth in that; and I think a good deal of it occurs through the fact that during the time we have been in existence, the attention of our association has been directed more to getting the half-holiday on one day of the week than to the shortening of hours during every day of the week; when that is more established, particularly in London, we shall be able to turn our attention to the shortening of the hours during the week; of course, there are places where that is much needed.

1915. In the large towns, among the shopkeepers who supply private and professional people, the closing is much earlier, is it not, than amongst the smaller shopkeepers, in the same neighbourhood that supply the working classes?—Yes; the working classes are, I think, to a great extent responsible for the present time that shops close. The labourer works in a distant part of London, and comes back to his tea, we will say, at six o'clock or half-past six, then the wife puts the children to bed, and it is generally seven or half-past seven before she is either able or prepared to go out and do her shopping. The consequence is that she must find places where she can make her little purchases after that hour, and that I think must affect thousands and thousands of workmen in the Metropolis and in all large towns.

1916. Do you think it is really necessary for the working classes themselves that they should have some late shopping?—I believe it to be absolutely necessary that they should, under the present system; the way under which they conduct their present habits, certainly. How can a woman leave her children alone? She has no nurse, she has no servant.

1917. Naturally, until the children go to sleep at night, you mean?—Until the children go to sleep at night.

1918. Then the parents go and do their shopping?—Then the working men take charge of the dwelling, and the wife is able to go out to make her purchases; it is the only time she has to do it.

1919. It is not necessary, however, to keep open until 12 o'clock at night?—Certainly not.

1920. You think it is possible to bring the earlier closing down to perhaps 10 o'clock at night?—Yes, I think even earlier than that; I think nine o'clock would be an hour that might be very extensively and generally adopted.

1921. That, I suppose, is growing in certain parts?—In most of the working parts of London. Of course I am speaking more particularly for London. I know more of London than I do of the country towns.

1922. You have thoroughly studied and examined the Bill now before the Committee, have you not?—Yes, as far as my ability will allow me.

1923. Have you ever heard of any public meetings being held at which that Bill has been discussed?—I have never heard of one; I do not believe it has been submitted to a public meeting in London.

1924. Are the trade organs such as "The Grocer," "The Grocers' Journal," "The Drapers' Record," and others, favourable to this legislation?—The majority of them seem to me to be dead against it, and a good many of the daily papers.

1925. As regards this Bill, do you recognise that one of the principal difficulties of carrying out that Bill would be to define the districts?—It would be an extremely difficult thing to define the districts in London, particularly if the authority was given to the various district boards of works and to the vestries, because in that case their boundaries would frequently overlap each other; and in many instances one parish runs down one side of a street, and another parish runs down the other side of the street; the parish on the right-hand side might decide to close at two o'clock on the Wednesday, and the parish on the left-hand side might decide to close at two o'clock on the Thursday; so you would have the extraordinary condition of a street one-half closed and the other half open; and that would apply to not one, but to dozens of districts in the Metropolis.

1926. And another very important difficulty, I believe, is the classification of shops, is it not?—Yes, that would be a very important difficulty.

1927. How could you, or any authority, arrive at what "a shop" was?—It would be an extremely difficult thing to arrive at it, unless a large number of inspectors were kept to canvass and see what the premises really were, and to take down the statement of the occupiers as to what they intended to conduct their trade upon; that is to say, if a butcher cooked and sold hot meats (boiled pork, and that kind of thing), he would have to say whether he would become a "refreshment house" or a "butcher's shop." If he declared himself to be a butcher, as a matter of fact, he would give up the cooked meat business; and if he kept to the cooked meat, he would have to give up his butcher's business.

1928. And in the drapery trades as now carried on, in nearly all towns the drapers sell all sorts of different things, do they not?—Yes, not only drapers, but such places as the Civil Service or the Army and Navy Stores. Suppose, for example, that the ironmongers in Westminster decided to close their shops on Mondays, then, I suppose, they would require the Army and Navy Stores to close their ironmongery department. Then, the bootmakers, and others, might decide for Tuesday, and the drapers might decide for Wednesday, and the grocers might go for Thursday; there is nothing in the Bill to prevent them taking a course like that, so that we should have in some neighbourhoods, if they were allowed to act upon this Bill, this condition of affairs: that some shops would be closed at two o'clock every day in the week in some neighbourhoods; and I consider the public would be very seriously inconvenienced.

1929. Do you recognise that there would be a great deal of difficulty in arriving at what number would be the two-thirds of any tradespeople in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

1930. Of any particular class; because the Bill provides that if two-thirds, for instance, of the grocers in a district wish to close at two o'clock on Thursdays they shall be able to compel the one-third to close?—Yes.

1931. The Bill does not provide how that is to be arrived at at all?—Well, I think in the first instance it would be necessary to get the names down in a book. They would have to be scheduled in some way or other in order that the local authority might find for their own information whether the people voting were really qualified to vote. Then on the question of signing a voting paper, that is a system now, I think, that is entirely a thing of the past; all public bodies now recognise no other voting than voting at the poll in the usual way (I do not think any other fair system of voting can possibly be maintained in the present day), and that would lead, I think, to very great expense. It would be extremely difficult to get at the names of the people; it would require a large staff of inspectors.

1932. This Bill applies, does it not, to street stall-holders (costermongers) as well as to shopkeepers?—Yes, I believe it does.

1933. Do you see any difficulty about their being included?—Well, they are a class of people that it is always very undesirable to interfere with if it can possibly be avoided. All local authorities are troubled more or less with the costermonger question. In many places they have a recognised position in the street, and they are not interfered with. So long as there is a certain width between their barrows, they are allowed to congregate and carry on their business in the street, and the local authority does not interfere with them. Of course it would not be fair to close the small shops, and allow the costers in those streets to carry on the very businesses that had been closed by the operation of this Bill; and therefore, I suppose, they would have to be swept away.

1934. How would you arrive at the costermongers' votes; they can go from one place to another; supposing London was divided, say, into little districts, they could go from one side of a street to another side of the street, and be in a different district?—Yes; and they very seldom give their correct addresses; it would be an extremely difficult matter to trace them from one street to another, or from one address to another.

1935. They would hardly have an address in the street, would they?—The inspector, or constable, would ask for their name and address, and take that down in his note-book.

1936. They are to be included in the number of shopkeepers in any district?—Yes, by the Bill; and I say it would be an exceedingly difficult thing to deal with that class.

Chairman.

1937. You understand, do you not, that it does not apply to the costermonger with a moving barrow?—No.

1938. You are using the term "costermonger" as a stall-holder, are you not?—No; as in the case of Peckham, for instance, they have a sort of recognised right; the only distinction being the distance between each barrow.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1939. I believe shop assistants prefer to have, if they can, a Saturday half-holiday, do they not?—Yes; that would be the best day of the week, if it were practicable, certainly.

1940. But the small shops cannot close on the Saturday, can they?—It is impossible for the shopkeepers; that is the best day of the week for them; and the wages in London are still nearly all paid (or a great majority of the wages in London are still paid) on the Saturday.

1941. For instance, take a neighbourhood you know very well, Marshall and Snelgrove's; I suppose just round about Marshall and Snelgrove's there would be ten times as many small drapers as large ones?—Yes: and, as a matter of fact, there is a poor neighbourhood (James-street, for instance, Marylebone-lane, and High-street, Marylebone), within a stone's throw of Marshall and Snelgrove's, where there are extremely late shoppers.

1942. And by this Bill, if a two-thirds majority of the small shopkeepers there decided to have a Thursday half-holiday, they would be able to compel Marshall and Snelgrove's to close on the Thursday?—That would appear to me to be the working of the Bill as at present proposed.

1943. Is there anything else you would like to tell the Committee?—There is nothing else, except to say, that, so far as our society is concerned, we are continually hearing of fresh departures in the way of closing earlier by voluntary arrangement; for instance, there is the name of a firm just handed to me, Hunt, of Newington Causeway; we have expended a good deal of time upon that firm (and I believe the other association have done what they could) to induce them to close earlier, and now they are going to close at five o'clock on the Thursday; they have just sent in an intimation that they will do that on their own account.

1944. Then all the shops round will follow suit?—It is very likely that as this firm kept several shops from closing, others will follow suit.

1945. Do you consider that by voluntary action you are more likely to arrive at early closing than by asking shopkeepers to contract themselves into this Act?—I think so. I should like to say that if this Act was put into operation in a district by reason of the two-thirds majority, and then it was discovered in 12 months that there was a vote to be taken, and that the vote taken was against it, and consequently the movement became lost, it would plunge shopkeepers into a regular muddle; and I believe the state of early closing after that would be far worse than it was before the operation of the Bill commenced, because the shopkeeper would say: "I will have nothing more to do with early closing; you have tried to compel me to do a thing against my will, and now the thing has fallen through"; and then he would be left to his own resources, and I believe it would be a very dangerous thing, indeed, to attempt.

1946. A witness here the other day proposed for the first offence substituting for a fine of 5*s.* 5*l.*, or 14 days' imprisonment: do you think that such action as that would prevent any shopkeeper from contracting himself into this Bill?—Yes, I should think it would decidedly; I do not know why we should be subjected to 14 days' imprisonment. I do not myself attach any very great importance to the amount of the fine; I think if a shopkeeper under the Act was brought up before any magistrate and fined, if it was only 6*d.* or 1*s.*, the exposure would be quite as much as if he had to pay 5*l.* or 10*l.*—quite as much. I do not myself attach any very great importance to it, but I think it would be the first time I heard of a shopkeeper being imprisoned for not closing his shop. That is quite a new principle to introduce.

1947. Now, as regards your Voluntary Early Closing Association; you have been working in the south of London?—Yes, we started first in South London, and called ourselves the "South London Early Closing Association," and then Hampstead and other places desired to join us, and we took the offices at 64, Cheapside, and called ourselves the "Voluntary Early Closing Association"; that was about two years ago.

1948. And you have branches, have you not?—We have several branches, one at Deptford.

1949. And Kilburn?—And Kilburn, and Hampstead.

1950. But they are separate organisations started on the voluntary system?—Yes, on the voluntary voluntary principle; on their own account, really.

1951. And in other parts of England the same thing is going on?—Yes. We confine our operations more to London than we do to the country.

1952. Supposing that this Bill became law, you still consider that it would be very difficult indeed to get a large majority of shopkeepers in any district to sign in favour of compelling the minority to close?—Yes, I think it would be extremely difficult; and there seems to me to be a total absence of assent; in fact, the shopkeepers I have had an opportunity of speaking to express their dislike to the Bill, and think it is not necessary.

1953. And you think that if the Bill was passed it would make a lot of bad blood, bad feeling?—Well, I think it would. It would cause a very heated discussion in every neighbourhood in which it was to be put into operation.

1954. In which it was attempted to be put into operation?—Yes; between tradesmen and contending parties. There would always be a fight in every district.

1955. And the good feeling which at present exists between employers and their shop assistants would be strained?—Yes; and I think the good feeling existing among themselves would be, perhaps, more in jeopardy than even the good feeling between the employers and the assistants.

1956. And, having thought the subject thoroughly out, you are of opinion that voluntary early closing is more likely to bring about the earlier closing of shops than using this particular Act of compulsion?—I think so. That is my opinion.

1957. Supposing the Committee and the House of Commons considered it necessary to enforce less hours in shops, do not you think it would be much better to extend the Shop Hours Regulation Act; you know the Shop Hours Regulation Act, do you not?—Yes, I favour that. I also think that a great deal of good could be done if the shopkeepers at times would let their assistants out for a short time during the day; give them time to do any little shopping that they may want to do on their own account. I think that would be a very good movement, and a step in the right direction.

1958. That would be got by limiting the hours of shop assistants to so many per week, even if the shop was open longer hours?—Yes, it could be got in that way. Assistants sometimes want a little indulgence in that way, I think. They have certain things to do; they have to buy new things; and it is better to buy them in the daylight than in the dark; or they may want to go to a doctor or to a dentist at a distance, or anything like that. I think shopkeepers would be acting wisely if they gave their assistants a little time during the day like that.

1959. And that could all be got by limiting the hours in shops?—Yes, it could be got by limiting the hours in shops per week, or it could be got by voluntary disposition on the part of the shopkeeper.

1960. But if it is considered necessary to bring about legislation to get early closing in shops, would that be got by limiting the hours of work per week?—Yes, it would be got in that way.

Mr. Diamond.

1961. You have stated that there are many hours during the day when there is little doing?—Yes.

1962. Is it your experience that in shops employing a large number of assistants the assistants are permitted to loiter or to be idle at any time in the shops?—Not to "loiter," but they are not actively serving a customer; they would be probably attending to their stock, and if that stock was finished and straight, they would have nothing further to do but wait until the next customer came.

1963. That is to say, when they would not be serving a customer they would be busy putting their stock right?—Yes; after it is done, and they would not be much employed.

1964. Now, would a shopwalker permit any assistant to stand at the counter waiting for the next customer to come in; would he not, as a matter of fact, say: You must find work to do?—Of course, he would have to find work to do; but if work was not forthcoming the assistants could not work.

1965. When could you say that the moment had arrived in a large shop when there was really nothing that the assistants could find to do, to put the stock right, to re-fold goods, is it not constantly done; and is it not the fact that they have to clear out the shelves and go on with the work?—Certainly; I said that that was not laborious; that it was rather tedious than laborious.

1966. Your statement was, that there are hours when there is nothing doing, or little doing?—Certainly there is, in every shop.

1967. But you contradict yourself, I think, when you say you meant there were hours when customers were not being served; but that when they were not busy serving, the assistants were busy doing something else, preparing for customers or clearing away the goods shown to the last customer?—Yes, I admit that in large shops the assistants are more under the control of what is called a shopwalker; but that does not extend to a large class of shops that I am familiar with, that have no shopwalker at all.

1968. I understood you to speak of having experience at Shoolbred's?—No, Marshall and Snelgrove's.

1969. Would not you call that a large shop?—Yes, I would.

1970. Then your experience would show that the statement I have made would apply to that shop, at any rate?—No; I have seen the assistants stand with literally nothing to do for many hours at Marshall and Snelgrove's; probably they are at this moment.

1971. I cannot controvert that experience of yours; but when you say that the shopwalker insists upon the assistants finding something to do, it is rather at variance with the other statement, that for hours the assistants would be standing with nothing whatever to do; is that a usual thing in a place like Marshall and Snelgrove's?—I do not say it is usual, but it frequently occurs, I should think. I do not contend that in what are called busy shops that kind of thing does exist.

1972. You say you left the association with which you were connected, because it tried to carry out the Act of Parliament for shortening the hours of children in shops?—Yes, young persons; children and young persons.

1973. Do you think that Act of Parliament was at all justified when it was passed?—Certainly; I think it was a good Act of Parliament to a certain extent.

1974. But that to endeavour to carry it out was not a desirable thing?—That it was not the province of that association to do it. I think to carry it out and put it into effect is desirable, but not by the Early Closing Association, who receive the subscriptions for promoting early closing. I make that distinction.

1975. They receive the subscriptions for promoting early closing?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

1976. Not for prosecuting?—Not for prosecuting.

Mr. Diamond.

1977. You thought it was not any part of their duty to endeavour to carry out an Act of Parliament, at present in existence, for shortening the hours of young people and children?—No, I did not think that it was; I did not agree with the policy, at all events, and that is one of the reasons why I left it.

1978. Now the half-holiday, we see from this book, is adopted very largely over the country; how far does it prevail in London?—Well, it prevails in London in a large district, in South London; that is to say, some day in the week, either Wednesday, or Thursday, and Saturday; there are really three early closing days in London, that is Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

1979. At present you find there are three days for early closing?—Yes.

1980. Voluntarily adopted by the shopkeepers?—Voluntarily adopted by the shopkeepers, yes.

1981. Does that cause any inconvenience?—I think not. Of course, it would be more convenient if one day in the week could be arrived at, that is to say, that it should be either the Wednesday or the Thursday, for the reason that it is so inconvenient or difficult for commercial men, and business houses, to know how to make their arrangements. It would be much more convenient, and become more permanent, I think, if one day could be arrived at, either the Wednesday or the Thursday.

1982. We were endeavouring to find out how far it affected the convenience of the public who wanted to make their purchases. I suppose the large warehouses will be able to arrange the journeys of their travellers in such a way that no time will be lost. You do not think the adoption of these three different days in different districts causes any inconvenience to the purchasing public at present?—I do not think it causes any large amount of inconvenience; but it does cause an amount of inconvenience, because a person that has been living in a Wednesday closing neighbourhood may change their residence and go to a Thursday closing neighbourhood, and find that the Thursday does not quite meet with their convenience. It is just that kind of little petty inconveniences that would arise through that.

1983. Little petty inconveniences?—Yes.

1984. It was put to you by an honourable Member that the difficulty in regard to areas would be very great, and you said it might be found that one side of a street would be closed on a Wednesday and the other on a Thursday. Do you think that that would really be a grave or a serious inconvenience to have one tradesman on one side of the street closing one day, and another tradesman on the other side of the street closing on another day. Whom would it inconvenience seriously?—Well, I think it would be a very great inconvenience for the people who wanted to shop in that street, and that that would be introducing a very novel principle.

1985. How would it be an inconvenience if the grocer on one side of the street happened to be open, and the grocer on the other side happened to be closed; who would be inconvenienced thereby if the grocers did this to suit their own purposes?—The grocer may possibly have a grocer's shop on both sides of the street; one firm may have it.

1986. Then, you would have one shop open on a Wednesday, and the other on a Thursday?—Then, his neighbour would be closed opposite him, and he would be open.

1987. One would be open on the Wednesday and closed on the Thursday, and vice versâ; both at the end of the week would have had a half-holiday; would there be a grave disadvantage to anyone in that?—I think it would be hardly fair to both sides of the street.

1988. They would not be symmetrical, I suppose?—Not only that, but I think it would lead to undoubtedly bad feeling on each side of the street.

1989. Why should it lead to bad feeling?—I do not think it is pleasant for anyone to see their business being transacted by someone else; I think they ought to be both open or closed on the opposite sides of the street, whether it is on a Wednesday or a Thursday.

1990. If the one man is open on the Wednesday and the other man closed, and then the reverse takes place on the next day, will not the thing balance itself; the one will get the trade on Wednesday, and the other will have the trade on the Thursday; how will they be seriously disadvantaged thereby?—Speaking as a shopkeeper, I think it would be, first of all, quite a novelty to begin with; a thing I never heard of before; and, secondly, I think it would create a great deal of bad feeling between the shopkeepers on each side of the street.

1991. You have never heard of some shops being closed in a street, and of others being open?—But I have never seen a whole side of a street closed and another open, which this Bill proposes.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

1992. What would be the practical difference between some shops being closed in one street and some open, and having shops open on one side and closed on the other; is there really any practical difference?—I have said it would create a great deal of bad feeling, unquestionably.

1993. I know you have said that; but I asked you if you could point out why it should create a bad feeling?—A man does not like to see the trade that he thinks belongs to him being done by another. Supposing a shopkeeper is standing at his door, and he sees two or three, or three or four of his best customers enter an opponent's shop; I think it goes without saying that that man would feel extremely annoyed.

1994. The following day the other man would be standing at his door?—It does not follow.

1995. You are imagining a case?—There can be no imagination in the case when you actually see your customer going into the other shop.

1996. You have imagined him first standing at his own door, and seeing three or four of his best customers going into his opponent's shop?—I say it is not human nature.

1997. It is not human nature?—No, it is not, to be content with a state of things like that.

1998. You say you are of opinion that much earlier closing might prevail without any inconvenience?—I think it might. There are districts where the hours are still very much too long.

1999. And what remedy have you for that?—Canvassing and example; and I think there is a decided disposition on the part of the shopkeepers themselves to close their shops earlier.

2000. Have you heard any of the witnesses that have been previously examined on this matter?—I heard a gentleman from Bolton give his evidence.

2001. Did you hear any of these witnesses state that they had been labouring for years and years to endeavour to get earlier closing, and that one or two people, by refusing to fall in with the general arrangement, had been able to upset the whole arrangement being arrived at?—I think that has very frequently been the case.

2002. How would you meet that difficulty?—I can give you a case at once to show you how it can be met. In a district that I am familiar with, the closing hour of two o'clock in one or two streets (on a Wednesday) has been in use for some time; one man last year broke through the thing and got to five o'clock; he was waited upon last week by a gentleman who had influence; that gentleman spoke to him, and he has now decided to close his shop at two o'clock, with the consequence that the whole of the early closing in the district is still to be in force; and another district that he has entered (the neighbouring district), through him undertaking to close at two o'clock in that district, will get the two o'clock movement there. That is entirely by persuasion and voluntary effort.

2003. You say that they will get it there?—They will get it there.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

2004. How do you arrive at that conclusion?—A canvass was made last week, and again yesterday, with the result that there is every prospect of it; the majority of shopkeepers are in favour of it.

2005. There is every prospect?—Yes.

2006. Then your experience is different entirely, I may take it, to that of these other witnesses who made the statements that I have already put before you?—I am speaking for London generally. I do not know much about Bolton or Liverpool, for instance, or Manchester; I am not speaking for those towns; I am speaking more particularly for London, and particularly for South London.

2007. And you are speaking for London when you say that in your opinion much earlier hours might prevail in many districts in London?—Yes, and I am still of that opinion; I am bound to be of that opinion. I think in many places where they are closing at nine o'clock, or half-past nine, or ten, nine might be adopted with very great advantage to the shopkeepers and their assistants too.

2008. But you are of opinion that it could be done by allowing assistants out during the day for shopping, &c.; you would give it as a sort of counsel or permission to the shopkeepers, that they might allow their assistants out during the day?—Quite so.

2009. But if they did not see their way to do that, how are you to secure any reasonably fair treatment for the assistants. If the shopkeeper refused, what would you do with him?—I do not think you can make any of these things perfect; you can only make it a workable thing, and a thing that will suit the convenience of a shopkeeper and his employee. You cannot make the thing perfect. If they were granted eight o'clock every night it would not be perfect.

2010. I am now speaking of the suggestion you made, if you would just pay attention to my question. You said it would be a good thing if the shopkeepers allowed their assistants out during the day, because you think it is absolutely necessary that they should have some time to do the things you mentioned?—I do not think I said "absolutely necessary," but think it would be a great convenience to them.

2011. But if the shopkeeper will not see his way to do that, have you any remedy to propose by which your desirable object may be achieved; have you any suggestion to make?—I have no compulsory suggestion to make.

2012. If a man does not do it you would just leave it there?—Certainly.

2013. You said that with these different half-holidays that might be desirable; one set of traders might close on Monday, another set on Tuesday, another set on Wednesday, and another set on Thursday, and that a man with various departments might find himself called upon to close for a half-day on Monday, a half-day on Tuesday, a half-day on Wednesday, and a half-day on Thursday; he might be closed practically a half-day on each day of the week?—That appears to be possible in the Bill.

2014. That is to say, it is not impossible?—As a matter of fact, where the half-holidays take place in these towns mentioned in the book which you have produced, some 900 towns, can you tell us whether or not it is general in all the trades of these towns to close on the same half-day?—Yes, it is.

2015. In 950 cases?—Because they have voluntarily agreed to close on that day.

2016. Then we have 950 cases, you say, of half holidays over the country?—Yes.

2017. And in those 950 cases it has been found that where the half-holiday has been decided upon, all the trades fall in and close together?—In a great majority of the cases I should think they do.

2018. Then do not you think it is rather what you may call imagining a very unlikely thing that you would find in any district different classes of trades each taking its own half day, so that the man with half-a-dozen different departments would be compelled to close on every half day; I mean, with these 950 cases before you, do not you think it very likely that what has been done in those cases would be done in others, and that the half day would be on one day of the week in all the trades; that is to say, as a general rule?—I think we have always found that the difficulty in getting men to accede to the two o'clock closing is, because it does not suit their trade. We find one day suits a butcher, another day suits a dressmaker, and so on.

2019. You have answered my question to the effect that in 950 towns the half holiday is all on the same day; do not you think that is really a precedent that should go to show that where it is adopted elsewhere, the same plan is likely to be followed out?—I do not think that what a man does in a voluntary way is in any way to be considered as a precedent for a compulsory measure.

2020. You think that if all traders voluntarily close their shops on a half day they will choose the same half day; but that if there was a law to that effect they would choose a different day?—It might be so.

2021. Do not you think it would be very unlikely, because the law was called in to strengthen this thing, that they would choose different days just because the law called upon them to close?—Each man certainly has the option of doing it if he likes.

2022. Each trade has the option to choose its own half day?—Certainly.

2023. And, as a matter of fact, the trades have all chosen the same day in the 950 cases with which you have supplied us?—There are plenty of butchers closing now on a Monday in London, and pawnbrokers close on another day.

2024. I asked you as to these 950 towns, whether it was the same day, and I think you replied that the half holiday was the same for all the trades?—Yes, I think it is. I told you at the outset that I am not familiar with the working of early closing in the big towns; my evidence is directed more to London itself.

2025. You say you have read the Bill, and that the traders can choose each his own half day?—Certainly; there is no doubt about it.

2026. But you are aware that under the Bill the local authority has a deciding voice in regard to the application of the principle, and to the adoption of certain days for closing; do you think that the local authority would be willing to sanction such a scheme as you have suggested is possible under the Bill?—If it was proposed to the local authority they would have no option in the matter but to carry out the terms of the Bill.

2027. Do not you see that the Bill says the local authority "may"?—Yes, "may."

2028. That is not compulsion, you see?—My experience of local authorities is this——

2029. I do not want your experience of local authorities, if you will allow me to say so; I want you to say what the Bill empowers the local authority to do?—The Bill empowers the local authority to close the shops on every day of the week if it so chooses; that is what the Bill does.

2030. Have you the Bill there?—Yes, I have got it here.

2031. I want to know what part of the Bill empowers the local authority to close the shops every day in the week if it so likes; I would just like to be informed of that clause?—Clause 1 is this: "If an application in writing is served on the local authority of any district praying that as regards all shops or any class of shops within the district, or any part of the district, belonging to any class or classes not mentioned in the Schedule to this Act, an order may be made."

2032. "An order may be made"?—"An order may be made."

2033. Where is the compulsion there; I understood you to say you had read the Bill and understood it. Now, where is there any justification for the statement that under that clause the local authority would be compelled, or could if it liked compel, the shops to be closed every day in the week?—They may be undoubtedly asked to do that thing on each day of the week.

2034. You now suggest that they might possibly be asked, but a moment ago you said they could if they liked close all the shops every day in the week; what justification is there for that?—I think if they felt that two-thirds of the shopkeepers of any particular trade were asking them to close their shops on any particular day they would do it.

2035. On any particular day?—Yes, the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday.

2036. But you said "every day." You said it would be difficult to find out what two-thirds of the shopkeepers might want; that was one of the statements I understood you to make?—Yes, I did say so.

2037. How do you find out now when the majority of tradesmen desire to close by your voluntary effort?—Well, we canvass them; we canvass them street by street, shop to shop.

2038. Now do you think it would be impossible to do that if this Bill were to become an Act?—I do not think I said it was "impossible"; I said it would be difficult.

2039. Would it be more difficult to find out what two-thirds of the shopkeepers wanted under this Bill when it is to find out now what the whole whole of them want?—It would be more difficult to find it out, because of the extent of the area that you are seeking to ascertain the opinion of. If our officers go into a street and work a street they finish with that street, and it is done with.

2040. Do I understand you to say that at present you direct your efforts to get the shops in a single street closed?—We tackle the thing street by street until we have arrived at the opinion of the majority of the shopkeepers.

2041. Until you have arrived at their opinion; do you ask traders in a particular street to close before you have finished the canvassing of a district?—Yes, we ask them if they are willing to close.

2042. Follow me; I think I have not made myself clear to you; you do not ask that the shops in a particular street shall be closed until you have finished the canvassing of the whole area, do you?—Oh, yes, we ask them from house to house as we go along from shop to shop.

2043. You do not close the shops at once?—No, not until we have ascertained the opinion of the people.

2044. For the area?—Yes.

2045. What is the area you generally choose?—Generally speaking, it is thus: If we went to Brixton it would be round about the Brixton-road; if we went to Peckham it would be round about the Rye, and so on.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2046. It would be a class of shops, would it not?—Yes; drapers, for example.

2047. And it is the better class of shops?—Yes.

2048. Then the little one cannot close?—No.

2049. The little ones do not affect the big trades, do they?—As a rule, they do not.

Mr. Diamond.

2050. What is the area you would think it desirable to include in any scheme of general early closing?—An area, I suppose, according to this (if you say a "district") would be the area of the vestry, or the district board of works for that district; I am speaking of London.

2051. The district board of works?—Supposing it was given to the Lewisham Board of Works or the Wandsworth Board of Works, it would be a district of seven or eight miles across; then, of course, the vestry district of St. George's, Hanover-square, would be very much smaller, and so on.

2052. Do you think it would be impossible, within the larger of these areas, to get an accurate view of the opinion of the majority of the shopkeepers?—I do not say it is impossible, but I say it is extremely difficult, and it would be a very expensive process to do it; it would entail a very great deal of expense.

2054. To find out the opinions of the tradespeople?—Certainly; in a perfectly straightforward way, so that no objection could be taken to the actual number of signatures, or whatever it may be. It should be done in an official way; that is the only proper way of carrying it out.

2055. But are not you aware that this Act merely embodies a principle which it is proposed to embody in other legislation?—Local option.

2056. That is practically what it means?—I do not know that it is embodied in an Act of Parliament.

2057. It is the tendency of legislation, is it not?—I understood you to say that it was.

2058. I say proposed to embody?—Oh, "proposed."

2059. Proposed to embody in other Acts of Parliament, leaving it to the local people to say what they want?—That is, Local Option, you say, would do the thing?

2060. Yes?—This is the first time it has ever been embodied in an Act of Parliament, do you mean?

2061. No; we have permissive Acts in existence; can you point out why it should be a very difficult matter to get one of these areas thoroughly canvassed by those interested in the question?—I have had experience: it is an extremely difficult thing to work up for a County Council election, for instance; the labour is immense in any big district; and the same thing would have to be gone through in this matter; committees would have to be formed, and the whole thing would have to be gone into.

2062. There would be difficulties in getting the views of the trades ascertained, as I understand?—That would be the difficulty.

2063. Do you think that difficulty would be more undesirable than the present state of affairs? You yourself say it would be very desirable that shops should get earlier closing hours; of the two things, which would be the weightiest, do you think, if you put them in a balance?—My opinion is strongly in favour of the voluntary effort.

2064. And this would be voluntary?—No, I do not think it would be voluntary.

2065. For two thirds of the people?—It would be voluntary as far as they were concerned, but the rest would be compelled.

2066. And you would not be of opinion that you should compel any minority to accept the view of the majority on a matter of this description; is that your opinion?—Not in the closing of shops, certainly.

2067. Do you think they should be permitted to keep the shop open all night if they desired to do so?—No, I do not think that.

2068. At what hour would you compel them to close?—As a matter of fact, there is no one doing it.

2069. We have had evidence that in Liverpool, up to one o'clock on Sunday morning, shops are kept open, certain shops. Would you compel them at any hour to close, or would you say that if a man liked to keep his shop open the 24 hours he should be permitted to do it. I want to know really where you draw the line?—I do not think there ought to be any compulsory power to do it.

2070. You are entirely opposed to any compulsion in the matter, no matter how long the hours may be?—Yes, I am opposed to compulsion, because I believe we can work it by voluntary effort.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

2071. You are minutely acquainted with the retail trade of London, I believe?—Yes, I know it very well.

2072. Not outside, to any large extent?—Not outside; I am in London principally.

2073. As secretary of your association, I suppose, you are able to collect facts from different parts of the country?—I am not secretary; I am the vice-chairman.

2074. Have the facts from different parts of the country been put into your hands?—No, I have not heard about different parts of the country at all.

2075. Do you know enough to say whether this question of early closing is mainly one for the Metropolis and the big towns?—I think it is. From what I know of country towns they are already closing at very reasonable hours, at all events in most small country towns.

2076. I will take London and different classes of shops. With regard to the large establishments which you see in the West End, is it true to say that there has been a general reduction of hours not only on one day of the week, but generally on every day?—There has been a general shortening of the hours; I should say so decidedly.

2077. Now we want to get the facts; what has been the shortening?—When I was an assistant in the West End of London, Marshall and Snelgrove closed at eight o'clock on Saturdays; they now close at two. The hour of closing during the week in most of those big shops first of all became eight, then seven, then half-past six, and a good many of them now are closing at six o'clock within the last 12 months.

2078. Is there any sign of their going back?—No sign whatever.

2079. It is in these shops that the greater number of assistants are employed, men and women, is it not?—Yes, in the large shops the greater number.

2080. In former Committees the health of the women has been to a large extent the subject of inquiry?—That was always one of the principal reasons for interference.

2081. They, I imagine, have benefited to a considerable extent by the tendency to close shops earlier of late years?—Yes, certainly, and I think by the construction of the shops; I think they are better ventilated than they were.

2082. Have you read the evidence given before former Committees as to the effect on the health of the women of the long hours?—I could not speak from memory.

2083. Have you any recent medical evidence of the kind. You have put in some letters; I do not want them read; but have you medical evidence that the health of the women employed has improved in consequence of the shorter hours?—I have not.

2084. Then, to take a second class of shops, the domestic shop, where there is only the man and his family, with, perhaps, one assistant; have the hours in that class of shop diminished?—Certainly. I know of districts in London, very important districts, such as Deptford, Bermondsey, and Rotherhithe, where, for the last four years, the shopkeepers have been working 800 hours less per annum than they did.

2085. Is that in consequence of what you have done through your association?—Yes, in consequence of the voluntary closing of their establishments, and also calculating the Bank Holidays as a portion of that total.

2086. Supposing that the local authority were to exercise the permissive powers given them in this Bill, would it tend to extinguish the small shops, or anyhow to prejudice the small shopkeeper?—I think if under this Bill the hour adopted became such that the customers of the small shop could not do their shopping, it would interfere with, and practically ruin, the small class of shops; it certainly would have that tendency.

2087. Are you aware of the feeling that exists among the smaller shopkeepers?—Well, I have not heard of any feeling; I am well acquainted with a great number of small shopkeepers.

2088. What is their feeling with regard to this Bill?—First of all, they do not understand it, and where they do, they are opposed to it. They have not had an opportunity of considering the Bill at all; it has never been submitted to any meeting that I am aware of in London; it has never been discussed or submitted to a single meeting in London. The London traders are absolutely ignorant, I was going to say, to a great extent, of the provisions of the Bill.

2089. I want to take two typical cases. Suppose you are dealing with a large establishment in the centre of London, I suppose it would be true to say that a great part of the business there would be done in the middle hours of the day?—It would be perfectly true to say so.

2090. If, on the other hand, you go into the suburbs—where the working classes live to an increasing extent now—there business would be mainly done in the evening, I suppose?—That would be so, yes.

2091. And if you oppose the small shop to the big one, you may say that in the small shop the hours of trading are mainly after six, whereas in the big shop they would be before six?—That would be true.

2093. In regard to young women and children, is it the case that the Acts already passed have diminished diminished their hours? — Yes; they have shortened the hours of that class of assistants.

2094. Apart from the direct effect of an Act and the prosecutions under it, I suppose the indirect consequences of an Act of that sort would be considerable? — They would, undoubtedly.

2095. Is it the case that the Factory Acts have touched the case of women employed in the shop or in the showroom, after the work in the workroom is compulsorily closed?—Yes; the Factory or Workshop Act applies to shops that have not a workroom now; that is to say, the small shopkeeper having a milliner or two sitting at his table in the shop has to conform to the Act the same as though he had a workroom.

2096. That only affects women and children?—That would affect women and young persons.

2097. Have you any objection to the extending of the Act to cover the case of adult men?—Yes, I have. I think that they ought to have perfect freedom. I think that adult labour ought to be free to make its own contract.

2098. Supposing it to be proved to the satisfaction of Parliament that men in grocers' shops, for example, or in big tailors' shops, are employed excessive and unreasonable hours (cases have been given, of course, which are not disputed), do not you think there is some call for legislation?—I would rather not see legislation. I am opposed to legislation.

2099. Now take this Bill; we are dealing with London?—Yes.

2100. You are aware that in the Bill in the City of London the common council are the authority for the purpose of the Act, and that the authority for the County of London are the London County Council?—Yes, I am aware of that.

2101. Are you aware that the boundaries are very indistinct between the city and the county, and that therefore you would have a different authority exercising possibly a different discretion in two exactly similar areas?—That is undoubtedly true.

2102. If you go to the outskirts of the metropolis, are you aware that there you may have the county council on one side of the road, and very likely some urban district authority on the other?—Yes; all round the edge of the metropolis.

2103. Therefore, you would be prejudicing one area as against another?—Certainly; you would be closing shops on one side of the boundary and keeping them open on another.

2104. In fact, if a power of this sort were exercised, it would be unfair to locality against locality, and, I suppose, if you look at the costermongers and those wandering traders, it would be unfair to a man who pays rates and taxes as against a man who simply perambulates the streets?—It would be most unfair.

2105. Do you believe that there would be a widespread feeling of indignation if this power of closing a particular class of shops at an arbitrary hour was exercised in London?—I believe that, when it comes to be thoroughly understood, there will be a great deal of indignation if they are called upon to submit to it. I do not, for my own part, think it would be possible to put it into operation.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

2106. Is it the case that the person mainly touched would be the small tradesman who carried on his business by his own labour?—Yes; the two-thirds majority would never be obtained.

Mr. Edwards.

2107. Whom do you think this Act will hurt?—I think it will affect the small shopkeepers.

2108. Injuriously?—Yes, injuriously.

2109. And I think you say now, in answer to this gentleman at my side, that they being in the majority could impose their own will on the neighbourhood?—I am supposing that it is put into operation. First of all, I am asked whether I believe the Act will ever be passed, and I say I do not think it will; then I am asked whom it would affect if it were passed.

2110. You were asked by Mr. Lawson whom it would injuriously affect, and you said it would hurt the small shopkeepers?—If it was put into operation.

2111. Exactly; you say it would hurt the small shopkeepers?—Yes.

2113. Quite so; but, as a fact, I suppose the small shopkeepers are in a majority?—Yes, as a matter of fact.

2114. They are in a majority?—That will be so all through the country as well as in London. I should think so; yes.

2115. Therefore, if the Act is intended to benefit them, they have the power in their own hands of saying whether it does benefit them or not?—Yes, they have that power.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2116. But is it not a fact that all the large shopkeepers now close, and that they would be an important body, and that a very few of the other shopkeepers coming in would have an influence upon the rest of the small traders?—Of course, the larger shops closing at two o'clock would maintain their system of two o'clock, or whatever it was; they would agree to it.

Mr. Edwards.

2117. I apprehend we are not dealing with those who do early closing now; we are only dealing with those who cannot get early closing?—Is it proposed to leave those out of the operation?

2118. Not at all; but if they choose to close early, what is to prevent them?—Most of those shops already closing close at two o'clock on Saturday.

2119. You say costermongers are a difficulty under the Act?—They are a difficulty under the Act.

2120. Or would be?—Yes, I think they would be the great difficulty.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

2121. You think they would be the great difficulty under the Act?—Yes, I think they would.

2122. Do you know of any early closing amongst that class now?—No; I know of places where they keep their barrows and stalls very late; I do not know of any early hours.

2123. You do not know of any place where they are to be found where the shops close early?—No. The shopkeepers, as a rule, close about nine and half-past nine in the neighbourhoods I speak of; some of them at ten, but many at nine, and the costers frequently do not clear out of the street till ten and half-past ten at night.

2124. Therefore, at present they are not in a difficulty?—At present they are not in any particular difficulty.

2125. They are not regarded; the shopkeepers close early now, although the costers are there?—As I tell you, the difference may be half-an-hour or a quarter-of-an-hour; not anything very great.

2126. Therefore, the experience of the neighbourhood would soon tell whether those people would affect them; but they would be brought in under the Act, would not they?—I believe it is proposed to bring them in under this Act.

2127. So that there would be no difficulty with them under the Act; you say that this Bill would be bad for London; you know London well?—Yes, I know it.

2128. You include in London, do you, the suburbs?—Yes; I include what may be called "Greater London."

2129. Therefore, that is an admission that one hour is fixed for closing in London as well as in the suburbs?—Yes.

2130. The same hour?—Yes.

2131. Might not the suburbs choose their own hour?—That depends on whether it is considered necessary to give the authority to a district or to London itself.

2132. You say that will depend?—It depends on whether the Bill gives the power to the local authority, or whether the County Council exercises the whole of the authority.

2133. Quite so; which would you be in favour of; giving the power to the whole area or to separate districts?—I am not in favour of it at all; I do not think it is necessary to give it to either.

2134. Now, who is to be benefited by early closing?—Well, it is always supposed that the shopkeepers and their assistants are to be benefited by early closing.

2135. The shopkeepers and their assistants; now, who are the greatest offenders against early closing?—Well, the greatest offenders are those who keep open their shops later than the rest of their neighbours.

2136. Yes; but I mean, are they small men who keep open, having no assistants, or are they shops where there are assistants?—Both classes of people.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2137. And they keep open to serve customers?—They keep open to serve customers.

Mr. Edwards.

2138. Those are the men you have difficulty with?—Those are the men we have difficulty with.

2139. Both those who have a small number of assistants and those who have none at all?—Yes.

2140. You think that voluntary action would be best?—I do.

2141. And would avoid "bad blood," you said?—Yes, I believe so.

2142. Is there no bad blood now because some few will not close?—I believe there is irritation.

2143. You think it would be greater under the Act?—I think the irritation would be greater in putting this Act into force.

2144. Do you think so, really?—I do really think so.

2145. A few object to closing now, do not they?—Yes. Then there come other points.

2146. You say a few object to closing now?—Yes.

2147. Now that must create "bad blood" in the many who do close, must it not?—Yes.

2149. Those who would be against it would be annoyed?—Those who would be against it would be annoyed.

2150. But assuming that those who are against it are few, those who hold out I mean to say, because you yourself say there are only a few who do hold out?—Yes.

2151. Assuming that they are a few, there would be a less number annoyed under the Bill than there are now?—Suppose there should be 2,000 signatures on the one side and a little less than 1,000 on the other, you would get nearly 1,000 dissatisfied persons on the one hand and you would get 2,000 satisfied on the other. That is a great difference to getting a single individual. There is a large difference as regards the amount of irritation that would be created by one man opposing a thing and the case of 1,000 or 2,000 shopkeepers irritated and annoyed because they were compelled to close their shops by two-thirds of their neighbours.

2152. You do not get all closing except one or two, I apprehend, now do you?—At present, you find in a street, say, of 50 shopkeepers, only one or two men objecting; but when you get the large bulk, it may be in Wandsworth or Lewisham (places I have mentioned), there are thousands of tradesmen involved in this vote, and I say the action of getting this carried would create a great amount of irritation in the minds of the minority, which might amount to hundreds of people, if this was imposed upon them against their will.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

2153. Is there no irritation now?—The irritation is small, I say.

2154. You object to compulsory action, do you not, altogether?—I do.

2155. You think voluntary action is better?—I do.

2156. I do not know whether I gathered rightly what you said; I believe you said you would like to have the Shop Hours, or something like the Shop Hours Regulation Act applied to the case, limiting the hours of assistants?—Yes; I meant that it should be arrived at by voluntary arrangement; I do not believe that any Act of Parliament that applies to adult labour would ever be a workable measure in drapers' shops.

2157. Then I did not gather your opinion rightly that you were in favour of applying the principle of the Shop Hours Regulation Act to them compulsorily?—No; I have not studied that question; I do not wish to pledge my opinion to that.

2158. Supposing that the applying of the Shop Hours Bill to adults were considered the way out of the difficulty (the Bill which is now applied to young people), would not that leave untouched the hundreds and thousands of small shopkeepers who keep shop themselves with their wives?—Yes; but I have pointed out that they keep their shops open often for the convenience of the public; and, again, if this Bill was adopted and large shopkeepers got the hour in the evening that suited them, and that hour did not suit the small shops, they would not have a chance of doing any business at all. I instanced the case of the working man who comes home late; it is not a mere opinion on my part, it is a fact that he does come home late, and that his wife goes shopping late at night; there is no getting away from that, that is the fact; and, where small shopkeepers not employing any assistants choose to do it for their own living, and for the sake of living and obtaining a livelihood, I think it is wrong that they should be interfered with by Act of Parliament and compelled to close their shops against their will.

2159. You are in favour of trying to get the application of the Shop Hours Closing Act; that is to say, limiting the number of hours that the assistants should be employed, are not you; you think that would be the way out of the difficulty?—I am in favour of it as far as young persons are concerned, but I am not in favour of its application to adult labour.

2160. Oh, I understood you were?—I do not think so; I have never expressed the opinion that I would like the Act imposed upon adults.

2161. I apprehend you to be in favour of getting by voluntary act that principle in action of limiting the hours of assistants?—Yes.

2163. There is no means of finding out what opinion they reflect, whether it is that of the employers or the assistants, is there?—No; I should think they take a critical view of the case like the papers do; they argue out the various points of the Bill.

2164. And, in your opinion, big employers of labour are against the Bill?—All those with whom I have any acquaintance are against the Bill.

2165. And the trade journals would be rather apt to reflect the opinion of the big employers of labour, would not they?—You might fairly put that construction upon it; some of them are extensively read by assistants; as a matter of fact they go into the libraries, and are laid on the table of the libraries.

2166. You mentioned one place, Bermondsey, was it?—Yes; Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Lambeth.

2167. A place where you had succeeded in getting certain gentlemen to "knock under"?—Where we had succeeded in getting the voluntary principle very favourably carried out.

2168. Is not that the sort of difficulty that exists everywhere?—Yes; there is difficulty in persuading people to close their shops.

2169. Would not you cut your knot very easily by means of this Act?—I say if this Act was once adopted, and if by any means it was allowed to lapse, then the condition of the early closing of shops would be in a worse condition than it was before the Act was put into operation.

2170. Shopkeepers, you say, object to it, but you cannot give us any numbers as to in what proportion they object to it?—No.

2171. It is merely your opinion that they object to it?—I think if it were submitted to a series of public meetings, you would arrive at it in that way.

Mr. Tennant.

2172. You said that at present you did not think there was so much bad feeling, because a large majority of shops do close early; that it is only a very small minority who keep open, and that they are the people who have the "bad blood," the bad feeling. Is it not the case that two or three shops keeping open can keep the rest of the shops in a district open?—They might do so, but in many districts the shops close independently of those people who object.

2173. They close independently?—They close independently of them, and allow those objecting people to fix their own hour; for instance, we will say there are 20 drapers in a street; 18 of those drapers will close at 2 o'clock on Wednesday or Thursday, and the two will close at 5; but it does not prevent the 18 from closing their shops at 2.

2174. It is rather remarkable that the others should close; but, apart from that, is it not very annoying to those other 18, who are the large majority?—Of course it is very annoying and very irritating, but it tests the principle. It is the great difficulty that we have in respect to this voluntary closing everywhere. Of course it is our great difficulty; the voluntary difficulty lies in that. That is where the whole of our difficulty lies; but still, bit by bit they are persuaded suaded, and one after another in time drop into it, and eventually a district becomes practically unanimous.

2175. In spite of that difficulty you still adhere to the system of voluntaryism?—I still adhere to the system of voluntaryism.

2178. Or even taking a poll?—Well, I do not know about "a poll" I am sure; there would come in the difficulty. It is a very difficult thing to get at the voice of London in any case; but the best way would be to hold public meetings, I think, of the traders themselves. They are the people who would have to vote. Of course assistants may be greatly in favour of it for all I know, but then they have not the power to vote.

2180. Yet you do admit there are difficulties?—Yes, I admit there are great difficulties in the way.

2181. Such difficulties as to render it in some districts, I suppose, absolutely impossible for a tradesman to close his shop early if he wishes to live by his trade at all; do you admit that?—No, I do not admit that.

2182. You think there are no districts you know of in London where early closing does not take place; I mean reasonably early closing?—Do you mean to ask me if I know of any place where shops are kept open to an unreasonable hour?

2183. No; what I want to know is whether you know any district in London where it is the rule for all sorts and classes of shops to be kept open to 9 or 10 o'clock at night three or four nights, or five nights of the week?—Well, I do not know about "10"; I know there are districts in London where they keep open until 9 and half-past 9.

2184. As a rule?—As a rule, yes.

2185. And even later, I suppose?—It may be in some instances, even later.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2186. On some nights, I suppose?—On some nights; and in this very district they would probably be closing at 2 o'clock on Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. Tennant.

2187. That shows does it not how the voluntary system is practically inoperative?—I think it goes to show, in my mind, that these shops are wanted; for instance, supposing the girls that are employed in factories go home to their rooms or parents at night, they have got their shopping to do after they get home at night frequently; shops are wanted by those people.

2188. Then you consider it necessary that some shops should remain open?—For the convenience of the public I distinctly think so.

2189. Do you deliberately think that it is impossible for the working classes to go out shopping before 9 o'clock at night?—Well, I have given you an instance of the difficulty there is attached to it. I think that difficulty very extensively prevails; and it cannot be an opinion of mine, because it is the actual fact. It is a fact that the wife has to stay until the husband returns, then put the children to bed, &c., before she can get time to go out and do her shopping, and that brings it frequently to 8 o'clock at night.

2190. Eight o'clock?—Or a later hour; but I think it could well be kept within reasonable bounds, say 9 o'clock. I have expressed that opinion, that those districts now closing at 10 might close at 9, without doing their business any very serious injury.

Sir Francis Powell.

2191. I believe you have had very considerable experience of the working of local customs as regards half-holidays on Wednesday and other days?—Yes, I have.

2193. Now I am confining my question to one point, that is the half-holiday: Do you consider that the voluntary action as regards the half-holiday arrangement has been satisfactory, or do you not?—It has been satisfactory up to the present, considering the difficulties that we have had to contend against; in fact, everything closing at 2 o'clock now has been obtained by voluntary effort.

2195. Is that done to a small extent which you may neglect, or is it to a serious extent which produces an inconvenience worthy of notice?—In districts where an earlier closing than 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock has been adopted, if that is broken through by one or two men, it jeopardises the movement; it upsets the movement in most places.

2196. But I believe it is the fact, that in a great many places the half-holiday system now prevails?—It is prevailing in a great many places; places; there are very few places without it in some form or another.

2197. Then my question is, seeing that it is so happily general, whether that does or does not encourage you to have faith in voluntary arrangements?—I have strong faith in voluntary arrangements, and I believe that they will eventually succeed in getting more shops closed at an early hour than they do at present.

2198. On the Wednesdays?—On the Wednesdays or the Thursdays.

2199. Do you consider, or do you not consider, that the half-holiday has been a success?—I consider that it has been a great success by the voluntary arrangement.

2200. Do you think, or do not you think, that the few exceptions will gradually disappear, or will they remain as they are, or will they increase?—I believe the half-holiday movement, at all events, will increase in every district; I believe that it will increase and become a general movement.

2201. Then you think the number of shops open on the half-holiday will diminish?—I do.

2202. Then you probably think (if I am wrong correct me) that that experience confirms you in your belief as regards the voluntary system applied to early closing on other days of the week?—Yes, it does.

Chairman.

2203. You have stated that in a district in London shops are now open to nine, half-past nine, and even 10?—Yes.

2204. And I think Mr. Restall, your secretary, has stated in writing, or in print, has he not, that in many shops the hours still remain 80 to 82 hours per week?—In some districts I believe he has.

2205. Now, this early closing movement has been in operation for a very long while; you probably remember that it is nearly five-and-twenty years ago since I introduced the first Bill on the subject?—Yes, I am aware of that; but I do not think the two o'clock movement, for instance, has been in existence so long as has been stated.

2206. I did not say it had, but that we had been working to get shorter hours for that period?—Yes, but a great advance has taken place in the last 10 years.

2207. Still you admit that there are districts, in spite of what you call the "great advance," where shops are open to nine, half-past nine, and even 10?—Yes, we intend to keep pegging away at these districts until we get them closed.

2208. In the meanwhile the unfortunate assistants may suffer terribly. You were one of the committee of the Early Closing Association in 1887, I think, which considered the question of early closing, and I believe that committee made a report to the association generally, that "The Committee are agreed that of the various schemes so far put forward, the Shop Hours Bill (now to be known as the 'Early Closing Bill') is that which is most likely to attain the ends sought. They, therefore, subject to certain alterations to be introduced in Committee, approve the principle of the Bill, and recommend its acceptance to the board of management"?—Yes, that is so.

Chairman—continued.

2209. And you signed that?—Yes, I did.

2210. At that time you were of that opinion?—Yes. Will you kindly read the resolution at the beginning? That will show to the Committee the spirit in which all these things were approached.

2211. The resolution was a resolution of the board of management?—Yes.

2212. But I am speaking of the report you made in consequence of that resolution?—Yes.

2213. The board of management of the Early Closing Association appointed a committee in 1887 through this resolution: "That while refraining from committing the association to any scheme of legislation so far proposed, the board of management, having regard to the results of their recent canvass, nevertheless determine to accord a benevolent support to the principle of legislation, and appoints a committee to examine the question and report thereon to a future meeting of the board"?—Yes, that is the resolution.

2214. Then the committee made a report in which they stated that "subject to certain alterations to be introduced in Committee," they "approve the principle of the Bill, and recommend its acceptance to the board of management?"—Yes.

2215. And you signed that report?—Yes, I signed that report. I may say that that Bill was not carried into law; that Bill was not passed.

2216. No, not that particular Bill?—No Bill has been passed yet, except the Shop Hours Regulation Bill, I think.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2217. And you have changed your opinions about it?—I have, decidedly.

Chairman.

2218. You have stated that you left the Early Closing Association partly on account of their endeavour to bring the Shop Hours Regulation Bill into operation to put down cases in which shop assistants were working 80, 90, and even 100 hundred hours a week?—Yes, I did not object to that in itself; I objected to it, because I thought they were not a proper association for carrying out the Act; I thought someone ought to see that the Act was enforced, but I did not think our society ought to do it.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2219. The London County Council do it, do not they?—The London County Council do it now.

Chairman.

2220. You have put in evidence certain letters from medical men which you state appeared to show that the health of assistants did not suffer from the long hours?—Yes, I was very anxious to know for my own part, in order that I might state it to the Committee, if there was really anything I knew of my own knowledge which would show that they were suffering from long hours; and

and in consequence of that our secretary has written to these gentlemen within the last week.

2221. You have put in seven letters, and I should like to ask you a question about each of them; Mr. Nelson Hardy says that he has "only seen one or two cases"?—That is so.

2222. Then the next gentleman (Mr. Davies) says: "I find that the visits of your members have been too few for me to give a satisfactory answer to your inquiry"?—Yes.

2223. Then Dr. Bown says: "I have only had two or three shop assistants apply to me;" that is so, I think?—That is so. I do not know whether he says anything more about it.

2225. Then Dr. Cotton says: "That hardly any member has applied for medical advice, so that he is unable to form any opinion on the subject"?—Yes.

2226. Then Dr. Brinyloe says: "I have not had a single application for advice, therefore am not in a position to form an opinion"?—That is so. I do not know whether that is the lady doctor or not.

2227. That is signed "I. Brinyloe"; then Dr. Boddy's is the next?—I think the long letter would be the lady doctor; that is Dr. Boddy's.

2229. The Committee will judge for themselves upon that point; then Dr. Flynn, is that the name?—Yes.

2230. Dr. Flynn says: "I am afraid I am unable to answer your query as to my knowledge; I have only treated one patient belonging to your association"?—Yes.

2231. Therefore, the Committee will judge whether those are witnesses who are able to give much information upon the subject; now you have stated to the Committee that the trade journals are opposed to this Bill; are you prepared to say that the "Grocer" is opposed to the Bill?—I am not prepared to say anything about the "Grocer."

2232. Are you prepared to say that the "Grocers' Journal" is opposed to the Bill?—I am speaking, perhaps, of my own trade journal.

2233. The "Grocers' Gazette"?—I have not seen the "Grocers' Gazette."

2234. The "Drapery World"; is the "Drapery World" opposed to the Bill?—I should say it is opposed to the Bill.

2235. The "Drapers' Record"; do you say that is opposed to the Bill?—I think that is opposed to the Bill.

2236. And the "Draper"?—And the "Draper."

2237. The "Chemist and Druggist"; is that opposed to the Bill?—I have not seen that.

Chairman—continued.

2238. Are you aware that it was at the suggestion of the editor of the "Chemist and Druggist" that chemists were included in the Bill?—No, I am not aware of that.

2239. Then which of the trade journals, to your knowledge, are opposing these suggestions?—I have noticed the "Draper," the "Drapers' Record," and the "Drapery World"; those are the three papers I was alluding to. I should, perhaps, have said my own trade. I have seen an article in the "Standard."

2240. I was asking you about "trade journals"?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. Diamond.

2241. Have you ever attended a congress for the purpose of discussing early closing?—Yes, I attended one in Glasgow.

2242. When was that?—I could not exactly tell you the date; about seven or eight years ago.

2243. Were you at that time distinctly in favour of legislation?—I was not distinctly in favour of legislation; I was in favour of the Bill that we had passed which has been now alluded to in my examination by the Chairman.

2244. You spoke in favour of the Bill?—I did not speak in favour of the Bill; I went there to vote in favour of it anyhow.

2245. You voted in favour of it?—I did.

2246. You are also in favour of legislation being applied to women and young people?—Yes, I think below a certain age. I have no objection to that at all.

2247. You approve of that?—Yes, I do not object.

2248. You think it desirable that there should be legislation for young people?—Yes.

2249. On what grounds?—Because I think that in tender years young people require more care than adult people.

2250. Would not you suppose that their parents would be quite fit to look after the interests of these young people?—No. So many of them are away from their people; they are not living with their parents when employed in shops.

2251. Their parents would know what work they were putting them to when allowing them to go to shops?—They would not know the details of the work.

2252. Would not they know the hours?—They would know the hours certainly to a certain extent, but they would not know all. I do not think it is quite a question for me to answer, but I think I may say without any doubt that everybody would be in favour of protecting young women and children, and making a distinction between them and adult labour.

2253. Did shopkeepers oppose the Shop Hours Regulation Act?—The shopkeepers? well, I am not aware that they did oppose.

2254. At any rate, you did point out that the law was being broken because a prosecution was initiated?—Yes, undoubtedly there was a prosecution and a conviction obtained.

2255. There is just one question I should like to ask you about the different authorities; it has been said that the borders of the London County Council

Mr. Diamond—continued.

Council and the Common Council, to some extent, overlap: I hardly thought it possible; I thought the police in each district had its own boundary line drawn very closely; for instance, in the Strand it is Temple Bar, I think; suppose these two authorities came close together in applying an Act like this (granting the Bill becomes an Act), do not you think these authorities would be most likely to consult together as to any basis of proceeding, so that there might not be any great discrepancy between the application of the Act in the various districts; these authorities do at present act in concert for various purposes; is there any reason why they should not act in concert in the application of the Shop Hours Regulation Act, granted that that was the law of the land. Do you know any reason why these authorities, who co-operate at present for other purposes in applying the law, should not co-operate to apply this Act?—I do distinctly, if the Bill is to be acted upon in the way in which it is drawn.

2256. What is your ground for thinking that they would not. Have you any ground for thinking so?—My reason for thinking so is that it is purely permissive; they would surely carry out the wishes and desires of their own district; that is to say, if Islington wanted the Bill it would not be dictated to by Paddington; and the County Council may consult as much as they like if it is absolutely in the power of the people to say whether they will have the Bill or not; you cannot dictate to the authority as to what Paddington or Kensington shall do.

Mr. Edwards.

2257. You say that all the drapery journals are against legislation?—All that I have seen.

2258. Against legislation?—Well, they criticise this Bill unfavourably.

2259. Do you know the journal called the "Drapery World"?—Yes, I do.

2260. Is that in favour of legislation?—I do not know that it is in favour, but I saw its criticism against this Bill; they had a criticism in it against this Bill.

2261. Do you mean to say you can read something in that journal so clearly as to find that it is a criticism against the Bill, and yet not find what it is in favour of?—Although I take the journal, and read it, I am not sure whether the "Drapery World" is, or is not, in favour of legislation.

2262. You do not know, as a fact, that it does advocate legislation?—I do not know that it does advocate legislation.

2263. Legislation in a certain line?—I do not know that as a fact.

Mr. FRANK DEBENHAM, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2264. I NEED hardly ask the question; you are a member of the important firm of Debenham and Freebody?—Yes, I am.

2265. And you were an alderman of the London County Council?—Yes.

2266. You have paid a good deal of attention to this subject?—Yes.

2267. Have you heard the evidence given by Mr. Bryce Grant?—Yes, I have.

2268. Do you generally concur in that evidence?—I cannot say that I am in a position to confirm a great deal of it; with regard more particularly to the practices in regard to hours and so on in the suburban, and what is commonly called the lower class of shops, I have had very little experience indeed in those; my experience lies rather in the larger houses in London and the country; but generally, I think, Mr. Bryce Grant's evidence is correct.

2269. Is there anything you wish to add to that evidence?—No; I cannot say that there is anything very special at all; I think the result of voluntary effort might perhaps have been a little more enlarged upon. I think Mr. Grant rather minimised the effect of voluntary effort in connection with this early closing movement.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2270. Do you consider that good voluntary work is being done still?—Oh, there is no doubt of it.

2271. In all parts of the metropolis?—I think probably more to-day than ever, and I think we are reaping the results of the work of the last five-and-twenty years to-day to a very considerable extent.

2272. In all the principal towns in the country there are early closing associations?—A great many, I believe. Yes, a great many more or less spasmodic movements one would almost say; there is always some movement cropping up for early closing in different places.

Sir Francis Powell.

2273. Does your knowledge of the hours of London extend beyond what may be described as the West End?—Oh, yes. I might say in connection with that that I have been chairman of a Voluntary Early Closing Association Board for some three years now (nearly three years), and through that association I have come to some extent in touch with the voluntary movement in London, and in that way have obtained a great deal of information.

2274. What do you consider the hours of closing in the West End are, speaking generally, in general terms?—In the larger houses I should say seven o'clock on an average; I speak more particularly of the drapery trade, the general trade, drapery, furnishing, and cognate trades.

2275. You say seven o'clock is the ordinary hour?—I should think to-day that is a very good average for the larger houses; I may say that my own house closes at six o'clock the greater part of the year; and the tendency is still to shorten the hours.

2276. And on Saturday?—And on Saturday at two o'clock.

2277. You speak about the larger houses, but does the same hour apply to the smaller shops?—The smaller shops are later, decidedly, than the others.

2278. Could you give a rough approximation of the hours of closing in the case of the smaller shops in the West End of London?—I do not think I could; I have not much experience as to that, but I should say that in the West End generally it would be nearer eight than seven.

2279. Taking large and small shops together, do you think that is about the average?—I should think so; yes. I might say the hours vary according to the season very much.

2280. Where?—Particularly in the West End; but throughout London generally they are later in the summer than they are in the winter.

2281. Later in the summer?—In what are called the better class trades.

2282. In how many months of the year would they close at seven?—I should say that a house that closed at six or half-past six in the winter in the West End would probably close an hour or an hour and a-half later in the season.

2283. Would it be as late as half-past seven?—In many houses it would.

2284. In the summer?—I am speaking of the West End only in the summer.

2285. I am confining my questions to the West End; I know your knowledge is more as regards the West End than any other part?—Yes, exactly.

2286. You consider that in the summer time the hours would be half-past six to half-past seven?—Yes, I think that would be a very good average. I am bound to say my knowledge is not more than that of any other ordinary person. I have never made it my business to inquire very particularly. I am hardly in a position to observe, and I have not made it my business to inquire what sort of an average might be struck with regard to the hours; so much depends upon the trades. That is the truth.

2287. Your knowledge does not extend to the East End of London?—Not a bit.

Mr. Edwards.

2288. Do I understand you to say that you object to the Bill?—Yes, decidedly, on many points.

2289. You think it is bad for London?—I think it is bad for anywhere.

2290. You think it is bad for anywhere?—Yes.

2291. Why do you object to the Bill, then?—I object generally. First of all, I should say that I object to its permissive character. I think if we are to legislate at all the former Bill of Sir John Lubbock's was very much better than the present one; that is, that there should be a hard-and-fast hour appointed, and that everyone should have to conform to it. I think the permissive point of the Bill is a very weak point. I do not believe you would ever get it taken advantage of, or put into force.

2292. Would not any injustice such as this might work be very much greater if you fixed a hard-and-fast line for all?—That is possible; but, on the other hand, I do not think you would ever get your two-thirds majority.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

2293. That is, for the district?—For that reason I think it has very little value.

2294. Does it not become almost what you are trying to get, voluntary closing?—Closing by voluntary effort?

2295. Exactly; closing is the great desideratum?—Yes.

2296. That all should close?—Certainly.

2297. But you find in voluntary efforts that one or two can very often throw a whole district into confusion?—Yes, I think that is very much exaggerated, you know; I think the cases where two or three throw a whole district "into confusion," as you put it, must be rare. I think, as Mr. Bryce Grant suggested, that the minority, sooner or later, is won over; I do not think the minority is the gainer by standing out.

2298. But they do stand out, do not they?—They do in cases.

2299. They do stand out, not only for the half-holiday, but for the shorter hours?—In certain cases they do. When you mention the half-holiday, I think that is a decided instance in favour of my view. Sir John Lubbock knows this: We worked together in that half-holiday movement; it was initiated by a few leading houses in the general trade in the West End—I might say quite independently of the Early Closing Association of that day; and when we agreed to close at two o'clock on Saturdays, the number of adherents was comparatively limited; but that movement has gradually grown until it is almost the exception for any first-class business to-day, in London, not to join in it. My point is, that if we had been deterred by the fact that we were only a small minority, we should never have initiated that, or carried it through.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2300. All small traders and drapers in your district close on a Thursday, do not they?—I think they do in some streets.

2301. Within your district?—Oh, yes; in the High-street, I believe.

Mr. Edwards.

2302. Then you have had more success with the half-holiday than with the early closing movement?—In the shortening of hours day by day, do you mean?

2303. No, the closing on one day in the week; the association has had more success in that, has it, than as regards closing early every day?—I am not prepared to say that. From the evidence that has been given I should think that the half-holiday movement on other days has extended a good deal; indeed, extensively, during these last few years. The Saturday half-holiday movement was the first, you know.

2304. I say the half-holiday movement has advanced more than the early closing?—Has advanced more than the early closing every day?

2305. Yes?—I do not know about that; I think there has been a general lessening of hours day by day in London; certainly in the West End.

2306. Do not you know well enough that there are

are complaints made, and very strong complaints, that the hours are excessive?—Yes, in certain districts and in certain trades; but I think the general trend of things has been towards the shortening of hours all through.

2307. And so long as you cannot win over all, your very success makes it all the harder for those who have to work in the shops which do not adopt your policy, does it not?—I do not know that I quite follow you. I do not mean to set up any distinct relation between the two movements, the half-holiday and the early closing. What you call "early closing" is a shortening of the hours day by day?

2308. Yes?—We call both early closing; I think both movements have extended very much during these last few years.

2309. What I mean is this: the very success you have met with in early closing has made the position of those who are assistants in shops which have not adopted it more irksome?—I cannot say that it has; I do not see where the connection comes in.

2310. They see their neighbours happier?—Yes; it brings home their condition to them more forcibly perhaps.

2311. They feel their condition to be worse?—It has not tended to maintain the longer hours for them; on the contrary, it has had rather the contrary effect; early closing in any direction assists early closing in all; that is my point; that is the tendency at all events.

2312. In the last 10 years has there been a general decrease in the hours?—I should say the last 20 years. In the last 10 years particularly there has been a distinct tendency to close earlier all the year round in spite of certain exceptions. That is my firm opinion.

2313. The shops that are open now are not open so late as they used to be, that is my point? No, certainly not.

2314. Then I apprehend that you do not like some other witnesses say that the Bill is bad for London, that is the point of some, that the Bill is in itself bad for London?—It would be more difficult to carry out in London probably; but with every sympathy with its author, I think it is bad all through.

2315. Others have said it is bad for London; that of course admits that it might be good elsewhere, because London does not comprise the whole country as yet although it soon may?—I do not think the principle is good; and still more I think what we are anxious for, and all anxious to secure, may be done by other means.

2316. By voluntary means?—Yes, and public opinion; public opinion is decidedly growing.

2317. I am afraid "public opinion" will not make people shop earlier, will not?—I think it will make them shop at more reasonable hours.

2318. I do not think I should be guided much by "public opinion" if I wanted to shop; I should be guided by whether I found that the shop was open or not?—I do not know whether you have read Lady Jeune's article on Shopping in the "Fortnightly"; that answers a good many of these questions better than I can answer them.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

2319. You confirm the evidence of the last witness, do you?—Generally, as far as my experience goes.

2320. In the West End, with which you are particularly acquainted, I know, do you agree with him that the hours have fallen considerably in the last 10 years?—I should not like to say "considerably"; I think the tendency certainly has been in that direction.

2321. I will take your own case if I may; what is the change there?—I should think that to-day, as compared with 10 years ago, the hours are at least one hour per day less; at any rate we close on an average at least one hour per day earlier.

2322. Have you acted in concert with other big establishments?—Yes, generally.

2323. In your own trade?—Yes, indirectly; we work together. I think the force of the example, probably of a few, has had more effect in bringing in a larger number than anything else.

2324. Taking London as a whole, is it true of the state of trade with regard to big establishments there?—Not to the same extent, I fancy. Still, I think all round there is a general shortening.

2325. Supposing this Bill was carried and enforced, do you consider it would be in favour of your house, the large as against the small tradesmen?—It would not make any difference to us, because we are well within the hours now. Do you mean in bringing others up to our level?

2326. Yes?—I do not think it would make any difference.

2327. Would you say that with regard to other trades than your own?—Well, I can hardly say with regard to other trades; but I cannot imagine that it would make very much difference. I think the real principal explanation of the excessive late shopping is the special requirements and the general indifference of the classes for which the shops exist.

2328. To use a phrase that has been often used, I suppose it is the small and domestic shopkeeper that is the great offender?—Yes; the workman's wife particularly.

2329. The workman's wife who keeps the shop?—No; the workman's wife who goes to buy her goods late at night.

2330. But I am dealing with the shopkeeper; is it the small shopkeeper?—The small shopkeeper, on account of the intense competition, can hardly help himself.

2331. I know you have a large acquaintance with London; do you think difficulties would arise with regard to the local authorities if this Bill were passed?—I do not. I do not fancy the difficulty would be so much with the local authorities as in getting the two-thirds majority. I do not mean with regard to the machinery for getting it, but as to the feeling. I do not think you would easily get a two-thirds majority.

2332. This proposes to treat them as a whole?—I understand it is a local option.

2333. No; it is the London County Council who is the authority outside the City?—Then I do not think it would work.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

2334. What is your trade?—That of general salesmen, silk mercers, drapers, and sundry cognate trades.

2335. Where?—Wigmore-street, in the west-end.

2336. What are about the average hours now on ordinary days?—Half-past six and two o'clock on Saturdays.

2337. You close about half-past six on ordinary days?—Yes, six o'clock perhaps the greater part of the year.

2338. When do you open?—I think, for the purposes of business, we do not open until half-past eight, but the place is really open at seven.

2339. Have the shop assistants to be there from seven until half-past six in the evening?—A few; certain classes of them have, yes.

2340. Not all of them?—Not all of them.

2341. Have you any young persons in your employ?—Oh, yes, a large number.

2342. And they are subject to the Act, I suppose, which limits them to 74 hours per week?—Yes.

2344. That is in arranging the goods, and so forth?—Yes, the execution of orders, and one thing and another.

2345. Packing up?—Yes; that is more on the wholesale side of the business.

2346. You close at two o'clock on Saturdays?—Yes.

2347. Is it customary to close on Saturdays in your part of the town at two o'clock?—Yes, generally.

2348. But I suppose some other parts of the town select other days for the half holiday, do not they?—Yes; it is not so much the different parts of the town as the different classes of trade, I fancy.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2349. In the same streets or the same neighbourhood?—Yes, quite close.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

2350. Is not Wednesday the day for closing in many cases?—Wednesday and Thursday are the two principal days.

2351. Is it more the trade or the place that settles the day they close upon?—Three or four leading trades generally settle it. I believe occasionally one trade alone will close.

2352. On a certain day?—Yes; but I really cannot speak with any authority upon that.

2353. That is all brought about by voluntary arrangement, as I understand?—Entirely.

2354. Are there many that stand out against it?—There is generally a minority; it is difficult to get all in.

2355. Do they get any unfair advantage, do you think, from standing out against it?—They evidently think they do, or, presumably, they would not stand out; but I doubt very much whether public opinion supports them in their attempt to take away trade, as it is called, from their neighbours.

2356. You think that the public would not give any advantage to people whom they thought acting unjustly or unfairly?—No; I think there will always be a section of the public who are always careless and thoughtless; if they find a man open while all his competitors are closed, and they want to buy something, they will go and buy it probably.

2357. I suppose, for the men you talk about in the good neighbourhoods, in the good shops, the voluntary movement will do all that is required?—Certainly; I would go further and say that the early closing movement has unmistakably had the support of, at any rate, that class of the public that support the houses that close early.

2358. How about those poor neighbourhoods where the shops are keep open until nine or 10 o'clock at night; do not you think something requires to be done to shorten the hours there?—It would be a very good thing if something could be done; I should not despair of bringing public opinion to bear, even among the classes that support the shops that keep open late, with a view of getting them to close early. It is obvious, as somebody has put it, that it does not take the working classes 80 hours to spend what it only takes 50 hours to earn; it is a question of adjustment; there is a good deal of carelessness, and unnecessary carelessness, in the matter.

2359. Are you aware that in some of the provincial towns, in the poor parts, the shops are keep open until 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and even until one o'clock on Sunday morning?—I believe so.

2360. And that a great part of the shopping takes place after nine or 10 o'clock on the Saturday evening?—Yes.

2361. And in many cases not until the public-houses have closed?—I have been told generally that the public-houses have more to do with it than anybody else; they keep open late, and the shopping takes place afterwards.

2362. Because the wives cannot get any part of the wages until the husbands come out of the public-house?—That may be the explanation to some extent; but I fancy it is more a matter of habit.

2363. Do not you think that if the hours of closing were reduced from 12 o'clock till nine o'clock that all necessary shopping could be done quite well if the people made the necessary adjustment?—I should think so.

2364. Could

Mr. Samuel Smith—continued.

2364. Could anything be done in the way of later opening to make up for these late hours, so as not to make the work unreasonably severe?—I do not know; it is very difficult to say, because the circumstances vary so much.

Mr. Diamond.

2365. Might I just ask you, you having been a member, or an alderman, of the county council, whether there is such a thing as overlapping with the city authorities and the county council in the matter of district; is there any conflict of authority in regard to local administration in the Metropolis; is not the boundary of the county council jurisdiction clearly defined?—You see it varies so much for different purposes; I do not know that there is much of what you call "overlapping."

2366. Overlapping is not really a practical question in this matter, is it?—No, I should think not.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2366*. One side of a street might be in the City jurisdiction and one side in the London County Council, might it not?—It might be as regards the City.

Mr. Diamond.

2367. I understand a question has been put about a possible conflict of jurisdiction of two bodies; I want to know from you, as a past member of the county council, whether that is a practical difficulty?—I do not think that is a practical difficulty.

2368. You are aware that one objection taken as to work being done after the shop is closed (the season trade) is provided for in the Bill by a special exemption from the local authority; I suppose that would meet the case you suggest?—It is only provided for as regards the actual closing of the shop in the Bill.

2369. Special exemption may be given to certain trades for what is called season work?—For the purpose of opening, or keeping open, rather.

2370. For the purpose of keeping open?—I was speaking of work done after the premises are closed, which this Bill does not pretend to touch. It does not pretend to interfere with that class of work, I understand.

2371. The last witness was strongly opposed to all forms of legislation, and I understand you to say that you concur in his evidence?—I would not like to go so far as that. As a general principle, I think the less the State interferes the better; but I was heartily in sympathy with Sir John Lubbock in the Bill for shortening the hours of young people; in fact, I went further than he did, and advocated 68 hours instead of 74.

Chairman.

2372. You had not to carry the Bill through the House?—Exactly; I still think they might have been made less, but I do not think the evil sought to be remedied, great as it is, can best be overcome by legislation; I believe that voluntary effort and the creation of public opinion on the subject has done a great deal, and will do more.

Chairman—continued.

2373. I find some evidence given in 1886, on the Shop Hours' Regulation Bill, in which you made this statement: "I am inclined to think that voluntary action—persuasion as he calls it" (that is Mr. Sutherst) "has reached very nearly the limits of its powers"; you entirely dissent from that view now; you believe that at the present moment you are receiving very valuable assistance in this movement from what is called voluntary action?—I think we are reaping the benefit of the voluntary action of that day now. I may have been, perhaps, a little desponding at that time, not seeing immediate fruits; but I am quite certain that to-day the shorter hours are largely the outcome of the voluntary efforts of 20 years ago.

2374. Do you think the closing early on Saturdays in the large places is really what you might call entirely for the benefit of the assistants; do you think it is not rather an economical matter; do not you think that, in the case of many of the large shops (I put the question to you as a man of experience), it would not pay them to keep open; they would waste more than they would make?—I think it would pay the great majority of establishments to close earlier; I think it pays us. The early closing, as far as we have got it, is profitable.

2375. That is, the early closing is economical, and to the advantage of the large shopkeeper?—Yes; it is not necessary to think we are all animated by philanthropic spirit in closing earlier than we did; it is economy; it is good business.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2376. The shopkeepers generally will close as early as they possibly can, will they not?—Well, I do not know that shopkeepers generally believe that. I am speaking as a matter of experience. Those who have not tried it are rather reluctant to believe it.

Mr. Diamond.

2377. Perhaps I did not put my question clearly; but what I want to know is this: In voluntarily consenting to an arrangement, or in adopting the system of early closing, it was really much to the advantage of those who adopted it from the economical point of view, and you could not say it was a great triumph for the voluntary principle, seeing that it is paying them to do it?—That, though we did not know it at the time, is an outcome of voluntary effort. I think we may claim it as a splendid result. I put it in this way: The half-holiday movement was not carried through, in the first place, because we thought we were going to save money by it, but because we thought it would be a very fine thing for employers and employés; we have found out also (at any rate, that is my own personal experience) that it is an advantageous thing, economically.

2378. That really is the result of it?—That is the result of it.

2379. There has been something said by previous witnesses which I would like to ask you a question about; if this Bill should become an Act it would be impossible, it is said, to classify the various trades?—Yes, it would be very difficult.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

2380. Now, I ask you to waive for a moment your objections in regard to the principle of the Bill, and answer this question: Do you think there would be any grave difficulty about the matter of classification?—I think there would be very grave difficulty; I think the manifest tendency of things is to bring trades together, to aggregate different kinds of trades.

2382. If you were applying this principle, which, you say, was not then difficult to apply in the way of classification, the fact of whether you were dealing with 12 shops or with four would not greatly differ so long as you arrived at the conclusion. There are not many difficulties in the way of classification. The number of tradesmen would not materially alter the difficulties, would it?—It is so much more difficult to-day to draw the line between one business and another; one business slides into another, instead of having 20 different kinds of businesses in a street, you will find them all aggregated in a general store.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2383. Shops have gone into so many more businesses lately; is not that so?—Yes.

2384. Since the time when that evidence was given?—Ten years make a great difference.

Mr. Diamond.

2385. I understand you to say that the large traders would not be affected by this Bill even if it became law, because they are well within the possible hours that would be adopted?—Certainly; not all large traders, large traders of a particular class. The general stores, who deal more with the working classes, would be affected, or might be probably.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

2387. I was taking your evidence as it stood, and the evidence of the previous witness, as typical of the view of your association, and that is distinctly hostile, as I understand?—I do not know that it is hostile. It is only hostile in a negative sense.

2388. It is directly hostile to this Bill and to legislation of any kind?—Yes, generally; negatively it is; if we think we can do better by voluntary effort obviously we are hostile to legislation.

2389. Do you suppose that if this Bill were put into operation it would make any person who is closing early now keep his shop open longer, seeing that it has been found out, as you have said, that it is absolutely an economy to close early?—No, I do not think that for a moment.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2390. Just follow this one question arising out of that: Those shops that would be now closed late, you consider would not be so friendly disposed towards closing if this Bill was passed as they would be by voluntary action and persuasion being used generally?—I think if the trading community was forced to accept this or any similar measure, they would say, "Now you have got your Bill, what more is wanted? There is an end to the whole thing." The voluntary movement goes farther a great deal, or contemplates going farther, at any rate, than closing places at eight o'clock.

Chairman.

2391. Under this Bill they might close at six; that is the minimum; not eight?—Then it comes to almost the same thing.

2392. I do not wish to put any words into your mouth, but I understood you to say just now, in answer to an honourable Member, that you are not here absolutely to oppose this Bill, but that you think voluntary action, on the whole, will secure the same object, and that that would be preferable?—That is the raison d'être of our association.

2393. Is that the tenour of your evidence to-day?—Personally, I oppose the Bill on many grounds.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2394. You are positively opposed to the Bill, because the first thing you consider is that it would destroy voluntary action, and would not so easily attain what we are wanting to get, and what we now get by voluntary action?—That is one reason, among others.

2395. And another reason is that you consider the Bill unworkable as it is?—Certainly; I do not believe it will ever have any effect.

Mr. ROBERT MACRAE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2396. YOU are Secretary of the Dundee Shop Assistants' Union?—Treasurer, not secretary.

2397. You have been treasurer for some years, have you not?—I have been recently appointed treasurer; previously to that I held the secretaryship for three years.

2398. Of what?—Of the Dundee Shopkeepers' Assistants' Union.

2399. How large is your union?—We have a membership of over 500.

2400. What are your usual hours in Dundee?—From eight in the morning till nine is quite a common occurrence; 9.30 and 10 is also pretty general.

Sir Francis Powell.

2401. Is that in your trade only?—That is generally speaking; and amongst licensed grocers 11 o'clock is quite a common hour.

Chairman.

2402. Now, is there any tendency to shorten those hours?—None whatever generally.

2403. And how about a half-holiday?—The half-holiday we have had in existence for about eight years now. We have over a thousand shops observing a Wednesday half-holiday, closing at three p.m.

2404. Do you think you will be able to maintain the half-holiday?—No.

2405. Why not?—At present we have, in one district of the city, two grocers who are keeping open, and they are keeping the whole of that district open. In another street we have 14 grocers. Only one of the 14 is opposed to the measure; the others are certainly closing just now, but we have intimation from them that unless we get this refractory grocer to close at once they will all break through.

2406. Then you are afraid that unless Parliament assists you, you will lose your half-holiday in Dundee; is that it?—It will amount to that.

2407. Are you hopeful of getting shorter hours by voluntary action?—No.

2408. You think you have gone as far as you can with voluntary action?—We do.

2409. Then is your association in favour of legislation?—Yes.

2410. Have you considered the Bill which is now before this Committee?—The Bill was considered by the assistants at a meeting held last week, and was quite favourably received.

2411. You are generally in favour of it?—There were resolutions to that effect passed at that meeting in favour of the Bill, and in favour of sending a delegate to this Committee.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2412. Was it read and argued clause by clause?—The Bill was explained by the president of our association, and explained in a very lucid manner.

2413. He did not read it?—He did not read it through and through.

Sir Blundell Maple—continued.

2414. They had no copies?—We had copies.

2415. Did each individual have a copy?—Each individual had not.

Chairman.

2416. But it was explained by the president?—Yes.

2417. And do you think that they clearly understood the main provisions of the Bill?—Yes.

2418. You are satisfied on that point?—I am satisfied on that point.

2419. And they approved of the Bill?—They approved of the Bill.

2420. Now you are going to say something to the Committee about the employers, I think?—The employers held a meeting on 19th February 1891, and there was an almost unanimous vote returned in favour of the Bill for Dundee.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2421. Which Bill was that?—Sir John Lubbock's Half-Holiday Bill.

2422. That was not the same as this?—No.

Chairman.

2423. Was it the Half-Holiday Bill or the Early Closing Bill?—The Half-Holiday Bill.

2424. Are there any suggestions you would like to make in detail with reference to the Bill as drawn?—In reference to the Half-Holiday or the Early Closing?

2425. In reference to the Bill now before this Committee: the Early Closing Bill?—The only reference I would like to make to it is that, as far as our city is concerned, we think the only way of bringing it into practice is by taking the City as a whole.

2426. That you can do under the Bill as it stands?—That is the only suggestion I have to offer.

2427. Do you think you would get two-thirds of the shopkeepers in your case?—Quite easily.

2428. And have you any doubt whether your town council would put the Bill into operation if they were requested to do so by the tradesmen?—We have no doubt whatever upon that subject; they have always shown themselves favourable to any movement of the kind.

2429. Therefore, your opinion is in favour of the Bill as it stands?—Quite in favour of it as it stands.

Sir Francis Powell.

2430. What interval have you for meals during the hours of business?—We are allowed one hour for dinner and half-an-hour for tea.

2431. What time of the day do those intervals occur?—Where I am employed we have dinner from 12 to 1 and tea from 5 to 5.30.

2432. Are the hours longer on Saturday than they are on other days in the week?—Yes.

2433. What are the hours on Saturday?—Eight till 11 is the general rule.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

2434. Eight till 11 at night?—Eight in the morning till 11 at night.

Sir Francis Powell.

2435. Do those hours apply to the large shops and the small shops equally, or more to one and less to the other?—More to the smaller shops.

2436. When do the larger shops close?—A certain percentage of the larger shops close at 10 on Saturdays.

2437. Do you confine your answers to me to the drapers' business?—No, to grocers and drapers principally.

2438. Do your answers hold good as regards other trades, such as the hardware trades, ironmongery, and so on?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2439. But you have some close earlier, have you not?—There are a few of the larger drapery warehouses which do not observe the Wednesday afternoon; they close on Saturday at four, some at five.

Sir Francis Powell.

2440. Your Wednesday half-holiday begins at three, I think you said?—Three o'clock is the hour of closing on Wednesday.

2441. As a rule in Dundee, do the shop assistants live at the place of business or with their friends?—With their friends.

2442. At what distance from the business?—At distances varying, I should say, from 200 yards to a mile.

2443. Have you tramcars and other means of locomotion?—We have tramcars and 'buses.

2444. Are they largely used by the shop assistants?—To a considerable extent.

2445. What provision have you in Dundee as regards seats for the assistants in the shops?—None whatever.

2446. Are the assistants compelled to stand during the whole hours of business?—Yes.

2447. You have no seats of any kind?—No seats of any kind.

2448. Suppose the business is slack, as it must be now and again, have they no means of resting for a few moments?—There is not very much rest to be found for them; there is always something to do.

2449. Then, when there is no customer in, there are odds and ends of routine business which require attention?—Which require attention.

2450. What, in your opinion, is the health of the shop assistants in Dundee?—Well, as far as Dundee is concerned, I have had no cases brought under my notice of actual illness being caused by long hours.

2451. I suppose a large portion of the shop assistants do not remain as such during the whole of their lives?—Well, the chances of becoming masters are now smaller than ever they were.

2452. Why?—Because the majority of places are got up on such a large scale now that there is less chance for individuals becoming masters. Large warehouses are doing the most of the business now, and smaller shops have not the same chance as the larger.

2453. I presume a considerable proportion of the women enter into married life, and cease to be shop assistants?—A large percentage of them do, I understand.

2454. And cease to be shop assistants?—They cease to be shop assistants.

2455. Then you will not have amongst the women many who are at all advanced in life; it would be quite the exception to have a female shop assistant advanced in life or beyond middle age?—Quite an exception.

Mr. Edwards.

2456. You represent a large society, do you?—Yes.

2457. Is it a mixed society, or only shop assistants?—Assistants only.

2458. Do you know anything about the feeling of the shopkeepers in Dundee, as apart from the assistants?—The feeling of the masters?

2459. Yes?—The great majority are in favour of legislation.

2460. The great majority of the masters in Dundee are in favour of this Bill?—In favour of this Bill.

2461. That includes small as well as large?—Small as well as large employers.

2462. You know what the provisions of the Bill are?—Yes.

2463. Have you had any conversation with any of the smaller shopkeepers?—I have, repeatedly.

2464. Have they ever expressed any fear to you that the Bill will do them harm?—No, they have expressed no such fear.

2465. You suggest that the small shopkeepers will be in danger of being wiped out, because they make their money to a great extent by late shoppers, and if there are no late shoppers there will be no late shops?—They have not expressed themselves in that way.

2466. They do not fear the Bill?—They do not fear the Bill.

2467. The witness who immediately preceded you (Mr. Debenham) has found that closing early on one day of the week has resulted in a saving of expense; would early closing enable the small shopkeepers to compete better or to compete worse with their neighbours: would it give them any advantage in competing with their neighbours, or would it be a disadvantage to them?—A disadvantage to the smaller shops, you mean?

2468. Yes?—I do not think it would be.

2469. Would it be a saving to them; it would be a saving, I suppose?—As far as gas was concerned, it would be.

2470. You say you know a case where two men have been able to prevent the early closing movement?—The half-holiday movement?

2471. The half-holiday; not the early closing?—Not the early closing.

2472. They have succeeded in preventing it?—They have succeeded in preventing it.

2473. The others did not close?—They did close for a certain time; but directly those two fell through, they all opened together.

2474. Because they were afraid of losing customers?—That is so.

2475. And

Mr. Edwards—continued.

2475. And that is really, I suppose, why shops are kept open so late at night, that people hope that at the very last they may get, not "the early worm," but the late one?—That is it.

2476. But the "late worm" has no business to be out so late you think?—None whatever.

2477. There is one point that has been spoken about, that is the question of the assistants remaining in the shops afterwards; you do not think there is any need of putting anything in the Bill to limit the attendance of the assistants after the closing of the shops; I will put it in another way: Do you think that the assistants in shops will be kept in the shop tidying up or for any other purpose, longer under early closing than they would be if this Act never passed?—In some cases that would happen.

2478. In what cases?—Well, grocers, as a rule, have a great deal of preparation of one kind and another.

2479. Preparation over night?—Well, they have occasionally to do half-an-hour and an-hour after the shop is closed; there is what is known as getting up stock, getting parcels of tea, sugar, &c., ready for the following day's sales, or for any busy day coming on.

2480. But that time which the assistants would be kept would not be longer under this Bill that it is now, would it?—No.

2481. It would make no difference?—It would make no difference.

2482. And, therefore, if they close now at 10, and closed under the Bill at eight, it would be a gain anyhow?—It would be a gain any way.

2483. You have had considerable experience, you say, of early closing?—Of the half-holiday particularly.

2484. Then, in Dundee, the early closing is for the whole town; there is no dividing of the district; it comprises the whole town, does it?—It would have to take in the whole town; there are really no convenient boundaries, I think, to divide it into districts.

2485. When you had it, it would apply to the whole town?—To the whole town.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

2486. Do you think you would get two-thirds to vote at Dundee for early hours?—Quite easily; I have no hesitation in saying that.

2487. The Bill allows closing as early as six; what do you think would be the hour they would adopt?—Eight o'clock.

2488. That is the general idea?—That is the general idea.

2489. How long do they keep open on the average just now?—Nine o'clock is a common hour amongst drapers, 10 with grocers, and 11 with licensed grocers.

2490. Is that every night of the week?—Every night of the week.

2491. So that in the case of licensed grocers the shop assistant will have about 15 hours in the shop every day?—That is so.

2492. That is 90 hours a week?—That is so.

Mr. Samuel Smith—continued.

2493. Surely that is very exhausting; are not they completely exhausted?—I should fancy so; I have not worked those hours myself, but I know those who do.

2494. Is the atmosphere gassy and bad?—It is inclined to be after the gases have been lit some time; it does get very stuffy and close.

2495. Does not that injure the health seriously, especially of females?—It causes depression at the time; whether it permanently injures the health I am not prepared to say.

2496. With regard to poor neighbourhoods, is there no distinction in the hours of closing in Dundee between good neighbourhoods and poor neighbourhoods?—It is in the poorer neighbourhoods that the longer hours are worked.

2497. Do you think that the working classes could do their shopping before eight o'clock if they liked?—Quite easily.

2498. Even on Saturdays?—I think they could do it earlier, because the majority of the works cease at two o'clock at the latest.

2499. They cease at two o'clock?—Two o'clock, the mills and factories.

2500. Has the closing of the public-houses anything to do with going to the shops; do you find, for instance, that the people come in after the public-houses are closed?—That is the case in a great many of the poorer districts.

2501. What hour do the public-houses close?—Eleven o'clock.

2502. Then the people come in after 11?—Then they come in after 11 in the poorer districts; that is on the Saturday nights.

2503. And you think that if eight o'clock were the hour they would just make their arrangements and probably spend some of the money in the shops which at present is spent in the public-houses?—That is so.

2504. Of course a great deal of drinking goes on between eight and 11 in public-houses?—I suppose the bulk of it goes on then.

Chairman.

2505. Has your Trades' Council at Dundee passed any resolution in reference to the legislation for earlier closing?—I do not know that they have passed any resolution. We are under treaty with them just now to affiliate with their union, and they are quite in favour of the Bill, and spoke favourably of it at our meeting last week; several delegates from the Trades Council did so.

2506. Therefore, you think you can speak to the fact that the Trades Council is favourable to the Bill?—The Trades Council is quite favourable to it.

Sir Francis Powell.

2507. How many members are there on the Trades Council?—I am not prepared to state that.

2508. Can you tell me, roughly?—Really I could not give a guess. We have had as many as six delegates at a time speaking at our meetings; but, as regards the actual number of members of the Trades Council I could not say what it is.

2509. How many do they represent?—Of the different trades?

2510. How many do the delegates represent?—The delegates represent one trade each.

2511. How many would there be in each trade?—Well, as far as the Trades Council are concerned they are only allowed one delegate for every 50 members, I understand.

Sir Francis Powell—continued.

Chairman.

2512. And you think that they would fairly represent the general feeling of the working class in Dundee?—Yes, they have expressed themselves so.

Friday, 5th April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Baldwin.	Sir John Gorst.
Mr. Cameron Corbett.	Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.
Mr. Diamond.	Sir John Lubbock.
Dr. Farquharson.	Sir Blundell Maple.
Mr. Frederick Frye.	Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM GREENWOOD, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2513. YOU are, I believe, chairman of the Northern Federation of Hair Dressers?—Yes.

2514. That is a large association, is it not?—It numbers about 750.

2515. And that is including branches?—Yes.

2516. You have branches in many of the principal towns in the north?—Yes, round about Manchester principally; in Manchester and round about.

2517. What are the hours of the hairdressers generally in your part of the country?—Some of them work very long hours; from 80 to 90 hours, some of them do.

2518. From 80 to 90 hours per week?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2519. Does that include Sunday work?—Yes.

Chairman.

2520. And you have communicated, I believe, with a certain number of trades organisations on the subject of this Bill?—We have.

2521. Are you prepared to put in any evidence as to their opinions?—No, I am not prepared to put in any evidence, excepting that we have had resolutions passed by certain trades organisations, such as trades councils, and that kind of thing, supporting what we ask for, namely, the compulsory closing of hairdressing shops on Sunday.

2522. Perhaps you will put in a list of the associations you have communicated with that have passed those resolutions. Will you give us the trades associations first and the trades councils afterwards?—The Northern Counties Federation of Hair Dressers, the Manchester Society of Hair Dressers, the Ashton-under-Lyne Society of Hair Dressers, the Bolton Society of Hair Dressers, and the Bury Society of Hair Dressers, and the Oldham Society of Hair Dressers.

2523. Do those comprise the principal hairdressers' societies in the north of England?—Yes, round about Manchester.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2524. Are they all included in the 750?—Yes, these are included in the 750.

Chairman.

2525. They are separate trade organisations?—Yes, they are separate trade organisations, all combining to make up the 750.

2526. Then you mentioned trades councils; will you give us the names of the different trades councils?—The Ashton-under-Lyne Trades Council and the Manchester Trades Council; we went before the Salford Corporation and they promised to support us; and the Ashton-under-Lyne Corporation Watch Committee promised to support us.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2527. Support what?—Support us in closing hairdressers' shops on the Sunday.

Chairman.

2528. But I understood you in the first instance to say that you were in favour of the Bill now before the Committee?—No; it is the insertion of a clause in the Bill for closing shops on Sunday that I have come down specially about.

2529. The resolution you sent me was a resolution in favour of the Bill, but asking the Committee to insert a clause for closing on Sunday?—Yes; that is our way of looking at it.

2530. Therefore it is in favour of the Bill, but at the same time you ask for a clause for closing on Sundays?—Yes.

2531. Now let us be quite clear about it: these associations and trades councils that you have mentioned passed resolutions and sent them to you, approving of the Bill, and requesting the Committee to add a clause relating to Sunday closing?—That is so.

2532. Are there any other modifications in the Bill that you wish to see introduced?—No, not that I know of.

2533. You are quite satisfied with the Bill as it stands, but you wish to see a clause introduced relating to Sunday closing?—Exactly.

2534. And you think that is the feeling of the hairdressers generally throughout the north of England?—Yes, of the great majority of the hairdressers throughout the north of England.

2535. And in the districts with which you are acquainted do you think that a majority of two-thirds of your trade could be obtained in order to get earlier closing?—I do.

2536. Have you any opinion as to the other trades, whether two-thirds would be obtained generally in the north of England, or would you be prepared to give any evidence on that point?—So far as we have been able to ascertain I think that would be so. I am speaking now of tobacconists, confectioners, and such like shops as those, that are open now at present. I think two-thirds could be easily obtained, in our district at any rate.

2537. Do you think that there would be any difficulty in getting the local authorities to put the Act into force if a two-thirds majority was obtained?—I do not.

2538. Do you think there is much prospect of getting shorter hours by voluntary action?—No.

2539. Then on the whole, the general tenour of your evidence is that the federation which you represent are in favour of this Bill, with the addition of a Sunday clause?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

2540. Is there any particular place that you know better than another; is the north of England your headquarters?—Ashton-under-Lyne I know more particularly than any other place in the north of England.

2541. If you come to apply this Bill to Ashton-under-Lyne, would you do so as one area or as several areas?—Our society in Ashton-under-Lyne includes Stalybridge, Dukinfield, Hyde, and the surrounding districts; and I think we should have no difficulty in putting it in force in those districts round about where I am particularly located.

2542. Do you think there would be any difficulty in getting unanimity in all those districts?—I think not; I think we should get unanimity all round.

2543. You would agree, not only to a particular day or days, for instance, for early closing, but you would agree to a particular time on those days, would you?—Yes; we have, in fact, done so already in our district; we have agreed to close all the shops so many days a week; one half-day in the week in particular; on Tuesday afternoon we close all our hairdressers' shops in the district I am particularly acquainted with.

2544. That is a voluntary arrangement?—That is a voluntary arrangement, and pretty unanimous.

2545. Consequently, I suppose, you have a good deal of faith in voluntary arrangement?—Not with regard to the Sunday labour.

2546. But with regard to week-day labour?—Yes.

2547. You think that voluntary arrangement may be very effective with regard to week-day labour?—It has been very effective in our particular district. But when you come to Manchester, voluntary arrangement falls through directly, Manchester being a large city, and particularly with regard to Sunday closing.

2548. But let us keep to week-day closing now, during the week-days, and not including Saturdays; I mean the first five days of the week; you say that in Manchester there would be difficulty in bringing about anything effective by voluntary action?—I do.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

2549. But yet in Stalybridge, Ashton-under-Lyne, and those places in your particular area that you are familiar with, you have an arrangement which is, you say, effective?—Yes, we have, and it works very well.

2550. Then why is it that you think that in Manchester it would not be so effective?—Because there are so many interests in Manchester, and in different districts their interest lies in different ways. For instance, in the centre of the city there is nobody who opens his shop late at night, or on Sunday at all; but in the outlying districts, in the working-class population part, they do open very much there.

2551. And there is a great demand, I suppose, for late hours; I mean that a great many people in the working-class districts cannot go and get shaved or shampooed early in the day?—That is so in the places where they reside; there is a demand for late hours, and in those districts, on a Sunday, it has been very often found, when the district has been canvassed, that there has been a great majority in favour of closing shops on Sunday, but one or two, or three or four, in a district have been able to upset the whole affair, that is with its being voluntary. But if we could get a clause inserted in this Bill, then we could compel them to close, it would have a much better effect. Of course we have tried the law of Charles II., but we have found great difficulty in getting magistrates to convict upon that law, because, as they say, it is almost obsolete.

2552. Then it comes to this: that in a big centre where there are a great many different interests, this voluntary system is practically a dead letter; you cannot work it?—That is so.

2553. Whereas in the district you know best it has been effective?—Yes.

2554. With regard to particular parts of districts, take a town like Manchester which, I understand, you know?—Yes, I do.

2555. Would it be easy to divide Manchester up into districts, or would you rather take a poll of all the people in Manchester and Salford, treating them as one district?—If we took a poll of the whole of the people of Manchester, treating them as one district, we should have a very great majority of people in favour of voluntary closing, if we took them all as one district and allowed the majority to rule.

2556. On the principle of this Bill, you mean to say?—Yes, we should have a great majority.

2557. But would it be possible to get such a poll; could you work it with the machinery?—Yes.

2558. By what machinery would you work it?—We should work it by the northern counties machinery, as far as we are concerned.

2559. The machinery of your society?—Yes; the machinery of our society.

2560. Would your society undertake to find out what the will of the majority of the people was?—Most decidedly we could do that; we have done it one or two occasions.

2561. In the districts that you are acquainted with

with do the hairdressers carry on any other trade besides that of hairdressing?—Some of them.

2562. Some of them are tobacconists?—Yes.

2563. Or newsvendors?—Yes; tobacconists and newsvendors, and that class of people.

2564. Are you familiar with the Bill which is before the Committee?—I am not very familiar with the Bill.

2565. If you have got a copy of the Bill you will notice in the Schedule, on page 6, that tobacconists' shops and news agencies are excluded from the operation of the Bill?—Yes, I have noticed that.

2566. Can you give the Committee any idea how you would work at shops which carried on the business of hairdressing, and also was either a news agency or a tobacconist's shop?—I should say that the clause should read somewhat after this sort: that all hairdressers carrying on any other business should be obliged to close that business as well; because if you allow one business to be open and the other closed there is no doubt it would work in between. If they carried on hairdressing and tobacconist's business I would rather see that they should close both the hairdressing and the tobacconist's business. I think that would work better.

2567. Close them both?—Yes.

2568. In the event of any difficulty arising among the hairdressers in a particular district, that is to say, any doubt being cast upon the signatures, supposing you went by the signatures of the members of your trade, what would you do to prove it; how could you make it good, as it were?—If we were asked to get the signatures we should get them in the ordinary way, and I should think persons' signatures would be sufficient. I do not see how we could adopt any system of getting proof except by the person's signature.

2569. You think that your society would make itself responsible for those signatures, and would, in the event of any dispute arising upon them, give ample proof that they were genuine?—Most decidedly.

Dr. Farquharson.

2570. I suppose that the sale of perfumes and soap, and things of that sort, is a legitimate part of a hairdresser's business, and would not constitute itself another trade?—No, not as a rule.

2571. Mr. Tennant has been asking you about the difficulty if a hairdresser sold tobacco at the same time; but if a hairdresser sells perfumes or soap, that is a legitimate part of a hairdresser's business, and would not be considered as constituting another trade, would it?—No, I should not consider it as constituting another trade.

2572. An honourable Member suggests umbrellas. There is a pretty wide range of articles that they do sell, is there not?—Yes, there is.

2573. But you would consider it a legitimate part of a hairdresser's business, and it would not constitute itself another trade or occupation?—I should consider that umbrellas did constitute another trade; but perfumes and soaps, and brushes and combs, and things of that kind, I should think belong to the hairdresser's trade itself.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

2574. You are the secretary for an association of hairdressers?—I am the chairman.

2575. Have you taken part in the trade yourself; have you been a hairdresser?—Yes, all my life.

2576. Where?—In Ashton-under-Lyne.

2577. You are still a hairdresser?—Yes, I am still.

2578. Are there a large number of hairdressers' shops in Ashton-under-Lyne?—In our society we have about 84.

2579. And they are pretty unanimous in supporting legislation on the lines of the Bill before the Committee?—They are.

2580. Do you consider that the public would be inconvenienced in their hairdressing arrangements by the earlier closing?—I do not; I consider that the greater part of the people that use hairdressing shops on Sunday morning are those people that devote Saturday night to drinking and debauchery, and one thing and another, and have not time to go to be shaved. I am speaking about Sunday now in particular.

2581. Is it about Sunday closing that you are giving evidence mostly?—Yes, it is about Sunday closing principally.

2582. You are not giving evidence about earlier closing on week-days?—No, not particularly.

Chairman.

2583. But you have stated, and we should like to get it quite clear, that you are in favour of the Bill generally, but that you wish for an amendment with reference to Sunday?—Most decidedly.

2584. Therefore you are giving evidence about week-days?—I am.

Dr. Farquharson.

2585. Then you are not of opinion that you and your fellow hairdressers would suffer professionally, or in your business, from this earlier closing?—No, I do not think so; not in our district in particular.

2586. But supposing that you shut up your hairdressers' shops and the chemists kept their shops open, people who wanted to buy perfumes instead of going to you would go to the chemists, would they not?—Yes, they might.

2587. And that might be a loss?—That might be a loss.

2588. But you would not mind facing that loss for the good of your fellow tradesmen?—That is the feeling of our society.

2589. I just want to ask you one more question, then, as you yourself are familiar with the conditions of life of the hairdressers and their assistants; do you consider that their health suffers from the long hours that they have to work at present?—Yes, I do. I consider that their health has suffered very materially in districts where they work very long hours; as I have told the Committee, from 80 to 90 hours per week.

2590. That is one reason why you want the earlier closing, that the health of the hairdressers' assistants suffers, and you want to relieve them from that; is that one reason why you you want earlier closing, in order to obviate the danger to health that now arises from late hours?—Of course, I am not a medical man, and I would not like to say that distinctly. I know that there are people whose health has suffered.

Chairman.

2591. The honourable Member asked you whether your desire for earlier closing was, for one reason, because in your opinion the health of the assistants suffers?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

2592. You told us just now that in your experience the health of the assistants in Ashton-under-Lyne in your trade suffers from the late hours?—I was speaking more generally then about Manchester. I told you that at Ashton-under-Lyne we have been successful in closing the shops and bringing the hours down to something like what this Bill says, 74 hours per week in our district; but in other districts that I am familiar with, especially Manchester, I know they work very long hours, and a lot of them have suffered in health through that, but not in our particular district.

Mr. Lawson.

2593. Does your association contain both shopkeepers and shop assistants?—Yes, we have both shopkeepers and shop assistants connected with the association.

2594. In what proportion could you say?—I could not give you the proportions.

2595. Does your association contain small shopkeepers who do not employ assistants?—Yes, a great many.

2596. At the present moment, of course, those men are able to protect themselves if they want to?—They could shut up the shops, certainly.

2597. You speak, do you not, for the barbers' trade generally, throughout the North?—Yes.

2598. Do you yourself own a shop of a large class?—I have two shops; I employ three assistants.

2599. What sort of people come to your shops to be shaved and have their hair cut?—Various kinds; we have a great many shopkeepers and shopkeepers' assistants, and we have one shop where a great many of the working classes come.

2600. Yours is not a working-class clientèle then?—One of them is.

2601. They come, I suppose, after their work is done in the factories and workshops?—Yes.

2602. What time would that be, in your own town?—From 5.30 to about 9; we close at 9, and we do not open on Sundays at all.

2603. Your trade particularly, of course, depends upon public convenience?—Yes, certainly.

2604. It would be utterly impossible for the working men to come during their hours of work?—Some of them. Some of them, of course, have an hour at dinner-time, and they take it, if they like, out of that.

2605. But if you want to be shaved, of course you must come yourself; you cannot send your wife?—Most decidedly not.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

2606. Therefore the work must be done in the working-class district after the factories are closed?—Yes.

2607. Should I be right in saying that very little work would be done before the factories are closed?—In some districts.

2608. So that in a district of that sort, although the shop might be open during the middle of the day, it would not be right to say that the people were engaged in actual labour?—It is so.

2609. In a shop of that sort the hours of labour would not be long, except for the fact that people might be forced to stay in the shop?—That is so; they are supposed to stay in the shop; of course, if they go away, they lose so much.

2610. Therefore, in those cases there can be no complaint of excessive exertion on the part of shopkeepers?—Not in those cases.

2611. And that would include the working-class districts of the north?—Yes.

2612. Would it not be an inconvenience to working people if they were unable to go at their ordinary time, after having had tea, we will say, to be shaved, or have their hair cut?—It would be, if the shops were closed very early, it would be a very great inconvenience.

2613. As early, for example, as six?—As early as six, that would not do.

2614. Or seven o'clock?—The shops in the working-class district require to be open later than that.

2615. Yet, of course, you are aware that under this Bill a town, or even London, is treated as a whole, and therefore, supposing the local authority so determined, their order would apply to the New Cut or to Grosvenor-square, and to anywhere else in the West End?—I do not think that would be workable.

2616. Then you would not be in favour of adopting one hour of closing for the whole of your trade over a locality, irrespective of the character of the different districts?—I should not.

2617. With regard to the Sunday closing of your shops, of course that comes under the Act of Charles II.?—Yes, we have been able, in some instances, to get convictions under that Act, but we have not upon all occasions; the magistrates refuse.

2618. But the Act is on the Statute Book?—Yes.

2619. It is a mere matter of its being enforced by the magisterial and judicial authorities?—Yes.

2620. The Act of Charles II. prohibits any trade being carried on on Sunday where money passes, is not that so?—No; one part of it says this (and we have been many times defeated upon it), that a person must not follow his legitimate occupation on Sunday; so that if a man works in a factory during the week, and then on a Sunday he comes to shave, he follows the occupation of shaving on Sunday, and the magistrates have no power to fine that man.

2621. But in the case of a regular barber's or a hairdresser's shop, provided that the same people were employed and the ordinary course of business was followed, you have the power of obtaining a conviction, if the magistrates so choose, choose, under the present Act, have you not?—Yes, we have done so.

2622. My point is, with regard to that, that the Act is on the Statute Book, and the question has, I believe, gone to a Committee of the House of Lords whether it should be modified; but you do not require anything more than you have got, I suppose?—Yes, we do.

2623. What more do you require in that respect?—We require power to close the shops on Sunday, hairdressers' shops in particular.

2624. But they cannot be open legally?—But they are opened.

2625. Then you or anybody else can, and I believe some bodies have, prosecuted?—Yes, but it has been so unsatisfactory to get a conviction that it has really made the Act almost a dead letter.

2626. Are you not of opinion that that is due to the fact that people generally think the Act somewhat antiquated, and that it is unfair to press too hardly upon business men?—Magistrates have taken that view.

2627. That is not a matter of statute; that is a matter of public opinion?—Magistrates have taken that view.

2628. And that is the complaint you have to make then, that magistrates have taken too lenient a view of the provisions of the existing law?—Yes, that is our complaint.

Chairman.

2629. The fine is limited to 2*s.* 6*d.*, is it not, under the existing law?—The fine is limited to 2*s.* 6*d.*

2630. And that you find quite inoperative?—That we find quite inoperative.

Mr. Lawson.

2631. Because the magistrates will not convict?—They have convicted.

2632. But in some cases you say they will not convict?—In some cases they will not convict.

2633. To revert for one moment, did you say you were in favour of treating Manchester as a whole?—No.

2634. You are in favour of treating places district by district?—Yes.

2635. And making a different provision according to the wants of the population?—Most decidedly.

2636. Would you be in favour then of giving the municipality which deals with the whole area the power of deciding?—No, I am speaking about Sunday closing now. You have taken me from one to the other.

2637. When you ask me if I am in favour of whole districts for Sunday closing, then I am in favour of it, but not for the general closing during the week.

2638. But the Act of Charles II. applies to the whole country?—It does.

2639. It is the absolute law, it is not a question of the local authority enforcing it, but it stands upon the Statute Book the same for all parts of the kingdom?—Yes.

2640. Then can you have anything stronger than that?—Yes; because, as I say, it is obsolete, and we find great difficulty in getting it put into force.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

2641. That is because magistrates do not wish to put it into force; but in any case, whatever the statute, if the authorities did not enforce it, it would be of no effect; that is so, is it not?—Yes.

2642. I want to take you to the general question of the Bill as it refers to week-days. Would you be in favour of giving the authority which dealt with a great area such as Manchester or, still more, London, with different districts, and a population of a different character in each, the power of enforcing this Act absolutely?—No, I do not think that would be workable.

2643. What would you propose, then?—I should propose to give it to the different districts, and allow the authorities of those districts to judge.

2644. But where you have a corporation for the whole of a city or a county, would you give the power to them in that case?—I think they would be the best people to judge; they would have representatives from the whole of the districts.

2645. Supposing that what you propose were carried out, and that a different hour were fixed in one district as against another, I suppose the effect would be to force the people who wanted to be shaved or have their hair cut after a certain hour, to go from one district to another for the purpose?—In certain districts, of course, there is no call or no desire for having the shops open to a late hour.

2646. They close now, do they?—They do.

2647. Then, what more do you want. If you say they close now in what people call the better class districts, the well-to-do districts, at an early hour, and at the other districts they are only kept open for the convenience of the people, and must be kept open, what change is necessary?—As I told you, in the first instance, I am here to speak more particularly about Sunday closing.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

2648. Most of the members of your association are shopkeepers, are they not; are the majority shopkeepers rather than assistants?—The majority are shopkeepers rather than assistants.

2649. Then you say that you have a great many small shopkeepers in the association?—Yes.

2650. Do you find that the small shopkeepers are in favour of legislation for compulsory closing?—Yes, a majority of them.

2651. You have had experience of the working class trade; would it be your impression that the working classes would be greatly inconvenienced supposing that such an hour was fixed as the majority of shopkeepers in the district would wish for?—I should like that question more definite.

2652. What I mean is this: supposing that we gave power to the shopkeepers in a particular district to close at a particular hour where there was a two-thirds majority, is it your opinion that all the shopkeepers would close at such an hour as would cause cause the working class inconvenience?—No, they would lose the trade if they did.

2653. Do you think then that the working class would not suffer any inconvenience from this power being general to the trades?—They would not suffer.

2654. When do you find that the majority of factories close in your neighbourhood; when do the working men get away from their work?—From about 5 to 5.30 on ordinary days, and from about 12.30 to 1 on Saturdays.

2655. So that you do not think there is any necessity for stopping the barbers' work at such an hour as 9 in the evening?—I think that the majority of barbers would close at 9 in the evening.

2656. Then, in fact, you do not think it is necessary for the working classes' convenience that they should shop as late as they do at present in some neighbourhoods?—I do not.

2657. It is really a matter of thoughtlessness on their part rather than of necessity, their going on so late, would you say?—It is so; I have known people go away into the country and come back at a very late hour and expect to be attended to.

2658-9. Would you attribute the failure of the present Sunday closing legislation to the fact that there can only be a fine of 2*s.* 6*d.*?—That has to do with it, but in some cases I have known people pay the fine and go on again.

2660. That is to say they really earn more by keeping open on Sunday than would pay the 2*s.* 6*d.*?——

2661. So that the general opinion has come to be, among the magistrates and others, that the present Sunday Closing Act is an unworkable measure?—Yes.

2662. I understand your answer to my question to embody really your final impressions, having thought over the matter here?—Yes.

Mr. Frye.

2663. What number of hours do you work in your business on Sundays?—I do not work our business at all on Sundays; but the general body commences at about seven or eight o'clock in the morning and works until about one, those that do open on Sundays.

2664. Then there is no occasion really to open your business on a week day very early, is there?—We open at eight in the morning.

2665. Do you begin business as early as that?—Yes.

2666. And you close at what time?—Nine o'clock at night, excepting Saturday, when we close at 11.

2668. Then the larger shops, where there are a great number of assistants employed, close much earlier?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond.

2669. You were asked, as to small tradesmen, whether they could not protect themselves by closing when they liked if they desired to do so; but, of course, 10 or 12 might close and one or two keep open in a district?—That is so.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

2670. And that would constitute in your mind a hardship and a necessity for something being done to make the two or three people conform to the general desire of the rest of the tradesmen; is that so?—That is so, with regard to Sunday in particular. As I said before, the very great majority of them do close on Sunday; but it is just the few in certain districts that keep open that cause the others to have to keep open to keep the trade; because if they go to them on Sunday they go to them on Monday and Tuesday and during the week, that is what they say.

2671. At present, I suppose, in all large towns there is much earlier closing in certain districts than in others?—Yes, at present.

2672. You were asked as to whether or not, if this Bill become law, and one district were closed early and another closed later, that would not send people from the one district to the other; but where that is done at present by voluntary arrangement, as it were, you do not see that there would be grave difference if it were to be done by law; the effect would be practically the same, would it not?—Most decidedly. In some districts of Manchester they close at 7 at night, and in other districts they do not close until 9 or 10 o'clock.

2673. You speak more particularly for Ashton-under-Lyne, I understand?—Yes, and Manchester as well.

2674. Could you say whether or not that sends everybody who wants to be shaved from one district where the shops are closed to another district where the shops are open?—No, because people leave those districts where the shops are closed early, and there is no one there to do business with.

2675. That is to say, the shops are closed because there is no necessity for their being open?—Yes.

2676. In regard to the areas, do you see any good reason why in a large town, say with eight or nine wards, and each of those wards being polled, and the tradesmen arriving at the hours which they believe will be suitable for themselves and their customers, the town council, as representing the whole of the district, should not be empowered to fix the hours for each area in accordance with the desire of the tradesmen living in that area?—I have already said so.

2677. You see no objection to that?—No, I see no objection to that.

2678. You would see no objection to the Corporation of Manchester, the Manchester town council, enforcing different hours in different districts where the people decided to close at a certain time, but those times varying?—Certainly not.

2679. Do you think that in many districts there are much longer hours worked now than are at all necessary?—Yes, particularly on a Sunday. I do not think it is necessary to have that Sunday labour myself at all.

2680. How about Saturday nights?—They require to work later on Saturday nights, say to 11 o'clock.

2681. What is the present hour of closing, say, say, in your district on Saturday night?—Eleven o'clock.

2682. You think 11 o'clock would still be necessary under this Bill?—Yes, on Saturday night I do; but you must bear in mind that we close at 1 on a Tuesday.

2683. You have a half holiday?—Yes, and we counteract it by that. But it is necessary to keep the shops open until 11 on Saturday night in our district.

2684. As a tradesman yourself, and studying the interests of the public, do you think that anybody would be injured, either large tradesmen or small tradesmen, or the public inconvenienced seriously, by such hours as might be enforced under this Bill if it were passed into law?—As I understand the Bill, it gives shopkeepers 74 hours a week; and if it is so I do not think so.

2685. You would allow the shopkeepers to determine their own time for opening and closing?—Yes, in certain districts. For instance, if we keep open on Saturday night till 11, if we have half a day on Tuesday, we think we are counteracting that by giving the assistants the half day.

2686. And you think that as much as can be done has been done by the voluntary effort; or do you think that anything more can be done to shorten the hours or stop Sunday opening by voluntary effort without the aid of an Act of Parliament?—On Sunday I do not think so; but during the week, in our district, we have been able to regulate the matter very nicely, and so that we can work comfortably all round and without suffering from ill-health or anything else; but in districts where the Sunday opening is practised I think it is a great hardship, both to the assistants and small shopkeepers.

2687. Then I understand your answer to be this: that you are satisfied with the hours as they exist at present during the week; is that so?—So far as we are concerned, yes.

2688. But your difficulty is with the Sunday opening?—Yes.

Mr. Baldwin.

2689. In your district, as I understand it, a half holiday in the week is now general?—Yes.

2690. That is in all trades?—Except butchers, tobacconists, and confectioners.

2691. Then what you chiefly want now is legislation to make closing on Sundays compulsory?—Yes.

2692. Would you, then, make it impossible for a man to come to you to be shaved on Sunday morning?—Yes.

2693. I was rather struck by an answer which you gave, and I should like to know whether it is your deliberate opinion that working men who come to be shaved on Sunday morning have spent the Saturday night in drinking and debauchery. Is that your deliberate opinion?—I said the great majority of them. I do not say all of them.

2694. Have you any ironworks in your district of Ashton-under-Lyne?—Yes.

2695. How about the bricklayers who come on on Saturday night to work all night; when would they get shaved if there was not a shop open for them on Sunday morning?—They generally find time in the dinner-hour, or before they go to work.

Mr. Baldwin—continued.

2696. Still, they work all Saturday night to repair the furnaces, do they not?—Yes.

2697. Surely they might want to be shaved on Sunday morning?—In our district I do not think they can get shaved on Sunday; they have to make prior arrangements.

2698. Your experience is in the north of England entirely, is it not?—Yes.

2699. And in the towns?—Yes.

2700. You know nothing of country districts, I take it, at all?—Yes, I do know something; but I have not any practical experience of the country. I know something through being Chairman of the Northern Counties Hairdressers' Federation; we have a good many country hairdressers among our members.

2701. In the small towns?—Yes; I do know something of their work.

2702. And are their views the same as yours?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2703. You find that the hours of closing on every week day are satisfactory in your neighbourhood?—Yes.

2704. And it is particularly in regard to Sunday work that you wish to have an alteration made in the Bill?—Yes.

2705. Now, as regards Sunday work, if you close the shops would you pass any rule to prevent your assistants going out and shaving people and cutting their hair on Sunday?—Yes; I should take it that if the shop is closed the assistants would not be allowed to do so, excepting that you could not regulate what they should do themselves; but I mean directly from the shop. If they went on their own account that would be the assistants' own look out; you cannot regulate them like that. You can say that they shall take no orders from the shop direct; but I would not prevent them from doing it for themselves.

2706. Then supposing your men started shaving and cutting hair at the corner of the street, what would you do about that?—I should have something to say to them about that.

2707. As regards this particular Bill, have you ever read this Bill through clearly?—I have read the Bill through.

2708. Are you quite sure you have?—Yes, I have.

2709. Then why do you say that this Bill limits the hours of labour to 74 hours per week; there is not a word about hours in it?—That is as I understand the Bill.

2710. But if you have studied the Bill there is not a word about 74 hours; are you not confounding this Bill with the Shop Hours Regulation Act, which applies to young people under 18 years of age?—Perhaps I am; if that is the case, the Bill I have read is the Shop Hours Regulation Act.

2711. And not this Bill?—No.

2712. And you told the Committee at the commencement of your evidence that you had the opinion of all the different associations and trades councils as regards this Bill?—I told the Committee that I had the opinion of all the associations and trades councils with regard to the clause that we wanted inserted in the Bill.

2713. You wanted a clause inserted in the Bill?—Yes.

2714. May I ask you for your clause; will you read it?—It says here: "The aforesaid Bill may be so altered or amended as to give powers to local authorities to order the closing all day on Sundays of all the shops in any trade within the district under their authority, upon petition to the said local authorities of two-thirds of a majority of the trade concerned."

Mr. Frye.

2715. Public-houses as well?—No, we do not interfere with public-houses; "shops" it says.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2716. And that is what was submitted to these trades councils?—Yes.

2717. And not this Bill?—Not that Bill; this is our clause that we ask you to insert in that Bill.

Chairman.

2718. But you sent me a paper in which it was distinctly the reverse, that they were in favour of the Bill, and they wished a clause put in about Sunday; that is the paper your secretary sent me?—That is unknown to me. This is the resolution I have had.

2719. Just let me look at that, please?—Yes (handing in a paper).

2720. This paper says: "Resolved, that this general meeting of the above do desire to express their most hearty approval and sincere sympathy towards Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill." That is the Bill now before the Committee; and then they go on to pray that the Bill may be extended to Sunday; that is in that paper you have in your hand?—Yes.

2721. Surely that is an emphatic approval of and sympathy with this Bill?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2722. I will just go over the point again. You say you have not read this Bill yourself, and you do not understand it, not the details of it; it is the Shop Hours Regulation Act that you know?—Yes, I say so now.

2723. And you are aware, and your society is aware, that there was an Early Closing Bill before the House of Commons and before this Committee, and you wished to have that clause inserted in that Bill; is that the fact?—Yes, that is the fact, that there was a Bill before the House of Commons, and we wanted to have that clause inserted in that Bill.

2724. But the whole details of this Bill you do not know?—I do not personally.

Chairman.

2725. The Bill to which that resolution refers is the Bill now before the House of Commons?—Yes; and that is what our resolution has been worked upon.

2726. What did you tell us were the hours in your own district of shops generally?—Seventy-four hours per week.

Chairman—continued.

2727. At what time do they generally open?—Eight o'clock a.m.

2728. And at what time do they generally close?—Nine o'clock.

2729. That would make more than 74 hours?—But we close at one o'clock on Tuesdays.

2730. Then on Saturdays you keep open till 11 p.m.?—Yes.

2731. Do you not think those hours are rather long?—We give our assistants an hour out of the time for dinner, and half-an-hour for tea, and that sort of thing; and in our district I do not think we should work with much less hours than those.

2732. But in the other districts round you the hours are longer?—Yes, in the outside districts.

2733. And you think they might be shortened with advantage?—Yes.

2734. And without having gone into the details of this Bill your association thinks that it would do something towards removing the evils at present existing?—I suppose our secretary has gone into the details of the Bill. I should think he has.

2735. But that resolution was issued by your society?—Yes.

2736. Then we may take it that your association approves generally of the Bill, with the addition about Sunday?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

2737. I am afraid I have misunderstood you to mean that you were in favour of taking Manchester, when we were talking about Manchester, as a whole?—I say now that if Manchester was taken as a whole it would have to be left to the discretion of the town council as to what part of it should be open at certain hours. The town council I should think would be the most fit and proper persons to understand that.

2738. But that is not quite my point. I want to know whether you are in favour of finding out the feeling of the people of Manchester as a whole, or rather of taking them district by district?—I do not think I am a fit and proper person to say. I think the town council is more fit than me considerably.

2739. Then you would leave it in the discretion of the local authorities?—Yes; most decidedly.

2740. Does that remark of yours apply generally to all big towns?—Yes.

2741. Then surely that might be open to some difficulties. Take a place like London, for instance: Supposing that the inhabitants who carried on the business of barbers and hairdressers in a parish like St. Margaret, Westminster, agreed upon a certain time to close on weekdays, and those in the neighbouring parish agreed upon a different time to close, is the local authority to constitute itself the judge as to whether they will shut up the shops in that area as one or in that area as two?—I should think the best people to know are the local authorities, the people that have the power invested in them.

2742. It is to be at their discretion, is it?—Yes.

2743. I notice

Sir Blundell Maple.

2743. I notice that you said, with regard to the Charles II., the Sunday Closing Act, that the fine was 2*s.* 6*d.*?—2*s.* 6*d.*

2744. I see it is 5*s.*, and that shops are only allowed to be open for works of necessity and charity?—Yes.

2745. And shaving, I suppose, is considered, therefore, a necessity?—It has been ruled so, and it has been ruled the opposite.

2746. Would you mind your hairdressers' shops being opened for a couple of hours in the morning?—I do not think there is any necessity for it.

2747. You would like people to go dirty all day on Sunday?—No.

2748. Those people who cannot shave themselves, I mean?—They can be shaved on Saturday.

2749. Then they would have to be dirty on Sunday?—I do not know that.

Chairman.

2750. Are they generally shaved every day, do you consider?—There are people who are shaved every day.

Sir Blundell Maple.

2751. And some people twice a day, are there not?—Yes.

2752. And of necessity?—Yes, I suppose so.

2753. But do you think it would be more agreeable to hairdressers that they might arrange to be open, say to 10 on Sunday morning and then close. Would not that be more advantageous, taking the whole of the hair-dressing trade together?—No, I do not think it would.

2754. Then you would have these hairdressers' assistants going and visiting people at their homes, whereas if you had the shops open a good many of those people would be shaved by attending the shops, and so save a waste of the time of the assistants in going to different people's houses?—I do not know that that is done to any very great extent.

2756. Then, in fact, you would prevent any man from being shaved on Sunday, even at his private house or at a shop?—I do not think it would be so.

Mr. Frye.

2757. I understand that you do not complain of excessive hours on the week days?—Not so far as we are concerned.

2758. But you complain of Sunday trading?—Yes.

2759. And you object to that?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond.

2760. In the poor districts at present I understand you to say there are no hairdressers' shops open?—Not on Sunday.

2761. And nobody makes any demand for having the shops open?—No.

2762. Is it a fact that in these districts the assistants go out on Sunday morning to the houses of people to shave them?—Not to my knowledge.

2763. That is not without your experience?—No.

2764. And the thing works well enough both for the tradespeople and the public?—Yes.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

2765. Then while in your own district you do not consider that the hours on ordinary days are excessive, there are districts that you know of where the hours are excessive?—Yes.

2766. In Manchester in particular?—Yes, in Manchester in particular.

Mr. Frye.

2767. Are the hours in Manchester longer than your hours?—Yes, much longer.

Mr. JOHN GRIFFIN BEAUMONT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2768. I BELIEVE you are Honorary Secretary of the Birmingham Early Closing Association?—I am.

2769. Will you tell the Committee what are the usual hours of labour in Birmingham for shops?—In the large central shops the hours are about from 70 to 80, but in the suburbs they run to 90 hours in the week, and even 95. But, speaking generally, they are from 80 to 90 in the suburbs and from 70 to 80 in the centre.

2770. Have you any hopes of being able to diminish those hours by voluntary action?—None whatever.

2771. I understand that you have almost abandoned any voluntary action in the matter?—Yes, we have. The association has been working for many years with practically no result, except a little in the matter of the weekly half-holiday.

2772. And there is no tendency at present to shortening the hours?—There is a strong public sympathy with the movement, and a tendency on the part of the employers; but at the present time we are at the mercy of the minority.

2773. There is a general desire for earlier closing?—A very general desire.

2774. But that desire is defeated by a small minority?

Chairman—continued.

minority?—Yes, it is defeated by a small minority.

2775. Is your association in favour of legislation under those circumstances?—Yes; our association is in favour of this Bill.

2776. Your association is in favour of the Bill now before this Committee?—Yes.

2777. Have you any suggestions, with reference to the Bill, that you wish to bring before the Committee?—I have no suggestions to offer on the part of the association. Personally I think the Bill would be improved by the clause, Section 7, I believe it is, which provides for the Act to be revoked by one-third being altered to two-thirds; but my committee make no recommendation, they are satisfied with the Bill as presented.

2778. I think in 1892 there was a large meeting held in Birmingham in favour of legislation in the direction of early closing?—There was a large meeting held in 1892 attended by over 3,000 people. The mayor took the chair, and we had four or five of our local members of Parliament present; and a resolution in favour of legislation was carried without a dissentient.

2779. Is it your opinion that the shopkeepers in Birmingham generally would be in favour of legislation of this character?—The canvasses of the association show that.

2780. Can you give us any details as to the canvassing that you have had?—I can give you the approximate result. In the grocery trade 2 per cent. only are against legislation; and we could shorten the hours in the grocery trade in Birmingham 15 per cent. on the whole of the present working hours if we were able to protect ourselves by legislative enforcement.

2781. Could you tell the Committee what are the hours in that particular trade?—From 7.30 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. on the average, and in some of the suburbs they run to 9.30 and 10 at night; and on Saturday to midnight.

Mr. Frye.

2782. Are they open to 9.30 and 10 o'clock every night?—Yes.

2783. At what time do they open in the morning?—At 7.30.

Chairman.

2784. As regards the half-holiday, in what position does that stand in Birmingham?—In Birmingham, after all our agitation and effort, we have only roughly about one shop in eight that has adopted the half-holiday. Although the very strongest feeling in favour of it exists, we are simply at the mercy of the small minority and cannot make any effective mutual arrangement.

2785. Do you think that if there could be such an arrangement as is contemplated under the Bill the half-holiday would become general?—Yes, I am pretty certain of that.

2786. Then in fact you believe that the general feeling in Birmingham is strongly in favour of shorter hours, and that this Bill is a step in that direction?—It is so. We have no evidence whatever of any opposition to the Bill, that is the strong point in its favour. Although we have been advocating it in the periodical that we publish and have called many meetings in support of it for years, I am not acquainted with any opposition whatever being offered to the legislative proposals.

Chairman—continued.

2787. Do you think that the shopkeepers generally are aware of the general proposal of the Bill, and if there were any real opposition it would have made itself heard?—Yes, quite so.

Mr. Baldwin.

2788. These are extraordinarily long hours that you have just spoken to in Birmingham, are they not, from 7.30 a.m. to 10.30 p.m.?—I did not say 10.30; I said to 9.30 and 10 in the extreme suburbs.

2789. But that only applies, I take it, to the small districts in Birmingham; it does not apply to the centre of Birmingham, does it?—I said that in the centre of Birmingham the hours run to 8.30, but in the suburbs the hours vary to 10. I should say that the average closing hour in all the shops in the suburbs is 9.30.

2790. Is there any reason that you can give why the closing time should be so much later in the suburbs than in the city?—The only reason is that the suburban shops are nearer the dwelling houses, and the public, from thoughtlessness, say, "These shops are open, and we can pop in just before they close," and, consequently, there is very little trade done proportionately during the day-time to what is done at night.

2791. I suppose that partially that would arise from the people being in Birmingham in the day-time, and living out of Birmingham, and wanting to do their shopping when they come home?—No, I do not think so at all, because those in the town would be the men, and the bulk of the shopping is done by the ladies.

2792. I think you said that in Birmingham there is no recognised half-holiday?—I said that the half-holiday was adopted only in one shop in eight; there is no general half-holiday.

Mr. Diamond.

2793. Your experience is that 2 per cent., as you say, of the grocery trade were opposed to legislation?—Two per cent. of the grocery trade.

2794. And the position is that those two out of the 100 are practically able at present to keep all the assistants in all the shops and all the tradesmen, the other 98, open for many hours a week longer than they would be if they had their own way?—Exactly.

2795. You would think, I suppose, that if there is to be a little compulsion it is more desirable that two people should be compelled to fall in with the wishes of 98, than that 98 should be compelled to fall in with the wishes of two?—Yes.

2796. Do you think that the public would be grievously inconvenienced if the hours were shortened?—I think not; I am in touch with the public as an employer, and I believe that the same amount of business could be done with equal efficiency in far shorter hours.

2797. Then you are an employer?—Yes, I am an employer.

2798. And the association that you are connected with consists of employers as well as assistants?

Mr. Diamond—continued.

assistants?—Yes, we recognise that it is a mutual work.

2799. You do not speak, then, specially on behalf of the assistants?—No, I speak on behalf of the association, representing employers and assistants; and I am an employer.

2800. And naturally, I suppose, the employers for whom you speak, and you yourself as an employer, would not be in favour of curtailing the hours to such an extent as either to interfere with your own trade or gravely to inconvenience your customers?—Certainly not.

2801. In regard to the matter of areas, you heard the previous witness, I suppose?—Yes.

2802. Birmingham is divided into a number of municipal wards, and in some of those wards, I suppose, different hours might be adopted by the tradesmen?—I think that, as a whole, Birmingham should be considered as one area.

2803. That is to say that you would be in favour of taking the votes of all the grocers in Birmingham?—I would be in favour of taking the votes of all the grocers in Birmingham, and of all trades. I am opposed to dividing up Birmingham into areas, and fixing hours for one district which may not be accepted in another, and thereby injuring trade.

2804. What I want to get out from you is this: you have told us that in certain suburbs the hours are longer than in the centre of the town; do you think then that the hour, say of eight o'clock, could be applied with equal convenience to the centre of the town, where they close early at present, and to the suburbs where they keep open late?—Yes; we merely wish to bring the suburbs up to the level of the centre; we think, with this Bill, we could at once cut off the excessive hours in the suburbs, and bring them at least to the hours which are prevalent in the centre.

2805. The hours in the centre of the town at present are very long?—Yes, but we could do that at the least. We should aim at a curtailment in the centre, and I have no doubt that we could carry that; we could reduce the hours in the centre by an hour a night and make the weekly half-holiday general.

2806. That is your opinion as a trader?—That is my opinion as a trader.

2807. Do you think that small shops would suffer by an arrangement of that description?—I do not. We find no opposition from the small shops whatever; they are as much in sympathy with the Bill as the large shops.

2808. You have canvassed the small shopkeepers, have you?—We have canvassed the small shopkeepers in some trades, and we know the opinion through our meetings of shopkeepers in other trades.

2809. And you do not find that the small shopkeeper is opposed to this legislation?—Not at all; he is quite as anxious to have his shop closed as the larger shopkeeper.

2810. Are you aware that the small tradesman is an object of solicitude to many people who oppose this Bill?—Yes.

2811. And you find amongst the tradesmen themselves that they are quite willing to accept the legislation if it is adopted by Parliament?—Yes, quite so.

Mr. Frye.

2812. With regard to the small traders, do you not think that if they were compelled to close their shops at the same time as the larger traders, all their trade would be driven into the larger shops?—Not at all, because these small shops depend for their trade upon quite a different class of customers to those who patronise the larger shops.

2813. I did not know what particular business yours is?—I am in the drapery business.

2814. There is a very important grocers' association, I understand, in Birmingham, is there not?—Yes, the Grocers' Association.

2815. Do you know whether they have considered this Bill?—They have not considered this present Bill, but they passed a resolution in favour of the old Bill, which was more drastic; and the Grocers' Federation a few years ago passed a resolution approving of legislation. But the President of the Birmingham Grocers' Association is one of our Vice-Presidents, and he has expressed his strong approval of the details of this Bill.

2816. But they have not considered the Bill as a body?—I am not aware that they have.

2817. In the centre of Birmingham of course the shops close much earlier in the better part?—No, not so much as in other towns; the hours are later in the centre than they are in many towns.

2818. What would be the average hours in the grocery trade throughout Birmingham?—Taking the suburbs and the centre the average would be about 13 hours a day; and in some places we have a half-holiday, but only in a few.

2819. Then are there in Birmingham a large number of people who sell beer for people to consume in their own houses?—Yes.

2820. Would you allow those traders to be exempt, the same as public-houses?—I think as they compete with the public-houses, they might be exempted; for the hours of public-houses are already regulated.

2821. You mean that you would exempt them so far as their trade in beer is concerned?—Only as regards the beer, on the same principle that a post office is now closed at eight, although the postmaster may be a chemist and keep his shop open another two hours afterwards.

2822. I think you said that, in your opinion, the voluntary movement had made little or no progress at all?—No progress whatever as a whole; what we have gained in one district we have lost in another.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

2823. In your association are the majority of the members employers or assistants?—I should say that they are about equally proportioned. I could not state straight off. Anyhow the employers are the most active workers.

2824. You were asked as to whether the keeping open of shops late in the suburbs was owing to people returning from Birmingham. I suppose your impression would be that the people returned from Birmingham at a very much earlier hour?—Yes. I do not think that the late shopping in the suburbs is consequent upon that in any way; it is simply due to the fact that the shops are open, and to people's thoughtlessness thoughtlessness in the matter. The shops are open, not because the employers wish to keep open, but because one man opens, and the custom becomes law.

2825. Then as to the meeting held in Birmingham in 1888 or 1889; I understand there was a meeting held then; that was largely a shopkeepers' meeting, was it?—It was held in 1887; 300 employers were present, and a resolution in favour of the old drastic Bill was moved by Mr. Stacey, the Secretary of the London Association, seconded by Councillor Jarvis, the President of the Grocers' Association, and carried unanimously in that meeting of employers only.

2827. Have you any information as to the effect of long hours upon the health of the assistants?—I have recently elicited from some well-known medical men in Birmingham their opinion on the physical effects of long hours of employment for publication in the "Birmingham and District Early Closing Record," and their statements are really a strong indictment of the tradesmen who open for such prolonged hours. I have taken the three best-known names throughout the country, Sir James Sawyer, Dr. Lawson Tait, the eminent ladies' physician, and Dr. Jordan Lloyd. I may read one striking sentence from Dr. Lawson Tait's evidence. He says:—"I have seen many a young woman whose epitaph ought to have been 'died from daily torture, 8 a.m. to 10 p.m.'" I think he would be admitted to be the most eminent ladies' doctor in the country; and yet those hours are prevalent in many cases in Birmingham.

Mr. Lawson.

2828. Can you tell me why Birmingham is so peculiarly backward in respect to the weekly half-holiday?—Because, unfortunately, the men who are opposed to early closing are distributed over various areas, and when we tackle a district we find just one man in that district who stops the movement in each case. There is not a single district in Birmingham in which there is absolute unanimity in any trade.

2829. Are you aware that one of these early closing associations issues a small report showing that the great bulk of the towns of the country have now a weekly half-holiday?—Yes.

2830. Therefore Birmingham is more or less in an exceptional position with regard to that?—Yes, we are behind in the movement, although there is as strong a feeling in favour of it as in any town in England.

2831. Does not that show a want of energy on the part of those who are conducting the movement?—No, not of necessity. It shows that voluntary action is an absolute failure.

2832. You, yourself, are an employer; can you tell me how many hours your shop is open?—From 8.30 in the morning to 8.30 at night, and 11.30 on Saturday. We close at two on Wednesdays and leave the bulk of our neighbours open. Our hours every night are practically an hour less than everyone else in the district.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

2833. Do you suffer in your trade from the half-holiday?—What we may lose in trade we make up for in health and happiness.

2834. Are you in the centre of the town?—No, in the suburbs.

2835. In the suburban shops is much business done in the middle hours of the day?—A fair amount, not a lot. It is about one-third of the day's turn-over.

2836. I suppose there is more and more a disposition on the part of the working classes to live in the suburbs?—Yes, there are practically no dwelling houses in the centre of Birmingham.

2837. But I mean they go further and further afield?—They go further afield, and as you get further out the hours are later.

2839. Is it not the case, from what you say, that the great bulk of the people who live in the working-class suburban districts would be employed in the central part of the town in the middle of the day, and are unable to use your shops?—No; many of the factories in Birmingham are not central, but suburban.

2840. Then the situation is peculiar to that extent?—Yes.

2841. The men are employed near where they live?—The men are employed near where they live; all the large industries are carried on in the suburbs, and the people live close to their factories.

2842. Do you think that this Bill would injure the small shopkeeper?—I do not, because the small shopkeeper is dependent for his trade upon his own peculiar class of customers.

2843. But is it not said to be the tendency more and more to divert trade from small shops to large establishments; and therefore would not this accelerate that tendency?—That is the tendency, but I do not think that the Act would accelerate it; I think that is one of the things that would work itself all right.

2844. Is it not the fact that the small shopkeepers are the people that keep open latest?—It is the small shopkeepers who are most anxious for legislation. They say that they are compelled to keep open because their neighbours are open, that they never have time to themselves, and that their working expenses are increased by the late hours. They are the people who are in favour of the measure.

2845. They do not employ assistants?—No, they do not employ assistants.

2846. I suppose that in hardly any case, even where there was one assistant, it would be a woman?—The average number of assistants in our

our own district employed would be, perhaps, three. We employ 20.

2847. But then these people want simply to be protected against themselves?—No, they want to have the power to assert their own right to close their shops at a reasonable time.

2848. They have the right now?—Yes, they have the right now; but the keenness of competition prevents them from exercising their right.

Chairman.

2849. They want to be protected from one another?—They want to be protected from one another.

Mr. Lawson.

2850. And the small shopkeepers are not afraid that they will be injured by the trade being transferred to your big shops?—No, they are not afraid.

2851. At the same time the active movers are probably the people interested in the big shops?—No, we have a considerable number of small shopkeepers who are working in connection with the association.

2852. What is the size of the association?—Our membership is on the basis of 1*d.* per week subscription.

2853. What is it?—I should say that we have something like 400 members.

2854. Out of a total number of shopkeepers and assistants in Birmingham of, how many?—I could not state.

2855. A great many thousands?—Yes. But this has to be considered, that as we have had no paid officials to pay, we have not made as big efforts as have been made in other towns, to ask for membership.

2856. Still you would not say, on your own figures, that those numbers are representative of the trade of Birmingham; they are so insignificant?—We claim to represent the trade of Birmingham; we claim to represent it, and we have run the movement all along.

2857. On those figures?—Yes.

2858. Some 400 out of a good many thousands?—Yes.

2859. Have you made a canvass, then, of the people outside your association so as to enable you to speak for them?—For what purpose?

2860. To find out whether they are in favour of this Bill?—We have made canvasses only in certain trades. When we have conducted a canvass in favour, say, of the Wednesday half-holiday we have ascertained the opinion in the district whether it was in favour of legislation, and on those returns we base our opinion that only 2 per cent. of the grocers object to legislation.

2861. What legislation?—To the general proposal in this Bill, that two-thirds of any trade shall fix its hours of closing.

2862. That is not the proposal in the Bill?—They have to appeal to the local authority to carry it out.

2863. But are they in favour of compulsion?—Yes.

2864. And the police court?—When the police court is a necessity.

2865. Are you aware you spoke on the ground

of health, that before the other Committees it was mainly of course the case of young women and men assistants that was put forward?—I am aware of that.

2866. That was the ground of health in favour of which Mr. Sutherst and other witnesses quoted medical opinion?—Yes.

2867. Could you tell me whether you do not think they would be protected by extending the provisions of the present Act (the Shop Hours Regulation Act). I have asked the question before but I should like to ask it again?—They would be protected, but I think that Act would be objected to by tradesmen, because it does not leave sufficient room for the demands of each trade.

Chairman.

2868. You mean an extension of that Act?—Yes; you see it practically says that all shops shall only open 74 hours a week.

Mr. Lawson.

2869. No, it says that nobody shall be worked more than 74 hours a week?—I do not think that the extension of that Act would be acceptable to the traders, nor do I think that it would be of very much use.

2870. Surely the compulsion under that Act would be much less, because it would not touch the case of a man working in his own shop by himself or with his wife; is not that so?—It would not touch them.

2871. Therefore the compulsion would be less, because the present Bill, if the application were accepted by the local authority and enforced, would cover a small shopkeeper working in his own shop by himself, as well as a man like yourself who has a number of assistants?—Yes; but there are many other details if that Bill were extended which would be objectionable. It would be too much of a cast-iron arrangement; it makes no provision whatever for cases where a particular trade at one time of the year requires an extension of hours. For instance, if this Bill is put into force I suppose the grocers would want an extension of hours for December; and they have that power.

2872. How they would get it under this Bill I do not know?—Well, in their first application I take it that could be met.

2873. They would ask for the order to be limited in that way, you mean?—Yes, and that is the strong feature of this Bill, I take it; that it leaves it a question of trade option.

Chairman.

2874. The elasticity of the Bill, you mean?—The elasticity of the Bill is the greatest point in its favour; it leaves it as a question of trade option, and does not make any sweeping law such as an extension of the present Shop Hours Act would make.

Mr. Lawson.

2875. Then you are really in favour of applying this compulsion of ours without limitations?—It would be left to the option of the traders.

2876. To the local authority, you mean?—I said the traders, but the local authority would have to follow it out. But I think that in a few years time the traders would so much see the advantage of shorter hours, and find that as much business was done with equal efficiency, that they would reduce the hours to something considerably less than they are.

2877. Of course they can do that now if they are unanimous?—Yes; but it is because we have not power to enforce the will of the majority that the movement stands still.

2878. Let me put to you a case under this Bill; do not you believe that it would cause a certain amount of friction and public indignation if men were sent to prison for not shutting their shops under this Bill?—I am not aware that the Bill makes it possible; I do not know of that clause.

2879. But if a trader were recalcitrant, would it not be the case that he would be sent, in the natural course of things, to prison?—No; because there would be a distraint upon his goods for the amount. There is no possibility of imprisonment. The Bill allows such elasticity in regard to the matter that I do not think there would be any vexatious prosecutions.

2880. Not in a case of 20*s.* for the second offence or 5*l.* for a third offence?—I do not think there is a word in the Act about imprisonment.

2881. No; but I suppose summary proceedings would be taken. But you do not think that that would cause any indignation?—No, I do not, at all; I think the people would accept it; the tradesmen would accept it in such a loyal way that if any man broke through and was prosecuted, the moral disgrace would be sufficient.

2882. But at the same time you only speak for 400 out of the whole trade of Birmingham?—That is not a fair statement. At a meeting at which 3,000 persons were present, convened by the association, they expressed approval of this Bill and legislation; and, therefore, I am empowered to speak on behalf of those people. Our actual membership is only that.

Chairman.

2883. They have taken means to ascertain the feelings of their neighbours, and that is their general impression?—Yes, and I think the fact that we have not extended more is simply due to the fact that people have become so disgusted with the failure of voluntary action that they have declined to do anything more in the matter; that is the only thing. I have scores of letters in which people have said that they are weary of our voluntary arrangements, and they will have nothing more to do with early closing until we get some legislation.

Mr. Lawson.

2884. But if they think voluntary action is closed would they not be in favour of compulsory action and back you up?—They will now that there is a prospect of the Bill coming into practical politics. Our membership is increasing daily.

2885. To what extent?—Our last annual meeting was the most successful we have ever held; and we are in a better position financially than ever we were.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

2886. Was this large public meeting, of which you speak, summoned by public advertisement?—Yes, by posters throughout the city.

2887. Were the provisions of this particular Bill explained at the meeting, or was it merely to discuss the general principle of early closing?—The provisions of the weekly Half Holiday Bill were discussed. Sir John Lubbock was present and explained this Bill too; and Mr. Chamberlain made his first speech on behalf of the measure at that meeting.

2888. Was any other resolution proposed or was there any show of feeling the other way?—No, it was absolutely unanimous; we never had a single amendment proposed in any meeting or any expression whatever of opposition to legislative proposals in Birmingham that I am cognisant of.

2889. Has any meeting been held in the opposite direction?—No, and I have not even seen a letter in the public papers, although the matter has been prominently before the public for the last three years; and we are sending into every shop in Birmingham a periodical advocating interference with the hours of labour and we have found no opposition.

2890. Was the meeting largely composed of shopkeepers and assistants, or would you call it representative of the general community?—I should say it was largely composed of shopkeepers and assistants.

2891. Then was the general community of buyers largely represented there?—Many of them came, being interested in the movement, I take it; but it was a public meeting, a towns meeting it was convened as.

2892. I suppose that if the buyers thought there was any real danger to their interests or convenience from this movement, they would have taken some public action to show their disapproval, would they not?—They would.

2893. But they have not done so?—The buyers are well protected by the tradesmen; the latter would look after their own interests.

2894. You would think, I daresay, that they could rearrange their shopping arrangements to meet the new condition of affairs without much inconvenience?—Without any inconvenience, and that has been done within the last five years. In our own establishment we have reduced our hours an hour a day without any decrease in the returns, or any complaint on the part of the public.

2895. Might not the working man think it rather a grievance if he was deprived of the opportunity of looking in at the shop windows when he takes his walk in the evening?—I think it is rather the other way about.

2896. May it not be an attractive part of the holiday hours to walk through the streets and look in at the shop windows?—That has not been my experience of working men.

2897. I am only speaking of my own feelings; I am very fond of looking in at shop windows?—But the working men look upon looking into shop windows as temptations to their wives.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

2898-9. There is something in that, no doubt. I want to ask you something about health. You have given us three opinions of three well-known and representative medical men of Birmingham, two of whom I know personally, and you agree, I think you said, with these opinions. Have you anything personally to add to them from your own observation?—I know that my own health suffered from long hours, and under medical advice I was compelled to curtail them. I have had to take a whole twelvemonth from business.

2900. Have you observed any deterioration of health on the part of your shop employées?—I have seen the evil physical effects of long hours in several cases. We do all we can to alter it.

2901. I presume that your class of business, even under the most favourable conditions, is one that must exert an unfavourable influence on health. There must be a good deal of dust in it?—Yes, there is a good deal of dust, and in most shops there is gas; and the injurious effect of breathing vitiated air hour after hour is very serious.

2902. It is probable that these hygienic evils would be worse in the case of small shops than large, is it not?—Far worse.

2903. Therefore you want to protect them from themselves, from that point of view?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

2904. I think you said you were an employer yourself?—Yes.

2905. In the drapery trade?—Yes.

2906. How many assistants have you?—Twenty.

2907. And what are your hours?—Four days 12, Wednesday 8.30 to 2, and Saturday to 11.30 for the male assistants only; the female assistants we allow off an hour earlier on Saturday.

2908. You said that you were in favour of this Bill all except one clause; I am afraid I did not catch what that was; was it Clause 7?—Clause 3, Section 2, "If at any time it is made to appear to the satisfaction of the local authority that more than one-third," &c.; I would substitute two-thirds; I think it would lead in many cases to continual chopping and changing over the matter. If two-thirds is sufficient to put the Bill into operation, two-thirds should be sufficient to revoke it.

2909. Have you studied Clause 5 at all?—Yes.

2910. Do you approve of that?—Yes; I see no better way of dealing with the matter.

2911. Do you think there would be any difficulty in working a clause like that?—No; I do not anticipate that at all, not in Birmingham.

2912. I only speak for myself, but as a Member of the Committee, and anxious to come to a practical conclusion upon this matter, I may say that I have had a certain amount of difficulty, because it has been suggested by different witnesses that different trades should be differently treated. For instance, some witnesses have said that in a shop which has two or more industries carried on in it, for the purposes of this Bill, only one of those trades should be stopped; whereas other witnesses have said that they all should, according to Clause 5. You approve of the clause, I understand?—I approve of the clause, as a whole, although I think that there might be individual cases of hardship, and I should not be sorry if some alteration were made in the Bill by which the one department of the house only should be closed; and I do not think there would be much difficulty about that. As I mentioned before, the post office department of many suburban shops, such as drapers and chemists, is closed at eight o'clock, while the other departments remain open. But in Birmingham all shops, I think, would come into the one day, except the butchers; that difficulty we should not meet with.

2913. But you have got a considerable number of shops in Birmingham, I suppose, where two or more trades are carried on?—We have not; I only know of two.

2914. Have you no big co-operative shops?—No, Birmingham is remarkably free from that class of shops; we have only two or three at the most.

Chairman.

2915. And they generally close earlier wherever they are?—Yes, they are our best supporters.

Mr. Tennant.

2916. You think that would really sweep away any objection that one might have to this clause?—Yes, I do.

2917. Then to go to the other difficulty which agitates one, the question of areas, I understand that you are in favour of Birmingham being treated as a whole?—Yes, certainly. I strongly object to any division of areas. As a practical tradesman, I believe it would be very injurious.

2918. Does your experience extend to any other large towns; do you know any of the other large towns in England or Scotland?—Yes, I am familiar with them.

2919. Do you think you could apply that provision generally to such towns as Manchester and Liverpool?—I think that principle can be applied generally, if provision is made for the shops which at present close on Saturday to have their holiday remain as it is.

2920. But with regard to closing on other days?—Yes, I think a uniform hour might be arranged for all districts.

2921. That is to say, you think that all the large towns you are familiar with might be treated as one area, and not as several areas, for the purposes of this Bill?—Yes.

2922. Do you think that that could be applied to London; perhaps you cannot speak as to that?—It all depends upon whether the shopkeepers ask for it. I take it that if a 7.30 p.m. closing all the week round were asked for, any of the higher-class shops that close at six would be perfectly free to close earlier than 7.30 if they liked.

2923. But when you say if the hour of 7 30 were asked for, who would ask for it?—The traders.

2924. How would they voice that request?—If we took action under the Bill a meeting would be convened first of all, I take it, of the trade associations of each trade, who would decide what what were reasonable hours consistent with the interests of the public and the demands of business; and there would then probably be a meeting of the representatives of various trades to see if any unanimous arrangement could be made by the trades as a whole. If not, sectional interests would be considered; the drapers would approach the council for one hour, and the grocers for another. But I anticipate that the general feeling would be in favour of a reasonable hour throughout all trades.

2925. You think there might not be any difficulty in getting practical unanimity among the people who were making this demand?—I do not think there would be any difficulty whatever.

2926. It would be very difficult, would it not, if one early closing society asked for seven o'clock and another asked for six?—Yes, but I do not think there would be any difficulty of that sort; I think that is a very remote contingency. I think one day would be accepted by all trades, I speak of Birmingham. I believe we could sweep Birmingham to-morrow for a half-a-day closing on one day, and shorter fixed hours all the week round.

2927. I suppose, to look at it practically, closing even an hour earlier, say, even at 7.30, would make a very great difference?—It would make all the difference in the world; that between living to work and working for a living.

2928. It would make all the difference to the shop assistants and practically no difference to the convenience of the general public?—Practically none; and it would make all the difference to shop assistants, and to the employers who are compelled to be there if the assistants are there, if they look after their business.

2929. Perhaps you heard in the course of the evidence this morning, if you were present, that it was suggested by one witness that the local authority should be the persons to decide whether a town, such as Birmingham or Manchester, or a still larger town, such as London, should be divided for the purposes of this Bill into districts, or should be treated as one area; do you approve of that?—Yes, I do; the local authority should decide the matter because they are most familiar with the local circumstances.

2930. But I take it that your society, or the society which made itself responsible for finding out what the will of the two-thirds majority was, would canvass areas in a particular manner. In the first place, they would set about taking a place like Camberwell, say, and would represent to the local authority of Camberwell that they had a two-thirds majority there?—Yes.

2931. They might have a two thirds majority there, but might not have a two-thirds majority all over London; what would you do then?—I cannot express any opinion with regard to London, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the workings of the trade or the local authority. In the provincial towns, where the corporation has an area of five or six square miles, I am in favour of the corporation becoming the local authority.

2932. Going to Birmingham, which I do not know at all, and supposing also that you are in favour of taking Birmingham as a whole, then, supposing that your association canvass a particular municipal ward, and you had a two-thirds majority in that ward for closing all the drapers shops at a certain hour, and also supposing that you had not a majority over the whole of Birmingham, what would you do then; would you leave it to the discretion of the local authority to say that they would close in West Birmingham, or whatever it was?—I think not.

2933. Then that is rather in conflict with your former opinion, is it not, that you would like to leave it to the discretion of the local authority?—I would like to leave it to the discretion of the local authority whether they enforced it for the whole of the city, but you are only speaking of a section like a ward.

2934. Our difficulty, I speak personally, is to know how this is to be worked, whether by sections or by the whole of the town?—In Birmingham, I take it, by the whole of the town.

2935. Then, even supposing that you had a two-thirds majority to close a particular trade in any section of a town, and you had not got it over the whole, you would rather forego your right to close it in that ward, would you?—Yes, in the interests of that district; because it would immediately lead to driving trade into another district. I should object to that.

2936. Several witnesses whom we have had before us have been in favour of canvassing all shops without any reference to the particular trade; do you approve or disapprove of that?—I should approve of that in small towns, but not in large towns.

2937. Have you any knowledge of rural areas of small villages?—Wherever I have knowledge of them I think that there would be no difficulty whatever in closing all shops except those which are exempted by the Act.

2938. Do you think that there is much necessity for earlier closing in small villages?—Not in small villages, and unless there were the traders would not ask for it; it is only where the evil exists that they ask for the remedy.

Mr. Lawson.

2939. With reference to what you said about imprisonment not being mentioned in the Bill, are you aware that proceedings would be taken under the 89th clause of the Factory Act, 1878, which refers to the Summary Jurisdiction Act?—I was not aware of that.

Chairman.

2940. Does that make any difference in your opinion?—None whatever.

2941. I believe that the Trades Council of Birmingham passed a resolution in favour of early closing?—They did some years ago, and at the present time we are asking them to pass a resolution in favour of the present measure. They have a letter from us to consider now, and I have no doubt it will be passed.

2942. You have expressed an opinion in favour of dealing with Birmingham as a whole, but I do not gather that you have any objection to the clauses in the Bill which would leave other districts to act as they think convenient?—None whatever; it must be left, I take it, to the discretion tion of each district, I speak for Birmingham only on that point.

2943. With regard to small shops, is there not an advantage to small shops in early closing in this way: that if shops are open late the customers can go to a considerable distance away from home to shop, whereas if the hours are earlier they would be more likely to do their shopping in their own immediate neighbourhood?—I do not think that would make any material difference.

2944. But so far as it did it would be rather in favour of the small shops, would it not?—Yes.

2945. Do not you think that that is one reason that those small shopkeepers are generally in favour of legislation of this kind?—Yes, I think it is.

2946. On the whole, therefore, you do not consider that the interests of small shopkeepers would suffer?—Not at all.

2947. You have handed me a copy of the "Birmingham and District Early-Closing Record," by which I see that this resolution was passed: "That this meeting of shopkeepers and assistants of Birmingham and district expresses its entire satisfaction with the provisions of Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill, now before the House of Commons, and appeals to the Members of Parliament for this city to do their utmost to place the measure on the Statute Book." That resolution, I believe, was passed unanimously?—

Chairman—continued.

Yes, and a petition in favour of the Bill will be sent up to the House within a few days with over 6,000 signatures.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

2948. I believe there was a meeting of the Grocers' Federation of the whole of the United Kingdom in Birmingham some time ago?—Yes; two years ago, about.

2949. Did they pass a resolution upon this subject?—The Birmingham Association invited them to pass a resolution in favour of legislation, and it was passed by the Grocers' Federation, which is probably one of the most representative organisations in the country.

Mr. Diamond.

2950. You were asked about the extension of the present Shop Hours Regulation Act, and I understood you to say that the small men would not be touched by it; that is to say, the men who did not employ young people or assistants of any kind?—Yes.

2951. Therefore do I take it that the present difficulty as to the closing would still remain although that Act were extended?—Yes.

2952. That the small tradesmen would still be compelled to keep their shops open if a few traders in the locality persisted in doing so?—Yes; that is the main objection to the extension of the Act, that it would not cover the difficulty at all so far as the small shops are concerned.

Mr. JAMES MACPHERSON and Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2953. (To Mr. Macpherson.) YOU are Secretary to the National Union of Shop Assistants, I believe?—That is so.

2954. How many members are there in your union?—About 2,000.

2955. And are they scattered over the country generally?—Yes, from Jarrow-on-Tyne in the North, right away down through England and into South Wales, as far as Swansea. I have a list of the branches, which are 37 in number, which I can put in (handing in the same).

2956. And you have about 2,000 members, you say?—Yes.

2957. What do you consider to be the general hours in the poorer districts of London?—In the poorer districts I should say that the hours are about from 80 to 85 per week; in some districts they will go up as far as 100; but generally speaking the hours at Deptford and some of the poorer districts are quite 80, and from 80 to 85 per week.

2958. Excepting in the larger shops in the centre of London, would you say that those hours which you have mentioned are about the hours of the shop assistants generally in London?—In that class of district I should say that they are.

2959. Do you see any prospect of shortening the hours by voluntary action?—Absolutely none.

2960. Have you considered the Bill which is now before this Committee?—Yes, our organisation has considered it as an organisation.

2961. I will ask you with reference to any amendments that you would desire to see in the Bill in a minute; but speaking of the general tenor of the Bill, are you in favour of it?—We are in favour of the Bill thus far, that our organisation believes in legislative enactment of some description or another, and these amendments which we propose to the Bill are the minimum, so to speak, that we would like to accept for this Bill to make it of any avail in our opinion, or of value to the shop assistants.

2962. Have you any doubt that in many places a two-thirds majority may be obtained in favour of shortening the hours?—Speaking generally, I think that a two-thirds majority could be obtained.

2963. Have you any doubt that the local authorities would put the Act into operation if a two-thirds majority were obtained?—There is a question about that, because in many instances a large proportion of shopkeepers are on the local authority and a few might influence the many.

2965. (To Mr. Johnson.) You are, I believe,

Chairman—continued.

general treasurer of the National Union of Warehousemen and Clerks?—I am.

2966. So far as you have heard Mr. Macpherson's evidence, do you concur with it?—Yes, I agree with what Mr. Macpherson has said.

2967. (To Mr. Macpherson.) Will you now kindly point out to the Committee the amendments which your association would like to suggest in the Bill, and if there is any point on which Mr. Johnson differs from you he will say so?—The first amendment that the organisation as an organisation has recommended is, in Clause 1 they wish the word "shall" to be substituted for "may."

2969. Therefore would it not be an advantage to give the local authority some freedom in the matter?—I do not think so.

2970. What is the next amendment which you desire to see in the Bill?—The next point is in Clause 3; we recommend that two-thirds should be substituted for one-third, in order to revoke the Bill.

2971. You see the general idea of the Bill is that the views of a majority of two-thirds of the shopkeepers should be carried into effect, and it was from that point of view, of course, that in this clause the number stands at one-third; have you considered that unless we leave it one-third a minority of the shopkeepers might be able to put the Act into force?—My idea is that under any circumstances it would want two-thirds to ask for even shorter hours; and it is possible that if one-third got the Bill revoked it would still want two-thirds to get even fewer hours; so that we might as well have two-thirds to revoke it if it wants two-thirds to be put into operation.

2972. What is the next point you would like to see altered?—The next point is the question of fines. We think that instead of 5*s.* it should be 5*l.*, 10*l.*, and 20*l.*

2973. Have you considered whether it might not be very much more difficult to get the shopkeepers to agree to come under the Bill if the fines were made as heavy as you suggest?—I do not think it would have any effect at all, because if people are willing to come under the Bill they would be willing to do as they ought to do when they were under the Bill.

2974. Do you not think that the mere fact of these fines being in the Bill, without considering the exact amount, would be likely to induce shopkeepers to conform to the Act?—I do not quite understand your question.

Chairman—continued.

2975. (To Mr. Johnson.) What is your view with regard to fines?—Our opinion is, from information that we have, that the shopkeepers would approve of a substantial fine being inflicted upon any individual shopkeeper who would violate the local agreement. I think they would quite endorse the increased fine that we suggest, and in any case it would permit the magistrate to allocate a fine of 5*s.*, supposing our amendment were agreed to. It says it is not to exceed 5*l.*; it may be 5*s.* or 10*s.*, according to the view or opinion of the magistrate if the Act was violated. We only fix the maximum, not the minimum.

2976. (To Mr. Macpherson.) What is the next amendment that you propose?—The next point is that we wish a clause to be inserted in the Bill, either to amend Clause 12 or to put a new clause into the Bill, to have a limit of half an hour after the hour of closing appointed by the local authority, so that the shop assistants can feel relieved to the extent of that half-hour.

2977. You do not think that there would be a difficulty in working a provision of that sort?—No, I do not.

2978. Is there anything else on Clause 12 that you wish to suggest to the Committee?—No, there is nothing else on Clause 12.

2979. Then do I correctly understand that, subject to those amendments which you have suggested, your association are in favour of this Bill?—Yes; as I stated before, they are in favour of some legislative enactment of this kind, and those are the minimum amendments that they would like to see proposed to the Bill, to make the Bill valuable to shop assistants. Personally, of course, I think there are some serious defects in the Bill.

2980. But those are the points which your association wishes to bring before us?—Those are the points which our association have instructed us to bring forward as amendments.

Sir John Gorst.

2982. (To Mr. Macpherson.) What is it that has to be done; I suppose the practice varies in different shops, but there are some shops, are there not, where the shop assistants can be sent away immediately the shop is closed?—That is so; in most shops it is a mere matter of arrangement.

2983. (To Mr. Johnson.) Is it not in drapery establishments that the hours of shop assistants are longest after closing?—I think there is very little difference between drapers and grocers in that respect. But we should discriminate between the various classes of shops. If you take a better-class a better-class draper's or grocer's shop, where they provide an adequate staff of assistants, they could leave immediately the shop is closed.

2984. But in a drapery establishment is it not necessary to keep the assistants for some time after the shop is closed to fold up and put away the goods, and is there not a certain amount of account-taking done after the shop is closed?—Only in the cases that I point out where they are under-staffed; then there is stock folding, and so forth, to be done. In a grocer's shop much of the weighing has to be done after the shop is closed.

2985. And the dispatching of goods?—Yes, and the dispatching of goods.

2986. Are you clearly of opinion that half an hour is long enough to allow for all that?—We think that if the object of the Bill is to secure a limitation of the hours it is long enough.

Mr. Lawson.

2987. (To Mr. Macpherson.) Is the membership of your association principally drawn from London?—No, we have comparatively few members in London.

2988. Do you believe that this Bill, if it were enforced, would have a tendency to drive trade from the small shops to the big shops if a particular hour were fixed for the closing of any particular class of shop in this area or in any other?—It might have a small tendency that way, but I do not think it would have very much.

2989. Are you empowered to speak (I suppose not) for anybody except the assistants in shops?—We speak for the shop assistants.

2990. And they are not satisfied with this Bill as it stands?—No, our organisation is not; as I say, these amendments are the minimum that they would like to see inserted. (Mr. Johnson.) I should like to make it clear that we are unanimously in favour of the principle of this Bill. There are certain points with which we disagree, and which we would like to see amended, but with the principle, as Mr. Macpherson has stated, we are unanimous.

2991. (To Mr. Macpherson.) Has your association considered the alternative plan of extending the Act of 1892?—Yes.

2992. What is their opinion with regard to that?—Our opinion is that this Bill is better ultimately than the other, although we accepted the other as something in the way of shortening the hours at the present time.

2993. But this Bill would only be effectual if it is enforced by the local authority, whereas the other is of course an absolute limitation of the hours?—Yes, but even 74 hours a week is not very much limitation.

2994. Supposing that 7.30 p.m. were fixed as the hour for closing, as the last witness suggested, do you think that that would satisfy the people who compose your union?—It would depend upon circumstances; under the present conditions it would.

2995. In the centre of London that would be a later hour than most of the shops close at, would it not?—Yes.

2996. Therefore the assistants in big shops in the centre of London would gain nothing, would they?—So far as that is concerned under the present conditions they do not want to gain very much in large shops, such as Shoolbred's and other large shops in the centre of London.

2997. In the small shops but few assistants are employed, I think?—I do not think so.

2998. What is your opinion with regard to the number of assistants that are employed in small shops?—My opinion is that the greater number of assistants are employed in medium and small shops.

3000. In that case your association would have no interest in closing those shops, would they?—Certainly we would. We want to see all shops closed.

3001. But if you have no members in them, if the man does not employ any assistants you would have no interest in them?—Whether we have or have not we want to see the shops closed at a uniform hour.

3002. Why?—Because we believe that it would be good for the employers as well as for the employed.

Mr. Tennant.

3003. When you said that your association put forward these amendments as a minimum, but that you did not entirely agree with your association, to what were you alluding, to which particular one were you alluding?—I meant that personally I have looked at the Bill probably more than the bulk of our association, and I have come to the conclusion that there are two serious defects in the Bill.

3004. What are those two defects?—One is the question of areas, and the other is the question of classification.

3005. What remedy do you propose for those?—With regard to the area, I think that there ought to be only one area.

3006. Do you apply that to London?—Yes.

3007. And with regard to classification of shops, what remedy do you suggest?—I think there ought to be one day as half-holiday.

3008. But that is not quite the point. With regard to the classification of shops, what is your remedy?—I should take out all those that closed on Saturday now, because, of course, they should be exempted from closing on the regular day that was appointed during the week.

3009. But what I wanted to be got at is the difficulty that Clause 5 deals with. That a shop in which two or more classes of trade are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades. How do you propose to deal with that?—That difficulty would be removed if you had one day, except for the shops that are scheduled in the Bill.

3010. That is to say, you would shut up that particular department for all shops which were not carrying on any of the trades mentioned in the schedule?—Yes, I would shut up all the shops at a given time on the early-closing day, and schedule those that I think might be left out.

3911. Has your association considered the difficulty of a shop that carries on, we will say, the business of a hairdresser, and the business of a tobacconist together, the one being included in the Bill, and the other not?—I do not think that the association has considered it, especially from that point of view; but I should say that a hairdresser if he is doing any other business ought to be compelled to close.

Chairman.

3912. That is what is proposed in Clause 5; I thought you were differing from Clause 5?—Then if you have one uniform day the difficulty is removed.

3913. Perhaps I misunderstood you; I thought you were objecting to Clause 5, and that that was what you called one of the blots of the Bill; as regards Clause 5 are you in favour of it, or are you opposed to it?—I am in favour of it.

Mr. Tennant.

3914. You are in favour of it?—Yes.

3915. As it stands?—Yes.

3916. Then I understood from what you said before that you would not only apply that to the trades that naturally come under this clause, but also would apply it to a shop that was carrying on one of the trades with which the Bill proposes to deal, and another of the trades which is scheduled with which the Bill does not propose to deal?—If they carry on that particular trade.

3917. (To Mr. Johnson.) Do you agree with Mr. Macpherson on this point?—With regard to Clause 5 I agree with what Mr. Macpherson has said: that it should be made applicable in the case you gave of a man conducting a business part of which is scheduled and part of which is not, that it shall come under the operation of that part that is scheduled. What we desire is that all the shops, with the exception of those that already close on Saturday shall be closed on one day in the week. We object to each class of trade fixing its own day.

3918. And you want to make one day general for all shops?—Yes, we do not wish to interfere with Saturday closing, because there is a growing tendency in its favour. We wish every shop to have the option of closing either one day, or on Saturday, and not each to have its own day.

3919. You think that that should be provided for by the Bill?—Yes.

3920. And in the Bill as it is, you notice that it is not so?—Precisely, we notice that. That was in the former Bill, I think.

3921. With regard to the question of areas do you agree with Mr. Macpherson that London should be treated as one area?—Yes; I agree with that. My experience is, that any arrangement by which each district could fix its own day or hour of closing would lead to confusion and cause irritation, and the gradual abolition of the agreement; we must have a uniformly fixed hour of closing for all trades if we are to have a successful and permanent early closing movement.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

3922. I understand that you would treat London as one particular area, and not as several. Is not that so?—Yes; I would have the County Council area as the area over which this Bill should operate.

3924. But what I want to know is this: Supposing that the West End shops closed at 6 o'clock, and you got a two-thirds majority of all the shopkeepers in London to close at 6.30, would not that operate rather hardly on the working class population in other parts of London?—I do not agree that it would work hardly upon the working class population. It would operate hardly upon the small traders; but it is not a thing that is likely to occur, in my opinion. The most I expect that would be done would be the fixing of the latest closing hour, say 10 o'clock on Saturdays and 8 o'clock on other days. We quite realise that we should have to begin at the beginning; and the most we should expect from this Bill would be a uniform hour of closing at 8 or 8.30 at first; then perhaps at 7.30, and then gradually from that to an earlier hour still. We do not expect a revolution if this Bill is adopted, that everybody would close at 6. The majority of voters, the shopkeepers in this matter, are late closers, and they would not vote in favour of the West End closing.

Chairman.

3926. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent what you call your system from being put into operation; it is already provided for in the Bill, is it not?—With regard to the first clause, which permits a two-thirds majority of any class of shopkeepers, shopkeepers, we do not agree with that. We are expressing now our personal opinions.

Chairman—continued.

3027. I quite understand that you would endeavour to put it into operation for the whole of London, but there is nothing in the Bill to prevent that being done; on the contrary, it cannot be done now, and it could be done under the Bill; is not that so?—The Bill would permit the grocers of London to fix their hour.

3028. I do not deny that; but what I am asking you (if you will listen to the question) is whether it is not the case that there is nothing in the Bill to prevent what you wish being done, but, on the contrary, it is expressly provided for in the Bill?—I do not see anything in the Bill to prevent what we desire to be done; but another course is likely to be adopted, we think, under the Bill.

3029. But are you prepared to say to this Committee that if another district wished to adopt another course you would recommend the Committee to prevent their doing so; whether it is wise to do that is another question; but unless you give them power under the Bill you would be preventing their adopting any system but the one you advocate?—Personally, I think it would be a mistake to permit any section of the retail trade to legislate or agree to its own closing hour.

3030. That is not my question, if you will direct your mind to the question; you agree with me that there is nothing in the Bill to prevent, but that on the contrary the Bill is intended to facilitate the course which you are recommending?—We are agreed so far, are we not?—Yes, I have already accepted that.

3032. But unless you wish to prevent them, you must leave them the option under the Bill?—I should prefer that they were led to adopt another course.

Mr. Lawson.

3033. Are you aware that under the Bill in the first clause the local authority can fix any time for part of a district, as well as for a district as a whole?—Yes, I am aware that the local authority may act upon the expressed wish of two-thirds of the shopkeepers in any given trade in any given district of a city.

3034. Do you approve of that?—No; I have already stated that I do not approve of it. In my opinion it is not a desirable way of dealing with this question.

3035. You are in favour of a general curfew; to fix one hour of closing for a whole city, and for all the trades in it?—Yes; and we understand quite clearly that unless the shopkeepers agree to it no one can put it into operation. The assistants are powerless in the matter.

3036. Two-thirds of the shopkeepers?—Yes; I say that the operation and enforcement of a clause of this Bill rests with the shopkeepers if they agree to adopt an early closing hour, and assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

3037. And you believe that two-thirds of the shopkeepers ought to be able to fix a time for all trades?—I think that two-thirds of the shopkeepers in any given area should have the power to fix the maximum hour that shops should keep open.

Chairman.

3038. (To Mr. Macpherson.) I should like to ask you whether you agree with the latter part of the evidence of Mr. Johnson?—Mainly, I agree with what Mr. Johnson said.

Mr. Baldwin.

3039. (To Mr. Johnson.) Would not the effect of fixing those hours be rather to lead to lengthen the hours in the better shops; would they not all tend to come to the same time?—No, because there are other adequate reasons, and sufficiently numerous reasons why the better class of shops close earlier now than smaller shops do; they are purely economic reasons. The question of giving their assistants lesser time has nothing to do with it. They close early because their trade is of such a character that it is an unnecessary expense for them to remain open any longer.

Mr. Diamond.

3040. (To Mr. Macpherson.) Did you hear the statement which has been made here that a person with one trade scheduled and another that was not scheduled should be allowed to come under the scheduled trade?—Yes.

3042. But do you know anything of the trade that you are talking about; do you think it is possible for a man who has a beer off-licence in the midst of a grocer's shop to put up a partition the effect of which would be to keep people from going into the grocer's shop at all?—There are arrangements made of that kind already, and I think it is quite a practicable, feasible, and desirable arrangement that there should be a separate entrance or partition of some kind, or a sneckett behind which the beer could be retailed out without keeping the grocery part of the premises open. So far as I understand it, the reason why this licence was given to grocers was to prevent women and children from entering a public-house; and there are people who go to grocers' shops that do not indulge in liquor of that kind, and do not want it forced upon them.

Mr. Leonard Edgar Ward, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3043. You are, I believe, honorary secretary of the Tottenham and Edmonton Early Closing Association?—I am.

3044. And you have been a tradesman yourself for 13 years, and you were a shop assistant before that for eight years?—Yes.

3045. And you represent a number of small tradesmen in that district?—Yes.

3046. Can you give the Committee any idea of how many you represent?—From 3,000 to 4,000.

3047. What are your hours at present?—The hours in the grocery trade are from 7.30 or 8 in the morning to 10 o'clock every night. On Thursdays some close at 5, and others at 2. On Fridays they close at 10.30. On Saturdays at 12 midnight.

3048. Have you any hope of shortening those hours by voluntary action?—We have not.

3049. What do you think is the feeling of the small tradesmen in your district with reference to legislation?—The preponderance of feeling is in favour of legislation; feeling that it would be better to have legislation than the so-called voluntaryism, which is worked on the lines of coercion.

3050. Have your association considered the Bill which is now before the Committee?—Yes.

3051. Is your association in favour of that Bill?—The association is entirely in favour of it with one or two conditions, if you will allow me to mention them.

3052. Certainly; we should be very happy to hear them?—The first is in reference to Clause 3, Section 2, that there should be some limit fixed before which no application could be made to alter the Act.

3053. You mean to revoke it?—Yes; and also that two-thirds should be inserted in place of one-third in case of alteration.

3054. Is there any other amendment you wish to propose?—We should like just to direct the attention of the Committee to the question of the tally trade, so that it could be distinctly understood that a man who did business on the tally system, who did not actually keep a shop, should be brought under the Act.

3055. Is there any other amendment you wish to suggest?—In reference to refreshment houses, and places where hot cooked provisions are sold, our committee thought that grocers, for instance, should not, by starting the sale of hot provisions, be able to exclude themselves from the Act, and that tobacconists and newsagents should be given the option, if they desired it, of coming under the Act.

3056. That was intended to be provided for by Clause 5. Have you looked at Clause 5?—No, we did not take it so.

3057. I think you will find that that is dealt with there. Should you have any doubt about getting a two-thirds majority of the shopkeepers in your district?—I think not.

3058. The last witnesses gave evidence in favour rather of dealing with London as a whole, which they thought would be desirable; but would you like to keep in the Bill the power of dealing with separate districts in case those districts wished it?—Ours being a suburban district apart from London, it would not come, of course, under the control of the London County Council; but, with regard to London, I am of opinion that it would be advisable to break up London in some way so that the hours were not the same in the West-end as in the East-end.

Chairman—continued.

3059. And you think that you could deal with the Tottenham and Edmonton district apart from the London district?—Yes.

3060. At any rate you would like to have the opportunity of trying?—Yes.

3061. Then I may take it that your association is in favour of the Bill as it stands, but that they would like the modification which you have suggested to be introduced into it?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson.

3062. Are you a shopkeeper or a shop assistant?—A shopkeeper.

3063. Do you employ any assistants?—Yes.

3064. May I ask how many?—Seven or eight.

3065. The question has been put very often, but I wish to ask you whether you think that the effect of an early closing order under this Bill would be to aid the big shops such as yours against the small shops?—I do not look on any shop as a big shop. I say that I employ seven or eight assistants in three different shops, so that mine are all small shops.

3066. Well, as against the small shops, then?—No.

3067. The small shopkeeper, as a rule, is a man who keeps his shop open latest, is he not?—In many cases.

3068. Therefore he would possibly be affected by the Bill?—Not necessarily.

3069. Your district is largely one inhabited by working-class people, is it not?—Certainly.

3070. Many of whom, I suppose, work in London?—Yes.

3071. And come out at night to their homes?—Yes.

3072. How could they shop, especially in dealing with certain articles, if the hour of closing were fixed we will say as early as six?—That would never be attempted in Tottenham.

3073. What would you contemplate then as the hour of closing?—The earliest we should attempt to get would be something like 9 or 8.30.

3074. If any other hour were fixed it would be detrimental to the working classes, would it not?—It would not be attempted under the Bill.

3075. Under the Bill you can petition for anything up to 6 o'clock, you know?—Yes, but there would not be one person in Tottenham that would think of that.

3076. Then

Mr. Lawson—continued.

3076. Then all you wish is to secure an 8.30 o'clock closing?—8.30, and the half holiday.

3077. You are under an urban district board, are you not?—Yes.

3078. In some parts of your district do you touch the County of London?—No.

3079. Your district does not touch it at all?—No.

3080. Is there one district board for Tottenham and Edmonton?—There is the Tottenham district council and the Edmonton district council.

3081. Supposing that there were a different hour fixed in those two localities, do you think that it would prejudice the traders in the place where it was not fixed?—No.

3082. You would not be afraid of that?—No.

3083. And you believe that you have the small shopkeepers as much with you as the large shopkeepers?—Yes; the small shopkeepers themselves desire legislation, in my opinion, in their own interest against the very small minority that keeps them open now.

3084. Have you a weekly half holiday?—For some shops.

3085. Not for all?—No.

3086. Have you had any expression of opinion of the working classes in your district?—It is entirely in favour of early closing.

3087. Have you had any meetings in support of early closing?—Yes, public meetings and open air meetings; meetings called specially in reference to special cases where one or two have jeopardised the movement; and on all occasions all classes of politicians on the different sides have been in favour of it.

Mr. Baldwin.

3088. I understood you to say that you wished to bring the tallyman under the Bill?—Yes, that is what we suggest.

3089. How would that be possible?—It is rather doubtful whether they would be under the Bill. We only wish to have it made clear.

3090. A tallyman is a travelling draper, is he not, a man who goes about the country?—Yes; but he generally has a private house where the goods are on show, and the customers go there; that is our experience in Tottenham.

Chairman.

3091. I should just like to know about the half holiday; you say that it is not generally observed in Tottenham and Edmonton?—No; it is continually in jeopardy of being overthrown. We no sooner get a half holiday settled for certain trades than one man overthrows it and we have to begin all afresh.

3092. And although you have to some extent a half holiday are you anxious for the half holiday clauses in the Bill so as to ensure it?—Yes.

3093. Have you any experience of other places where the same thing occurs. I have been given to understand that there are other places where they have a half holiday, but they are always afraid of losing it?—Yes; I have known other places in the same condition.

3094. So that you think that even in places where they have a half holiday they would be glad of these clauses so as to be sure of retaining that half holiday?—Yes.

Mr. ALFRED GEORGE MAHER, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3095. YOU represent, I believe, the United Shop Assistants Association?—I do.

3096. That is especially a London association, is it not?—London and the suburbs.

3097. What do you consider to be the hours in the districts where you have representation?—The hours that are worked or the hours that should be worked, do you mean?

3098. I mean the hours that are worked at present?—In the district where I am at work the hours are from 86 to 90 per week.

3099. Have you any hope of getting those hours shortened by voluntary action?—None whatever.

3100. Is your association in favour of legislation?—Yes.

3101. I will ask you about any amendments to the Bill in a moment; but you approve of the Bill in its general outlines?—We approve of the Bill on the principle that half a loaf is better than no loaf at all.

3102. But you have some amendments to suggest, I believe, which, in your opinion, would secure you the whole loaf?—Yes.

3103. We shall be happy to hear what they are?—I think you have them in a printed form.

3104. I will just run through them; you wish

in Clause 1 the word "shall" instead of "may"?—Yes, we wish that.

3105. Do you not think that local authorities would be almost sure to carry out the wishes of a majority of two-thirds of the shopkeepers?—Not necessarily so. For instance, assuming that it was left to the discretion of the vestries there might be a few tradesmen on the vestry who were antagonistic to the movement, and consequently would refuse to put the Act into force.

3106. But you observe that it is not left to the vestry; it is left to the London County Council?—I said assuming that it was left to the vestry.

3107. But it is not left to the vestry, but to the London County Council?—I understand that is so.

3108. Does that make any difference in your view, then?—Slightly; if it is left to the London County Council, I do not think it would make so much difference as if it were left to the vestries.

3109. I believe you wish to alter the "one-third," in Clause 3, to "two-thirds"?—Yes.

3110. Have you considered that the object of wording it as it is, is that Parliament should feel assured that they were acting in accordance with the wishes of the majority of tradespeople?—Yes.

3111. You wish, also, to make the fines heavier, I believe?—Yes.

3112. And you also wish that a certain amount of time should be fixed after the shop is closed, so that the assistants should not be allowed to be worked more than a certain length of time after the shop is closed?—Yes, we think that that should be limited to the time of closing.

3113. Do you not think that you ought to allow some time for putting up and sorting the goods?—That could be done before the shutters were put up, we think, very well.

3114. Supposing you were not able to get those amendments, I presume you would rather have the Bill than nothing at all, as you say that half-a-loaf is better than no loaf at all?—Yes.

Mr. Frye.

3115. What trades are these which you say work from 86 to 90 hours per week?—A great many trades; for instance, tailoring and boot shops, tea grocers, and provision merchants, and a variety of trades.

3116. But tailoring work would be done at the people's homes, would it not?—I mean clothiers' establishments where they sell clothing. And while I am speaking of that we also think (although we have not included that among our recommendations) that there ought to be some limitation of the time on Sundays.

3117. What particular trade do you represent yourself?—The trade I work at is a clothiers' assistant.

3118. And you are here from the United Shop Assistants' Association?—Yes; representing all trades.

3119. What is the number of members that you have in the association?—Something like 550.

3120. Does that take in the whole of London?—Yes; the whole of London for our society.

3121. How many assistants do you think there are in London?—I believe it has been estimated that there are something like 500,000.

3122. And your association numbers a very small proportion of the assistants among its members?—Yes, the enlightened proportion though.

3123. Of course you do not have any traders at all in your association?—None whatever.

3124. What do you think is the feeling of the traders with regard to this step?—Mostly in favour of it.

3125. Do you think they are quite willing that their shops should be shut up by Act of Parliament?—Yes; for instance, my employer is so, otherwise I should not be here to-day.

3126. And if this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament I presume you would want a number of inspectors to see that it is carried out properly?—Undoubtedly.

3127. Who would you suggest should be the inspectors to do that?—I should suggest that the County Council should appoint them; and not, as it is under the Shop Hours Regulation Act, "may" appoint them, but should appoint them.

3128. You do not suggest that the police should be employed as inspectors?—It is immaterial to me whether it is the police who are employed or inspectors. I think either one of them could do it efficiently.

Mr. Frye—continued.

3129. Then, with regard to the local authority, you said that the words should be altered from "may" to "shall." Of course there are others besides shopkeepers interested in this question, and the local authority would probably look after the people who buy at the shops. Do you not think that they should have a say in the matter?—The customers?

3130. Yes?—No, I do not think so.

3131. You think that they should not be considered at all?—No, from the very fact that they can purchase earlier if they like; but if you keep your establishment open to 12 o'clock at night you would find a customer coming in just as you were closing the door.

3132. Do you find that the smaller traders are opposed to this legislation?—No; in fact my experience is that the larger traders are more opposed to it than the smaller ones.

3133. And you think it would not do them any harm that all trades should be closed at one hour throughout London?—None whatever.

3134. You think that would be quite as convenient for the West End of London as for the East End?—Yes, from the simple fact that they would never close at the West End time in the East End. I mean to say that if you took the poorer districts you would find that the earliest they would go to would be 8.30 or 9 o'clock at night.

3135. Do you think that the voluntary movement has not made any perceptible difference in the hours of shop assistants?—None whatever, with the exception of a slight difference on Thursdays.

3136. How many shops in London do you think close at 2 on Thursdays?—Very few; most of them close at 5, and there has to be a deal of pressure brought to bear on various tradesmen to keep to that.

Mr. Diamond.

3137. Would you be in favour of allowing one-third of the shopkeepers to compel two-thirds to close?—No, I think that would be going too far.

3138. You are quite certain of that?—Yes.

3139. But you would allow one-third to be able to keep the other two-thirds closed if once they did close; that is to say, you would allow the one-third to prevent the two-thirds from opening?—Yes.

3140. Do you not think that is rather inconsistent?—Not necessarily. You must understand that this is a shopkeepers' Bill. On the other side, you have 500,000 assistants in London alone, and we will say nearly two-thirds of the tradesmen, and consequently one-third of the tradesmen would be preventing the other two-thirds and all the shop assistants from closing.

3141. Our contention in favour of the Bill is that there is an overwhelming majority of tradesmen required in favour of closing?—I should say not.

3142. But the Bill cannot be put into force unless there is a majority of two-thirds, which I call an overwhelming majority?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

3143. Do you not call that an overwhelming majority?—I do not think it would be possible to get that in all cases.

3144. Then if you could not get it there would be no closing?—Yes.

3145. Then, if you had got the shops closed, unless two-thirds are in favour of opening, you would permit one-third to keep them closed?—Yes; the very fact that you obtain a two-thirds majority would show that two-thirds were in favour of closing, and then, simply because one or two tradesmen happened to change their minds in a moment of fickleness, they could re-open it all.

3146. But do you not think it would be better, as a previous witness suggested, that after two-thirds had decided to close, then there should not be another poll taken for a certain time, say, a limit of two years?—Yes, I should be in favour of a time limit.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

3147. You think that that would give traders on both sides a fair opportunity of considering how the thing was working?—Yes.

3148. And if, at the end of that time, half the traders were in favour of re-opening, you could not allow one-half to compel the other half to close their shops?—Not under the Bill.

3149. But you could not, could you?—My opinion personally is in favour of a bare majority to close them.

3150. Would not that do away with your other opinion that one-third should be able to compel two-thirds to keep closed?—A bare majority either way is my personal opinion.

Sir John Lubbock.
Sir Blundell Maple.
Sir Francis Powell.
Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., F.R.S., IN THE CHAIR.

Councillor JOHN JAMIESON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3151. You are here to-day as representing the Scottish Shopkeepers' Union, I think?—Well, sir, I am a director of that union; I have been, for a very short time, indeed. I was sent for by a communication from this House.

3152. Yes; but you can speak for that union?—Yes.

3153. You yourself are a merchant clothier in Edinburgh?—I am.

3154. Is "The Scottish Shopkeepers' Union in Edinburgh," a fairly representative body?—Yes, I would deem it so; its influence is chiefly amongst the smaller class of shopkeepers.

3155. It represents many of the smaller class of shopkeepers?—Yes; where the late hours prevail chiefly.

3156. It comprises both shopkeepers and assistants, does it not?—Yes.

3157. Could you tell the Committee at all in what proportion it is made up of the shopkeepers and assistants?—No; I am rather unable to do that, for I have more taken a general interest in it; and it was at the solicitation of the other directors that I recently joined as a director; they thought I would be of use to them.

3158. At any rate, it represents fairly the general shopkeepers?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

3159. Are you chairman of your body?—I am not.

Chairman.

3160. I think you are Vice-President?—I am Vice-President of the Merchants' Association of Edinburgh.

3161. And you have been for the last four and a-half years a member of the City Council of Edinburgh?—I have.

3162. And one of the representatives of the St. Leonard's Ward?—Yes.

3163. Which is chiefly occupied by the shopkeeping and industrial classes, is it not?—Yes, that is so.

3164. You are tolerably well acquainted with their feelings naturally upon the subject?—Yes, I think I am able to form a good judgment.

Chairman—continued.

3165. You are also a member of the Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

3166. And, as you have said, Vice-President of the Merchants' Association?—Yes.

3167. In all those capacities I think you have taken considerable interest in the question which is now before this Committee?—Yes, I have; within recent years, at any rate.

3168. Have you any doubt that if the two-thirds majority of the shopkeepers was obtained, the Corporation of Edinburgh would put this Bill into operation if it becomes an Act?—I have no doubt of that.

3169. Do you believe that the two-thirds majority would be obtained under the Act?—Yes, I am strongly inclined to think that.

3170. Now, as regards the working classes, do you think they would be put to any inconvenience by the adoption of the Act?—I do not think so.

3171. I believe it is the case that the Edinburgh Trades' Council has passed a resolution in favour of shortening the hours of labour in the shops?—Yes.

3172. Could you tell the Committee approximately what the hours are of the smaller shops in Edinburgh?—Yes. It is with reference to the smaller shopkeepers, that I speak chiefly. There is a considerable section of the shopkeepers in Edinburgh at present that have early hours of closing.

3173. Those would be the larger shops, would they not?—Yes, the shops in Prince's-street, George-street, and streets intersecting those streets, and in some degree the north and south bridges; there is no reason for complaining of the hours there, for the quite good reason that as regards the classes that deal with such shops their shopping is done before five o'clock in the afternoon.

3174. The Committee quite understand generally that in Edinburgh and elsewhere in the richer neighbourhoods and the larger shops, the hours are comparatively short?—Yes.

3175. Could

3175. Could you state what the hours are in the poorer districts in the smaller shops?—I should say the earliest prevailing hour is eight o'clock in the evening.

3176. What time do they open in the morning?—About half-past eight, perhaps, in the morning, until eight to half-past eight in the evening; that is, the most favourably placed of them; there are others that are open to nine, some till half-past nine, and even until 10 o'clock on week nights; and on Saturday evenings a great many of them only shut with the close of the week, 12 o'clock.

3177. I presume the shop assistants are kept some little while after the shop is actually closed in many cases, are they not?—Yes, that is so sometimes.

3178. Have you any hopes of curtailing the hours by voluntary action?—No; I really have no hope of that from my knowledge of the facts.

3179. And you believe that the small shopkeepers themselves would be glad of earlier hours provided they could be made general; is that the case?—Yes; I am satisfied that they are chiefly the supporters of the proposals in that direction.

3180. The small shopkeepers are the main supporters of the proposal?—Yes.

3181. You are aware of the general provisions of the Bill which is now before this Committee, are you not?—Yes, I am; I have a copy of it, and know about it quite well.

3182. I will not ask you at the moment to make any suggestions as to details, but I ask you, for the information of the Committee, whether you approve of the Bill as a whole?—I approve of the Bill generally.

3183. And you believe that it would do something to improve the state of affairs?—I approve of it chiefly in the direction of earlier hours in the evening; I think there would be greater mental and physical benefits from that than from anything else.

3184. Then the general outline of the Bill meets with your approval, and that of your association?—Certainly.

3185. Now, have you any suggestions on the clauses that you would like to bring before the Committee?—There have been one or two petitions in its favour from some bodies in Edinburgh.

3186. We will come to that in a moment; in the meantime let us just take the provisions of the Bill. Have you any suggestions you would like to make as to amending the Bill, or are you satisfied with it as it stands?—I am not so sure of the half-holiday being desirable, that is to say, a compulsory half-holiday. I strongly approve of the enforcing, by compulsion of a two-thirds vote, earlier hours at night.

3188. Would you object to a provision which would enable the shopkeepers to determine that matter for themselves?—Certainly not.

Chairman—continued.

3189. Then you would approve of it?—I fully approve of the local option contained in the Bill.

3190. Then you would approve of the clause as it stands, because it is on the principle of local option?—Yes.

3191. I would like that to be quite clear: you observe that the half-holiday is not compulsory under the Bill; it only becomes compulsory provided two-thirds of the shopkeepers wish for it?—I quite understand.

3192. And that you approve?—Yes.

3193. Then may I take it that your association approves of the Bill generally as it stands?—It strongly approves of it; it is part of its Articles of Faith.

3194. We have had evidence from one witness that the trade journals generally were opposed to the Bill, "The Drapers' Record," for instance. Could you give the Committee any evidence upon that point; is it correct to say "The Drapers' Record" is opposed to the Bill?—I do not think it can be correct. I do not often see that "Record," but I have a copy of it before me of April 6th (the most recent copy), where it is stated that they have not expressed any final opinion whatever.

3195. Perhaps you would just read that part of it?—"One of the witnesses examined on Tuesday before the Select Committee on the Shops (Early Closing) Bill stated that the 'Drapers' Record' was 'dead against' legislation of the kind under consideration. This is not correct. We have not expressed any final opinion one way or the other, holding that the trade, which is the final authority on the subject, has not yet voiced its own view with anything like distinctness."

Sir Blundell Maple.

3196. Does not that paragraph go a bit further, and say something more?—It does.

3197. Will you read that?—"Were it otherwise there would hardly be much necessity for the Select Committee to seek evidence on the point."

Chairman.

3198. Now, "The Grocer." Can you give the Committee any information as to the views of "The Grocer"?—"The Grocer" is rather more strongly in favour of the Bill I should say. It says: "We have seen what the result of the present system is, viz., a failure; we shall not, therefore, object to see what legislation can do."

3199. Will you hand in those two articles from "The Drapers' Record" and "The Grocer," so that they may appear in the Appendix to our Proceedings?—Certainly. (The documents were handed in.)

3200. Then, on the whole, your association is in favour of the Bill, and you believe it would be welcomed as a boon by the small shopkeepers, and that there is no opposition to it amongst the working classes?—That is my opinion. As I have said already, it is chiefly among the small shopkeepers that the strong desire exists for the Bill being adopted. If there is anything to be regretted it is that the larger shopkeepers who have already satisfactory hours do not take sufficient interest in it, they are a little little unsympathetic. The working-classes, I know, would be quite in favour of it; certainly, they are in favour of it.

Sir Francis Powell.

3201. You gave us certain hours of closing in the smaller shops in the poor districts. Do those hours extend to all classes of shops?—Well, some trades are certainly worse than others.

3202. Are the hours which you have given applicable to trades in general?—Yes; I should say small drapers, and bootmakers, and hatters and hosiers, can all come under the same category.

3203. The great majority of all kinds and classes of shops?—Yes, the great majority.

3204. What intervals have you for meals?—An hour, or an hour and a-half for dinner is, I think, what usually prevails.

3205. An hour and a-half for dinner?—Perhaps an hour to an hour and a-half for dinner.

3206. Then have you an interval for light refreshments, such as tea, or the like, in the afternoon?—I do not think there is much provision made for that.

3207. Is there any?—I am not aware that they get out of the place.

3208. What is the hour of dinner?—Running from one o'clock on to three o'clock.

3209. Do you mean that assistants work from the hour you have mentioned up to the hour of closing without any interval for refreshment?—With the exception of dinner-time; there may be exceptions.

3210. From one to eight is seven hours; is there any interval allowed during those hours?—They go to dinner at one, say; they have at least from half-past two to eight.

3211. Without any opportunity of refreshment of any kind whatever, a cup of tea or a cup of coffee, or whatever it may be?—They may, inside the premises, get that.

3212. There are arrangements made that they may have that advantage, are there?—I do not think they are usually made.

3213. What is your objection to the half-holiday system?—I think it is not so suitable for a large town where there are a good many visitors coming into the town.

3214. Why not?—There are business inconveniences. It is very suitable, and in fact it has proved to be very successful, in smaller towns; and perhaps in towns which are purely industrial towns, but in show-towns or large towns, it is not just so suitable.

3215. We have had it in evidence from a Scotch witness, that with the exception of some of the great cities such as Edinburgh and Glasgow, the half-holiday is universal in Scotland?—Yes, I think it is quite suitable for the smaller towns.

3216. Why should not it be applicable to the larger towns if it is so good and so universal in the smaller ones?—It would be difficult to get it adopted generally where the Saturday afternoon is observed as a holiday to any extent. Then there is a further considerable inconvenience to the business community and to visitors.

3217. I understand the half-holiday is not a holiday at all to the shops in Edinburgh?—It is among the better class of shops.

3218. What time do they close on Saturday?—There are some who shut at two o'clock.

3219. That is practically a half-holiday for the larger shops?—Yes.

3220. Whereas the smaller shops have no half-holiday at all?—No; they have a longer day.

3221. I ask you: Is that fair and just and equal for the assistants?—No, it is not absolutely fair.

3222. Then do you think that the customers are incapable of becoming accustomed to a half-holiday in your great cities?—I cannot say honestly that I favour it; I do not expect so much benefit from it as from shorter hours generally in the evening.

3223. The only reason, I take it, that you have against it is that it would not suit the customers. My question again is: if it is suitable for all towns excepting the very large ones, why should it not be suitable for these large towns?—Well, you know, I can only speak of Edinburgh with any certainty; I understand that it is quite generally adopted even in as large towns as Leeds and Bradford.

3224. Then can you give the Committee any substantial reason, any really valid and effectual reason, why it should not be adopted in Edinburgh?—Only just what I have stated; indeed, with the want of general approval of it that exists, there is some doubt if it would secure the two-thirds majority; if it would do that, I am quite in favour of it.

3225. If it were to become generally popular, you would not oppose the popular voice in that regard?—Oh no, certainly not.

3226. Do you think public opinion is moving in that direction?—Well, the efforts put forth in Edinburgh have chiefly been directed to secure a half-holiday, and they have not been marked by any permanent success; but, of course, I attribute that just to the want of some form of compulsion, or some sort of guarantee that there will be a general shutting.

3227. Should you favour a general shutting supposing that could have legal authority?—I would.

3228. You would?—Yes.

3229. Your objection is not against the principle so much as against the purely voluntary system, that system being in your judgment not applicable?—I do not think the voluntary system will ever secure success in early closing.

3230. But you would not regret seeing a compulsory system of half-holiday?—No, I should not regret that.

Mr. Tennant.

3231. Are you in favour of another day being substituted for Saturday?—No. I think Saturday is the ideal half-holiday.

3232. You do; but you see great difficulties in the way of it?—I do.

3233. You are familiar with Edinburgh, I think you have said?—Yes.

3234. In applying this Bill to Edinburgh, would you treat Edinburgh as a whole, or would you you divide Edinburgh up into sections?—I would have a smaller area than the whole city.

3235. What lines of demarcation would you have?—Well, I have not quite thought that out; I think the wards would be quite suitable; or take perhaps two wards together, or something like that.

3236. I understand you would be in favour of shutting up one particular class of shop as against taking a poll over the whole of the shops of a particular district?—I think that would work best in a large city. [My answer surely incorrectly reported. I would certainly be in favour of a poll of all classes of shops.]

3238. Are they different on one side of the street to what they are on the other side of the street?—No, I should hardly say that.

3239. Then if you have got a town like Edinburgh you have got certain main thoroughfares which divide the wards from each other, have not you?—Yes.

3240. Is it not conceivable in the system you advocate that one set of shops should be shut on one side of the street, and others on the other side of the street left open?—No, I do not think that would happen.

3241. You do not think it would happen?—No. Well, yes it would happen if one ward adopted the compulsory system and the other did not.

3242. Have you any cure for that; because do not you agree that that would operate unfairly in practice?—Yes, it is conceivable that it might.

3243. That being the case, do not you think it would be simpler to take the city as a whole?—I still think that is a large area in a town as large as Edinburgh.

3244. We have had witnesses here from Scotland who advocate that principle for Glasgow, which is nearly three times the size of Edinburgh. You do not think that that could be done. I only want your opinion as a man conversant with Edinburgh?—Well, I think it would be simple enough. Without binding myself to say what wards should be the division, I think it would be simple enough to find a division that would avoid any injustice.

3245. But that is rather vague, is it not,—unless you can tell us in what manner you think it could be done?—As I say, I have not bent my mind just to that. I do point out this distinction in Edinburgh, that the greater number of the shops are in working-class districts, but there is a considerable number of them where the shopping is finished long before the present hours of shutting.

Chairman.

3246. You are, of course, aware that the Bill leaves it open, for instance, to Edinburgh to determine for itself whether it should be treated as a whole city, or by wards or by any other division?—Yes; I was just looking that up.

Chairman—continued.

3247. You would be in favour, would you not, of leaving this question to be determined by those who have local knowledge?—I think the local authority is quite competent to determine questions like that; and regarding the classification of shops I might be allowed to say that I have noticed some objections stated by the Scottish Trade Protection Society where they authorise objection to the measure to the effect that shops would be apt to adopt a different trade—a trade which comes under one of the exemptions,—so as to evade the operation of the Bill. Now I notice that that is left to be dealt with by the local authority as well: "If any question arises as to the classification of shops or trades for the purposes of this Act, or whether any particular shop or shops is or are included in any class to which any of the provisions of this Act or any application or order under this Act extends, such question may be referred to the central authority." I think that is quite sufficient to meet that objection.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3248. Then there is Clause 5 I will call your attention to?—"A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is, by any order made under this Act, required to be closed for the purpose of any of them."

Mr. Tennant.

3249. I was just coming to that. Will you be good enough to tell the Committee whether you approve of that Clause 5 as it is drafted?—Yes.

3250. Have you in Edinburgh many large shops carrying on several trades; I know one or two myself?—Oh, yes.

3251. And do you think there would be any difficulty in asking them to close all their branches—all their particular departments,—on one or two days of the week?—No, I do not think so. In the case of any of the shopkeepers who carry on any of these exempted trades, it is quite a subsidiary feature of the trade.

3252. You may have a store which carries on the business of a draper, a grocer, a butcher, a provision merchant and everything else, quite a general shop, where you can buy anything?—Yes.

3253. There are such shops in Edinburgh, are there not?—Yes; and it is proposed to include all these trades under the order.

3254. Suppose you have the grocer shut on the Monday, the butcher on the Tuesday, and the draper on the Wednesday?—For the half-holiday?

3255. Well, I was thinking more of an early hour, say six o'clock; this Bill, I think, fixes six o'clock?—It would be far better to determine that by a general measure.

3256. This Bill would determine that, as I understand it: Is not that your reading of the Bill?—I am not quite sure about that.

Chairman.

3257. Are not these large shops generally early-closing shops?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

3258. What time do they close?—Some of them shut at six o'clock in the evening, others at seven.

3259. And what time do you think is a fair and reasonable hour at which to ask the majority of the shops to close on an ordinary week day?—I would extend it to eight o'clock.

3260. So that you think there is no difficulty under this clause of the Bill, inasmuch as the large shops carrying on several different trades do actually close before the hour at which you wish to compel the small shops to close?—Yes; there would be no difficulty with regard to that at all.

3261. That is another objection the Scottish Trade Protection Society had?—Yes.

3262. There is nothing in that, I think?—They say it would press hardly upon the small shopkeeper, because the big shopkeeper could keep his hands inside after the shop was closed working at packing up goods and making up orders.

3263. After the shutters are up?—After the shutters are up; but that is quite absurd, for nothing of that kind is done now, or only to a very slight extent; they would still be easily shut long before eight o'clock.

3264. That is to say, those shops which actually close at six or even seven, we will say, do not keep their assistants in after the closing?—Not any length of time.

3265. More than half an hour, we will say?—No, not more than that; that is the very outside I should say. The representations of the Scottish Trade Protection Society set out with guarding the interests of the small shopkeepers, and it is just the small shopkeepers who are most strongly in favour of this Bill.

3266. Because the small shopkeepers keep open I suppose later than the large ones?—Yes.

3267. Then you do not see any difficulty in the matter of shops that have several trades?—No, I think not; I think the local authority could settle that point quite well.

3268. You would understand, I suppose, that such a shop exists as one which carries on two or more trades, which keeps open until eight or nine o'clock at night. Suppose there is such a shop and that this Bill, if it became an Act, was acted upon, would it create very great difficulty to that particular shop?—I do not think so.

3269. You do not think it would?—Not to any extent.

3270. Why? Under the Bill you would be able to make it close every night at six instead of half-past eight or nine?—Under the Bill?

3271. Supposing it were acted upon?—It says, not earlier than six o'clock.

3272. Well, say half-past six, or seven, that would be a very considerable difference, that is my point. Do not you agree to that?—Do you mind stating your question again, sir?

3273. If there is such a thing as a shop in Edinburgh which carries on two or more trades and does keep open until eight or half-past eight, or nine or half-past nine, habitually, this Bill becoming law and being acted upon would make a very great difference to that particular shop would it not?—Do you mean by "two or more trades" inclusive of one of the exempted trades?

Mr. Tennant—continued.

3274. No, I do not mean necessarily that; I mean two or three trades which are closed?—No, I cannot see any difficulty there; I do not think it would make any difference.

Chairman.

3275. It would not make any more difference to that shop than to any other shop, would it?—No.

3276. The large shops already, generally speaking, close earlier than the hour which probably would be likely to be adopted under the Bill?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3277. But there are plenty of stores for the poor people in the poor neighbourhoods that keep all sorts of things, are there not?—Yes.

3278. And they are open late now?—Yes.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

3279. What is the membership of your association?—I cannot tell you that.

3280. Is it very small?—It is not very numerous in Edinburgh; it is mainly a Glasgow Association; it is only a district branch in Edinburgh. You are speaking of the Scottish Shopkeepers' Union?

3281. Yes, the association of which you speak to-day?—Well, I profess to speak for the general trend of opinion, and to the facts in Edinburgh.

3282. Of course, that must be very doubtful; the people you can speak positively for are the people of this association?—I cannot say that I came up with the idea that I was speaking for them entirely or exclusively.

3283. Has not another gentleman (Mr. Cooney) spoken here for the same association; another witness, do you know that, the chairman of the Scottish?—He is not chairman in Edinburgh; Mr. Little is the name of the chairman in Edinburgh.

3284. Do I understand that you are giving evidence for yourself, and not for any particular association?—I have pretty extensive knowledge of the whole.

3285. I do not doubt that. Are you giving evidence on behalf of the association here?—I can speak for that association; I can speak for other associations, and I can give you the facts.

3286. Could you tell me, then, for how many people you are speaking?—I could not.

3287. Has any resolution been passed at any town's meeting (or any burgh) on the subject?—Yes.

3288. What town?—The Merchants' Association, of which I am vice-president, has passed a resolution in favour of the principle of Sir John Lubbock's Bill. There is also a joint committee of the different traders' associations. There are several associations; they have a joint committee, and that joint committee has also passed a resolution of the same kind almost unanimously.

3289. Have public meetings been held upon the subject?—Yes.

3290. What public meetings have been held?—There

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

—There was a large public meeting last winter (which I was at), which was addressed by Mr. Cameron Corbett, where Mr. Cameron Corbett argued in favour of early closing under such powers as those of this Bill, and was very enthusiastically received.

Chairman.

3291. And there was one the year before which I had the honour of addressing in the same way?—In the same year, was it?

3292. It may have been the year before, or the year before that?—Yes.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

3293. From your acquaintance with Edinburgh would you say there was much difference in the interests of the different quarters of the city?—A good deal; but a great deal of it is just "use and wont." Undoubtedly, where the late shopping prevails they could be easily educated into early shopping.

3294. Are the shops kept open latest in the suburban districts?—They are kept open latest in the poorer class districts.

3295. That is, of course, because of the necessities of the poorer classes?—I do not think it is for the "necessities" precisely.

3296. What would you say was the reason of it?—Just an extremely bad habit that has grown up by the custom of years.

3297. Is it the case in Edinburgh that the hours in the bigger shops in the central part have diminished of late years?—That the hours have been shortened?

3298. Yes?—Oh, yes; I think they have been in the larger shops.

3299. What improvement has there been?—The adoption of two o'clock on Saturday and six o'clock during the week. It is a good many years old with some firms, but the number of firms coming under it is increasing.

3300. To the shops in that quarter this Bill would not apply?—No, it would not apply at all.

3301. It would only bring pressure to bear on the small shopkeepers in the outer districts?—Yes.

3302. And is there any expressed opinion on their part in favour of being coerced?—Yes; I think there is good evidence that they wish it.

3303. What evidence is there?—There is the evidence of those associations having passed resolutions on the subject where that class of shopkeepers is very well represented, and my own judgment is that if they were more strongly represented the decision would be still more emphatic; for those who are opposed to it are some of the larger shopkeepers, who are members of such associations, or wholesale merchants.

3304. Why, if they close now at six o'clock, should they be opposed to this Bill?—Well, just from the fear that a great many people have, that we are doing too much by legislation; some of them are strongly individualistic in their tendencies.

3305. The small shopkeeper is the man who would suffer by the Bill?—I do not admit that he would suffer.

3306. At any rate, he would be affected by the

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

Bill; you say he is in favour of it?—Yes; I think he is the best judge of whether he would suffer or not; and if he thought he would suffer he would not be in favour of it.

3307. How many of the small shopkeepers have expressed an opinion?—There has never been any poll taken.

3308. No poll?—No; there has never been any vote taken.

3309. Therefore, it is quite a matter of opinion what they think or do not think?—One can only judge from the expression of opinion which has been given by public meetings, by the discussion of the subject at certain associations, and so on, and what one knows personally from contact with such shopkeepers.

3310. Do the workpeople in Edinburgh live a good deal in the outer parts of the city?—No; the rather well-to-do are in the suburban districts I should say; but they are not just so bad as in the working class districts; that is to say, bakers, large grocers, butchers, and so on; some of them shut comparatively early in residential districts.

3311. When do the hours of labour generally come to an end for workpeople in Edinburgh; at what time?—Five o'clock in a good many trades.

3312. Take a barber's trade, for example?—They are among the late shopkeepers, a great many of them.

3313. That is, of course, to meet the convenience of the workmen, I suppose?—Presumably it is for that.

3314. Do you believe that under this Bill it would be possible to close the barbers' shops much earlier?—I think so.

3315. Would not that interfere with the convenience of the working classes?—I do not think it would, because the working classes' hours have been very much shortened, and the shopkeepers' hours have not been, relatively, shortened at all.

3316. But in the case of the small barber's shop, or in the case of any barber's shop, the man can shut at what time he likes?—That is so; but he wants a guarantee that his neighbour shuts also.

3317. Has any attempt been made to come to an agreement in the different trades?—There have been repeated attempts, but they have been unsuccessful; they have always broken down from self interest being stronger than combination.

3318. Suppose this Bill were passed, do you think any ill-feeling would be aroused by prosecutions under it?—No; certainly my opinion is that it would be quite easily enforced from the fact that it would get public support, and operate, as all our good laws operate, without difficulty.

3319. If there is such a strong feeling in Scotland in favour of it, would you prefer it should be confined to Scotland?—I understand there is quite as strong a feeling in England.

3320. You have no opinion as to the Bill being first tried in Scotland?—No; I should have it operative all over.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3321. You did not give us the numbers belonging to your association?—No, I really could not do that with any accuracy.

3322. Would you say there were 200, 300, or 400?—Well, it is not strong in Edinburgh; it has not taken very deep root.

3323. Are they composed of shopkeepers or assistants?—Both.

3324. How many assistants, do you think, are employed in Edinburgh, at a rough guess?—I could not really say; I would not even venture to make a rough guess.

3325. Then you spoke about the small traders; do not you think the effect of closing the small shops at the same time as the large ones would tend to drive the trade from the small shopkeepers into the hands of the larger ones?—No, I do not think that the effect of the Bill would be to make them shut at the same time.

3326. You think not?—I think that the large places will voluntarily shut somewhat earlier than a compulsory Bill would ask them to do.

3327. Then you gave it as your opinion that eight o'clock would be a fair time for the shops?—Yes, I think so. I think it would not be wise, perhaps, to make it any earlier than that.

3328. Do you think that there are many shops with assistants that work later than that, except on Fridays and Saturdays?—Oh, yes; decidedly.

3329. What are the hours for closing; you said six o'clock some of the shops closed?—Oh, yes; some in exceptional localities.

3330. You think eight o'clock would be a fair time?—I do.

3331. Then about the mixed traders; are there any hairdressers who keep a little tobacconist's shop, and who would have to close, although their neighbour, the tobacconist, might be allowed to keep open?—I have my doubts as to whether tobacconists should be exempted.

3332. Chemists; would you exempt them?—I would sooner exempt chemists than tobacconists; they are more necessary.

3333. Chemists sell all kinds of things nowadays, do not they?—Yes; I think they should not be exempted, except under certain conditions.

3334. Then there are newsagents?—I do not see why they should be exempted.

3335. They sell stationery and that kind of thing?—I do not see why they should be exempted.

3336. Then you know public-houses work the longest hours of any trade; would you exempt them?—I suppose special legislation is required for that business.

3337. Have not you a good many holidays in Edinburgh?—No, not many.

3338. What they call public holidays?—Very few.

3339. You say the half-holiday movement has not made any great strides there?—No; only just a temporary fitful sort of effort.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3340. But in the best neighbourhoods the best shops will close earlier?—That is on Saturday; they never have recognised a half-holiday during the week.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3341. Is not Saturday a part of the week?—Yes; they close on Saturday, whether other shops are closing or not.

3342. At two o'clock?—They do not all shut at two; a good many shut at four.

3343. Do not you think that the voluntary movement has made great strides during the last few years?—I cannot see it.

3344. You cannot see that it has?—No.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3345. Are you a retail trader yourself?—Yes.

3346. Do you keep a retail shop?—Yes.

3347. And you let all your assistants go away from one to half-past two for dinner?—No, I do not let them all go at one time.

3348. But you told a Member of the Committee just now that they had an hour and a-half in your shop for dinner?—Yes, they have an hour and a-half.

3349. Each man?—Yes.

3350. What time does your first party commence dinner?—About a quarter before one.

3351. How long do they go away for?—An hour and a-half.

3352. What time does the second party commence?—About two o'clock—a quarter past two, perhaps.

3353. A quarter past two they commence to go away?—Yes.

3354. What time do they come back?—An hour and a-half after that.

3355. Not until four?—Nearly four.

3356. And they come in the morning and do not have anything until that time—four o'clock?—At a quarter past two they go off; they come about ten minutes before nine in the morning.

3357. How many shop assistants have you?—I have not many. I am in the clothing trade, where it is all large sales—what we call the "bespoke" clothing trade; not the ready-made.

3358. How many shop assistants have you?—I have four assistants.

3359. Four assistants; you can consequently let two go at one time and two at another?—Yes.

3360. In a large number of cases, in the larger shops, they cannot let half their assistants go at one time, can they?—No; but those very large ones are adopting very largely now the system of giving the assistants their dinner on the premises.

3361. And they go in so many different parties, do not they?—Yes.

3362. So many at one time and so many at another?—Yes.

3363. Do I understand you to say that you do not give your people any time for tea?—No; but they may get an opportunity of sending out for a cup of tea, and take it on the premises. We shut at eight o'clock; for three months in the year at seven o'clock, and on Saturdays about an hour earlier, so that mine is not among the very late shops.

3364. There are a lot of clothiers, I suppose, supplying the working classes who are open much later?—Oh, yes, later than that, although the clothing trade is by no means the latest trade; trade; the hat trade, and boot and shoe shops, and hosiers, and so on, are a great deal later.

3365. I suppose there are a great many shops in the retail portion of your trade that sell drapery as well as clothes?—A few; not very many.

3366. Surely they sell boots?—No, that is not the case much in Edinburgh.

3367. But you know it is the case in England, generally, that they keep boots and shoes, and shirts and hosiery?—Yes.

3368. And trousers and hats?—Yes.

3369. Do not you see the difficulty that this Bill would create as regards all these different classes of trades, as to what that particular trade any one of those shops should come under?—It is proposed to apply the Bill to all those trades.

3370. Supposing the bootmakers close on a Monday, and take their half-holiday on the Monday, and the tailors take their half-holiday on the Tuesday, and the butchers on the Wednesday, and the drapers on the Thursday; by this Bill one of these shops keeping everything would have to take a half-holiday on each of these days?—Yes; those are amongst the inconveniences of the half-holiday.

3371. That is why you do not agree with the half-holiday?—I am not much in favour of the half-holiday. The Bill would be a thoroughly good Bill without that; it would be a very desirable Bill without the half-holiday clause at all.

3372. And you think also that the hour that is in the Bill should be altered from six until eight?—It says, "Not earlier than six;" I would have no objection to see an earlier hour than eight o'clock, and it would depend on the shopkeepers themselves. There is no use in putting a Bill in operation later than eight, I would say. I think eight should be the limit of lateness.

3373. Just now you said you would have tobacconists close, and you would not exempt them?—Oh, I do not know; I would not commit myself to that.

3374. You said as regards newspaper shops that you would not have them exempt?—I do not see the use of it.

3375. You do not think they should be exempt?—I do not see any use in exempting them.

3376. You would not exempt them?—No, I think not.

3377. Lots of stationers now sell newspapers, do not they?—Oh, yes, but there is no need for newspapers being sold in shops after eight o'clock.

3378. No need for them?—None whatever.

3379. And hairdressers, they are not to be exempt by this Bill?—No, they are not to be exempted.

3380. It is to take effect as to them?—Yes, I think very properly.

3381. Also refreshment rooms; you said something about what you would do with them?—I think there might be that exemption.

3382. All refreshment houses?—Yes, I think so.

3383. Ham and beef shops?—Not where they sell it over the counter; not where they sell it for non-consumption on the premises.

3384. Supposing the poor people go to these ham and beef shops in different parts to get some cooked meat; they have only just earned some money and want some cooked meat, having had nothing all day, perhaps; would you close those shops?—Yes.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3385. Suppose they arrived late by train?—I say I would be in favour; at least, I would not object to see refreshment places exempted.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3386. These ham and beef shops: you would close them?—Where the people pay for it over the counter, and take it away with them.

3387. Suppose they went to a public-house; they could buy cooked meat there, and take it away with them, could not they?—I do not know that they could.

3388. Sausages, and all sorts of things?—I do not know; perhaps they could.

3389. That would drive them into those places of refreshment, would it not?—There are places besides public-houses.

3390. It is cold cooked provisions I refer to. In the Bill it says, "that places where hot cooked provisions are sold" are to be exempt. Cannot you imagine that most of the ham and beef shops about London (I suppose they are the same in Scotland: they are according to my memory) sell cooked things cold; they do, do not they?—Yes.

3391. Will they not be allowed to sell what is cold, though the Bill says they may sell what is hot?—Oh, well, that is a detail.

3392. I believe generally it is acknowledged that it would be an advantage to get earlier closing if we could get it; the difficulty is to know how we can apply it in a practical form?—Yes; I daresay there is nothing that could be proposed that would not present some few difficulties on some side or another, but in this case the benefits would preponderate so largely that I do not think any objections on that ground are worth looking at.

3393. Just now, I think, you said that as regards the districts you would leave different wards to act by themselves?—I am not just prepared to commit myself to a plan as regards that, but I think that is a matter that could be left to the local authority.

3394. You would leave that to the local authority to decide?—I think so.

3395. And the getting of the canvass done in order to arrive at the two-thirds majority, how would you do that?—Under the direction of the local authority, too.

3396. How would you call upon the local authority to enforce that?—Merely to dictate the way in which it should be done. I would have the report made to the local authority first of all, on the part of the shopkeepers of a locality, of course, and division in the districts might be done first; I think that would be a good plan.

3396*. What would you have it done by, by ballot?—I think I would divide the city into districts. As at present advised, that is an idea that I have a preference for; and then action could be taken by the shopkeepers in that particular district, and representation made to the local authority.

3397. Who is to make the canvass?—The shopkeepers must devise means to do that, I think.

3398. Are the shopkeepers to vote by ballot, or are they to sign?—I think, when a representation was made by a certain number of shopkeepers in a district (you could name a number, 50 or 100), the local authority should then devise the means for taking the vote.

3399. Would you leave them to satisfy themselves or to obtain the vote?—Yes, I think so; I think it should be done by the local authority.

3400. You cannot conceive any difficulty arising?—Do you mean any difficulty arising from putting the Bill in operation?

3401. No, to arrive at the two-thirds majority of any particular class of shopkeepers?—No; I do not think there would be any difficulty.

Chairman.

3402. The small shopkeepers are a large majority, I suppose, in Edinburgh, as elsewhere?—Yes.

3403. Therefore, if the shopkeepers thought the Bill would be unfavourable to them they would not adopt it, would they?—Certainly not.

3404. Therefore the Bill leaves it in the hands of the shopkeepers to determine whether they will apply it or not?—Yes.

3405. Then, as regards the hour of closing, I understood you to say that practically eight o'clock would be the hour that would be probably adopted; but you did not mean to suggest, did you, that the hour of six o'clock, as a permissive hour, should be altered in the Bill?—No; I think that is quite unnecessary.

3406. As regards the wards, the Bill leaves it to each district to settle the divisions for itself. I understand you approve of the suggestions of the Bill in that respect, leaving it to those acquainted with the local circumstances to determine what would be the most convenient districts in each locality?—Yes.

3407. You were asked a question as to what would happen supposing one class of shops determined to have their half-holiday on the Monday, one on the Tuesday, one on the Wednesday, one on the Thursday, and one on the Saturday. Do you think it very likely that the local authority would agree to an arrangement which would be so inconvenient as that?—I think that difficulty could be obviated; I think the shopkeepers themselves would agree to fix on one day.

Chairman—continued.

3408. Therefore you do not think that is a practical difficulty?—No, I do not anticipate much difficulty there.

3409. Then, as regards a two-thirds majority; under the Bill it is left to the local authority to be satisfied that there really is a majority of two-thirds?—Yes.

3410. I understood you to say in the earlier part of your evidence that you thought, on the whole, that was the most convenient way of leaving the question?—Yes.

3411. Leaving it to the local authority to satisfy themselves as they may deem best, that there really is a majority of shopkeepers to the extent of two-thirds in favour of the Bill?—Yes, quite so.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3412. Do you know the working of the Shop Hours Regulation Act?—The Shop Hours Act, that is.

3413. The Shop Hours Regulation Act?—Yes.

3414. You know that that limits the employment of young people under 18 years of age to 74 hours a week?—Yes.

3415. Does that work satisfactorily in Edinburgh?—Yes, quite satisfactorily; it is quite recently that we appointed an inspector under the Act.

3416. And that is working satisfactorily?—Quite satisfactorily.

3417. As regards the limitation of the hours of shop assistants, I suppose you consider that shop assistants now work too long?—Yes; for the most part I think they do.

3418. Too long in the week?—Yes.

3419. Suppose the Shop Hours Regulation Act was extended to adult male and female workers limiting the time to 74 hours per week, would you consider that a satisfactory way of reducing the hours of labour of shop assistants?—No; I would prefer the provisions of this Bill. This Bill would require less inspection; it would work itself as it were. We would require a considerable addition to the number of inspectors if we adopted the Shop Hours Act all over.

Mr. HUGH RENTON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3420. You are the secretary of the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association, I believe?—Yes.

3421. And you have come here to represent that association?—Yes, directly; I have also been asked to speak on behalf of some other associations.

3422. Will you kindly tell the Committee which other associations you represent?—I have been asked to speak on behalf of the Belfast United Early Closing Alliance representing various trades; the Belfast Vintners' and Grocers' Assistants' Association asked that they should be included; and the Belfast Drapers' Early Closing Association: I have resolutions from three of these bodies in favour of the Bill.

3423. Perhaps you will put them in?—Certainly. (The resolutions were handed in.) 3424. Now the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association: about how many members are there in that?—Upwards of 400.

3425. Are they both employers and assistants?—Employers.

3426. They are all employers?—They are all employers or shopkeepers.

3427. They are all grocers?—Yes.

3428. Now

Chairman—continued.

3428. Now will you kindly tell the Committee what (about) the hours are in Belfast at present?—Well, in the grocery trade, about half-past seven in the morning to half-past eight at night.

3429. And how about Saturdays?—Generally speaking, 12; in some cases 11; in the outskirts of the city it is often, in fact, after 12 o'clock.

3430. Is there any half-holiday?—No.

3431. Do you see any prospect of getting those hours shortened by voluntary action?—Certainly not; we have tried it repeatedly.

3432. Does your association represent a certain number of the smaller shopkeepers?—Yes, we have the smallest grocers in the city, and we have also the largest.

3433. Do you find that the smallest grocers are in favour of legislation?—They are.

3434. Your attention has been called to the general provisions of this Bill?—Yes, it has.

3435. I will give you an opportunity in a moment of making suggestions upon the clauses; but what is the view of your association with reference to the Bill generally?—They are practically unanimous in favour of the Bill as it stands. We decided, however, that Clause No. 5 should be extended so that publicans might have an opportunity of reducing their hours of labour if they felt so disposed.

3436. Your association is practically unanimous in favour of the Bill, but you would like Clause 5 to be extended to publicans?—Quite true.

3437. Do you feel any doubt that the local authority in Belfast would put the Bill into operation if the two-thirds majority of shopkeepers were in favour of it?—Well, I think we could probably force them to do it. Our association is very influential; we have some magistrates in connection with it.

3438. Therefore you would not be afraid that the Bill would not be put into operation?—No; I am not disposed to think so.

3439. You think it would be put into operation?—I think it would be put into operation.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3440. Will you give me the number of members in your association?—We have upwards of 400.

3441. And are they all grocers?—No, I cannot exactly say that they are; we have some 30 or more, I think, identified with other trades.

3442. In Ireland, of course, most of the grocers are also publicans?—Well, that is not the case in Belfast.

3443. Not so much in Belfast as in Dublin?—Not so much in Belfast.

3444. In Dublin nearly all the grocers have retail licenses, and they have bars?—I understand so.

3445. You say that is not so much the case in Belfast?—No.

3446. But these off-licenses in Belfast are what they call grocers' spirit licenses, are they not?—Quite true.

3447. And they sell beer and wine in any quantities, so long as it is sold in a bottle?—Quite true.

Mr. Frederick Frye—continued.

3448. And that is sold to people to consume at their own homes?—Yes.

3449. What time do they close?—About 11 o'clock is the hour; they keep open generally as long as the statute will permit them.

3450. Do you think it would be fair to these traders that they should have to close, say, at six o'clock, whereas a public-house might be open until 11?—Personally, I do not think six o'clock will be the hour; I fancy seven o'clock will be.

3451. They might close at eight o'clock?—I do not see why they should not.

3452. Would not they lose trade?—I do not see why they would.

3453. Do not many of them sell bottled beer, for instance?—There is not a great demand for beer of any kind in the north of Ireland.

3454. Many of them sell draught beer?—Yes; but not exactly the spirit grocers, as we understand them; not the off-license holders; the publicans do.

3455. Then the spirit grocers sell beer in bottles, do they not?—Yes; there it is more of a family trade; family orders.

3456. Why do they keep open until 11 o'clock if they have no customers?—I suppose to sell the grocery goods to assist in paying the gas account. I may say that some of the largest spirit grocers do close early.

3457–8. Has your association considered this Bill and discussed it?—Yes.

3459. And you have had resolutions, I presume, to support it?—Quite true.

3460. You have no half-holiday in Belfast?—We have not.

3461. And these hours which you have given us would be in the poorer neighbourhoods, would they not?—Yes, principally.

3462. What time do they close in the better-class neighbourhoods?—About half-past six and seven.

3463. And you still think you might close these off-license holders at eight o'clock and allow the public-houses to be open until 11?—It is in justice to the off-license holders that we would be anxious for the publicans also to reduce their hours.

3464. Are these off-license holders anxious for this?—Yes; many of them are, so far as I understand.

3465. And a good many of them are belonging to your association?—Yes, we have a large number of them. Of course, they have an association of their own besides; I am not prepared to speak for them.

3466. My information is quite different?—I am not speaking on behalf of their association; I can only say the resolution was passed unanimously at our own meeting last week, and we had a number of them present.

3467. What is your association?—The Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association.

3468. There is an association called the Belfast Wine and Spirit Grocers' Association?—Quite true; I am not speaking on behalf of it at all; I am only speaking on behalf of our own.

3469. The majority of those belong to that association?—I do not exactly know anything at all about their numbers.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

3470. Are you in favour of bringing public-houses under the Bill, then?—We think they should be afforded an opportunity of reducing their hours of labour, if they feel so disposed.

3471. Are you in favour of bringing them under the compulsory clause of the Bill?—As far as I understand, it is not a compulsory clause in the Bill; it is a local option one.

3472. It is compulsory, subject to local option. Are you in favour of bringing them under that clause?—Certainly.

3473. And refreshment houses?—We do not mind refreshment houses.

3474. What about tobacconists and news agencies?—Well, they should get the opportunity of shortening their hours if they felt so disposed.

3475. Are you in favour of bringing the whole retail trade of the country without distinction under the Bill?—I should certainly give them an opportunity of coming under it.

Mr. Tennant.

3476. If this Bill were to become law, what time would you expect the shops to be closed by its provisions?—Well, personally, I am disposed to think seven o'clock would be the hour for five days, and nine o'clock on the Saturday night. I do not think that in the North of Ireland a half-holiday will probably become popular.

3477. According to your statement that would only reduce the hours of labour about six or seven in the week?—In the outskirts of the city.

3478. In Belfast?—It would be no advantage whatever in the centre of the city, but it would be a decided advantage in the outskirts.

3479. Do you say that it would be no advantage in the centre?—In the centre of the city, no; but it would be a decided advantage in the outskirts of the city.

3480. Then you do not think that this is going to be a revolutionary matter?—Certainly not.

3481. Is there a very great demand for legislation of this kind in Ireland?—Yes; in fact it has been adopted by all the associations I represent to-day.

3482. Notwithstanding the fact that you state that it would not really make a very great difference. It would make no difference, for instance, in the centre of the city, you say. The difference in the outskirts would be about six or seven hours in the week?—It will mean three hours, at least on the Saturday night.

3483. And about five hours the rest of the week?—Quite true.

3484. That is about eight hours in the whole?—Quite so.

3485. It might reduce the hours from about 80; are they about 80 now?—Close upon 80.

3486. Between 70 and 80, 72?—Quite so.

3487. I suppose, with regard to Belfast, there would be no difficulty in applying it to the whole of Belfast?—No, we certainly go in for the whole of Belfast.

3488. You would not divide it?—No, I would not

Sir Francis Powell.

3489. When do you open the shops in Belfast?—What hour in the morning, do you mean?

3490. Yes?—Half-past seven to eight o'clock, generally speaking.

3491. Is everybody expected to be there at that time?—Yes.

3492. What are your hours for meals?—In-door assistants, unfortunately, get very short hours; just as rapidly as they can swallow their meal is all they get.

3493. Answer my question; answer it in your own way, but do answer it. I ask you what are the hours for meals in shops in Belfast?—An hour, generally speaking.

3494. When, between what hours?—Between one or two.

2495. What do you mean by the expression "generally speaking"?—Because in-door assistants have no recognised hour. I myself have worked for 19 hours a day with only half an hour's cessation. They have no recognised hour for meals.

3496. What do you mean by "in-door assistants"?—Those who stop on the premises.

3497. Those who lodge on the premises?—Quite so.

3498. What is the custom in Belfast on that point?—In the larger business houses in the centre of the city they lodge off the premises, but in the outskirts principally on the premises.

3499. Then in the centre of the town they are chiefly off the premises?—Quite true.

3500. Therefore in the centre of the town they get this hour for dinner?—Quite so.

3501. But as regards the in-door assistants, they surely must have some time for the meal?—No, they have no recognised hour.

3502. But, "recognised" or not, have they an hour?—They have not.

3503. Do you mean to say that an assistant is kept on duty from half-past seven or eight in the morning until the late hour you have mentioned, without any regular opportunity for meals?—Quite so.

3504. Is that your statement?—That is my own experience.

3505. When was that experience?—Well, 15 minutes for dinner and the same for tea, and 19 hours without a break on a Saturday; Saturday and Sunday combined.

3506. How much for dinner?—Fifteen minutes.

3507. Fifteen minutes for dinner; and how much for tea?—The same.

3508. That is for the in-door assistants?—That is my experience.

3509. I asked you a moment since, Is that present experience or past experience?—Past.

3510. How long since?—Seven years ago.

3511. You are not an assistant now?—I am not.

3512. Then, have you any knowledge of the practice existing at the present moment?—I have not, but I know that they have no stated time; they get a certain length of time to swallow their dinner, and the same for tea, but they have not a full hour.

3513. Has the time (15 minutes) been extended since your experience?—I do not think that that probably everyone was so badly treated as I was.

3514. But are you prepared to say that in Belfast, during the long hours you have mentioned, there are only two intervals of 15 minutes each for the in-door assistants, and those at uncertain and irregular intervals; is that your evidence before this Committee?—That is the evidence of my own experience, but that is not, generally speaking, now; popular opinion has come in to press for a little better terms.

3515. Then you are speaking of what was the case seven years ago?—Quite true.

3516. What about a Saturday half-holiday; what half-holiday have you in Belfast?—We have no half-holiday at all.

3517. The hours you have given regulate the whole of the week?—Quite so.

3518. But although the shops are open, according to your statement, during the hours you have mentioned, is everyone engaged during the whole of those hours, or do certain assistants have leave of absence?—They are only on leave of absence during the dinner hours, that is in the centre of the city, and they are on duty the whole of the day in the outskirts.

3519. In some towns, although the shops may be open during long hours, there is as regards each assistant a half-holiday?—I understand so.

3520. Although the shop goes on, each assistant has a half-holiday. Does that practice occur in Belfast?—It does not; there is no half-holiday or any such thing in Belfast.

3521. Do your remarks apply to all shops?—Yes.

3522. And all kinds of business?—Yes, quite so.

3523. Have you any arrangement for seats in the shops?—No.

3524. Have the assistants to stand the whole time?—Well, in the drapery business they have seats, but not in the grocery.

3525. Have they in any other kind of shops, booksellers' shops, for example?—Not that I am aware of; of course, they have not just so hard to work in those cases; they have not the constant labour there that they have in the grocery trade.

3526. Do these hours apply to the whole of the city. I presume in Belfast, as in other cities, you have a more wealthy district, and you have a comparatively poor district. Do these long hours obtain in the wealthy district?—They do, except in the centre of the city; the hours are practically the same in the outskirts.

3527. What are the hours in the centre of the city?—They are from eight till half-past six and seven.

3528. How large an area would you cover by "the centre of the city"?—It is not a large area, but we have some very large establishments in it.

3529. Does it include the chief establishments?—Yes.

Chairman.

3530. As regards the convenience of the working classes, there are places in which the Trades Council has passed a resolution in favour of some such Bill as this. Has anything of the kind been done in Belfast?—The Trades Council assisted the United Early Closing Alliance to obtain last year a voluntary early closing; they tried to bring moral suasion to bear on the working classes to make their purchases early, but I am sorry to say it was not successful.

3531. Then you believe the Trades Council of Belfast would be in favour of legislation of this character?—I do.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3532. Do you think the closing of these shops very much earlier than they are now closed would be a great inconvenience to the working classes?—Certainly not. The working classes from the factories get out at half-past five in the evening.

3533. Then they go home and wash, I suppose?—They might make their purchases before doing that.

3534. They go home to get their meals?—Quite so.

3535. Then after that they go shopping?—Quite so.

3536. Then what hour do you think these shops could be closed at?—Seven o'clock conveniently.

3537. That would not give them any time, would it?—It certainly would.

3538. You say the factories close at half-past five?—Yes.

3539. Then the people have to walk home?—Yes.

3540. What time do they get home?—A quarter to six, most of them, they live pretty convenient to the factories.

3541. Or six o'clock?—Or six o'clock.

3542. They would then have to wash and get their meal; they could not go out shopping until seven, could they?—The argument is that they have to go to the shops to make their purchases for their meals.

3543. To make their purchases for the meals of the next day. You must give the working classes some time to do their shopping?—We are anxious to do so.

3544. I assume that the working classes cannot do their shopping in the hours they have to be employed at the factory?—You must remember that the shops are practically at the corner of the streets; we say sometimes. Every fourth house in Belfast is a shop; they have no distance to go to the shops.

3545. You can imagine some instances where they have, cannot you?—It very rarely occurs.

3546. Not in Belfast?—Not in Belfast.

3547. In other neighbourhoods it would be so?—I do not think so.

3548. Would you be surprised to hear, as to some of the working people in London, that it is quite an hour's journey away from their own homes to where they are employed?—Yes, I would be surprised to hear it.

3549. There are lots of the working classes in London who go to their work at places an hour away from their own homes?—Well, I cannot speak for London, but in Belfast their purchases could all be made before six o'clock.

3550. You think all the shops in Belfast could be closed without any inconvenience whatsoever at seven o'clock?—Certainly.

Chairman.

3551. I think I understood you to say that you believed that that was the feeling of the working classes in Belfast?—Most decidedly, sir; the working classes are in favour of it.

Mr. JOHN PARKER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3552. You are secretary to the Nottingham "Off" Licences Association?—I am.

3553. And you are sent here to represent the National Federation of "Off" Licence Holders' Associations?—Yes, I am.

3554. They have a large number of branches throughout the country?—There are 53 or 54 affiliated with the federation.

3555. Have you any idea of the number of members you represent?—We represent, in round numbers, about 12,000 "off" licence holders.

3556. You are also a holder of one of these "off" licences?—I am, and have been for 15 years past.

3557. And you and these various associations have considered this Bill?—Yes. I have copies of resolutions that have been passed at the annual council meeting of the federation from 1892 to 1895 inclusive.

3558. Would you mind reading one of those resolutions?—I will take the last one, if you have no objection. The last meeting was held at Bradford, Yorkshire, on the 20th March 1895. It was resolved: "(1.) That inasmuch as grave injustice would accrue to holders of "off" licences for home consumption if their places of business were compulsorily closed during the hours which holders of licences for consumption on the premises are permitted to remain open, this council instructs the executive to take such action as may be advisable to obtain facilities for evidence being tendered to the Select Committee on the Shops (Early Closing) Bill prepared and brought in the House of Commons by Sir John Lubbock. (2.) That Messrs. J. Parker (Nottingham), H. Coggan (Sheffield), Henry Brown (Leeds), and H. G. Crews (Manchester), do ask to be permitted to tender evidence on behalf of this federation before the Select Committee on Sir John Lubbock's Bill. (3.) That this council would respectfully suggest that the "off" licence associations of Birmingham, Leicester, Oldham, Bradford, Derby, Halifax, Leeds, Hull, Southport, and Blackburn do request the Select Committee of the House of Commons to receive evidence from those towns in favour of the exemption of "off" licence holders from the Shops (Early Closing) Bill."

3559. You put those resolutions in?—Yes, I do, sir. (The documents were handed in.)

3560. Now, will you kindly describe the nature of your business to the Committee?—My business is that of a retailer of beer only, off the premises, coupled with that of a grocer and provision dealer.

3561. Your business is, of course, a late one, because you supply the beer that people are in the habit of taking to their homes for their suppers?—That is so; principally at supper time.

Mr. Frederick Frye—continued.

3562. And you are very strongly opposed to this Bill if you are not to be exempt as public-houses would be if this Bill becomes law?—Most certainly we are.

3563. Can you tell me how many off-licence holders there are in Nottingham?—There are about 460; that represents of course the beer, and wine and spirits and beer, additional licences.

3564. How many publicans would there be?—There is a matter of something like 650, including beer-sellers, that is the "on" beer-sellers who have not full licenses.

3565. And you think it would be a hardship if you had to close say at 8 o'clock, and publicans kept open until 11 in the evening?—Quite so; it would practically ruin our trade, because it would drive it into another channel altogether, which I contend was never intended; in fact, I contend that the intention of the Legislature when these off-licences were granted was, that the public should be able to obtain their draught beer for home consumption without being compelled to go to the public-house to obtain it.

3566. And you would suggest as an amendment that these words should be put in after the "public-houses," "or licence holders for consumption on or off the premises"?—Yes; it is a matter of indifference how it is put, so long as we are included in the Schedule of exempted trades.

3567. The grocers, who sell wines and spirits, do their business quite in a different way, do they not, and do not want to keep open so long as you in your own trade?—They do not want to keep open so long; there is not so much necessity in their case.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3568. Are you also a grocer?—Yes.

3569. Then by Clause 5 of the Bill you would have to be closed if the other grocers wanted to close?—Yes, that would be so.

Mr. Baldwin.

3570. I understand what you want is that your hours should be the same as those of the publicans?—That is so.

3571. With that you would be satisfied?—Well, we represent what may be called domestic shopkeepers, inasmuch as nine-tenths of our off-licence holders shops are what may be called domestic shops; we do not employ assistants at all; therefore we cannot conceive why an Act should be made to apply to us where the business is conducted entirely by the members of the family at home.

3572. You would object to having shops closed where assistants are not employed?—Yes.

3573. That is your point?—We think that if there

Mr. Baldwin—continued.

there is legislation needed for assistants, that can be accomplished without interfering with those shops where there are no assistants employed.

3574. You think that such legislation should not apply to shops which are carried on by a man and his family?—Yes.

Sir John Gorst.

3575. Do not all grocers sell wines and spirits?—Oh, no.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3576. This Bill would affect you very seriously if the grocers, who are also in your neighbourhood, closed by a two-thirds majority. I suppose there are a lot of grocers' shops round your neighbourhood which have not got off-licenses?—Not large grocers' shops; these are nearly all on the outskirts of the town, they are nearly all domestic shops.

3577. But they are small shops that have not got off-licenses?—That is so.

3578. I suppose there would be three or four times as many grocers' shops without off-licenses as with off licenses?—Yes.

3579. Therefore, as two grocers' shops can shut up a third, these other shops being the larger number of grocers, they would be able to close you up with your off-license?—That is so.

3580. That would be the effect of the working of this Bill?—Yes.

3581. Can you speak generally for the impression of the off-license holders throughout the length and breadth of the country; can you speak generally as to that?—They speak their voice through their representatives at the annual council meeting; and I have just tendered the resolutions which have been passed by that council.

3582. Have you any idea how many off-license holders there are altogether?—There are 20,301 altogether. I will hand in this document which has been given to me by our hon. secretary; it shows the particulars of the retail "off" licenses for England and Wales, issued up to the 31st March 1894. (The document was handed in.) 3583. That, you say, shows 20,301 off-license holders?—That is so.

3584. They would all be affected by this Bill?—Of course there are many of them that already close at a very early hour.

3585. But still if the grocers in any particular town decided to close for a half-holiday those "off" license holders would have to close also?—They are not all grocers; for instance, in some instances butchers hold these off-licenses, greengrocers, bakers, and other tradespeople.

3586. Those hold off-licenses?—Yes; but those are very very rare instances; nine-tenths of them are held by grocers and provision dealers.

3587. Supposing off-license holders were exempted, that would necessitate the shop being open altogether, would it not?—I presume it would.

demanded that we should do so, but we conceive that it should not do so, because these are absolute articles of food which we contend the public ought to be able to purchase at the hour most convenient to themselves, that is, when many of the poorer class have the money to expend.

3589. You heard the last witness say just now that he thought, with factories closing at half-past five, the working classes would have plenty of time between half-past five and seven o'clock to do all their shopping; is that your experience?—Well, the factories do not close at half-past five as a rule. In Nottingham our principal trade is the lace trade, and when trade is brisk the machinery runs 20 hours out of the 24, from four in the morning until 12 at night the machinery is continually running in a busy time.

3590. And the factories are not closed by legislation?—Only so far as regards women and children.

3591. The factory itself is not closed at all?—No, certainly not.

3592. Adult male labour is allowed to work in factories as long as it likes?—Yes.

3593. And the factories are allowed to have different relays of workpeople?—Yes; they are not affected by the Factory Act in that respect.

3594. They are not affected by the Factory Act at all, as regards adult labour in the lace trade, which is a season trade in Nottingham?—Yes.

3595. At this time they are very busy, making curtains for the summer, and they work long hours?—Yes, pretty much so.

3596. And you say that that occasions late shopping, especially as regards off-licenses?—Yes. There are also the cases of day labourers of many descriptions, who receive their wages from day to day as they earn them; and they work in many instances until seven and eight at night, and then they want to purchase something for their families' requirements.

3597. The best class of shopkeepers now close very early, do they not?—Yes; they close not later than eight o'clock at night.

3598. And it is only in certain districts, is it not, where it is necessary for a few small shops to be open to supply the wants of these people?—Their principal time is after the larger shops are closed; they have not much chance to make their purchases while the larger ships are open.

3599. You heard a witness say just now, did you not, that the small shopkeepers would welcome this Bill?—Yes, but I do not believe it.

3600. You do not believe that they would welcome it?—No.

3601. Is it your opinion, I have heard it often (or very generally) expressed, that it would mean ruin to very many small shopkeepers?—I believe it would have a very ruinous effect upon the small shopkeepers.

3602. Taking you back again, I will ask you this question: I suppose in many districts the large majority of the shops now do close early; then in the same district there may be a lot of small shops, or a certain number of small shops, which have to be kept open to supply the wants of the working classes?—That is so.

3603. And the larger majority, closing, could force these small shops to close also, could they not?—They would wish to do so if they could.

3604. That is their desire, to close these shops?—Yes; they have the practical monopoly now, but they appear as if they want all.

3605. And they, being in more than a two-thirds majority, would have the power of shutting these small shops up?—Yes, that would be so.

3606. And you contend that would be very detrimental to the small shopkeepers?—Yes, I do, indeed, ruinous.

3607. You have had great experience as regards classification; you know the retail trade generally, I presume?—Yes.

3608. You know there are shops that keep all sorts of things, do you not?—Yes, I do.

3609. Those shops that keep all sorts of stores do not only appertain to the upper class, but are to be found among the lower class, are they not?—I do not gather your question quite.

3610. There are small shops in the poor neighbourhoods, are there not, where all descriptions of things are sold?—Yes.

3611. Grocery, drapery, medicines (I have seen a card once with "violin strings" on it) patent medicines, flour, butter, cheese, and all sorts of things are to be found in the small shops as well as in the large stores, are they not?—Yes, that is so.

3612. And more generally, it is the small shops that keep all these things?—It is so.

3613. Therefore this Clause 5 of the Bill which would compel the shop to be closed, practically, for the purpose of one particular description of trade, to be closed for the purpose of all, would seriously affect those shops that dealt in everything?—It would.

Chairman.

3614. Do I understand you to say that, in your opinion, there are a great many more large shops than small ones?—Than small ones? Oh, no, I did not say so; I think the smaller shops predominate.

3615. Then, in that case, as this Bill cannot be put into operation unless there is a majority of two-thirds, does it not follow that the shopkeepers have the matter in their own hands (if they really would be injured by the early closing), and that all they have to do is to vote against it?—I do not think the Bill draws any distinction.

3616. But if they thought they were going to be injured by it, they would not put the Bill into operation, would they?—I do not think the Bill draws any distinction between large shops and small shops, in any particular trade. Grocers and provision dealers are all grocers and provision dealers, whether they have small shops or large.

3617. Certainly; but do not you see that if the small shopkeepers are, as you very justly say, a large majority, and they think they are going to be injured, they will not put the Bill into operation; the Bill cannot come into operation unless a majority of two-thirds wish it?—I quite see that. I had the opportunity yesterday of having a conversation with Alderman Pullman, the President of the Half-Holiday Association in

Nottingham, and he told me that, as far as Nottingham is concerned we need not have any fear of the Bill, because the voluntary system is so much in vogue there that there is no requirement for any legislation. I come here to speak more on behalf of the off-license holders throughout the country than for those of my own particular town.

3618. As regards the hours, how long are the off-license holders hours?—The domestic shops open at eight o'clock in the morning, and remain open until 11 at night; they close at the same time as the publicans, and on Sundays the same as the publicans.

3619. You open at eight o'clock, and close at 11?—Yes; but the work is not continuous by any means.

3620. But the assistants have to be in the shops?—Shops where assistants are employed are not open those hours, or very rarely indeed; there are scarcely any (not more than 2 or 3 per cent.) of the off-license holders that employ assistants at all.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3621. Of course there are a great many more small traders in other trades than in your own; the number of off-licensed holders in Nottingham is small as compared with the rest of the small traders?—Oh, yes.

3622. And if they had this veto, and they chose nine o'clock as the hour of closing, you would be in a great minority, of course?—Yes, unless exempted by the Bill.

Chairman.

3623. You say the shops open at eight and close at 11; that makes 90 hours per week?—Yes.

3624. You consider it a great hardship that you should not be able to sell beer at these late hours; but do not you think it a very great hardship that shop assistants should have to work 90 hours a week?—We are not continuously in work during those hours; if we were, I should advocate some system of restriction.

3625. But they have to be in attendance those hours?—We find that either the husband or the wife in the morning or the afternoon can go out alternately, just as they think well to arrange it.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3626. In fact there are periods in the day when there is really nothing doing, are there not?—Oh, yes; very little indeed.

Chairman.

3627. Still the assistants have to be in the shops, have they not?—I am scarcely speaking on behalf of assistants.

3628. No; but I am?—I have just said there are not above two or three per cent. of off-license holders who employ assistants.

3629. Will you let me ask my questions before you begin to answer; you cannot answer properly until you have heard what the question really is; I put this to you: you think it a great hardship that you should not be able to sell beer during these long hours; then I ask whether you do not think it a great hardship that the shop shop assistants should be kept in the shops 90 hours a week?—I do most certainly.

3630. Now, I ask: how would you propose to remedy that state of things?—I would apply the Shop Hours Act.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3631. The Shop Hours Regulation Act, you mean?—Yes, the Factory Acts; the same Acts that apply to women and children in factories.

Chairman.

3632. Do you think that would be popular with the shopkeepers generally; do you think they would prefer that to the provisions of this Bill?—I do not think there is any shop proprietor that has any intention or disposition to keep his assistants at work 90 hours per week; in fact I do not think such is the case. When I say that 90 is computed as the number of hours, I refer to the domestic shop.

3633. But a great many of the off-licence holders employ assistants, do they not?—No.

3634. Very few of them?—Very few, indeed. I have just said about 2 or 3 per cent. would represent them.

3635. Then, as regards the domestic shops, you have already stated that they are more numerous than the great shops, and therefore if they did not wish to come under the Bill they need not do so; they have only got to vote against it to prevent coming under it. You have already said that the small shops are in a large majority?—Yes, I say so.

3636. The Bill cannot be put into operation unless there is a majority of two-thirds in its favour; therefore, if that is the case, and two-thirds of the small shops are against it, it cannot be operative?—We cannot conceive why there should be any legislation promoted of this kind.

3637. I was not dealing with your opinions, I was asking you as to facts?—But that is our point.

3738. You wish the off-licence holders to be exempted from the Bill, as I understand?—Yes.

3639. Do you think it would be fair to the other grocers that grocers who had off-licenses should be allowed to keep open while the other grocers should be compelled to be shut?—It would be a most difficult task to draw a line as to what to sell and what not to sell.

3641. That is not an answer to my question; still I will take it for what it is worth. You are not here to ask the Committee to allow the off-licence holders to sell beer provided they do not sell the other articles in which they deal?—If it came to a matter of that kind we should prefer having the power to sell beer to being closed entirely.

Chairman—continued.

3642. You are aware, of course, that there are a great number of persons who object to the off-licences altogether; have you considered whether your opposition to this Bill may not lead to the off-licences being done away with altogether?—I do not think so.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

3643. May I ask you what amount of actual work would be done in a domestic shop during the day of how many hours?—Out of the 15 hours that I was speaking of, with regard to the off-beer licences, I take it you mean the small grocers' shops are not open those hours. We conceive with regard to the off-beer licences that the Legislature intends us to be open the same hours as a public-house, and we pay a percentage of licence duty upon that basis. Upon those grounds we conceive that it is our duty to keep open while "on"-licence holders are open; but the smaller grocers' shops are not open during those hours.

3644. I understand that, but my point is this: supposing there to be a small shop of the class you have described in a working-class district. I presume most of the trade will be done late?—That is so.

3645. Then during the middle hours of the day very little would be done in the shop at all?—Very little indeed.

3646. My question is, if you will answer it, how many hours actual labour would be performed by the man, or his family, in that shop?—I should say, taking an average shop, not over eight or nine hours.

3647. Are you aware that in the Bill compulsion can be applied either in a large district or in a small district; that is to say, in the large area of a county in the case of London or in smaller districts or wards?—Yes.

3648. I think, in answer to the Chairman, you admitted that the small shopkeepers were in the majority?—Yes.

3649. But of course you are aware that in taking a vote over the whole of the districts, certain districts might practically decide what the course should be that the council should pursue? That might be so.

3650. Therefore great injury might be done to particular interests of one district by the others predominating?—That is so.

3651. A vote might be taken for the whole town or city as well as for a ward in it?—Yes; according to the Bill.

3652. Do you believe it would be contrary to public convenience in working-class districts to close shops there compulsorily at the same time as in the central parts of the town?—Most decidedly I do, and that it would be unjust to the shopkeepers as well.

3653. You admit that long hours of course may be prejudicial to the health of assistants?—I do.

3654. You think that could be met by extending the Shop Hours Regulation Act to all persons?—In the shops where assistants are employed they are bound to be on duty, whether they are actually working or not, but a shopkeeper without assistants can take his leisure; he can please himself.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

3655. Do you believe there would be a widespread feeling against proceedings taken under this Bill, should it become an Act, in the courts of law?—I do indeed.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3656. Just now, when you answered a question of mine, you said that the large majority of shops in different neighbourhoods close now much earlier than the off-licensed shops close?—That is so.

3657. And it is these grocers, who are the large majority as compared with the off-licences, that would be able to close you?—That is so.

3658. You did not mean that the large shops, because they are not so numerous, would be able to close the small shopkeepers generally, but that the small shopkeepers themselves in different districts now close earlier than off-licensed shops?—That is so.

3659. They would be able to close the off-license shops?—As a rule.

3660. That is what you meant?—That is what I meant.

Mr. HENRY COGGAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3661. YOU are president of the Sheffield "Off"-Licenses Association?—That is so.

3662. You are also a holder of one these "off"-licenses?—Yes; I have been for over 21 years.

3663. You have had great experience of the trade?—I have.

3664. You have heard the evidence of the last witness, have you not?—Yes.

3665. Do you confirm all he says?—Yes, in particular I do about the hardship that would be brought about on the off-license holders generally throughout the country.

3666. You have given me a return just now of the number of customers that you canvassed, or into whose shops you went at Sheffield on Friday night last?—That is so.

3668. Read the totals, please, and hand in the particulars?—The sum total for the 10 shops in the three hours was 2,386. (The document was handed in.)

Mr. Frederick Frye—continued.

3670. Your trade is done chiefly in the middle of the day, before dinner time, and late in the evening after eight o'clock at night, for supper beer?—That is so.

3671. And you maintain that your trade would be ruined, and that of many others in Sheffield, if this Bill became law without having you exempted, as publicans are at the present time?—I do.

Chairman.

3672. There is an association called the Sheffield Retail Traders' Association, is there not?—Yes, I believe there is.

3673. They are, I believe, in favour of this Bill, are they not?—That I could not say; I have no knowledge of it.

3674. You say that you inquired at 10 shops; about how many assistants were there employed in the first shop that you gave us the detail of?—There is not any assistant at all; in none of the 10 are there any assistants.

3675. Not in one of those 10?—Not one; the business is worked principally by the man and his wife.

3676. Do you agree with the last witness, that scarcely any of the off-licence holders employ any assistants?—I do.

3677. In fact, you agree generally with the evidence which Mr. Barker has given?—I do.

Mr. Frederick Frye.

3678. By "off-licence holders" you mean those who sell beer?—Yes.

3679. Not those who sell wines and spirits?—No; the draught beer for supper.

3680. Is this a list of the associations connected with your trade throughout England?—Yes. (The document was handed in.)

Chairman.

3681. Are you not aware that the Sheffield Retail Traders Association sent a representative to the Nottingham Congress to support this Bill?—I am not, sir. We, as an association in Sheffield, are different, and apart altogether, from the retail dealers. We are mixed trades, and we consider that it would be a hardship to be brought under this Bill; in fact, it would mean ruination to myself. I own my own premises, which cost me 2,300*l.*; I had to buy them at an enhanced price, and, if this Bill becomes law, I am practically ruined.

3682. Do

Chairman—continued.

3682. Do you employ no assistants yourself?—None; I have not done so all the years I have been in business, 25.

3683. What do you sell besides the beer?—Groceries, beer, bottled beer, polony, cheese, mincepies, a little pork pie, and a generality of things for home consumption.

3684. And do you agree with the last witness that there would be great difficulty in allowing the off-licence holders to sell the beer, and to shut them up as regards the other articles in which they deal?—I do not perfectly understand you, sir.

Sir John Gorst.

3686. Would not that hardship be a hardship upon the workpeople only; it would not be a hardship upon you, would it? I mean, if you could conduct business under your off-licence the same hours as the public-houses do and were shut up only as to the groceries, that would be no hardship on you, would it?—No, certainly; it would be a hardship in a sense.

3687. On the work-classes?—Yes; but it would be a hardship on the off-licence holders generally, for this simple reason: the big shopkeepers in the heart of the city perfectly inundate the outskirts of the city with travellers getting family orders, and we only come in as a kind of makeshift for the needful supply of things that they have run out of in general grocery.

3688. But still that hardship to you would be a hardship which you would share with the grocers who had not off-licences?—Yes.

3690. Still you can protect yourselves under the Bill, can you not?—It is very questionable; it is allowing the thin end of the wedge to get in; it is direct interference, to my mind, with the individual.

3692. You think the hours of shop assistants are unduly long, do you not?—Where the half-holiday has not taken place; but in Sheffield it works exceedingly well, the voluntary half-holiday. All the large shops in the city close on a Thursday afternoon.

Sir Francis Powell.

3693. When does the half-holiday begin?—At one o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin.

3694. Do the small shops close as well as the large?—Not in the outskirts.

Friday, 26th April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cameron Corbett.
Viscount Cranborne.
Mr. Diamond.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.
Sir John Lubbock.
Sir Blundell Maple.
Sir Francis Powell.
Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT DUNWOODY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3695. YOU are president of the Grocers' Federation?—I am.

3696. Which is an association, I believe, representing the grocers of the whole of the United Kingdom?—Yes.

3697. With a number of different branches in different places?—Yes.

3698. And you are the president of the whole association?—Yes, for the years 1894 and 1895.

3699. And you yourself are in business in Belfast?—I am.

3700. You have paid a good deal of attention to the subject now before the Committee for some years, have you not?—I have.

3701. Could you give the Committee any evidence as to the length of the hours, in your own district, of shop assistants?—I can. I would divide them into two, or perhaps three, classes in the city of Belfast. There are about 80 large shops; these close at about 7 o'clock in the evening. On Saturday evening there is an exception; the hour is then 10 or 11 o'clock for the same class of shops. Then the smaller shops keep open every night till about 8, some of them after that; but, broadly speaking, about 8, and on Saturday nights 11 o'clock.

3702. At what time do they open?—The smaller ones open about 7.30; and the larger ones, the first lot I referred to, open about 8 o'clock.

3703. All the smaller shops open at 7.30, and close when?—They open at from 7 to 7.30, and they close at from 8 to 9 on ordinary evenings, and on Saturday evening at from 11 till 12.

3704. And, in your opinion, I believe those hours are undoubtedly long and might be shortened without any disadvantage?—That is not only my opinion personally, but it is also the opinion of a large percentage; in fact, it is the general opinion of the shopkeepers themselves. They desire it.

3705. Can you put in any resolutions, with reference to the subject, which your Grocers' Federation have passed?—I can. I have a series of resolutions sent to me by the secretary of the Federation for that purpose. Of course, I was speaking just now of my own district.

3706. I quite understand that with reference to the hours you were speaking with regard to your own district?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3708. What you call off-license holders, you mean?—That designation I do not understand; we have not got it with us.

Chairman.

3709. Then as regards the Federation itself?—With regard to the Federation itself, I have a copy of a series of resolutions sent to me by the secretary, which I wish to hand in, making one observation observation at least in regard to one statement that it contains.

3710. Will you, kindly, just read the resolutions?—Yes.

3711. There are not very many, are there?—No; they will not take long. On the 19th November 1891 at the first Grocers' Federation Congress, held in Birmingham, a resolution in favour of legislation on early closing was carried, 28 voting for, 10 against, and 57 members of the congress not voting. That is the resolution which I wish to make a remark about. I telegraphed to the secretary to be present here this morning, as I wished to ask him a question upon that resolution. I was present then when that resolution was passed, and I do not understand this statement, that 57 members of the congress did not vote, because as a rule they voted if they had a right to vote; but at our congress meetings there are sometimes men present who are delegates, but not voting delegates; and every man had the right to vote if he wished to vote. I would take it, therefore, that if he was present and did not vote, at any rate he was not against the Bill.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3712. At what date was that held?—On 19th November 1891.

3713. That was not in reference to this Bill, then?—They voted for a resolution in favour of legislation on early closing. The question was, voluntary action or legislation; and the vote was in favour of legislation.

3715. That is another Bill?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond.

3716. To a committee of what association are you referring?—A committee of the Grocers' Federation.

3717. In Belfast?—No, in the United Kingdom; the Federation of Grocers' Associations.

Mr. Lawson.

3718. Is that an Irish committee, or a committee of the United Kingdom?—A committee for the whole of the United Kingdom; this is a committee of the whole Federation; there are two committees. I am sorry the secretary is not here, because I am just raising the question myself that I do not know whether it was the Parliamentary Committee or the General Purposes Committee.

Chairman.

3719. Perhaps you will ascertain that, and put it in your answer?—I will. I see the difficulty myself, and I raise it, "That this committee support Sir John Lubbock's Half-Holiday Bill." A motion in support of the Early Closing Bill proposed by the Liverpool Association was carried at that particular meeting. Then on 12th October 1892 the following resolution was carried: "That the thanks of this Federation of Grocers' Associations be tendered to the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain and the Right Honourable Sir John Lubbock for their valuable advocacy for the earlier closing of shops." That was at the annual meeting of the Federation on 16th November 1892. The following resolution was carried by nine votes to two. This is a committee meeting again: "That this committee hereby re-affirms its opinion in favour of the principle of early closing contained in the Bill drafted by the Liverpool Association." That Bill, I think, is before you. On 8th June 1893 the following resolution was carried: "That the committee find the draft Early Closing Bill of the Liverpool Grocers' Association a comprehensive proposal. That Sir John Lubbock's Bill having been considered, Clauses 5, 8, 10, and 12 in it be objected to as being too indefinite." That is the opinion of that committee. The secretary is now present, and he informs me that he will be able to give that information which I had undertaken to supply.

3720. The next resolution was passed on the 16th of May 1894, I think?—On 16th May 1894 it was resolved to oppose Mr. Provand's Shop Hours Amendment Act, then before the House of Commons. I do not know what Act that is. I do not know anything about it, and have no evidence to give, so far as I am concerned.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3721. You mean "Bill"?—It is "Act" here.

3723. We need not go into the internal arrangements of your Federation?—Very well; but the Federation adheres to the principle of Sir John Lubbock's Bill.

Mr. Lawson.

3724. The Federation object to that Bill?—No; I will read it again: "That each association affiliated to the Federation should, if it so desires, give evidence through its own witnesses, but that the Federation adhere to the objections to Sir John Lubbock's Bill made in June 1893."

Mr. Lawson—continued.

Chairman.

3725. Now I should like to ask you whether the modifications that have been made in the Bill since have removed your objections?—They have removed the objections which the Belfast Association held at the time, and they have removed my own personal objections to it.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3726. But, may I ask you, do not those particular clauses to which objection was taken now appear in this present Bill exactly in the same form as in the previous Bill?—I do not know; I will ask the secretary if that be so.

Chairman.

3727. Do you think that there is any prospect of shortening the hours of shop assistants by voluntary action?—Not the slightest.

3728. Then you are in favour of some legislation?—Yes.

3729. Now, with regard to the Bill before this Committee, I will ask you in a moment whether there are any suggestions you have to make as regards the Bill; but, taking in the first instance its general character, what is your view with reference to the Bill generally?—My view is, that I am decidedly in favour of it as a Bill, speaking of it generally.

3730. And you believe it would do a good deal to modify the evils under which shop assistants are suffering?—Yes, I do.

3731. Now, as regards particular points in the Bill which you would like to see amended or altered, the Committee would be glad to know what points you would wish to suggest to be modified. Is there any modification that you would wish to be introduced in Clause 1?—I should say that a city of the size even of our own should form a district.

3732. There is nothing to prevent that in this clause; the clause is only permissive, you will observe?—Very well, then I have no suggestion to make that occurs to my mind at the moment.

3733. It has been suggested to the Committee that the word "may," in the last line but one, should be altered to "shall;" have you any opinion on that point?—I agree with that suggestion, that it should be "shall."

3734. In fact you wish rather to strengthen that clause then?—Most decidedly.

3735. Then, if you have nothing to say on Clause 2, with reference to Clause 3 a suggestion has been made, that instead of one-third being required to revoke an order, that number should be increased; is that your view?—Most decidedly. I think that if two-thirds put it in force it ought to take, at least, a majority to put it out of force.

3736. Then you would, in fact, wish to strengthen Clause 3 also?—I would, certainly. I think that is a weak part of the Bill.

3737. And as to Clause 4 have you any suggestion to make; that is as to the classification?—I understand that all shops where general goods are sold, say spirits and general groceries, are included in this Bill. Such a shop, I understand, is included in the Bill; and if so, then I am in favour of that.

Chairman—continued.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3738. Not public-houses?—My own personal opinion is that the public-houses need to be closed earlier than they are, and it would be a good thing for the community, for the owners, and for the shop assistants; but they are not included in this Bill, and I do not care to injure the prospects of the Bill by even suggesting that they be put in, although personally I should like to see them in. However, they are under another licensing law, and I do not know that we have very much right to interfere with them.

Chairman.

3739. You would not wish to endanger the Bill by pressing for their insertion?—By no means.

3740. I need not ask you about the separate clauses; but perhaps you will give us any suggestions you have to make on behalf of your association?—I do not know that I have a suggestion to make at the moment. One strong point in favour of this Bill, to my mind, is the optional nature of it. As I understand, if a trade or a district does not like it they need not have it. Am I right in that interpretation of the Bill?

3741. Yes, I think so, substantially?—Then I think it is a most reasonable proposal.

3742. Then, in fact, you approve of the Bill, but you wish to strengthen it on the one or two points to which you have already alluded?—Yes, that is so.

3743. Has your trades council in Belfast passed any resolution, do you know, or taken any part with reference to the Bill?—The trades council not only passed a resolution in favour of the Bill, but the secretary of the trades council attended at least one out-door demonstration in favour of early closing, at which I attended. Personally I am not in favour at all of this half-holiday idea; and if I might make the suggestion at all I would go dead against it; but after all I would not imperil the Bill; if a district wants the half-holiday I would let them have it, but I think it is an absurd idea. However, as it is optional I do not object to it, although I would object to it in my own district.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3744. But you would not mind being closed if they compelled you to be closed?—I would mind it a very great deal, but I could not help it if I were compelled.

Chairman.

3745. You speak, as I understand, mainly for the grocers; but can you give the Committee any information as to the feeling of those engaged in other departments of business in Belfast?—There is a general consensus of opinion in favour of early closing, and some of the large drapery shops have actually voluntarily closed, and are carrying that out; but the difficulty that each trade meets with is that certain men will not close, unreasonable men, in our opinion; opinion; and they then, by holding out and keeping open, prevent the general adoption of the movement by the great majority, some of whom still keep open because of that.

Chairman—continued.

3746. Do you think that if this Bill were passed there would be a majority of two-thirds in favour of somewhat shorter hours than those now existing?—I do, in the country that I come from; and not only in Belfast but the country generally. The Dublin Association, and, as I have called your attention to, the Cavan Association, have sent in resolutions in favour of that; they are entirely in favour of your Bill.

3747. Have you any doubt that the Belfast Local Authority would put the Bill into operation if they had the necessary requisition?—I have not the slightest doubt of that.

Sir Francis Powell.

3748. Have the shop assistants in your district any intervals during the day for refreshments?—Certainly.

3749. What are the hours of those intervals?—The large establishments have definite and distinct hours; the smaller ones have not so distinct hours, at the same time they have a given hour.

3750. What are the hours?—From one to two and from one to four according to the size of the establishment.

3751. From one to four?—Yes.

3752. Has any given hand a release for three hours in the middle of the day?—No.

3753. You mean that the time for the refreshment of the different hands is distributed over the three hours?—Yes.

3754. Do they have any opportunity for some refreshment afterwards in the way of tea or the like?—Certainly, they are exceedingly well taken care of in that way in our country.

3755. Is the dinner hour a complete hour of 60 minutes?—Yes, it is in the large establishments; in the smaller ones they may not get an hour, because they are on the premises.

3756. Is it nearly an hour in the smaller establishments?—I really could not say that.

3757. Do your assistants in Belfast chiefly live on the premises, or with their friends at a distance?—In the smaller shops they live on the premises; and with regard to the larger places they live in lodgings or with their friends in their ordinary home.

3758. In cases where they are living off the premises do they go home to dinner or do they dine on the premises?—That is a matter of arrangement. If they are outdoor assistants they go home to dinner; if they are indoor assistants they have dinner in the establishment.

Dr. Farquharson.

3759. Have you any evidence to lay before the Committee as regards the effect of prolonged shop hours upon the health of shop people, male and female?—I have not any particular case to refer to; but although I am a wholesale merchant I call upon my customers, many of whom are small shopkeepers, and they all deplore the fact that they have to keep open so long. When I say all, it is a constant topic of conversation with them.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

3760. Do they deplore it because it is inconvenient, or because they think that their health suffers from being kept up late in the hot and crowded shops?—I think from both; they consider that it is inconvenient; it is not convenient, it is unhealthy.

3761. Then as you have been apparently i communication with small shopkeepers, have you had any complaints from them as to the possible effect of this legislation upon their trade; do they think that their business will be injuriously affected by this proposed legislation?—No, quite the opposite; they desire it, they wish it.

3762. They do not think that they will suffer?—No.

3763. But do not the small shopkeepers pick up, so to speak, the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table, from the customers that do not go to the big shops late at night?—Not so much. After all, each district does its own class of trade, and the customers that come to shops that now close at nine, it is believed, would come if they closed before eight. As any man who has been a retailer knows, if he kept open up to 12 o'clock at night he would have odd straggling customers coming in.

3764. Is it your impression that buyers would accommodate themselves to the altered circumstances?—Certainly.

Mr. Tennant.

3765. Are you in favour of extending the provisions of this Bill to wholesale shops and wholesale warehouses?—I am, if necessary; but it is not necessary in our country at all. We are a long way ahead of the Bill.

3766. Is that the case with regard to large stores where they do a retail business but have several trades?—I answered you entirely in regard to wholesale houses.

3767. But I am now going on to retail houses, where they deal in several commodities; is it the case in Belfast, or in any place with which you are familiar, that they do close earlier in such establishments than in small shops?—Yes, it is so; the larger shops close earlier than the small ones in every large town that I know.

3768. That is a general statement?—That is generally the case.

3769. You do not know any exceptions, do you?—Yes, I do know of one.

3770. In Belfast?—Yes.

3771. And you think that if this Bill became an Act of Parliament the provisions of it would deal with that particular exception?—Yes, decidedly; because I understand that every man would have to obey the law.

3772. We should hope so?—There is no question whatever about that.

3773. In Belfast, that is to say?—Yes.

3774. Do you see any difficulties in the working of this Bill?—None whatever.

3775. It is all simple and plain and straightforward?—In my opinion it is. In regard to one question that you asked me, one establishment in Belfast in one trade is stated to be the great cause why that trade cannot at the present time close altogether at a reasonable hour. That is just the necessity for the Bill in that particular trade.

3776. And you think there is a general demand for it?—There is a general demand for it, especially in that particular trade.

Mr. Lawson.

3777. I daresay it is through my own stupidity, but I cannot yet understand exactly whom you represent here; do you speak for the whole body of grocers throughout the United Kingdom?—I do, so far as the principle of the Bill is concerned.

3778. But how far are you qualified to do that; I think I understood you to say that you were not present at the committee where this Bill was considered?—No; but I was present when the resolutions of the Federation were passed, which is far more important than the committee, even if I had been present.

3779. Did that meeting include representatives from all parts of the United Kingdom?—Yes.

3780. Who were specially instructed on this Bill?—Who were specially instructed in the agenda paper which was brought before that meeting, and it was one of the subjects on the agenda paper.

3781. How many people were represented there, do you suppose; how many grocers?—According to the answer which I received from the secretary, who is present, and who ought to be better able to give the information upon that than I can be, there were at the last annual meeting about 3,200, and there have been several associations, I think, affiliated to the Federation since then.

3782. How many grocers do you suppose, or do you know, are there in the United Kingdom?—I cannot answer you that.

3783. I suppose that the 3,200 would be a small proportion of the total trade?—Yes, it would.

3784. Therefore you would not be, in a sense, able to speak for the trade?—I am able to speak for every reasonable and rational man in the trade.

Chairman.

3785. You are president of the General Federation for the United Kingdom at the present time?—I am.

Mr. Lawson.

3786. Do the hours in Belfast differ, as far as you know, from those prevalent in the trade in the rest of the United Kingdom?—I rather think that we are slightly ahead of most towns of the same size in the matter of shorter hours.

3787. I suppose that in Belfast the hours differ in the different quarters of the city?—I have said so already.

3788. Do you think it would be a proper thing to fix the same hour of closing all over the city?—I do, for the simple reason that those who do not close ask to be enabled to close at the same time as the others.

3789. Is it true that those who close earlier are the bigger establishments?—That is so, generally.

3790. And probably in the centre of the town?—Yes.

3791. Therefore to close all the shops at the same time would be, I suppose, to divert trade, even more than is now the case, to those big shops?—Not in the slightest; and the proof of that is the fact that they voluntarily close, showing that they do not lose their trade.

3792. I did not say so. I said that closing small grocers' shops in the outskirts of the city would probably make people shop more in the big establishments?—Pardon me, that is not what you said. You asked me to answer a question, and I want to know what I am answering. You said, would it divert trade even more than now.

3793. Yes?—The diversion would not take place to any considerable extent, for the simple reason that they now close early in the centre of the city, knowing fairly well that they lose little or nothing, and that their customers will come in the proper time.

3794. Is it not the case that the great mass of the workpeople go out of the centre of the city after working hours?—That is not so, because our working classes do not live in the centre of the city; they live all over.

3795. That is what I wanted to know. Therefore they would naturally shop earlier if they were to shop in the central shops than they would in the shops in the suburbs?—But if the shops in the suburbs were closed an hour earlier than they are now their customers would come so much earlier knowing that the shops were going to be closed.

3796. What time do the artizans in Belfast leave off work?—Generally speaking at 5.30.

3797. And what time do the small shops close; did you say at 7.30?—I said at 8 o'clock.

3798. Then what is the custom; do the people go home, get their tea, and then go out to shop?—Not at all; that is not how we live in Belfast.

3799. What do they do; I want to know?—There are houses and homes in Belfast, and the working men and women come home to those homes, and their food is ready for them, having been got ready by the portion of the inhabitants who keep house; and they live somewhat like how human beings ought to live. They do not run out immediately; they are not living from hand to mouth at all.

3800. I wanted to know whether they followed the ordinary customs of humanity; that is to say, that after their work they went home and had a meal, and after that went out for their evening's duties, whether shopping or anything else?—I do not know what you mean by the ordinary customs of humanity.

3801. Let me ask you this: do you consider that it is mainly a question of the public convenience at what hour the shops should be closed?—Yes; and the public convenience includes all shopkeepers and shop assistants, as well as those who come to purchase in shops.

3802. Certainly. May I ask you whether in the smaller shops it is the custom for the man to work with his family and not to employ assistants?—Frequently.

3803. Would you propose, then, to coerce those people into closing earlier than they chose?—No, I never go for coercion in the sense in which it is used now.

3804. I mean

Mr. Lawson—continued.

3804. I meant in the proper sense of the word; would you force people?—I would give those people the opportunity of voting as to whether they would keep open or close, and when they would close. That is what the Bill is; it is optional; it is not coercion at all.

3805. I do not think you have quite read the Bill?—I have asked one of the authors of the Bill if it was optional, and he says, "Yes;" therefore, whether I have read it or not, my answer, I think, is correct.

3806. When two-thirds of the shopkeepers petition the local authority, they may make an order which the whole of the trade, including the third that may have voted against it, has to obey, subject to penalties; is not that so?—That is so.

3807. In that case that third who might have protested against it would be forced by law to obey it?—Yes; that is exactly how you and I have to live every day of our lives.

3808. That is not the question?—I say, yes, sir, and then I give the reason for it.

3809. Then do you think that these people who employ no labour outside their family would consider it a hardship to be forced to close earlier than they would otherwise wish?—I do not. I think a great many of them would be delighted to get the opportunity one against the other. You evidently forget this fact: that there are a number of those people, and one says, "I would close if Brown would; but Brown will not, and therefore I will not."

3810. But you yourself object to a half-holiday?—Yes.

3811. And you would not like to be forced to close on a half-holiday against your will?—I would not, nor would I vote for insisting that any other man should be compelled to close on a half-holiday.

3812. But supposing you were outvoted, would you consider it a hardship to be forced to close?—I would.

3813. Would you protest against it?—I do not know what I would do until it occurred.

3814. Would you be prepared to go to prison for not closing?—I have never been there, and I do not know exactly how I would feel.

3815. But that is what any shopkeeper might be forced to do under the Bill who was outvoted in the first ballot, against whom the local authority made an order, and you did not pay the fine extorted from him?—Yes.

3816. You think that that would be a hardship in your case as regards a half-holiday?—In my case, and in every other man's case, as regards a half-holiday, because they do not hang on all fours at all; the half-holiday and shop hours are two different principles; the one is nonsense, and the other is common sense.

3817. But they are both in the Bill?—Then put out the nonsense.

3818. It is not my Bill, you see; I cannot do that?——

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

3819. Do I rightly gather that your opinion is that the small shopkeepers are really as much in favour of this Bill as the larger ones?—That is my opinion.

Mr. Diamond.

3820. You said that there had been some outdoor demonstrations in Belfast in favour of this Bill?—Yes.

3821. You have attended some?—Yes, I have attended two, one as a spectator and one as a participator.

3822. Can you give the Committee your opinion as to the kind of people that attended those meetings; were they shop assistants or owners of shops, or was the attendance made up of the general public, those who deal at shops and those who keep shops?—At the first one, the one I simply attended as an observer, the Lord Mayor of Belfast presided.

3823. That was an outdoor demonstration?—An outdoor demonstration. I would say that 90 per cent., perhaps 95 per cent., of the attendance, or even more than that, were simply those who had nothing whatever to do with shops.

3824. Except to buy?—Because it was about four o'clock in the afternoon on a Saturday, and therefore shopkeepers and shop assistants could not possibly attend.

3825. So that it was the general public who attended?—Yes.

3826. So that, as far as the convenience therefore of the purchasing people is concerned, the general public in Belfast seem to be in favour of the principle?—No doubt whatever about it; the general public are decidedly in favour of it.

3827. And then, as regards your experience amongst the smaller shopkeepers, I understand that you have had considerable experience, being a wholesale dealer?—That is so.

3828. And your experience is that there is no opinion, so far as you are aware, amongst the smaller shopkeepers, that if they closed earlier their trade would thereby suffer?—None whatever.

3829. I suppose that if they thought their trade would suffer they would not be in favour of putting the Bill into operation?—I am sure they would not.

3830. You said, I think, that you do not know what off licenses mean in Belfast; that is to say, that you have no people who are grocers and at the same time are spirit merchants for consumption not on but off the premises only?—We have such, but such a designation is not known or given to any class of traders, 3831. Then you have people that we would call a spirit grocer in this sense, that he has a grocery business and a spirit business, the spirits being for sale only for consumption off the premises?—Yes, we have them.

3832. Have you any number of them?—Yes.

3833. And I understood you to say that they would be in favour of being brought under the operation of this Bill if they were permitted to fix their own hours of closing; did you give such an answer?—I did not.

3834. I thought you did?—No.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3835. I thought you said that they would be agreeable to the Bill provided that those who sold spirits could be treated separately?—I see what you are referring to now. It was not my evidence at all; it was a resolution passed by the Cavan Grocers' Association, which was sent to me this morning. It reads thus; I will read the two resolutions so that you may thoroughly understand it: "(1) The meeting unanimously passed a resolution in favour of the 'Early Closing Bill' as it now stands; (2) The grocers having spirit licenses were in favour of being brought into the Bill provided their hours of closing be settled by themselves."

Mr. Diamond.

3836. That is the question that I had in my mind, and the evidence was therefore not your own particular evidence, but merely a resolution?—Yes, only that; but now that I am asked the question will you allow me to explain that these are not the class of men you refer to; these are ordinary licensed publicans who sell spirits, groceries, hardware, perhaps, and everything in a country town; and their point is this (and I want to be perfectly fair to them, for they are very decent fellows): that they want not to be associated in their vote with the men who do not sell whiskey or spirits of any kind, but they want to be a class amongst themselves if they can.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3837. You speak, I believe, on behalf of the Federation of Grocers' Associations?—So far as the principle of early closing is concerned, I do.

3838. You are aware of the fact, and you put it in evidence just now, that on the 26th of February 1895 it was resolved, "That each association affiliated to the Federation should, if it is so desired, give evidence through its own witnesses, but that the Federation adhered to the objections of Sir John Lubbock's Bill made in June 1893"?—Yes.

3839. And I think that you told the Committee that the clauses that were objected to are Clauses 5, 8, 10, and 12 in the Bill of 1893?—That is one of the questions that I could not answer.

3840. But you read that point: "That Sir John Lubbock's Bill having been considered, Clauses 5, 8, 10, and 12 in it be objected to as being too indefinite"?—I read that.

3841. Would you be surprised to know that those particular Clauses, 5, 8, 10, and 12 in the Bill of 1893, are identical word for word with the same clauses as in the present Bill now before the Committee?—I would not be surprised at anything I hear.

3842. Then, I suppose, I may take it that this Federation of Grocers' Associations has not had this Bill before them, the present Bill entirely, or else why did they refer back to that resolution of theirs in 1893 and not pass a new resolution?—Will you please observe that it is not the Federation that passes that resolution; it is a committee of the Federation that does so.

3843. Is not that the supreme body?—No, they are the executive body.

3844. They are the body who carry on the affairs of the association?—Yes.

3845. And they speak on behalf of the whole association?—Yes.

3846. Do you yourself speak on behalf of that particular executive body, or for whom do you speak?—I have stated distinctly that, so far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, I speak here in the name of and on behalf of the Federation of the Grocers' Associations of the United Kingdom.

3847. You still agree with them as regards those resolutions?—Those resolutions were never up before the Federation for discussion. That is the opinion of that committee on 8th June 1893.

3848. The executive committee?—Yes.

3849. Do you see that those particular clauses now in this particular Bill were objected to by that executive committee?—Yes; they were objected to as being too indefinite; and I say that the objection is too indefinite.

Chairman.

3850. With reference to these points, I should like to ask you a few questions. As you say, the objections to these clauses are objections to the clauses because they are not considered to be sufficiently definite?—Yes, that is the point of the resolution.

3851. There is no objection to the really operative clauses of the Bill; that is to say, Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4, is there?—I never heard of any.

3852. Now, Clause 5, which your Federation thought hardly sufficiently definite, reads as follows: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them." Has your Federation suggested any modification of that clause?—The Federation never did, but my association is decidedly in favour of it; that is to say, my own association.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3853. That is not the executive body of the Federation of Grocers' Associations?—No.

3854. They are against it?—Yes.

Chairman.

3855. Let us be quite clear; that is because they thought it was too indefinite?—They said that they thought it was too indefinite.

3856. But they have not made any suggestion as to altering it?—I never heard of any.

3857. Then the next clause that they thought was indefinite was Clause 8; that is with regard to the prosecution of offenders. Have they any suggestion to offer with reference to making that clause rather more definite?—I have not heard any suggestions, and certainly there ought to be a suggestion, considering the fact that the Federation two, three, or four times supported and passed resolutions in favour of the principle. We ought all try and carry out what the Federation says.

3858. And you yourself, as president of the association, had no suggestion to make with reference reference to Clause 8 when I was examining you in chief?—I had not, because I did not examine them closely.

3859. I understand that you have no objection yourself to Clause 8?—None whatever.

3860. Now, I pass to Clause 10. Clause 10 is: "Nothing in this Act or in any order made thereunder shall render the occupier of any premises liable to a fine for supplying any article to any person lodging in such premises." That is really a permission under the Act; it does not make the Act more stringent but less so. Have you any suggestions to make as to that particular clause?—None whatever, because it is so free, except that it ought to be tightened a bit because it is too free, if anything, in my opinion.

3861. Then, as I understand, your objection to Clause 10 is that it is not sufficiently strict?—Yes.

3862. Then Clause 12 is simply a definition clause, and I do not understand that you yourself have any suggestions to make with regard to the definition clause?—No. There is, of course, a difficulty about the detail; but I would say that with a lot of small shops, perhaps, the best thing would be to give them a new designation and call them hucksters.

3863. But you yourself are satisfied with Clause 12?—Yes, as far as I understand it.

3864. The objections of the committee of your association were not in any way to the principle of the Bill but simply to those particular clauses that I have mentioned, which they thought might be made somewhat more definite?—That is so.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3865. You are a wholesale grocer yourself?—I am.

3866. And as a wholesale grocer you know that some of these grocers keep drapery and all sorts of stores?—Broadly speaking, that is so.

3867. Then by Clause 5, if the drapers decide to close on one day and the grocers decide to close on another day, at say one o'clock in the day, and the wine merchants on another day, those shops would all have to be closed at one o'clock?—If such a very improbable case arose; but then there ought to be a clause to this effect allowing that particular man to choose his particular day.

3869. You say that it is nonsense?—Yes.

3870. And you would not have the shops closed?—Not at all.

3871. But you would go for regular hours every day of the week?—Certainly; and I am very glad you have mentioned that, because I think it shows the utter impossibility of carrying it out. I am of opinion that it is utterly impossible to carry it out in an honest, straightforward way.

3872. Then you think that there ought to be a fixed hour for the whole six days of the week?—Say five days and the sixth.

3873. Which day would the sixth be?—Saturday.

3874. You would say that the shop might be open later on Saturday?—A little later.

3875. What would be your hour for every night's closing five days in the week?—My idea is that the legal hours should be seven and nine; seven on five days of the week and nine on Saturday evening; but I understand that this is optional, and so they could make their hour whatever hour they wished back to six; of course they cannot make it earlier than six.

3876. But let me just see what would you fix the hour at which those who wanted to remain open for the purposes of their trade should be forced to close by?—Seven o'clock and nine o'clock.

3877. Then all shops you would have closed on Saturday at nine o'clock?—Yes.

3878. None could be open later?—That is my idea; but it may be too short.

3879. You would have seven o'clock on five days of the week and nine o'clock on Saturday?—Yes.

3880. And you would have no shop open later than that?—I would not.

3881. And your own opinion then as regards the measure to be introduced for the early closing of shops is that you would fix a definite hour that all shops should be closed at?—Yes.

3882. And this permissive idea you think then could be done away with?—I did not say that. You asked me my own personal idea when shops should be closed, and I have given you that, and not only my idea but I take the liberty of saying (and I am sure I am correct) that that is the general opinion of three-fourths of the trade in Ireland.

3883. But you said just now, I think, that you would not compel shops to be closed earlier than seven o'clock at night?—That is my idea.

3884. And that is on five days in the week?—Yes.

3885. And nine o'clock on the sixth day?—Yes.

3886. Do you see any objection to fixing definitely those particular hours?—No, I do not see at the moment any objection, if we could get it; but for fear that we would not get it I would go in for the option, believing that when one district would go in for the earlier hour other districts would soon follow. Personally (I see your question now) I would be decidedly in favour of a regular closing hour being made the law of the land.

3887. It would be easily worked, you think?—Yes.

3888. As regards Clause 1, how would you leave the local authority to decide as to what would be the two-thirds majority of any particular class of traders. Did you not say that you would like to have Belfast treated as one district?—Yes.

3889. Then how would you proceed to find out that two-thirds of the grocers in the whole district trict desired to be closed at, say, nine on Saturdays, for example?—By giving them voting-papers.

3890. Should each grocer have a voting-paper given to him?—Yes.

3891. And then the local authority should go round and collect them?—That would be one way, and I think that would be the proper way too, because it would not do for any official belonging to any association to interfere in a matter of this sort.

3892. And no matter what size the shop, would each shop, whether small or big, only have the same voting power?—That is a matter of detail which I have not considered. I will give you my opinion. I think that a man who has two or three shops should have, first of all, a vote for each shop.

3893. Supposing that he has two or three shops together in one block?—I do not know of anything of that sort.

3894. But large establishments contain ten or a dozen shops sometimes?—If they are all under one roof I would only give him one vote.

3895. You would allow each shopkeeper to have a vote for each shop that he has?—Yes.

3896. If separated?—Yes, if it is in different parts of the town.

3898. I only asked you the question?—I would say, yes; but you must draw the line as to what a shop is. I said a few minutes ago that I would make a new designation, and call a lot of them hucksters; they scarcely deserve the name of shops at all.

3899. Are you aware, as regards this Clause 12, that a shop is there specified to mean: "Any building or portion of a building, booth, stall, or place where goods are exposed or offered for sale by retail, and includes a place where the business of a barber is carried on"?—I did not see that before.

3900. So that a shop may be at a corner of a street, and a greengrocer to-day may be found to be a fishmonger to-morrow?—I include them by all means, and I will tell you why: a barber needs shorter hours as well as any of us.

3901. I am not talking of barbers?—But you read: "includes the place where the business of a barber is carried on." And again, a man who is in a booth, perhaps, requires shorter hours than any of us; for a booth I take it is a very unhealthy place to live in.

3902. Let me just call your attention to the particular point. A canvass is made of the greengrocers in Belfast, say, and one day one of the stalls in the streets is a greengrocer's, but the next day it is a fishmonger's; how are you going to arrive at a proper qualification as to the two-thirds of the greengrocers in the town of Belfast?—If you raise questions like that you will never do anything in this wide world.

3903. But we want to pass a measure that there shall be no difficulty in carrying out?—The day that the vote is given, that is the occupier; the same as I vote now for my Parliamentary vote. I may lose it in the next voting. Carry out the same principle.

3904. Then as regards the purpose of voting, would those shops that keep different classes of trade (I am still dealing with Clause 1), which by Clause 5 come under the operation of the Act with respect to any one of the trades, be able to vote first of all as drapers, then as grocers, then as boot shops, or whatever class of goods they keep?—No.

3905. Then how will they record their vote?—I would give them their option.

3906. But they are to be closed by Clause 5 for the purposes of all their trades on the day that their fellow-tradesmen of any particular class decide to close?—Yes.

3907. And they are not to have a vote?—Certainly they should have a vote.

3908. But let me explain to you: supposing that the drapers want to close on Saturday, and a shop keeps drapery and also keeps grocery, and the grocers decide that they cannot close on Saturday but want to close on the Wednesday, the grocers can by their votes close the shop that sells drapery on the Wednesday?—You are on the shop half-holiday again.

3909. You say that you would have on five nights of the week the shops open to seven o'clock and on the other night to nine o'clock. This drapery shop would like to be open on the Wednesday to nine o'clock, but the grocers decide to close at seven, so that this drapery shop would have to close at seven o'clock as well as the grocers?—I do not see the force of the argument at all; but do you want an answer from me.

3910. I asked you the question whether, in your opinion, it is not right that a shop carrying on different trades should for the purposes of voting as regards the two-thirds majority have a vote under all the different trades by which it would be affected?—I see it now; no.

3911. You think they ought only to have one vote?—One vote. A man can only have one identity in this world.

3912. And still he is to be affected by his other trade?—We are going to affect him for good in this case.

Mr. Diamond.

3913. You did not come here, I suppose, for the purpose of doing any injury to the Bill, so far as regards giving a half-holiday to people that desire it; are you aware that there are 600 towns in this country where they have a half-holiday already; although you consider it utter foolishness, still you would not desire, I take it, to prevent those people from having it?—Certainly not; so long as a man does not interfere with me in his folly I would let him be foolish if he wished.

Sir Blundell Maple.

3914. I call your attention to this: the central authority authority in Ireland in the definition means the Local Government Board for Ireland?—What clause is that?

3915. That is Clause 12; and also in the same clause on page 5, in regard to Ireland, are you aware of the fact that the county inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary, in any district over which a county inspector is appointed, is to examine and see as to these shops being closed?—I was not aware of that until you called my attention to it; but I think it is a very proper arrangement.

3916. The fact is that you have not thoroughly dealt with all the details of this Bill?—I have read it; but, at the same time, when you commence to criticise a measure like this to a layman like myself, many new things crop up that you did not observe before. I think he is a very proper official to carry out this Act.

3917. And to go and see if there is a light in the shop, and if anybody is being worked in the shop?—Ah, well, you know that is how the officer will do his duty.

3918. But it is laid down in this Bill that when a shop is closed people are not to be served after a certain time; therefore, the police must have the power of entry into persons' shops to see that these things are being carried out?—I thought I read in the Bill that if there are customers in the shop they are not to be put out until they are served.

3919. Only for a certain time?—Yes.

3920. But then the police would have the power of going into the shop?—Certainly.

3921. And you do not think that in Ireland they would object to the police entering the shops after they are closed?—They do so in many cases at present under the law. In further answer to your question, that is one of the strong points in favour of this Bill, that public opinion is quite in favour of it; and, therefore, being in favour of it, I think the law would be easily carried out. It is not always so with us, but it is so in this case.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

3922. Do the resolutions that you have handed in include the last resolution; I believe there was a resolution passed, was there not, by your central body two or three weeks ago?—Not by the Federation; the Federation met in June 1894; that was the last meeting.

3923. Then there has been no quite recent meeting of your central body?—No. Am I right in supposing that the local authority in our case would be the city council in the first instance?

Chairman.

3924. Yes, that is so; if you look at Clause 4, if any question arises as to the conduct of the Bill then it is referred to the central authority; but so far as regards putting the Bill in operation that rests with the county council, or the town council, as the case may be. That, I understand, you approve of?—That I quite approve of. Our city council will do its duty in every respect to carry out any measure that is for the good of the community.

3925. And you believe that this Bill would be greatly for the good of the community?—I do, indeed.

Mr. HENRY ROBINSON and Mr. CHARLES ARTHUR JUMP, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

3926. (To Mr. Robinson.) YOU are the late president of the Grocers' Association of Manchester, Salford, and the district?—Yes.

3927. And you come here to represent their views with reference to this Bill?—Yes.

3928. (To Mr. Jump.) And you are a member of the committee of the same association?—Yes.

3929. And you are also deputed by the association to represent their views?—Yes. (Mr. Robinson.) Manchester and Salford really are one town, but two divisions; and they appointed one of us to represent Manchester and the other Salford.

3930. Could you give the Committee approximately the hours of labour of shop assistants in your district?—If I speak for myself here, mine are 70.

3931. Could you give us the hours generally?—They vary from 70 to 90 hours; the majority is nearer 90, I think, than 70.

3932. And you have been in business for nearly 30 years, I believe?—Twenty-eight.

3933. Have you any hope of shortening the hours by voluntary action?—None at all.

3934. Is your association in favour of legislation for shortening the hours of shop assistants?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

3935. Have you considered the Bill which is now before this Committee?—Yes.

3936. I will give you an opportunity of making any suggestions as regards clauses afterwards; but speaking generally, do you approve of the general principle of the Bill?—Generally we do.

3937. And you think, on the whole, that it would be the best mode of meeting the difficulty?—Yes.

3938. With reference to any special clauses, you have, I believe, a suggestion to make on Clause 1, have you not; you wish to substitute "shall" for "may," in Clause 1, I understand?—Yes. (Mr. Jump.) I should like to say on this point that I am not in entire agreement with my colleague as to altering that. I would give the local authorities that power.

3939. (To Mr. Robinson.) Has your association passed any actual resolution on the subject, or are you speaking generally?—I may say that the association has given us leave to express a general opinion on that, but we have discussed these things, and some of the association are in favour of it and some are not; but I have got it here that it is my opinion, and the opinion of some of them, that in Section 1, line 9, the word

"may" should be omitted, and the word "shall" substituted.

3940. In fact, you rather wish to strengthen the Bill in that respect?—Yes. We further recommend that in Section 1, line 16, the words "may, if they see fit," be removed, and the word "shall" be substituted.

3941. (To Mr. Jump.) I suppose your objection to the first amendment would also apply to the second, would it not?—They are similar, I suppose. (Mr. Robinson.) I think myself that if a two-thirds majority want it the local authority ought to carry their wishes out.

3942. Have you any doubt that the local authority of Manchester and Salford would carry the wish out if there was a general expression of the wish?—Yes, I think they would.

3943. Then you have a suggestion on Section 3, after the word "time," I think?—Section 3, sub-section 2, line 20, after the word "time," we suggest that there should be inserted "after six months," and on line 21 we suggest the substitution of "two-thirds" instead of "one-third." I may say that my association are in favour of that strongly.

3944. That, again, is really a suggestion to make the Bill more stringent than it is at present?—Certainly. We think that if there was no time stated, and it was only perhaps obtained by a small majority, they would be continually going round and getting testimonials and signatures to have it altered, and the trade would be upset all the time; and I think that whichever side obtained a majority it should last for six months; and so does my association.

3945. We have had a suggestion that the time should be one year; would you prefer one year or would you prefer six months?—I am quite willing to fall in with one year. We thought it should be either six or 12 months; but six months was the least we would like.

3946. You look upon six months as the minimum, in fact?—Yes.

3947. Then you wish to substitute "two-thirds" for "one-third" in line 21?—Yes; we think that if it takes two-thirds to obtain it it ought to require two-thirds to upset it again.

3948. You have nothing to say, I think, on Clauses 4 and 5?—No, I think not.

3950. Then I believe with reference to the fines you have a suggestion to make?—Yes; we think that the fines are too small. In Section 6, line 41, we think that "five" should be removed and "20" substituted, and in Section 6, page 3, line 1, that "20" be removed and "40" substituted, as we think that the small fines are of no use.

3952. You would be satisfied with the fines as they stand?—Personally, I should. (Mr. Robinson.) Of course, these alterations have been passed by the committee.

3953. I did not quite understand that. I asked you the question, and I understood you before to say that the committee had left it to you, but that it was not the actual resolution of the committee?—I referred to Clause 1; then that was the one I meant then. These others have been passed by the committee.

3954. Your association I believe had a meeting on the 26th February, and they passed a resolution in favour of the Bill generally?—On the 26th of February the association passed a resolution requesting the Federation to take such action in the way of tendering evidence in support of the principle of the Bill as might be deemed necessary.

3955. Then there was a resolution passed on the 1st of April making some suggestion. Will you just read that to the Committee?—On the 1st April 1895 the association passed the following resolutions: "That in the opinion of this meeting this section of the Bill should be read as follows":——

3956. Which section is that?—This is really confirming that six months' suggestion.

3957. We have already got that in evidence then?—Yes.

3958. And also the two-thirds, I think?—Yes.

3960. And you wish to insert a clause with reference to Sunday trading?—Yes. We think that Sunday trading should be abolished as far as possible. It is carried on to a great extent in poor districts in large towns.

3961. But you would not wish to endanger the

the Bill by inserting a clause with reference to Sunday trading, would you?—Certainly not. I do not wish to endanger the Bill in any form.

3962. You are very anxious that the Bill should pass?—Yes, certainly. (Mr. Jump.) I should like to explain my position. Mr. Peter Bratt, of Manchester, was appointed along with Mr. Robinson to represent Manchester and Salford, and they got the instructions such as have been read by Mr. Robinson; but Mr. Bratt was unable to come; therefore I was deputed to take his place; and, of course, although I agree with Mr. Robinson in almost everything, still there are a few things I do not fall in with; so that I thought I would just like to explain that position. I do not think that the passing of this Bill would increase Sunday trading.

3963. Is there any other point in Mr. Robinson's evidence as to which you wish to make any remark?—I do not think there is anything else.

3964. You wish, I think, to give some evidence to the Committee as regards the long hours of business in the suburbs of Manchester?—In the working-class districts in the suburbs of Manchester the shops are open somewhat as follows: The general hour for opening is 8 o'clock every day. On Monday they close, some at 8, a few at 8 I might say, a large number at 9 and 9.30, and a few at 10; and similar closing hours are observed on Tuesday. On Wednesday in some districts in Manchester, after many years of hard work to get the half-holiday, we have succeeded in some districts in obtaining a partial half-holiday for the grocers, but only for the grocers; the other trades have not followed suit. And also I should like to add that at the present time there is a serious danger in some districts of the half-holiday again breaking down. On Thursdays 9 o'clock is a very general closing hour in our trade, but 9.30 or 10 is perhaps more general. On Fridays 10 is the general closing hour for the grocery trade. On Saturday 11 to 11.15 is the general time for closing.

3965. Do you agree with Mr. Robinson generally in the evidence which he has given in favour of the Bill?—I do.

3966. (To Mr. Robinson.) Do you think you would obtain a majority of two-thirds in favour of somewhat earlier closing than you have at present?—I think we should. (Mr. Jump.) I believe myself we should obtain five-sixths.

3967. (To Mr. Robinson) Do you feel satisfied that the local authority in your district would put the Act in operation if the necessary majority were obtained?—I think so. In our district that would mean the Salford Town Council.

3968. Yes, and the Manchester Town Council?—Yes.

3969. You do not feel any doubt that they would act in accordance with the wishes of the shopkeepers?—No, I think not.

Mr. Diamond.

3970. What is the number of members in your association?—There are about 250 members I think.

3971. A question has been raised as to how far those 250 may be said to represent the general body of traders: have you any idea of how many grocers you have in Manchester and Salford?—You see there are many little, what you might call, huckster shops, which are classed in grocer's or provision shops, and that swells the number up; but really there are a lot of those very small ones that you can hardly call such. I believe that if they were all reckoned in there would be something like 600. (Mr. Jump.) I should like to say that at the time I was secretary to the association there were 350 members, which was the largest number they have ever had, and during the time they had the largest number of members there was more activity in favour of shortening the hours in our trade.

3972. How do you account for the falling off of your membership?—It has been caused by the secretary who succeeded me not having time to call upon members and get their subscriptions. It is solely through that. He has resigned, and stated that that is his reason; that he has not time to call upon them.

3973. But you think the association, although not embracing all the traders, may fairly claim, in a sense, to be representative of all the trades?—It most excellently represents the opinion of the grocery traders in Manchester.

3974. And these small people outside that you were speaking of, would all, of course, have votes in the case of this Bill coming into law?—Yes.

3975. And, of course, they would go either to make up the two-thirds majority or to prevent the Bill from coming into operation if they thought their own interests would be endangered by it?—Yes. We believe that they desire to close; only a small number of them will keep open.

3976. My point is this: It is contended that there would be a hardship inflicted on these small people, and what I want to endeavour to get information upon is whether you think that you really would be able to get these people to vote for putting the law into force, although they themselves are said by some people to be likely to be injuriously affected by its application?—I think they would vote for it in a great majority.

3977. Of course, if they voted against it in large numbers the law would not come into force and there would be no hardship?—No. (Mr. Robinson.) I think that if anything would stop us in getting that majority in these small shops it would be those that hold the out-door beer licence. I think that if anything at all would stop us from getting it it would be that, because they would, perhaps, vote against it; but anyone that had not an out-door beer licence would vote for it.

3978. Then, if they voted against it, things would remain as they are, and there would be no hardship?—No; but you see the great difficulty that we have now to obtain even the short hours. I do not think that the 70 hours which I put here that my assistants work can be curtailed very much, because it includes the half-holiday as well. But the difficulty is for a few of us to close and give our assistants the benefit of a half-day when our opponents in the street will not; and it is caused in a great measure by one man; it is not by the majority. For instance, I have a case here of a man which I put down here, not from any personal feeling, although he is opposite to one of my establishments, but to show that the man is in that position. It is not like a man that had a small shop that was struggling to get a living, or anything of that kind; but here is a man opposite me who has his shop open 90 hours a week at the least. He opens at 7 and closes at 10; whereas I open at 8 and close at 8 the first four nights. He neither closes on Wednesday afternoon nor on bank holidays or anything, and only Christmas Day and Sunday. He has done that for 35 years, and his reason is that he has done it so long that he will not alter it. He is a man in a good position, and a member of the Salford Town Council. It is such men as those that cause the voluntary effort to break down; that is what I want to show. But if I would not close my shop, which I have thought sometimes of not doing, opposite him, I should keep the whole of Salford open, because I have six places, and one would touch another and the other grocers between; and that would practically keep all Salford open, and they would not get the half-holiday. I do it on purpose really to oblige the majority, and we have to ignore the minority. (Mr. Jump.) I should like to supplement that statement by saying that we have had similar difficulties in Manchester. In one road in Manchester one shopkeeper has several times broken through the half-holiday arrangement, and caused a re-opening for a short time, until, by force (I suppose a kind of coercion) on the part of his assistants and the public he has been compelled to fall in with the arrangement. and all is going on smoothly at present; but in Oldham-road, Manchester, which is a very large and important thoroughfare, the grocers after strenuous efforts have failed to obtain the half-holiday in consequence of the refusal of one tradesmen to agree with the general body. It is the unreasonable man that we want to compel to close. This man's hours are as follows: Every day he opens at 8, but on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday his closing hour is 9.30, on Friday 10, and on Saturday 12. I should like to say that my own opinion is that a great number of shopkeepers desire to close, and would take very little, if any notice of, in fact, they do not care a straw, if a lot of the small shops remained open continuously and were never closed; they regard them as being of no account. I have a suggestion to make that might conciliate some of the opposition, if you will allow me. It is that the local authority, such as the town council, should be authorised to appoint an early closing committee similar to a sanitary committee or other committees, and that when an application similar to that set forth in Clause 1 is served upon the local authority, that is, where a two-thirds majority has been obtained——.

3979. Pardon me a moment; is this as a suggestion in any way emanating from your association as such, or is it a personal expression of opinion?—It is a personal expression of opinion of my own: and I take it that I am allowed a free hand so long as I support the general principle of the Bill. I would suggest that when an application similar to that set forth in Clause 1 is served upon the local authority, they should issue a public notice informing the minority of shopkeepers that if they desire exemption they must set forth their claims in writing, and send the same to the local authority within so many days. The local authority shall then consult with the majority of shopkeepers, or their accredited representatives, as to which of the minority of shopkeepers shall be exempted. I take it that that would be more a question of including one or two unreasonable shopkeepers than of exempting a very large number of trivial shopkeepers, whose business does not interfere with the larger ones. The local authority should then have the power to decide such cases on their merits, as between the majority and the minority, without the intervention of the legal profession, and subject to no appeal. If at any time during the operation of the Act an exempted shopkeeper should so change the nature of his or her business as to become an unfair competitor to the majority of shopkeepers, the majority, as their accredited representatives, should be entitled to approach the local authority with a view to the inclusion of such a shopkeeper within the operation of the Act; and the local authority should have power to confirm or reject such application.

3980. (To Mr. Robinson.) I understood you to say that you had the half-holiday in Salford and Manchester very considerably?—No, not considerably; only a few of what I may call the leading grocers who are in favour of it, and have done it on purpose to give their hands the half-holiday, and have ignored the others.

3981. And they have found that the half-holiday is quite a practicable thing; there is no difficulty about it?—They have no difficulty at all. It is only the one man in one road that we have to deal with. There is always about one man in one road that causes difficulty.

3982. Not only with regard to the early closing, but with regard to the half-holiday as well?—As regards both. (Mr. Jump.) Where the half-holiday is an accomplished fact there is a large number of very small shops that still keep open, but they are not regarded as being of any account.

3983. That is to say, the view of the tradesmen is that it is only the people who are, in a sense, equals and competitors of their own, that they desire to have included?—Yes, that is my view.

3984. And they do not pay much attention to the competition of the little traders?—That is my view of it.

3985. And, at the same time, those little traders would have, under the Bill, a vote just the same as the larger, and could protect themselves?—Yes.

3986. Have you had any public meetings in Manchester and Salford in favour of this Bill?—Not this particular Bill. (Mr. Robinson.) There was a national conference held in Manchester on the 18th of April 1892; that was for the shop assistants. There were some of our members on the platform supporting it.

3987. Both the shop-assistants and the shopkeepers themselves are in favour of it?—Yes.

3989. That is to say, you are not very anxious really to include every little man who puts a few things into his window?—No, I do not care a fig about him. I want men of my own standing, or something approaching it. I am not one of those that kick against every little widow woman that keeps a shop in a back street. If I wanted every one of them to come in I should be working 90 hours now. There is one thing that I should like to speak about. There is a feeling, I might say, in Manchester, amongst the shopkeepers who do close now, that if this Bill or some other kind of legislation is not passed, we feel inclined to keep open and force our assistants to form a union of themselves, on purpose to do something.

3990. I understand that you are afraid that unless legislation is really carried out, the voluntary effort, which has up to now done something, will fail entirely, and you will go back to a worse state of things than existed before?—Yes, the half-holiday movement is just wavering in the balance now.

3991. It is purely a question of being able to hold your ground, and you do not see your way to do that?—I do not think it will be held much longer if something is not done.

3992. With regard to Sunday trading, it was said that there was some danger that this Bill might increase that, I think?—My own opinion is, that it will. My friend here thinks not.

3993. What I want to put to you is this: What is the class of tradesman who opens on Sunday; has he not, as a general rule, this small pettifogging shop?—Yes.

3994. To which, on a week day, you pay no attention?—Yes; there are, of course, a few just bordering between the one and the other, but not a great many.

3995. But you do not think that it is likely in any way to lead to the better class of shopkeepers opening on Sunday, do you?—No.

3996. Therefore, it does not present such grave difficulty in that direction as one might be led to imagine from the resolution, or from the expression of opinion that was embodied in the

Mr. Diamond—continued.

Report which you read some time ago; that is to say, you think it would only affect the very small shops?—That is so.

3997. It would not lead to any open Sunday trading on the part of the large people?—No, but it is done to a great extent; and more so by butchers and greengrocers, and those people, than it is even in the grocery trade.

3998. But what I wanted particularly to get at was this: the class of people that trade with shopkeepers, say of your own standing, are not likely, because you close an hour earlier on Saturday, to put off their purchases till Sunday, and go to a small shop such as we have referred to?—I think not.

3999. Therefore, really looking at it in that light, you would be inclined to the view that the amount of Sunday trading under this Bill, if it became an Act, would not be more appreciable than at present?—Perhaps not to any great extent.

Mr. Lawson.

4000. I understand that you wish to leave the small or domestic shop somewhat out of account?—That is my own opinion. I think that if every little shop, as it is represented in the Bill, a booth, a stall, and everything else is included, the Bill will be no use, practically, to shopkeepers, because there would be above two-thirds against the closing. (Mr. Jump.) I should not leave them entirely out of account, but I should leave it to the majority of the shopkeepers and the local authority to decide.

4001. A bare majority, or the majority proposed by the Bill?—As proposed in the Bill.

4002. (To Mr. Robinson.) Do you think that it would be unfair to bring these small shopkeepers, if they were in a minority of a third, under this Bill against their will?—I do not think it would; but my fear is that many of these small shopkeepers hold an out-door beer licence, and, of course, they are in favour of keeping open every night till eleven.

4003. But where they have no licence you still think it would be possible to leave them out?—The very small ones I think it would.

4004. You wish the Bill to apply principally to those places where assistants are employed?—I do not wish it to exclude a man who has his own sons or daughters working for him. I do not see that a man has any right to work his own children longer than anyone else's.

4005. But if it is a family arrangement, do you think there is any necessity for interfering with the free will of those people?—Certainly. I do not think that a man has any more right to keep his shop open because he employs grown up, I might say, sons or daughters in the shop, than I have because I have business enough to employ assistants. (Mr. Jump.) He becomes an unfair competitor then to a man who happens to have a branch shop.

4006. (To Mr. Robinson.) But is it not the case that the conditions of trade are quite different in different quarters of such cities as yours?—It is, to a great extent; but I do not see that that would apply at all; that was one of the objections that Mr. Dunwoody read in these resolutions; I have them here the same as he has;

and that is one of the clauses in this Bill that the federation objected to. There was, I think, a provision in Sir John Lubbock's first Bill, that if a man employed his own family he was allowed to keep open, and a man that employed assistants had to close. That, I believe, was really the principal objection that all the grocers in the federation had against the Bill.

4007. But I understood you to say that you yourself do not wish to bring small domestic shops under the Bill?—Yes; but there may be perhaps a man that has not a small domestic shop. A man might have a shop as good as one of mine, or perhaps better; but if he has only one shop, and lives on the premises, he has sons and daughters, as a rule, that help him, and does not employ assistants.

4008. But do you not think that the first point to be considered is the convenience of the public?—I think Mr. Jump can give you some evidence with regard to that. (Mr. Jump.) With reference to the convenience of the public I can give you some particulars of the co-operative stores in our district, and in some other parts of Lancashire; they are solely, I believe, supported by the working people. The Pendleton Co-operative Store closes on Monday and Tuesday at 7. (Mr. Robinson.) That is one of the divisions of Salford. (Mr. Jump.) On Tuesday they close at 7, on Wednesday at 1, on Thursday at 8, on Friday at 9, and on Saturday at 7. In these cases the customers, if they desired the shops to remain open, would only require to pass a resolution at a general meeting of these stores, and they could have it. The Failsworth Co-operative Society close on Monday and Tuesday at 7.30, on Wednesday at 12.30, on Thursday and Friday at 9, and on Saturday at 7.

Sir Francis Powell.

4009. What class of business is that?—Co-operative societies.

4010. What class of trade?—Grocery, drapery, and almost anything you can mention; boots, beef, fish, and almost anything. In Oldham on Monday they close at 8, on Tuesday at 12 o'clock noon, on Wednesday and Thursday at 8 o'clock, on Friday at 9 o'clock, and on Saturday at 6 o'clock. At Bolton on Monday and Tuesday they close at 7.30, on Wednesday at 12.30, on Thursday at 7.30, on Friday at 9.30, and on Saturday at 7 o'clock. The Manchester and Salford Equitable Co-operative Stores close on Monday and Tuesday at 7 o'clock, on Wednesday at 1 o'clock, on Thursday at 8, on Friday at 9, and on Saturday at 9. At Rochdale they close on Monday at 7.30, on Tuesday at 1, on Wednesday at 7.30, on Thursday at 8, on Friday at 9, and on Saturday at 8. At Prestwich they close on Monday and Tuesday at 7, on Wednesday at 12 noon, on Thursday at 8, on Friday at 9, and on Saturday at 6. At Denton they close on Monday and Tuesday at 7, on Wednesday at 12 noon, on Thursday at 7, on Friday at 8, and on Saturday at 6.

Mr. Lawson.

4011. Does not that show a facility of early closing by voluntary means, where there is the will?—But these people are the owners of the stores, and they can please themselves.

4012. At the same time, they have a pecuniary interest in the result, and therefore they are able, as the shopkeepers could do elsewhere, of course, to close the stores at an earlier hour?—Exactly. All we require is some pressure to be brought to bear upon the unreasonable men.

4013. But here it is no question of pressure; these people do it of their own accord?—But it would be unfair to the shopkeeper to close his shop early when his competitor directly opposite can keep open.

4014. I do not say by law, but, as these people do it, for themselves?—Yes, but he might suffer great injustice.

4015. Then how far does that apply to these stores?—It does not apply, because they have no competitors; it is the people's own store.

4016. I know that; but, at the same time, they have competitors in the different classes of the business which they conduct, like the stores elsewhere?—But they trust to the loyalty of their members.

4017. Perfectly; I understand that: that they find it more to their advantage to close at what you consider to be a reasonable hour. Now, I should like to ask this question: with regard to Sunday closing, you know what the Act of Charles II. says about that subject, do you?—Yes.

4018. The 5*s.* penalty?—Yes.

4019. In what way do you think that ought to be strengthened?—The magistrates throughout the country regard the law as pretty well obsolete, and they will not put it into force. Personally, I do not make any suggestion with regard to Sunday at all.

4020. (To Mr. Robinson.) It is your suggestion, I think?—Yes, I did suggest it.

4021. But nothing could be stronger than that Act of Charles II., could it?—But it is really impossible, I think, to get it carried out. And whenever you can, it is only a matter of a fine of 1*s.*

4022. That is because of public opinion, is it not?—Yes; but I think myself that these hours of the co-operative societies, showing that they have shorter hours, instead of showing that if you try to do it it can be carried out by voluntary effort, speak in favour of this Bill, because that is carried out by a majority of the people at the annual meeting.

4023. It must be a matter of opinion, of course, what conclusion it leads to; but with regard to Sunday closing, may I ask you again: is it not the case that the law is stringent enough at the present time, but that it is merely a question of public opinion, and the action of the magistrates that hinders it from being carried out?—It may be; but I think the Act is really obsolete.

4024. But proceedings are taken under it constantly, are they not?—Very seldom. (Mr. Jump.) I have never seen any serious attempt to put it into force myself.

4025. Not in your district?—No.

Mr. Tennant.

4026. What reason do you assign for these various co-operative stores closing at the time you you mentioned?—The working men nowadays, I take it, have got shorter hours themselves, and they desire them for those who are practically their employés.

4027. It suits the working men, you think, just as well as that these stores should close at 7, 7.30, and 8?—There is not one workman in one hundred who makes his own purchases; the wife or daughter make them at most shops; we seldom see a man coming into a shop.

4028. And you think that suits the working class just as well?—I think it proves the point that the working class would not be inconvenienced if there was a great reduction in the present hours observed by shopkeepers.

4029. And you said, I think, that the hours at present were from 70 to 90?—Yes; and some of the stores about 55.

4030. Anything up to 60 hours you would not object to?—We should be very glad if we could get 70 or 74; a great deal of good would be done by that.

4031. What time would you like to see for compulsory closing in the evening?—I should think 7 o'clock would be a very suitable hour for some nights in the week. Of course, on Friday or Saturday we should require 9 or 9.30, and 10 o'clock on Saturdays.

4032. Are you familiar with the provisions of this Bill?—I think fairly so.

4033. Have you observed Clause 5?—Yes.

4034. Are you in favour of that clause as it stands?—Not as it stands.

4035. You made an alteration in that, I think?—I have elaborated Clauses 4 and 5 in the suggestion which I have made.

4036. To what effect is your suggestion?—That the local authority and the majority of shopkeepers should exempt people who they thought did not interfere with the shopkeepers who employed assistants, and yet bring about the operation of the Bill.

4037. That applies of course to Clause 4?—Yes.

4038. What about Clause 5, where you have two or more trades carried on?—You could not tell until you saw the shop. The local authority and the majority of the shopkeepers would answer the question in two minutes when they saw the shop. The local authority would consult with the majority of the shopkeepers, and the majority of the shopkeepers would be able to say immediately whether a shop should or should not close; whether it was fair to them that it should remain open or not.

4039. But, I understand, according to the provisions of this Bill, that a shop which carries on two or more trades, which after all must be very common in Manchester and Salford, I should think?—Not very common.

4040. But are there not large stores?—Not beyond the co-operative stores, and they close very early.

4041. It would not affect them; but I understand that by the provision of this clause all shops that carry on more than one trade will have to close all those trades at any hour at which any of the trades are closed during the week?—Yes; but I do not see any difficulty in that.

4043. But taking the case of the half-holiday, supposing the grocers agreed to have a half-holiday on Wednesday and the drapers on Thursday, and the butchers on Friday, what would happen?—That would work all right.

4044. But then under this clause you would have a store which carried on the businesses of drapery and grocery being shut up at 1 or 2 o'clock in the middle of the day on Wednesday, and Thursday, and Friday, would you not?—I do not know such a shop in Manchester, beyond the co-operative stores.

4045. But that would affect the co-operative stores just as much as anything else?—But they close.

4046. They do not close at one on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday?—No. (Mr. Robinson.) I have stated that I think myself that if they closed one day, that would be all that ought to be required of them.

4047. You would like a clause put into the Bill to that effect to say that it shall not be demanded to have more than one half-holiday?—No, not more than one. If a store keeps short hours and closes one half-day, I think it is all one could reasonably expect. The only other way out of the difficulty would be that he should close one department, but not close all his shop or store two or three half-days because he had two or three businesses carried on in it.

4048. (To Mr. Jump.) May I ask you if you are in favour of making Manchester one area or two, with regard to this Bill?—We have not come to a decision upon that point (Mr. Robinson): I think that would be worked out without any difficulty.

4049. You think it could be worked out by making Manchester one district?—Yes, or two or three divisions as it is now. (Mr. Jump): I think myself an easy way out of that difficulty with regard to the delimitation of areas would be that when an agreement has been come to amongst the shopkeepers and ratified by the local authority, the local authority should have the power to make that a district within the meaning of the Act.

4050. Of course, the local authority would have that power, I understand, according to the provisions of the Bill?—Yes; but the area would then be delimited.

4051. But how are you going to delimit it; you must delimit it in the same manner as is done now for County Councils or Parliamentary, or other franchise, must they not?—Not necessarily.

4052. But still there must be some means of doing it?—It ought to be left to the local authority to proclaim a district as a district within the meaning of the Act.

Chairman.

4053. I understand that you are satisfied with the Bill in that respect and do not wish to modify it. The Bill gives ample power as it is?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

4054. You think there would be no difficulty in that?—I see none whatever. I can give you an instance. On one road in Manchester, supposing it is 2 miles long, for 1 mile the shopkeepers preferred Wednesday for the closing day, and the other half preferred Tuesday, and that arrangement has worked smoothly now for two years.

4055. That means that half the drapers, or whatever it might be, shut up on Wednesday, and the other half shut on Tuesday?—Yes, and yet there is only about 100 yards from the last shopkeeper shutting on Tuesday, and the first who closes on Wednesday; so that there is not the great difficulty about the delimitation of areas that there would seem to be.

4057. But you might get a two-thirds majority in the one area, and not in the other?—There might be a difficulty; but, at any rate, they would not be any worse off than they are now if they could not put the Act into operation.

Dr. Farquharson.

4058. (To Mr. Robinson.) I think you have expressed the opinion that the early closing of shops might lead to an increase of Sunday trading?—I was afraid that it might do so if all these small shops were compelled to close earlier on Saturday night.

4059. Is not that equivalent to an admission on your part that the early closing of shops might be against the convenience of the public?—I do not think so.

Mr. Lawson.

4061. Those that get shaved on Sunday morning, do you say that they are idle and dissolute?—No; I say the people that shop on Sunday morning are only the idle and dissolute who are in the public-houses on Saturday night.

Dr. Farquharson.

4062. The evidence you have given us about the co-operative stores goes to show, does it not, that the public can accommodate themselves to circumstances?—Yes.

4063. That is to say that the public convenience will arrange itself according to public arrangements?—Yes, they only shop because the shops are wide open.

4064. And you think that if the shops were shut they would arrange their shopping to meet the circumstances?—We are firmly of that opinion.

4065. You do not think it would be felt as a grievance by the working classes that they could not go out to shop after they had finished their work and had their evening meal with their wives. Might they not like to look into the shop windows?—I do not think they do at present. (Mr. Robinson.) In the working class neighbourhoods I do not think a great many men go with their wives. Besides we are only asking now for a reasonable day, to close at 8. The artisan finishes at 5.30, and that gives him 2½ hours; but I might state here that at whatever time a shop is open to customers of course will come; and those that live the nearest, perhaps next door, are always the latest customers. That is a noted fact in the trade altogether.

4066. You rather indicated, I think, some suspicion that the small shopkeepers might be injuriously affected by the operation of the Bill, because you thought that they might be exempted?—I think that the poorest class of shopkeepers might be exempted, whose trading does not affect the larger and better-equipped shops.

4067. But would not the exemption of the small shopkeepers rather defeat the operation of this Bill. As I understand, the great obstacle to early closing is that you cannot prevent one or two standing out, and therefore injuriously affecting those that remain in the arrangement. Would not, therefore, the exemption of small shops rather tend to make a difficulty in that way, that they might be carrying on business after the big shops close, to the disadvantage of the big shops?—Then we should have to break through the agreement after the six months. I have made a provision for that, that if a shopkeeper so alters his trade we shall be allowed to approach the local authority and ask for his inclusion, if he became an unfair competitor to those who were closed; but I do not myself think they would.

Chairman.

4068. Would there not be a great difficulty in drawing a line; supposing, for instance, you said that nobody rated under 10*l.* should be included, would not that be rather hard on those rated at 12*l.* Whatever line you draw, would it not be very hard on those just above the line?—I do not think so. Our great difficulty has been with such a small proportion of tradesmen. Every time when we have required a half-holiday, it has been a question of three or four, or perhaps two in a district; and all the other grocers would say, if they will close, we will all close.

Dr. Farquharson.

4069. But your plan seems to me to perpetuate the difficulty that there is now against voluntary closing closing. If the only objection to voluntary closing is that two or three stand out, what you propose now is simply perpetuating it?—It is not the small shops that have bothered us to a great extent; it is two or three of the larger shopkeepers that cause the trouble, as a rule. Of course, we are quite willing, and so is my association, that all shops should be included, if possible; but we are a little fearing there, that if every small shop was included, perhaps we should never get two-thirds, and the Bill would not be carried out if it became law. (Mr. Jump.) Yes, we think we should get two-thirds.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4070. (To Mr. Robinson.) Do you attach importance to this kind of legislation in the interests of health?—Certainly.

4071. Do you consider that the small shopkeepers are probably working under worse conditions of health than the large ones?—Yes.

4072. And, therefore, you want to protect them against themselves, so to speak?—Yes.

4073. You think that the small shop is, of course, naturally badly ventilated, hot, and stuffy?—Yes.

4074. And therefore you consider that the health of the employés is more injuriously affected in a small shop than in a large one?—Certainly. (Mr. Jump.) I think they would close earlier now, but they keep waiting for one another, and they both close when both are weary of watching for the other to close.

Sir Francis Powell.

4075. (To Mr. Robinson.) You mentioned the late hours at which shops are open in the working class districts of Manchester and Salford; do you consider that the working classes would be inconvenienced by earlier hours of closing on Saturdays?—Not, say, 10 o'clock; I do not think they would be, because they finish work at 12; I should not go in for having a half-day holiday on Saturday, and closing at 2 or 3.

4076. You think that 10 o'clock would give sufficient opportunity for the working-class population to complete the shopping of the week?—Certainly; they would have 10 hours after they had done their work.

4077. How do you account for the shops being kept open so late?—It is rivalry, to a great extent.

4078. You consider the lateness of the hours rather due to rivalry between shopkeepers than to any convenience or inconvenience on the part of the public?—Yes.

Viscount Cranborne.

4079. (To Mr. Jump.) I should just like to ask you on this matter of excluding the small shops, which is a very important point; there would be always, would there not, a feeling of grievance as between a shop just above the line and a shop just below the line?—My experience is that when they are below the line they are very much below the line.

4080. But there must be some people on the line, or near the line, wherever you draw the line, must there not?—We find there are some men who are very unreasonable men, who will not fall in with the half-holiday movement, and make all sorts of excuses of this kind; they say that the little shops in the side streets would get some of their trade. But perhaps only three or four yards from a man who is grumbling there is another who closes and sacrifices any trade that he might be deprived of in that manner.

4081. In that connection I should like to ask you this question: Just now, in reply to the honourable Member, you said that you considered this Bill very important from the point of view of health; and it was specially in the small shops, perhaps, that health was liable to suffer from long hours?—Yes.

4082. Do you not see that there is a certain difficulty in excluding from the operation of the Bill the small shops, when it is specially in the small shops that the evil which you want to remove exists?—Yes. If you want to meet it from the point of view of the health of the community, of course, you can close them up; but still we do not want to do anything that would have even the appearance of hardship.

4083. But I think you appreciate my point, that from the health point of view, it is in the small shops that the difficulty really arises?—Yes.

4084. And that if you exclude them you give away a large part of the case with regard to the health point of view?—The health point of view has not occupied our minds so much.

4085. Then you do not look upon health as the most important consideration with regard to early closing?—No, we want shorter hours.

4086. Why do you want shorter hours?—For recreation.

4087. Not for health?—No; our trade, the grocery trade, is rather a healthy one.

4090. It is true that there is a power to classify, but that is merely meant to get rid of smaller difficulties. But would that carry with it the power to say that a man who manifestly and obviously sold meat was not engaged in the butchers' trade? What the Right Honourable Chairman points out is that the local authority could exercise the option by refusing the half-holiday to the whole trade on that particular day, because certain shops would be so injuriously affected by dealing in so many articles that they would have to close every day; but I understand you to say, from your evidence just now, that you thought that a shop that dealt in three classes of trade ought only to be called upon to close on one day?—Certainly.

4091. Then supposing you had a large shop in Manchester dealing in these three trades, which I take as an instance, and supposing the Bill was so altered that they were only obliged to close on Wednesday, and not on Thursday and Friday, then all the other butchers and bakers compelled to close on Thursday and Friday would evidently be put to great disadvantage compared with this big shop, which would be allowed to open the whole day with respect to those trades, and would be the only one open in the whole district?—I might explain that if a man was carrying on three trades, one of the trades must predominate over the others; and I will suppose, for the sake of argument, that the grocers' trade might be as much as the butchers' and bakers'.

4092. I do not know Manchester and that district so well as you do, but there are a great number of cases in London of large providers, like Whiteley, who provide everything; and, if I remember rightly, there is a case of that kind in Manchester. It would be perfectly possible, would it not, that a shop of that kind would have to close every day of the week for a half-holiday?—I think, and the association would back me in saying that, if he closed one day that is all that would be required of him.

4093. Then he would have a great advantage over the others, would he not?—I fancy if that man was asked to-day what he was, he would say he was a draper. (Mr. Jump). In a case like Whiteley's you can only leave that to the local authorities, because even in Whiteley's shop it would be an easy matter for the butchering department to close up the same day as the other butchers.

4094. Yes, I think that is a fair answer; you would close it in departments?—Yes, I would close it in departments; I see no difficulty in regard to Whiteley's.

Mr. Diamond.

4095. Just in regard to that there are a very large number of towns in which there is a half-holiday at present, and is it within your knowledge as to whether it is found that the trades close on separate days, or, rather, is it not the case that where a half-holiday has been established there has been a general agreement and all the businesses have closed on that particular day?—Yes, they have.

4096. That is the case in about 900 towns in the country at present, I believe?—Yes.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

4097. So that if this Bill became an Act there is no reason why there should be a departure from that principle that has hitherto ruled the half-holiday, and why one trade should choose Monday and another Tuesday, and so on, is there?—No.

4098. And even now on the half-holiday these large shops close on that day along with the other trades, do they not?—Yes. (Mr. Robinson). Yes, I think it would come to a great extent to be one day in the week. I think there would be very little difficulty about having three or two days.

Viscount Cranborne.

4099. (To Mr. Jump.) Of course, Mr. Tennant put it to you in the form of a question with regard to the half-holiday, because that was the most striking case; but the whole of the questions could be asked in respect of early closing on particular days. You understand that that is so; it is not merely to do with the half-holiday?—No.

4100. The same kind of questions could be put about closing at 6 o'clock on three days of the week, or on all days of the week, and so giving a disadvantage to the big shops that have to close in respect of all the days that were closed earlier in each particular trade dealt with in that big shop?—Yes, certainly.

Mr. Diamond.

4101. Except that the large shops are now all closed much earlier, as a general rule, than even this Bill suggests would be the rule for an entire district?—Yes.

Chairman.

4102. (To Mr. Robinson.) You do not regard that, in fact, as a practical difficulty likely to arise often?—No. (Mr. Jump.) We think that a lot of what seem to be difficulties would disappear in practice.

Chairman.

4103. (To Mr. Robinson.) Is there anything else you would wish to say?—There is one item in my evidence that I have not spoken about, which I should like to do, and that is that I believe the assistants would like something mentioned as regards the time being stated definitely in the Bill, for which they should be employed after the shops are closed. They passed a resolution at Cardiff on Easter Monday to that effect, and I have no doubt there will be evidence given before you as to the desire to put something of that kind in the Bill. Now I object strongly, and so does my association, that a clause should be put in the Bill that no assistant should be employed for over thirty minutes after a shop is closed.

Sir Francis Powell.

4104. You would leave that to be a matter of arrangement?—Yes; I want just to state this: you see the grocers' assistants are paid quite differently; they are paid so much per week, and not so much per hour, as they are under the Factory Act; and therefore they are paid for time that they do not work, in a different way, because they are paid for bank holidays, and Good Fridays, and all.

4105. You

Chairman.

4105. You are quite aware that that is not in the Bill at present, and you object to its being put in the Bill?—Yes, we object to its being put in the Bill, because we think the grocers' assistants are in a different class, and they should not come under the working of the Shops and Factory Acts. They are paid so much and have an annual holiday, and all these times they are paid for; and there are many times little things crop up, and the master should not be fined for having them over 30 minutes in his employment after the shop is closed.

Mr. HARTLEY WILSON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

4106. YOU are president of the Liverpool and District Grocers' Association?—Yes.

4107. Could you tell us approximately what the hours are in your district?—They vary. In my own case they are from 73 to 78, according to the districts; but in many districts they would run up as high as from 86 to 90.

4109. Your association, I understand, is in favour of some legislation?—The committee are unanimously in favour of the principle of this Bill.

4110. But there are one or two points in the Bill which you would like to see modified?—Yes; in the first clause the committee thought it should not be left optional with the local authority when a two-thirds majority had been secured.

4111. Did you hear the evidence of the last witnesses, and do you not think that there might be difficulties, perhaps, about the half-holiday which would be a reason for leaving some discretion to the local authority in the matter?—I do not know whether that would apply to the half-holiday. We are not very anxious or concerned about the half-holiday, we are more anxious to see the general hours reduced.

4112. I believe your association would be in favour of a 12 months' limit for reopening the question?—Yes.

4113. So that there should be an interval of a year before the question is so opened?—Yes, so as to save perpetual agitation on the subject.

4114. And I believe that, instead of allowing a majority of one-third to be sufficient for revoking the order, you would wish to make it a clear majority?—Yes.

4115. You approve of the Bill generally; but you would like to see it strengthened in those particulars?—Yes.

4117. And you do not think there would be likely to be any inconvenience to the public generally under the Bill?—No, we do not anticipate any.

4118. Do you see any great difficulty in putting the Bill into operation, or do you think, on the whole, that the clauses are satisfactorily drawn?—I think that it would be adapted to meet the case.

4119. Do you feel any doubt that the local authority at Liverpool would put the Act in operation?—No.

Viscount Cranborne.

4120. Has your association considered the question of areas under the Bill?—We think that there would have to be one general area for the town generally.

4121. The city of Liverpool generally?—Yes, the city of Liverpool generally.

4122. And you would have the question determined by two-thirds of the particular trade over a whole city?—Yes, we think that would be the fairest way of doing it.

4123. I am not familiar with the city of Liverpool, but are there not great differences in the habits of the people in different parts of Liverpool?—Yes.

4124. I suppose that some parts are rich and some parts are very poor?—Yes.

4125. And in some parts of Liverpool the shopping is done early, and in some parts at late hours, I suppose?—Yes; in the centre of the town the Bill would not apply.

4126. How would it not apply?—Because they close now long before any hour that we could anticipate being fixed by the Bill.

4127. But, in some of the poorer districts, I suppose, the people are in the habit of shopping very late sometimes?—Yes.

4128. Would it not interfere with their convenience, do you think, if the shops in those parts of the town were put on exactly the same basis as shops in the centre of the town?—They would not be put on the same basis as shops in the centre of the town; as I have just said, we should not anticipate that.

4129. But, so far as the law is concerned, it would be so?—It would.

4130. You do not anticipate any difficulty in consequence of that?—None at all.

4131. You do not think that, to some extent, it is rather unfair that the grocers, say, in the centre of the town, who are really not concerned in the question at all, should vote and overbear the minority in the poorer parts of the town who are concerned?—No, because the people would shop in their respective neighbourhoods.

4132. I think you did not quite understand my point; you told me that, practically, this Bill would be inoperative as regards the centre of Liverpool, because, as a matter of fact, all the shops there do close early?—Yes.

4133. But you give all these shops that do, as a matter of fact, close early, voting power for the whole city of Liverpool in deciding at what time the poorer shops that do not at present close early should close?—Yes; but I do not think that would affect them, because the people that live in the poorer localities would not go to the centre of the town to shop, and do not go. I am speaking of my own trade.

4134. Your own trade is the grocery trade?—Yes. I am speaking, of course, of the public convenience.

4135. I am speaking, for the moment, of the shopkeepers; under the Bill it requires a two-thirds majority to bring about early closing?—Yes.

4136. That two-thirds majority in the case of the city of Liverpool, under the conditions which you advocate, might be largely formed from grocers living in the centre of the town, might it not?—No, it would not, because there is a very small proportion of grocers in the centre of the town.

4137. Perhaps it is hardly fair to ask you of other trades, but I suppose that could not be said of all trades?—Drapers and other classes of trades besides grocers comprise the majority of the shops in the centre of the town.

4138. I think you see the difficulty I am trying to put to you, that in the centre of the town they do naturally close early, and therefore they would not be interested in any way in the question as to whether the outlying shops should close early or late?—No.

4139. Yet you give them the power to insist upon the tradesmen in the outlying districts closing earlier than they otherwise would?—My answer to that is, that the number of grocers' shops in the centre of the town is so small in comparison with those in the whole of the city as not to influence the question.

4140. So that so far as your trade is concerned it does not become a practical question?—It does not.

4141. I want to ask you now from the point of view of the shopkeepers and of the assistants in shops; do you advocate this Bill upon the ground of health, or upon the ground of re-creation?—Both.

4142. Do you consider the health the most important part?—I think that one is equally important with the other.

4143. Did you hear the evidence of the last witnesses?—Not clearly.

4144. Would you find any difficulty in putting all shops on the same basis with regard to this Bill; the small ones as well as the big ones?—I do not see how the Act could be applied without putting them all on the same basis.

4145. And you do not recognise that there is a difficulty in the case of very small shops?—Yes, I do; but I think this is the only way out of it.

4146. What is the difficulty?—There is a difficulty in classifying the shops, because many of what we call small shops in back streets, or perhaps in a parlour window, or small cellar, sell almost everything; a little hosiery, chips, and bath bricks, and all that kind of thing, and sweets; a little bit of everything that they think they can dispose of; and the difficulty that would arise to my mind is the classifying it as to what kind of shop it would be, whether a greengrocer's, or confectioner's, or a grocer's, or provision dealer's.

4147. Would the town council at Liverpool have to go through every one of those small shops for the purpose of such classification?—The general feeling would be to exclude small shops perhaps of that character.

4148. To exclude them from the operation of the Bill altogether, do you mean?—Yes.

4149. That would be the view of your association, would it?—Yes; that is to say, the very small shops.

4150. Upon what sort of basis would you exclude them; would you say the rateable value?—The Liverpool Association did draft a Bill some years ago in which they put the rateable value as the basis. That would apply to Liverpool, but not generally, I am afraid.

4151. The reason I ask the questions is that I want to put the matter to you in this way: surely the difference of long hours and the bad effect they have upon health applies with much greater force in the case of the small shops than it does in the case of the large ones?—Yes; and on that ground it would be better to include them; but we just see a difficulty in the classification of the small shops.

4152. I understand you to say that you consider that the difficulties of the question are so great that those shops where, from the point of health, reform is most called for would have to be excluded?—I see the difficulty there; but still I think the advantages are so great that they would be wishful to be included.

4153. I understood you, I think, to suggest that they should be excluded below a certain rateable value; is that so?—That is not my own personal opinion, but it is the opinion of my association. I am personally in favour of their being included, and I think they would be included.

4154. You think yourself that, notwithstanding a certain amount of hardship, they must put up with it in order to receive the greater good?—Yes, I think they would receive greater benefit, because these small shops do not do a cash trade as a rule, it is a weekly account, and it is only from the bad habit of the purchasers shopping shopping late, simply because they know the shop is open, that the shops are kept open.

4155. I do not think that you gave to the Right honourable Chairman the particular hours upon the given days in the week in your evidence?—On the first four days of the week we close at 7.30; that is to say, where this voluntary effort has been maintained; on Fridays at 10, and on Saturdays about midnight.

4156. Can you tell me whether the other trades in Liverpool follow the same hours pretty much?—Many of the butchers do.

4157. Not the general trades?—Some of the drapers do, but not generally.

4158. As I understand from you there are two nights in the week when you are open rather late?—Yes; Friday and Saturday.

4159. Is that the case with most of trades in Liverpool?—Yes.

4160. That is the case with every trade, should you say?—Yes.

4161. There is no distinction or difficulty, such as was put to the last witnesses, about a different late hour on different days?—No; the late hours with us are on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Diamond.

4162. If these small keepers were included, you say that, in your opinion, they would not suffer any injury, because they do not do what is called a cash trade?—No.

4163. Their business is credit?—Mostly credit.

4164. Therefore their customers would find no difficulty in shopping at whatever hours they chose, because they would not have to wait for their pay before they went to do their shopping?—No, that would be a matter of arrangement.

4165. So that so far as the convenience of the customers of those people is concerned, and so far as their own interest as traders is concerned, there would be no difficulty?—No, I do not anticipate any.

4166. But the difficulty, you think, would be one of classification?—That is where I see a little difficulty.

4167. Let us go away from those very small shops in cellars or parlour windows for a moment, and go to the grocery and provision merchants. The two trades generally go together, do they not?—Yes.

4168. And under the heading of groceries you find everything sold that would be sold in those little shops, matches and bathbricks, and so on?—Yes.

4169. And under the heading of "provisions" you would find all the things usually sold under that head?—Yes.

4170. Do you not think, therefore, that the small shop, as a general rule, would fall into an easy classification with most of the large shops; that when you go to the very large shops that embrace a number of trades you would be able to put the little man in the cellar, with cabbages and bathbricks in the window, in the same category as the large store that sold everything?—Yes.

4171. Do you not think, then, that on closer examination that difficulty of classification tends rather to disappear?—Yes, it might.

Mr. Diamond—continued.

4172. You spoke about health and recreation. I suppose you would take it for granted that if a man was working 90 and 96 hours a week it could not be a good thing for his health?—Most certainly.

4173. And that if you got those shorter hours for the sake of recreation you would, as it were, be killing two birds with one stone; benefiting his health and giving him recreation at the same time?—Yes.

4174. The two things are synonymous, in fact?—Yes; that is one of the advantages which we think the Bill gives.

4175. With regard to Liverpool and the centre of the town as compared with the suburbs, I think we had a witness from Liverpool some time ago?—Yes, representing the assistants.

4176. Who said it was no infrequent thing in some of the districts adjacent to the docks to find a shop open on Saturday night, if I may so speak, till half-past one on Sunday morning?—Yes.

4177. Do you know anything about that?—In some districts it would be so; I would not say, perhaps, so late as that, but into Sunday, at all events, I should say.

4178. Do you think that that is a matter of necessity?—Not at all; not the slightest; because the working men, even at the docks, are paid at mid-day, and the corporation employés are all paid at mid-day.

4179. Supposing they were not paid till 2, and did not get home till 3 or 4, still you do not think it would be an unreasonable thing to ask that they should do their shopping before 11 o'clock at night, do you?—No; it is the careless and the improvident that leave their shopping till 11, at all events.

4180. The noble Lord asked you a question about the hardship that might be involved in permitting traders in the centre of the town who close early at present to have a voice in determining the hours at which the traders in the suburbs should close their shops; that is to say, the noble Lord thought that there would be an injustice in permitting what we may call the outvoters to come in and swamp the local people, seeing that they have no interests of their own; you say that there are not enough of tradesmen in the centre of the town to appreciably affect that?—I am speaking of my own trade, of course; and I only represent my own trade here.

Viscount Cranborne.

4181. For that very reason I thought it unfair to press you about other trades?—I would not like to speak about others.

Mr. Diamond.

4182. But I suppose you approach this Bill in this way: that either you must have Liverpool treated as a whole or in wards; and the difficulties of treating it by way of wards present themselves in greater number, perhaps, than the difficulties presented by treating it as a whole?—Yes; because in wards a street would be the line of division, and one ward might adopt the Act and the other might not; and it would be a hardship to a shopkeeper on one side of a street that he should come within the Act, and his neighbour on the other side should be left out So we think it would be best for Liverpool to be treated as a whole.

4183. What I want to get at is this: I suppose it is difficult for you to give any accurate information, but do you think that the traders, say the drapers in the centre of Liverpool, who now close early, are so numerous that they would be able to impress their will upon the whole of the rest of Liverpool to make them close earlier than they otherwise would?—My knowledge of the drapers is that those of them who are not in the centre of the town would be only too anxious and glad to be brought under the operation of the Bill.

Viscount Cranborne.

4184. But the point is that there might be always a difference of opinion between one locality of Liverpool and another, and whether the thing was decided or not, might depend upon the votes of persons not directly interested in any way. You do not think so?—I do not think so, because if they are classified as drapers then they would settle the matter for themselves.

Mr. Diamond.

4185. And have a right to vote?—Yes. The difficulty would not arise with regard to the classification of drapers so much as it would with regard to my own trade.

4186. But you do not think that the general consensus of all the grocers in Liverpool, say, taking them as a whole, would be for closing at an unreasonably early hour?—No.

4187. They would, of course, naturally consult their own interests and the convenience of their customers?—Yes.

4188. And you could hardly say that in determining that matter the grocers in a certain portion of the centre of the town should not be allowed to register their vote in regard to that?—Certainly not.

Mr. Lawson.

4189. Would you say that the justification for a Bill of this sort was the excessive hours of labour worked in shops?—Yes.

4190. Do you mean by the hours of labour the hours of active work?—I mean the hours that the shop is kept open.

4191. But so far as the people in it are concerned, do you mean the hours of active work?—The assistant is always engaged in active work so long as the shop is open.

4192. I want to take you to one of these domestic shops you have spoken of, where a woman perhaps sells a variety of goods such as you described: would it not be true to say that in the middle hours of the day hardly anything is done at all?—But she would be busy in the house; and I think it is unfair that she should have to attend to domestic duties, and then when any business has to be done she should have to attend to the shop.

4193. You presume she would be attending to her domestic duties; but there might be no business in the shop during the middle hours of the day, might there not?—Still it would require her attendance in the shop.

Mr. Lawson—continued.

4194. But for practical purposes the shop is kept open because business is done in the evening, and during the middle hours of the day there would be one or two customers and no more?—Yes.

4195. Do you think that the people are actually working during the hours the shop is kept open?—I think they would be. The woman might be working in the house.

4196. In the shop, I mean. I do not mean work in the house making toffee, or anything of that kind?—The shop would require her attendance; it would require looking after.

4197. But she might be sitting there?—Yes, she might; but I think the great evil is the fact that she must be there that long number of hours.

4198. Is she not the best judge of that herself?—She is driven to it by the force of circumstances rather than by her will.

4199. I thought it might be true to say that in the outskirts of towns the shops were kept open to meet the convenience of people?—It is not in the outskirts of the town that it arises. I am speaking not of the centre of the town, but of the town generally, in the small back streets.

4200. But I understand you, in answer to an honourable Member, to say that at the present moment in the central parts of the town the shops do close early?—That is the large shops in the main thoroughfares; but branching from them there would be small side streets with a number of these small shops which are under worse sanitary conditions and are kept open longer hours.

4201. Do you believe that in many cases they would be driven out of existence if they were forced to close early?—No.

4202. Do you not believe that where a man was keeping a shop himself with his family he would resent being compelled to close at early hours?—So far as I have been able to ascertain the opinion of shopkeeepers of that class, I do not think so. Only the other day one of them said to me, "I wish they would include shops like mine;" that was a small shop, where the husband went out to his daily work and the wife attended to the shop.

4203. Has there been any expression of opinion on the part of these small people in Liverpool in favour of this Bill?—No, I think not.

4204. Then you could not say that you have got their opinion?—No, except that when I have come in contact with them I have asked them their opinion, and it has always been in favour of shorter hours.

4205. Is it not mainly really the case of the assistants, the men and women, that has been urged in favour of early closing?—The assistants, of course, are all in favour of it, and have given it their active support.

4206. Would not their case be met by limiting the hours of labour in shops, as in the case of young persons under the last Act?—No, it would not.

4207. Why not?—Because many shops which are in competition with the shops where they have assistants would be excluded.

4208. But

Mr. Lawson—continued.

4208. But they are people working for themselves?—Yes, but still they would have an unfair advantage over their competitors.

4209. Because of their own labour?—Yes, because of their own labour and the labour of their children.

4210. Is it not an extreme thing to tell a man that he is to be prevented from working at a legitimate trade like this, simply because he chooses, for his own purposes, to use his ability late at night?—I think it is no more extreme than that by his selfishness he should keep 100 or 1,000 people in his neighbourhood working long hours.

4211. But they can close if they like?—No, they are driven by the force of circumstances.

4212. They want to make more profit?—They do not want to give their neighbours any advantage.

Dr. Farquharson.

4213. My honourable friend suggested that the people are the best judges of what is best or worst for their health; do you think that is a proposition that would be entertained without some comment?—No, I do not.

4214. Is it not the case that a great deal of our law is framed on the assumption that people have to be protected against themselves?—Yes. I might give you an instance. I knew Liverpool when they used to keep pigs in the back yards and cellars, but the sanitary authority interfered and said that it was not conducive to the general health of the community; and I know that took a good source of revenue from some people.

4215. Is it really a very extreme order to interfere with the right of people to work for hours that may be presumed to be detrimental to their health?—I do not think the hours fixed would be such as to interfere with the comfort or convenience of the people.

4216. My honourable friend asked you about the small shopkeepers working in their shops. Is it the active work that is bad for the people, or is it the fact that they are obliged to sit or stand so many hours in the bad atmosphere?—I take it that it is not the work that is so exceedingly laborious, but the fact that they have to be so many hours at the work.

4217. Perhaps standing, perhaps sitting, waiting for business that may come or may not come, but in any case you would think being in a bad atmosphere is bad for them?—Yes, and I think it has a bad effect on the physical frame that a man should be kept so long at work.

4218. Do you speak from impression or from actual experience on that point?—I can speak from both. I have had both experience and observation upon the point.

4219. What condition of health do you think is engendered by these long hours of work upon men and women?—We do not employ many women in the grocery trade.

4220. Yours is a healthy trade rather, is it not?—It is healthier than most; it is healthier than the drapery trade.

4221. But even in your trade do you think that damage is done to health by long hours?—Yes, I think so.

4222. You told us something about the popular feeling in Liverpool. You are only talking of your own trade, I understand?—Yes.

4223. There have been public meetings in favour of the Bill, we know; but has there been any demonstration of public feeling the other way?—No. I may say that at a public meeting last Monday in one of our largest halls, St. George's Hall, only two hands were held up in opposition to the movement.

4224. And you think that the case was plainly stated, and they knew what was going on?—Yes.

4225. Was the meeting composed both of shopkeepers and shop assistants?—Shopkeepers and shop assistants, and the general public. The tickets were well distributed, and all classes were represented.

Sir Francis Powell.

4226. Can you inform the Committee approximately how many members there are in your association?—There are 156 members, representing between 300 and 400 shops; nearly 400 shops.

4227. What proportion does that bear to the total number of shops in Liverpool?—That would represent about half, I suppose, of the shops of the class I represent.

4228. The grocers?—Yes.

4229. Have there been meetings held of other trades besides yours on the subject in Liverpool?—I am not aware of it.

4230. How do you account for there having been no expression of opinion on the part of other trades?—I am rather surprised myself that there has not been any. The drapers have no association. The chemists, I understand, have an association, and they are taking an expression of opinion, and, I believe, will give evidence before this Committee.

4231. But as to other trades; have you heard of anything being done in that direction?—I have not.

4232. I presume that the hours of closing in Liverpool differ very much in different parts of the town?—Yes.

4233. Do you find that early closing prevails through all the trades in any given district?—In some districts the movement was adopted some five or six years ago, and has been kept up, but it is on such an insecure tenure, that they are afraid every moment it may break down.

4234. Do you consider that a 12 o'clock closing on Saturdays is not wanted, with a view to the convenience of customers?—I think there is no necessity for it.

4235. I presume that those that shop so late on Saturdays are chiefly the working classes?—Chiefly; almost exclusively so.

4236. What hour would you describe as the most convenient hour, having regard to all the circumstances of the case?—I have no authority to speak for the association, but personally, I should say 7 o'clock for the first four nights, 8 on Fridays, and on Saturdays 10 or 10.30.

4237. Are you in favour of a half-holiday?—Personally I am not. We have not discussed that matter.

Mr. Edward Rainbow Hill, called in; and Examined.

Sir Francis Powell.

4238. I believe you are a councillor of the Corporation of Crewe?—Yes.

4239. What is your connection with the Crewe Tradesmen's Association?—I am ex-president.

4240. Who is president now?—A gentleman named Hoptrough.

4241. May I take it that his views and yours agree?—Yes, they do.

4242. You both speak the sentiments of the association?—Yes.

4243. What are the hours of closing at Crewe at the present moment?—Taking my own as a criterion, I will just read them out to you. Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, 8.15.

4244. Does that apply to all trades?—Yes, Fridays, 10.30, Saturdays, 11, and Wednesdays, 2 o'clock.

4245. I presume those hours are fixed by voluntary arrangement?—Yes, that is my own arrangement.

4246. Are those the arrangements usual in Crewe?—Yes, for the largest shops.

4247. How far do you consider those hours satisfactory?—I think we might very well close at 8 on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays; on Fridays we might close at 10, and on Saturdays at 10 or 10.30, and on Wednesdays at 1 o'clock.

4248. An hour shorter, that is to say?—Yes.

4249. What is the reason why you have such a late hour on Saturday?—It is through people who have got into the habit of late shopping.

4250. When are the wages paid in Crewe?—On Friday, at half-past 5 on Friday night; consequently, Friday is a marketing day as well as Saturday.

4251. Have you anything more to say about the hours of closing, or a half-holiday?—No, no more than that we might close an hour earlier on Wednesday.

4252. Are you in favour of compulsory legislation?—Yes.

4253. Have you examined this Bill?—Yes, to a certain extent I have.

4254. Speaking generally, are you in favour of it?—Yes, except the first clause. In a provincial town like ours is, I am afraid there would be a difficulty in getting a two-thirds majority.

4255. Then you think two-thirds is too large a majority?—Yes, in a town like ours.

4256. What would you substitute for it?—I should like to make it compulsory by Act of Parliament, in the same way that public-houses are closed.

Mr. Lawson.

4257. With no majority?—No.

Sir Francis Powell.

4258. But it must be set in motion by a majority. The Bill provides that there are to be two-thirds of the tradesmen who must apply?—Yes.

4259. What is your proposal: that a bare majority would be sufficient?—Either a bare majority or compulsion all round.

4260. A bare majority instead of two-thirds?—Yes, or compulsion all round.

4261. Would you explain what you mean by compulsion all round?—The same as the public-houses.

4262. Then you would not have any initiative at all by the Bill, but would make the law directly operative, as it is now in the case of factories or public-houses?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson.

4263. I suppose that one or two people would have to apply, would they not?—Yes, they would have to apply to the town council.

Chairman.

4264. Then, instead of having a majority of two-thirds you would allow a limited number, such as 10 or 20, to make application?—Yes, to ask for the Act to be put into operation.

4265. Is there any other requirement in the Bill which you desire to draw our attention to?—I think Clause 10 might cause an evasion of the Act.

4266. Would you explain your point?—I have not got the Bill before me, but I think it refers to lodgers.

4267. You object to the exemption?—Yes.

4268. Will you tell the Committee on what ground?—I do not know that it would be carried out openly, but a person might go in a large way into a supposed lodging-house, and supply people in that way.

4269. You think it might lead to a great evasion of the law?—That is what I think.

4270. Then the Bill provides for the possible division of a town into districts; are you in favour of that proposal?—No.

4271. What would be the alternative?—Taking my own town as an instance; one side of the street is what is called the west ward, and the other side is what they call the east ward. The east ward might be in favour of closing, and the west ward might not; they might get a majority in the east ward and not in the west; so that the people on one side of the street in the east ward would be compelled to close, while their opponents on the other side might keep open.

4272. You think, then, that it is fair to have the same regulation over the whole of the town?—Yes.

4273. Would you have any exemption from the operation of the Bill?—No, excepting to purely chemists and druggists.

4274. Those dealing in drugs for medical purposes?—Yes, those only.

4275. Would you have any classification of trades, or would you take all trades as one?—I would take all trades as one.

4276. You would have neither exemption nor classification?—No, because in a provincial town like Crewe we go in for what is called the mixed trade. A grocer will say he is a provision dealer and corn dealer as well as a grocer.

4277. You consider that, in a place like Crewe, great great difficulty would arise from a clause dealing with classification?—It would.

4278. Do you wish to tender any further evidence to the Committee?—Those are the chief points which I have mentioned.

Mr. Tennant.

4279. I should just like to ask you this: you said, at one part of your evidence, that you were in favour of a bare majority regulating the hours of closing, and then you went on to say that, on the application of a few ratepayers, you would like to see it done?—A few tradesmen.

4280. Then you are not in favour of any majority; you withdraw the majority?—Yes, I do withdraw the majority. The best explanation is here: We have something like 400 shops in Crewe; out of those 400 there would only be about 120 of what you would call principal shops, shops where they employ assistants; so that it would be impossible to get the small shops closed.

4281. You mean to say that you could not get a majority?—No.

4282. I am just asking your opinion; do you not think that you might inflict some hardship upon the other people who do not desire to close before half-past 8 or 9, or whatever the time may be, by coercing them to close earlier?—No, I do not think it would be so. It would make very little difference to them in time. People would get into the habit of doing their shopping earlier.

4283. You only speak, I suppose, for Crewe; you cannot speak for other places?—I speak for Crewe, certainly.

4284. You are aware that, by this Bill, it is proposed to deal with not only Crewe, but all parts of the country?—Yes, but I take Crewe as a fair test of a provincial town.

4285. But you are in favour of the whole town being taken as one, and not in districts?—Yes.

4286. Are you aware that there might be some difficulty with regard to other towns, larger towns than Crewe, in making that provision apply to them?—I do not think there would, because the same difficulty would arise if you came to divide them; the wards would divide in some street or other, and one side of the street would be in one ward and another in another.

4287. But could you take a large town like London or Liverpool, for instance, as a whole? No, I do not suppose you could. I speak more of the small provincial towns.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

4289. Therefore, you think that you ought to take the whole of every single trade?—Every single trade; take the whole of the trades in a block.

4290. You think that that would do away with that difficulty?—Yes.

Mr. Lawson.

4291. I understood you to say that you were in favour of closing compulsorily by Act of Parliament?—Yes.

4292. Without reference to the locality; all over the country, and in all trades?—Yes.

4293. All the shops of all trades?—Yes.

4294. And what hour would you fix?—Eight at night.

4295. Is that your own hour?—Yes, it is my hour; but it is not the hour all over the town.

4296. Of course, what might suit Crewe very well might not suit London; it is rather a strong order, is it not, settling the hour in that way?—No; I understood you asked me for our town.

4297. No, I asked for a compulsory hour for the whole country?—No, I could not say that; I cannot fix the London time.

4298. That is for all trades in Crewe?—Yes.

4299. I suppose that would be for the benefit of the big shops?—Yes, it would.

Viscount Cranborne.

4300. You said just now, in reply to an honourable Member, you were afraid that if there were a poll, and the small shopkeepers voted, you would not get a majority in Crewe?—I do not think we should.

4301. What sort of proportion do you think the vote of those in favour of closing would be to those not in favour?—We might get half. I do not know whether we should.

4302. You would not get half as much as they would?—No.

4303. Supposing that there were a poll, they would beat you by two to one in Crewe, would they?—Yes, I think they would. What I mean is that in the small shops there are many men employed in the Crewe locomotive works of the London and North Western Railway Company who keep a small shop at the same time to the detriment of the large traders.

4304. Do you not think that it is rather a startling proposal that one-third of a town should impose its will upon the other two-thirds?—I consider that the one-third would be the legitimate traders.

4305. You said just now, in reply to the honourable Member opposite, that you did not desire to close at 8 all over England and Scotland?—I said I should not like to make such a rule.

4306. Would your proposal be to schedule each town with a special hour opposite?—I think it should be so.

4307. Or would you leave it to the local authority?—I think that power should be given to the local authority to settle that.

Tuesday, 30th April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Baldwin.	Sir John Gorst.
Mr. Cameron Corbett.	Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.
Viscount Cranborne.	Sir John Lubbock.
Mr. Diamond.	Sir Blundell Maple.
Mr. Edwards.	Sir Francis Powell.
Dr. Farquharson.	Mr. Samuel Smith.
Mr. Frederick Frye.	Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS STUBBS, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

4308. YOU are the honorary secretary of the Bolton Drapers' Association?—I am.

4309. And is that an association which fairly represents the trade in Bolton?—The majority of the trade are members of it.

4310. It is an association of the drapers, I understand, not of the assistants?—No, of the drapers themselves.

4311. And it comprises a majority of the drapers in Bolton?—The whole of the principal drapers with the exception of two in the centre of the borough, and many on the outskirts.

4312. Would you favour the Committee with particulars as to the general hours of the trade in Bolton?—The general hours would be from half-past seven in the morning till half-past eight on Mondays and Fridays; Tuesdays and Thursdays, from half-past seven to eight; Wednesdays, from the same time in the morning till one, and Saturdays, from half-past seven to from ten to nearly twelve.

4313. And I believe that your association is of opinion that those hours might be shortened with advantage?—Considerably so.

4314. Your difficulty is that some few stand out?—Yes.

4315. Have you any hopes of being able to shorten the hours materially by voluntary action?—None whatever. We have tried it and utterly failed.

4316. And your association, I understand, is in favour of some legislation?—Very strongly so.

4317. Have they considered the Bill which is now before this Committee?—They have.

4318. And what view do they take of the matter?—They think it is a very reasonable effort to deal with a difficult question; and the only suggestion they would make would be that the same majority should be required to cancel the operation of the Bill as to put it in operation.

4319. I think you mentioned to me in your letter that your members are unanimously in favour of the Bill?—They are; that is the only suggestion they would make of any alteration.

4320. That is to say, for revoking the order; Chairman—continued.

you would suggest that two-thirds should be required for that purpose?—Two-thirds, the same as to put it in force.

4321. And that is the only suggestion that your association wishes to make in regard to the Bill?—Yes.

4322. Do you think that any class of shopkeepers would be injured by a Bill of this kind?—We do not think so.

4323. You do not think that the smaller shopkeepers would suffer?—We do not think so; in fact, the smaller shopkeepers of our association speak very strongly in favour of the Bill.

4324. Now as regards the public, do you think that they would in any way be put to inconvenience by the adoption of a measure of this kind?—We believe they would not be inconvenienced at all.

4325. Has there been any public meeting at all in Bolton on the subject?—Not any, with the exception of the different associations.

4326. But I suppose you are in touch with the people and you know their views?—Yes. I may say that the grocers at their last meeting had this question before them, and a motion was put before the meeting against the Bill; an amendment was moved in favour of the Bill, and it was carried unanimously after a very long discussion.

4327. That was a meeting of the grocers?—Yes.

4328. Therefore we may take it that both the drapers and the grocers in Bolton are in favour of the Bill?—That is so.

4329. That seems to imply that you do not see any difficulty with regard to obtaining the two-thirds requisite for bringing the Bill into operation?—We do not see any difficulty at all.

4330. And have you any doubt that the local authority in Bolton would put it in operation on the application being so made to them?—We believe that they would.

4331. I was rather under the impression that your Trades Council in Bolton was in favour of the

the Bill; you do not happen to know as to that?—I do not happen to know.

4332. I may take it that you, speaking for the Bolton Drapers' Association and, as you believe, also for the grocers, state that in your opinion they are decidedly in favour of this Bill, with the one suggestion of strengthening it as regards revoking the order?—That is so; in fact, I wrote to the secretary of the Grocers' Association to send me a copy of the resolution passed at their meeting; I have his reply if you would like to see it.

4333. If it bears on the point?—(The Witness handed the same to the Chairman.)

Mr. Tennant.

4334. We had a witness from Bolton, I think about a month ago, Mr. Vicar, and he was in favour of including off-licenses in the Bill?—Yes.

4335. May I ask your opinion on that point?—I am not prepared to give an opinion on that point. I do not represent the off-licenses.

4336. You only represent the drapers?—I only represent the drapers.

4337. And you only speak with regard to the drapers?—With regard to the drapers, and also what I know of what the grocers have passed; but on the off-licenses I should not like to give an opinion; I really do not know what their views are.

4338. You know the Bill, I presume; you have studied it?—Yes, I have read the Bill.

4339. What do you think about Bolton with regard to the question of an area; would you consider Bolton one area, or several districts?—One, I should say.

4340. And would your association be prepared to get the opinion of the people all over Bolton?—Oh yes, so far as the drapers and grocers are concerned.

4341. You are in favour of the Bill as it stands?—As it stands, with just the one alteration which I have suggested; that is, that two-thirds should have the power of cancelling instead of one-third.

4342. Do you know Clause 5 of this Bill: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them." Do you think that there would be any difficulty in Bolton in regard to that clause?—In my opinion there would not.

4343. Are there many shops in Bolton in which two or more trades are carried on?—I do not think so.

4344. They are chiefly stores?—Yes, chiefly stores.

4345. Which close earlier now?—Yes.

4346. The Bill would not affect them?—I do not think so.

4347. Do you think that any class of the public would suffer by the passage of this Bill?—I do not think so. They get their wages on Friday early, and they have the whole of Saturday afternoon to do their shopping in, and the mills stop at half-past five every night; it used to be six.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

4348. At what time on Saturday?—Half-past twelve.

4349. Then you do not propose to alter the fines; I see that your colleague from Bolton wanted to make the fines heavier?—I have not gone into that.

4350. What time of day would you propose to adopt for the drapers for closing on the five days of the week, not the half-holiday?—Leaving out Saturday, I should say eight o'clock is quite late enough.

4351. That would be about an hour earlier than is your practice now?—No, half-an-hour earlier.

4352. Only half-an-hour?—Only half-an-hour.

4353. Then you do not think that you would bring about any great revolution in closing by this Bill?—No, I am sure we should not.

4354. Then all you aim at is to get from half-an-hour to an hour more leisure for the shop assistants?—Yes.

4355. And you think that would be a great boon to them?—Yes.

4356. And no detriment to anybody?—No.

Chairman.

4357. Would you not think the half-holiday clause also desirable?—We have it in force as far as the drapers are concerned.

4358. There are several towns that have the half-holiday, but are very anxious to put the clause in for the half-holiday, because they fear losing it owing to the action of a small minority?—We do not fear losing the half-holiday, but approve of the clause.

4359. You are not afraid that a small minority might deprive you of it?—No.

Mr. Lawson.

4360. You are yourself a draper?—Yes.

4361. And you yourself employ assistants?—Yes.

4362. Is your association composed of employers?—Yes.

4363. How many members are there?—Between 30 and 40.

4364. Out of a total number of what?—I cannot give you the total number, but the association comprises the whole of the principal ones, except two.

4365. It mainly consists of the big establishments of your town, I suppose?—No, we have some on the outskirts.

4366. But I mean they are mostly big shopkeepers, men who keep important shops?—Yes; still we have a number of the smaller shops as well; I should think equally divided, half-and-half.

4367. Would it be the case that in your trade, your particular business is more and more tending to go to the bigger shops of late years; you speak for the drapers, I understand?—Yes.

4368. In your trade in particular, is it the case that business is more and more concentrated in big shops?—I cannot say that. I think that the outskirts are doing a very good business just at present; some of the shops are doing remarkably well in the outskirts.

4369. But in the drapery trade there would not

not be many small or domestic shops where a man is working with his family alone?—Keeping the shop, do you mean? No, I do not think so.

4370. In the drapery trade, in most of the shops assistants would be employed?—Yes; there would be a few where the man and wife and family would work, but the principal shops keep assistants.

4371. It would not be fair then to take the drapery trade as representative of the retail trade of your town generally?—What do you mean by that question? I cannot quite follow it.

4372. What I mean is this: in the drapery trade you tell us most of the shops are places where assistants are employed and where business is done on a big scale?—Yes.

4373. In many other trades of course there would be the small shops in the back streets that would be affected by such a Bill as this?—We also have small shops in the outskirts, and they are strongly in favour of the Bill, and spoke in favour of it at the association's meeting.

4374. Those people who employ no assistants?—Yes.

4375. You can say that positively?—I can say that positively; that they have spoken at the meetings of the association strongly in favour of the Bill.

4376. They do not object to being compelled to curtail their own leisure?—They would be only too glad, because it would compel their neighbours as well.

4377. I understand you to say that the artisans in Bolton cease work at half-past five?—Yes; it used to be six.

4378. Under this Bill the shops might be closed at six?—Yes.

4379. Would not that be a very short allowance of time to give to the people for shopping?—We should not think of adopting that.

4380. What hour would you give?—Seven or eight o'clock.

4381. I suppose in the central shops of the town the drapers close altogether?—No, from eight to half-past eight.

4382. And if you closed at eight o'clock it would not make much difference?—To some it might not.

4383. If you do not propose any large difference the matter is not of considerable importance any way, is it?—It would be of importance on the Saturday; some of them do not close till a few minutes to twelve then.

4384. Would you suggest a different hour on Saturday?—Yes, I would suggest ten on Saturday.

4385. But I understand you to say that ten o'clock is the time at which some of them close now?—Yes.

4386. Then it comes to this: that in a great number of instances this Bill would make no difference to your trade?—Yes, it would; there are very few that close at ten on Saturdays and eight on the other days. It would affect the larger number.

4387. This would benefit the smaller as against the larger number of shopkeepers?—I think so; but I am not sure that I understand your question properly.

4388. You have told us that a certain number, you say a smaller number, already close on weekdays at eight and on Saturdays at ten; supposing that this Bill were in force, you would very likely adopt those hours for closing?—Yes.

4389. Then the question I put was this: is it not for the benefit of the smaller number who close at those hours, by compelling the larger number of shopkeepers in that trade to fall in with them?—I do not think it would make any difference at all.

4390. That contradicts your former answer?—No, I did not take it in that way. I understand you to say now that it would be for the benefit of their business; I do not think so. I do not think the larger shopkeepers that close now at ten o'clock would benefit in their business.

Chairman.

4391. Your meaning is that the closing of the larger number would give no unfair advantage to the remainder?—My contention is that we have a smaller number that now close at ten on Saturdays; if the Bill is put in force and forces the others to close at ten, these few would not benefit in their business by it, because the customers would not be driven to them; they would still go to the small shopkeepers on the outskirts that now keep open later.

4392. Nobody would be inconvenienced by it?—I do not think so.

Mr. Lawson.

4393. But I suppose the wish is father to the thought?—I do not think so.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

4394. What is the latest closing that you have now in Bolton in your trade?—Well, I should think half-past nine on a week-night, and say at a few minutes to twelve on the Saturday night, and others in the same trade close at ten, and half-past ten, and eleven.

Mr. Alfred Charles Wootton, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

4395. You are the editor of "The Chemist and Druggist" newspaper?—Yes.

4396. You have paid a great deal of attention to this subject?—Yes, some.

4397. For some years now?—Yes.

4398. When this Bill was first drafted it was thought that it might be desirable to exclude the chemists on the ground of their trade standing in a different position from that of others, but you yourself suggested, I think, that there was no necessity for taking that course, and you issued a circular inquiring the opinion of the chemists throughout the country?—I think I asked you, first of all, what your reason was for excluding them. I had no feeling in my own mind one way or the other.

Chairman—continued.

Chairman—continued.

4399. And the result of our conversation was that you issued a circular to the trade generally throughout the kingdom; would you, if you have it on record, inform us what the result of that inquiry was?—Yes; we issued 10,000 voting-papers throughout the United Kingdom, that covering pretty fairly the whole of the chemists and druggists in the United Kingdom, and the result was that out of the 10,000 we had 2,227 votes; of these 1,330 were in favour of compulsory closing, 734 against it, and 163 neutral. That was at the end of 1886.

4400. You have now I believe issued another circular in certain towns?—I have.

4401. Which towns did you select for inquiry?—Liverpool, Birmingham, and Brighton.

4402. You thought that Liverpool, Birmingham, and Brighton might be taken as fairly representative of the views of the trade throughout the country?—Yes, fairly typical.

4403. And will you kindly state to the Committee what the result of that inquiry has been?—We issued postcards addressed to ourselves on which they were asked to state, either, "I am opposed to the principle of the above Bill," or, "I am in favour of the principle of the above Bill."

Viscount Cranborne.

4404. "The above Bill" being this Bill?—The Shops (Early Closing) Bill.

Chairman.

4405. I think you stated in your circular the provisions of the Bill?—We sent a reprint of the Bill and a postcard with the request that they would put on it either "I am opposed to the principle of the Bill," or, "I am in favour of the principle of the Bill." We sent 206 to Liverpool, 205 to Birmingham, and 71 to Brighton; that was as near as we could get them the whole of the chemists in business in those towns. The replies up to this morning have shown the following results: Liverpool, 106 for, 10 against, three neutral. Birmingham, 101 for, 11 against, six neutral. Brighton, 36 for, six against, three neutral.

4406. That makes 243 in favour?—Two hundred and forty-three in favour, 27 against, and 12 neutral. Besides at the same time in the Journal we suggested that people in other places might, if they would, express their opinions to us, and within the last week or 10 days we have received 43 letters or post-cards in favour of the Bill and three against it.

4407. And the readers of your paper have had the subject of the Bill called to their attention more than once?—Yes.

4408. So you think if they had felt strongly against it they would probably have communicated with you on the subject?—I should think so.

4409. Do you think that we might take it that these answers in all probability fairly represent the views of the trade generally throughout the country?—I cannot see any reason why they should not.

4410. And by the use of the night-bell in your opinion the provision with regard to the power of selling after hours meets any difficulty with regard to the selling of medicines after the shop is shut?—Yes.

4411. You do not think that there would be any inconvenience either to the public or to the chemist if this Bill were adopted?—I do not wish to speak as an advocate either way; I am merely conveying the votes that we have; I do not feel that I am in a position to express an opinion on the Bill.

4412. At any rate you have no suggestion to make with regard to the clause dealing with your business?—No.

Viscount Cranborne.

4413. Have your society considered the provisions of this Bill?—I represent no society.

4414. Then have you no opinion to give the Committee as to the operation of the clauses of the Bill?—There is one clause, the clause, I think, is No. 5, which compels a shop where two or more trades are carried on, if they touch one, to close the other trades; as that stands I think it is quite impossible to carry it out.

4415. Does that affect the chemists?—It would affect the chemists in this way: that suppose two-thirds of the chemists were to vote for the Bill, it seems to me that it would force all grocers to close, because they all sell drugs more or less.

4416. So far as the chemists overlap the grocers they would have to vote together?—Yes; but then it would follow with drapers and nearly all other trades; the drapers largely sell patent medicines now.

4417. What part of England do you know best, or are you a Londoner?—I have lived in London for a good many years.

4418. It has been suggested by other witnesses that, as a matter of fact, all the trades generally close at about the same time; that public opinion in favour of early closing is about the same for all trades in a particular locality?—Perhaps so.

4419. Supposing, as a matter of fact, it should be found that the chemists and druggists and grocers desire to close earlier on different days?—The effect of this Bill would be to make a compulsory closing.

4420. On another point, has your attention been drawn to Clause 9 which deals specially with the chemists?—Yes.

4421. It says in that clause that a chemist "shall not be liable to any fine under this Act for supplying medicines, drugs," &c., "but this section shall not be deemed to authorise a pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist to keep open shop after the said hour;" what is your conception of keeping open shop; what is meant by those words?—I should say that either the front door is closed and they have to apply at a side door, or that they have to ring at the front door.

4421*. But in any case I suppose that the drugs and medicines would be sold in the shop?—Oh, yes.

4422. Therefore in that sense the shop would be opened for medicines and drugs to be sold there?—Yes.

4423. And a customer having come in to ask for a rhubarb pill might also buy other things, I suppose?—When he got in.

4424. Would he have to say at the door I want to buy a rhubarb pill?—No, I should think not; but in chemists' shops there is a great difference in the amount of night business done.

4425. Anybody might buy anything they liked?—If the chemist chooses to sell it.

4426. And on Sundays?—And on Sundays.

4427. Any chemist could supply goods which were not medicine even though this clause were to become law?—Yes.

4428. What is the advantage of the law when anybody could break it if he likes?—The clause might be taken advantage of in that way. It would be possible to put in a clause to prevent that, but I do not think it would be practicable if a man once gets in the shop to prevent him buying something else.

4429. I was once in Edinburgh on Sunday and wanted some tooth power, and I bought it. The shop was what you would call not open; would a clause in this Bill prevent that?—How do you mean "not open."

4430. It had shutters?—Did you ring at the door, may I ask?

4431. No, I opened the door and went straight in and said, "Can you give me tooth powder;" under this clause would that be prohibited?—That is a question for the Court to decide; probably that clause would cover it.

4432. I mean is there any machinery for preventing or any possibility of preventing such a state of things even supposing it did pass?—I should think not.

4433. What is the use of the clause at all?—Because it would prevent the chemist from having his shop widely open, and evidently inviting customers as at present. When you went to that shop in Edinburgh, for instance, you had to open the door.

4434. So I have in winter in all shops?—It depends upon how it is closed, but if the gas is burning, and the shop is evidently doing business, you cannot call that closed.

4435. There is really no coercive power in this clause at all, as a matter of fact; I do not mean theoretically, but in practice?—I see a distinction between a shop open and a shop not open.

4436. There is no coercive power, no possibility under the clause to control a chemist who desired to break the law?—Not under that clause.

4437. I will ask another question: Suppose we take the case of a chemist who desires to obey the law, how is he to know where the line is to be drawn between drugs and medical appliances and other things which chemists sell; how is he to know that; is there a broad distinction between eau de cologne, for instance, and drugs?—No. Your tooth powder would have been a drug; I think they would have considered it so.

4438. And a tooth brush, is that a medical appliance?—Yes.

4439. In fact you would probably agree with me that there would be a necessity for more definition in this clause if it is to work at all. Acid drops are sold by some chemists, jujubes by nearly all; are they drugs?—I think under that clause the chemist would sell them, and if he fairly closed his shop, if you had to go to the side door (or if the man has not a side door of course you must go to the front door), he would not be breaking the law.

4440. At any rate if he had done that he would have complied with the Act?—Yes.

Chairman.

4441. Would you look at Clause 9 of the Bill; the honourable Member asked you whether you did not think that practically that would not be coercive. But Clause 9 is entirely a relaxing clause?—Evidently.

4442. The object of Clause 9 is that whereas any other shopkeeper selling anything after a certain time would be liable to a fine, the chemist is exempted if he sells medicine or medical appliances?—Yes.

4443. Therefore Clause 9 is not a coercive clause, but a relaxing clause so far as a chemist is concerned?—I think so.

4444. And though there might be a border line on which it is difficult to say whether a thing is a drug or a luxury, do you consider that there would be no practical difficulty of importance arising out of it at all?—I think a chemist would read this clause as allowing him to sell practically everything in his shop; that is what a chemist might think; I do not say that is what a judge might think.

4445. But do you think that there would be any great practical difficulty arising from allowing chemists to sell drugs and medical appliances after hours?—No, not in the cases of chemists who do a really pharmaceutical business; there might in the case of chemists who are really more grocers than chemists, and there are such.

4446. But you do not think that the business would be of a magnitude to interfere with the general operation of the law?—No.

4447. In that case there might be a theoretical difficulty, but not a practical one?—I should think it would not be a practical difficulty.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

4448. Do you think that chemists are practically thoroughly acquainted with the distinction between closing the shop, except for having the night bell, and having the shop open?—Yes, I think they have a clear idea of what that means.

4449. And having a perfectly clear idea of the distinction between closing the shop and being able to give medicines on an emergency, and having the shop open their answers imply that they think it would be a very good thing if they were compelled to close their shop at a certain hour?—Their vote seems to imply that.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

4450. You have spoken of the canvass you took on a previous Bill?—On Sir John Lubbock's previous Bill.

4451. In that canvass you had only a bare majority of the votes given in favour of the Bill?—One thousand three hundred and thirty against 734.

4452. With a certain number of neutrals?—One hundred and sixty-three.

4453. Out

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson—continued.

4453. Out of 10,000?—Those were the answers we got.

4454. In the last case you sent out a polling paper with regard to the principle of the Bill, did you not?—Yes.

4455. You did not define the principle?—No, we sent with it the provisions of the Bill, and at the same time a short article commenting on it.

4456. It is possible, is it not, that anybody reading that paper may have imagined that the principle was closing the shops earlier than at present?—It is not possible if he read it.

4457. What would you define the principle of the Bill to be?—The power of coercion.

4458. You did not state that, did you?—Yes.

4459. I understood you to say the only question was, "Are you in favour of the principle of the Bill"?—No, that was the vote on the card that they sent back to us; "I am opposed," or "I am in favour of the principles of the Bill," but that was the article published with it (producing the same).

4460. Did you in any way define what you considered the principle of the Bill to be?—Yes, we did; we did it in our previous notes and in this note too.

Chairman.

4461. Did you send a reprint of the Bill?—Yes, a reprint of the Bill.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

4462. You are in favour of closing chemists' shops absolutely at a certain hour?—No, I did not say I was in favour of that.

4463. You are not in favour of Clause 9 as it stands in the Bill?—Yes.

4464. And do you think that would be sufficient to give the necessary facilities for buying drugs and medical appliances?—I think so. I am neither opposed to it nor in favour of it, but as editor of the Journal, I merely state the result of the vote that we took.

4465. Do you consider that any difficulty would arise to the public from closing chemists' shops, or putting up the shutters at a certain time?—I do not see why so long as it was a reasonable time.

4466. Of course, prescriptions have to be made up at any hour?—Yes, Clause 9 would allow that.

4467. Would things go on just as they are now?—Well, it is to be hoped that they would get a little more leisure at night, that is all, the proprietors and assistants.

4468. But if prescriptions could be made up, if Clause 9 would enable that to be done, where would the difference come in?—At present in large shops, where several assistants are kept, one stays in after the shop is closed, one or more if it is a large business, and so they would have to do under any circumstances.

4469. That is my question; I really wanted to know what you thought would be the difference?—The general public would not come into the shop at those late hours.

4470. But you say that they would have to keep, perhaps, two assistants specially for the night-bell?—They would have to keep someone in always where there is a large prescription business.

Chairman.

4471. If there were several assistants, they would all be let out except one?—Yes; or in larger businesses, more than one.

Mr. Tennant.

4472. Is it the fact now that there is always someone on the premises of a chemist's and druggist's shop even at night ready to answer the night-bell?—Not invariably.

4473. But most of us have had experience of going out late at night for something we want for a sick person; you can nearly always get into a chemist's shop?—In a large chemist's shop, but there are many where you cannot get in.

4474. You think there are many where it is impossible to get anything late at night?—There are many where no one lives on the premises.

4475. So that, so far as that point is concerned, you do not think that the passage of this Bill would make any alteration in the existing practice?—I presume if it had any effect at all it would make a fixed time for closing; that would be a difference.

4476. What you might call partial closing. From your answers to Lord Cranborne, I understood you did not think that the door would be shut any more than the door of this room is shut, you would always have somebody there?—Generally, they would have to ring a bell. Generally, the assistant is in a private room; he is not at work in the shop after the closing hours, and a customer has to ring a bell and fetch him to the door.

4477. That is the practice at night after a certain time?—Yes.

4478. And that would be the practice after the closing hour fixed by the Bill; is that so?—I presume so.

4479. Now, to go to another point, have you experience chiefly of London or of any other towns also?—Yes, but it is a long while ago since I had experience in the country.

4480. Then do you consider that this Bill is required by the people in the country, or is its application more required for London and large towns?—There are some localities where it would not be suitable at all.

4481. Then you imagine, I suppose, that in those places the requisite two-thirds majority could not be obtained?—No, I am confident of that. For instance, a chemist wrote to me from somewhere near Piccadilly pointing out how impossible it would be to close early round there. It is pretty obvious that they do a lot of business at night, and I presume the chemists there would not propose it.

4482. Do you think that applies to any other trade in the same area?—I should think so. I am not an authority on other trades, but I should think it would.

4483. You only speak for chemists and druggists?—Yes.

4484. Then, do you think that might apply to some particular districts in the richer parts of other large cities, Glasgow, Liverpool, or Manchester?—No, I am speaking of this district as a district where people when they come out of theatres often buy things; at any rate, it is the fact that in the theatre district of London, as I may call it, there is a good deal of shopping done late at night, buying eau-de-cologne, perhaps, and I do not know what; not much in the way of medicine.

4485. London has no monopoly of theatres; there are other towns with theatres, and the principle might be applicable to such towns?—It might, only in those cases, if it were so, I presume there would not be a two-thirds majority in favour of closing.

4486. Still, it is possible that there might be a two-thirds majority, if you had a very large area which included not only the theatre district, but a larger district; is that possible?—Yes. That question of area is, of course, an important one.

4487. What is your view of the question of area?—I have not formed any view.

4488. For the purposes of London, for instance, have you formed any opinion?—Generally, I should say that the shops in the theatre district require to be open longer than in the City, for instance.

4489. What do you mean by the theatre district; you have theatres in Sloane-square and the Strand, and you have the Surrey Theatre, that is a considerable area; are you going to make that all one?—I am speaking of the Strand and round about Leicester-square.

4490. You think that that ought to be all one area, the parts in and around the Strand and Leicester-square?—I am scarcely prepared to define an area, but obviously an Act of this kind which applied to one part of London would not do for another altogether. The East End and the West End have different habits.

4491. And the local authority would have to say what the area shall be?—Yes.

4492. And the local authority may have other things to do and not have formed an opinion on that question; how do you suggest getting over that difficulty?—I think I could draw up an area map of London if I were required to do so which would be fairly reasonable.

4493. Supposing you did that you would have to have certain streets to bound certain areas?—Yes, there would be difficulties. There would be sure to be.

4494. You admit that there would be difficulties?—Yes.

4495. You think that possibly some hardships might be created by one trade shutting earlier in one area than in the other, letting the shops on one side of the street be open when the others were closed?—It is quite possible.

4496. But do you think it would really be a great hardship or not?—I really cannot express an opinion as to what would result.

4497. Would the chemists, so far as you know, resent very much having to close their shops at an earlier hour on one side of the street than those on the other?—Yes; I think every individual who objected to close would resent being forced to close.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

4498. Even though he might have voted in favour of early closing?—I suppose he would not vote in favour of early closing if he were not prepared to go with the majority in early closing. I should think that any of these men who voted with us in favour of the principle of the Bill would be ready to vote in the two-thirds majority.

4499. Having voted in the two-thirds majority, presumably he would loyally abide by that decision when it was arrived at?—Yes.

4500. Do you think he would resent having to close his shop when the man opposite was not compelled to close his?—If that occurred I suppose the two-thirds majority would dwindle down and the coercion would be withdrawn.

4501. In other words there would not be a two-thirds majority?—I do not think so.

4502. Still, you have to have a trial; you cannot tell without that?—No.

4503. I mean the first time this vote is taken it is an experiment?—Quite so.

4504. And it is conceivable that such a state of things as we have been discussing should occur?—Yes.

4505. And that there might be hardships?—That there might be complaints and difficulties.

4506. And you have not got any suggestion to make to the Committee by which that might be overcome?—No.

Dr. Farquharson.

4507. Are you in favour of reconsidering from time to time the decision of the locality about early closing, that is to say, if you got a two-thirds majority in favour of early closing to-day, would you be inclined to reconsider it to-morrow or the day following if the necessity arose?—Within a reasonable time, yes.

4508. If you found it did not work then you could go back and take another vote?—Certainly.

4509. Then I understand that, speaking generally, the chemists and druggists are in favour of earlier closing?—It appears so from the votes that we took.

4510. Are their hours oppressive and long?—Yes.

4511. Would you say that the business of a chemist and druggist was one that involved a great deal of strain on the attention of those engaged in it?—Yes.

4512. And that is one reason why you think they ought to get relief of that sort?—Yes.

4513. Would it be a fair way of putting it that, according to your plan, in place of a shop having 20 assistants working on Sundays, or very late hours on Mondays and Tuesdays, you would have only one or two, and thereby 18 would get relief?—We would only employ after hours the number necessary to meet cases of emergency.

4514. In fact, your position is very much like that of a medical man?—Yes, very much.

4515. And you are liable to be called upon on an emergency by the public?—Yes.

4516. And under those conditions you have to have one man waiting on guard, if I may put it in that way?—Yes.

4517. It is not necessary that he should sit in the

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

the shop waiting to serve the noble Lord with tooth powder or eau de cologne?—No.

4518. He might be upstairs or in a back shop with a newspaper?—Yes.

4519. And then the door would be ajar, or in some places, I think you say, people would have to ring a bell?—Yes, in most cases.

4520. That is like what it is in medical practice; the doctor is inside and liable to be summoned?—Yes. After the chemist has closed his shop he does not wish customers to come; they are rather a nuisance.

4521. Now, how would this Bill affect the practice of medical men who keep what is called an open surgery, which is very common in England; would a medical man, keeping an open surgery and supplying his own drugs, be obliged under the Bill to shut in accordance with the two-thirds majority?—I suppose so.

Sir Francis Powell.

4522. How do the hours of chemists' shops with regard to their closing compare with the hours of other shops?—I should think they are one or two hours later on the average.

4523. What is the reason of that extension of hours?—I think it is an old tradition that a chemist ought to be open later.

4524. Is that done with a view to the purely pharmaceutical business?—It is difficult to say how it has grown up. There is, as you know, a certain demand for medicines at night as well as in the daytime, and some chemists prefer to keep their shops open rather than to have this night-bell ringing. If one does, another feels he has to.

4525. And keeping the shop open for an hour or two will prevent interruption at a later hour?—It is thought so.

4526. Is that the view of the trade?—It is a very old system, the keeping of chemists' shops open so late. I should not like to say how it grew up.

4527. Do you find that the custom of combining other trades with the trade of a chemist is growing or not growing?—The system is growing of other traders selling drugs and medicines, but I do not think that the system of chemists selling groceries or such goods is growing.

Dr. Farquharson.

4528. A country grocer now keeps a pharmaceutical assistant, does he not?—A few large ones do, and those that have formed themselves into companies.

Sir Francis Powell.

4529. Do chemists open later than other shops?—In the morning do you mean. No, about the same time.

Chairman.

4530. You published an article on the subject of early closing in "The Chemist and Druggist" of the 20th of this month?—Yes.

4531. Will you hand it in?—Yes.

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

4532. I see in the article you question the majority in the Bill, and you say, "Perhaps two-thirds is not a large enough majority, at all events to begin with." It is open to doubt whether in a town where there are 15 chemists 10 of these should have the power to coerce the other five?—At all events to begin with.

4533. That was sent out with the polling cards?—Yes.

4534. Then, of course, the principle of the Bill must allow a great latitude to those voting?—That is why I say that we did explain the principle of the Bill. I regard the principle of the Bill as being the power to enforce early closing.

Chairman.

4535. You also sent, as I understand, the Bill itself?—Yes; we sent the Bill, all except the one or two clauses, like the date of coming into operation.

4536. All the important clauses, I mean?—All the important clauses.

4537. And you think, therefore, that they perfectly understood what the general proposals of the Bill are?—They must have understood.

4538. As regards the areas, the Bill leaves the question of areas very much to the shopkeepers themselves and the local authorities?—Yes.

4539. Do you not think it better to leave the matter in that way rather than to attempt to define the exact areas by Act of Parliament?—I feel that that question of areas is a difficulty, and must be a difficulty.

4540. It is a difficulty in any case?—In any case.

4541. Do you think it would be impossible in an Act of Parliament, particularly in the case of London, to define the areas?—Yes.

4542. Therefore, you approve of the way in which that question is dealt with by the Bill?—Yes.

Mr. EDWARD GOULD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Tennant.

4543. YOU are Her Majesty's Superintending Inspector of Factories?—I am.

4544. And as such you are responsible for seeing that the provisions of the Factory Acts are carried out, and that overtime is not worked by protected classes?—That is so.

4545. You have examined this Bill, have you not?—I have.

4546. Would you give the Committee generally your views upon the provisions of the Bill?—I suppose I may ask one question first; that is to say, is it intended to apply to all shops irrespective of the class of hands who are employed in the shop.

4547. That is so?—I think the first sub-section of the first clause is exceedingly good; as to the second sub-section, with regard to six o'clock, there seems to be to my mind a little doubt, because there are so many places in poor neighbourhoods where the shopping cannot be done by six o'clock.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

4548. You think that that hour should be extended?—I think so.

4549. Would you suggest something?—I think I should suggest eight o'clock. You see so many people of the working classes do not leave their work till six and sometimes not till seven o'clock, and they would have no opportunity practically of buying their little stores until after that hour.

4550. But from your experience do you consider that most of the shopping is done by the working men or rather by their women kind?—The women undoubtedly do the shopping, but then they have to wait for the money; the late night is always the night on which the wages are paid.

4551. That is the end of the week?—That is the end of the week.

4552. They are generally paid on Friday or Saturday?—That is so, and a great deal of the shopping is done on the Saturday night between nine and eleven o'clock in the poor neighbourhoods.

4553. Then do you think that it would be advisable to try and make that shopping a little earlier, to close the shops at half-past nine or ten on Saturdays?—I think ten o'clock might be a fair compromise, but I think they should have one night a week late, as late as ten o'clock at least.

4554. Then with regard to Clause 4 of the Bill, do you approve of that clause as to classification of shops?—Yes, I do; but the only question that arises in my mind is as to what "central authority" is referred to.

4555. It has been suggested by the Local Government Board, and has been practically agreed upon by the Home Office, that the central authority should be the Home Office?—I ask that question, because otherwise there would seem to be some dual authority in the matter.

4556. Do you think that practicable from your point of view as an inspector of factories?—I see no reason against it, as it says further on that the police should be the individuals entrusted with the administration of the Act, and as they are practically under the Home Office, if the classification were under the Local Government Board you would get a dual authority at once, which I think undesirable.

4557. The only dual authority you would have would be outside London, where you would have the local authority putting the Act in force, and in the event of a dispute reference would have to be made to the central authority, namely, the Home Office?—Quite so.

4558. Of course you know the local authorities are not under the jurisdiction of the Home Office?—No.

4559. But you do not see any objection to that particularly?—None whatever.

4560. Then with reference to Clause 5, which relates to shops where trades of two or more classes are carried on, do you consider that their might be hardships in having to shut up shops altogether at earlier hours owing to this provision?—You mean such a condition of things as where a man with a barber's shop sells other articles?

4561. Yes, or even larger shops where they sell everything?—General shops.

4562. Yes?—I think there might be some difficulty arising there. If you have a grocer who sells articles of drapery, for instance, and so forth.

Sir J. Blundell Maple.

4563. Or boots and shoes?—Yes.

Chairman.

4564. Do not those large shops now close earlier?—On one day in the week.

4565. That is the half-holiday, but apart from the half-holiday do not large shops generally close earlier?—That is so generally in London.

Sir J. Blundell Maple.

4566. But are not the general shops in the country small shops?—Yes.

Mr. Tennant.

4567. Have you much experience in the country of small shops which sell a great many different articles?—Yes, one sees that constantly.

4568. Do you think they might be injuriously affected by such a provision as this?—I should be afraid that they might be.

4570. May I ask you this question: do you think that a Bill of this character, namely, the local option character, would be more effective and generally preferable to one which contained a provision by which it should be made illegal for any shop to be open for more than say 12 hours in a day, or rather for any one to be employed for more than 12 hours in a day?—Yes, I think it would.

4571. You think that this Bill is preferable?—I think that this Bill is preferable to a hard and fast line.

4572. And more effective and more easily carried out?—Yes, in my opinion because in different localities you find there is generally a consensus of opinion as to what is the best time to stop, and very few people would hold out if the others closed, in the country especially.

Sir J. Blundell Maple.

4573. If the generality close those others follow suit?—Almost always.

Mr. Tennant.

4574. I want to ask your opinion with regard to the first clause, if you will look back to that. The wording of the clause is "shops within the district or any part of the district;" we have taken a considerable amount of evidence before the Committee, and we have had some difficulty in seeing how that might work; you are aware probably of the argument, that in a large place like like London you would have to have a street dividing two different districts or parts of a district, and it might be that you would have certain shops open on one side of the street and closed on the other; I should like to know your opinion, whether you think that would be a hardship. You see, you might get a two-thirds majority in one area and not in another?—Then, excuse my asking, what is your unit as part of the district?

4575. We have not got one; that is left to the local authority; it might be a parish or a ward?—I think that might be a hardship if you were to make your "part" of a district too small.

4576. Do you think it would be practicable in London to unify London, to make one area, or would the east and the west clash?—I think the East End shopping, so to speak, is carried on on an entirely different system from that in the west. The West End establishments almost always close at seven o'clock, hardly ever later.

4577. We have just had a witness here who tells us that chemists and druggists in and around Piccadilly would not close before ten or eleven o'clock. That is a special trade you would say?—Yes. I was not thinking of the chemists; that is so, no doubt.

4578. But you think it would be impossible to treat London as one district?—I do.

4579. You would have to divide it up, and in order to divide it up you would have to make certain streets the line of demarcation?—If you have certain districts, of course the districts must be bounded in some way.

4580. Have you any suggestion to make to the Committee by which that difficulty might be lessened?—I think you might divide London for practical purposes into, say five, six, seven or eight districts, such as Chelsea and Fulham; we will take these two as being poor neighbourhoods; then we will take Whitechapel, which is entirely a place sui generis; the West End would probably be the West End that is considered as such; and then Soho, there are a different class of people there also.

4581. In the north?—In the north, such as Islington and Hoxton.

Sir J. Blundell Maple.

4582. Are there not small shops in the West End?—You do find them, but not to the same extent.

Mr. Tennant.

4583. Do you consider that by the provisions of this Bill the small shopkeepers would be hit hardly at all?—I think if you gave them one late night a week to keep their shops open till ten o'clock, that would almost meet the case; but I think six o'clock would be too early in many cases.

4584. And, generally speaking, you think that a Bill of this kind would be a great boon to the working classes and to the shop assistants generally?—I think it would be an immense boon to the shop assistants.

4585. And not be an inconvenience to any section of the public?—Not after the first few months, or a year or two; it would gradually get into shape. I do not see that there would be any serious disadvantage to the shopping class.

4586. From your knowledge of the conditions of labour, would you say that there is a great difference in different parts of the country in the time at which artizans and labourers leave off work?—Yes; in the North of England, for example, the work is generally done from six to six, and in other parts of the country from seven to seven; in other parts from eight to eight.

4587. In your opinion, is it essential to the working of this Bill that no time should be fixed too early to allow of the artizans and labourers themselves shopping after they have had their evening meal?—I think so, certainly.

4588. Is that the reason that you advocate putting in eight instead of six as the optional hour?—Yes.

4589. And you do not think that the Bill ought to pass without that amendment?—That is my opinion certainly, for what it is worth.

4590. Are you particularly acquainted with London?—Yes, I have been in London for a good many years.

4591. Is it the case that the hours of labour vary very much in different parts of London?—Well, six to six, seven to seven, and eight to eight are the general hours; eight to eight predominates, I think.

4592. From your knowledge, is it the case that more and more working people in London go to the outskirts to live?—Undoubtedly.

4593. Therefore, to enable a man to shop near his own home, you would have to allow the time for going and coming?—Yes.

4594. That necessitates a later hour in many districts in London?—Yes, that is a condition which adds to the force of my idea on the subject.

4595. Are you aware that the Bill might be applied by the County Council to the whole area of London?—That had not struck me, but I presume it could be.

4596. Do you think that that would be an inequitable arrangement, one that would be inconvenient to working people?—I think it would be inconvenient to a section of the people of the working classes in different districts.

4597. Dealing with London, do you think it possible that the local authority in the different districts and parishes might be a preferable authority to the County Council?—I think so; they would know more about the peculiar wants of their districts.

4598. Therefore, you are in favour of amending the Bill to that extent, striking out the County Council and substituting the district authorities?—Yes.

Sir J. Blundell Maple.

4599. That would mean, would it not, dividing London into an enormous number of districts?

Mr. H. L. W. Lawson.

4600. The Parliamentary boroughs in London are some 58; of course, you are aware that that produces sometimes very anomalous results in London, because of the curious way it is carved out?—No doubt that is so, that is a difficulty.

4601. Would you be in favour of restricting the operation of the Bill to shops where two or more assistants were employed, for example?—No, I do not see that. It would be just as hard upon one assistant to be employed long hours.

4602. You would apply it to a shop where any assistant is employed?—Yes.

4603. But take the case of a domestic shop, where a man is working with his family, is it not almost an unprecedented legislative interference, as far as you know, to stop that man in the exercise of his power of working if he chooses?—Yes, it is; but the family appears to me to be rather a different condition of things; I mean it is a different thing for a man to employ his own family from what it is for a man to employ his hired assistant. At the same time, to allow the man and his family to keep the shop open would give them an undue advantage.

4604. Would you say that a very strong case, on grounds of health, should be made out before you interfere with a domestic shop of that kind?—I should say so undoubtedly; but the difficulty is that you give him an undue advantage over his neighbour.

4605. Yes, but at the same time the only way of avoiding that is to prevent this man himself working in what may be a healthy and is certainly a legitimate trade?—That is so.

4606. Though the conditions may be perfectly healthy, so far as you know, in certain cases?—Yes.

4607. Have you really considered the alternative proposal, to extend the Shop Hours Regulation Act to adults; you know Sir John Lubbock's Act in regard to shop hours?—Yes.

4608. Have you considered the question of extending that Act to adults and so meeting the difficulty of excessive hours; that Act only applies to young persons, and limits their hours to 74 hours a-week; it has been proposed by some people to make that applicable to all persons working in shops; what do you say to that?—I am not prepared to answer that question.

4609. If you have not considered it you could hardly say that you have really considered the question in all its bearings?—Well, that is so; I have not, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. Edwards.

4610. But you are strongly of opinion that it is well to close shops earlier than they are generally closed now?—I think so.

4611. You say that one or two would not hold out against it; is that your opinion?—I think that the minority would very soon submit to the general wish of the majority in such cases, but, of course, I have had no experience of that; it is merely an opinion.

4612. We have had evidence that that is not so. You were speaking of the difficulty of shops having various departments, grocery and drapery, for instance; is that really a serious difficulty in the Bill, such a state of things occurring; is not that generally in the case where there are large shops?—In the case of stores.

4613. Or in the case of tradespeople who are well-to-do, who are doing a good business, and who add to their business by keeping a number of departments?—That is so; but in the case of large establishments my experience is that they are not kept open late.

4614. No, they close early, therefore that is no objection to the Bill, no practical difficulty?—No.

4615. And have you experience in small towns?—Yes.

4616. You do not often find that such shops keep open late?—Yes, what we call general shops; grocers, who sell almost everything.

4617. But such shops would be better than their neighbours' shops; I mean that where there are such cases the Bill does not inflict any hardship upon them, because they are better able to protect themselves than the small shopkeepers are?—I do not quite follow your question.

4619. Then I gather that you say that in those cases they cannot be put to any hardship because they are already closing earlier, and are a better kind of shop?—I hardly think that is so in the country; it may be, but the general shop in the ordinary village is one that requires to be kept open as long as possible.

4620. But then the general shop in the village is better than any other shop in that village?—Only from your being able to buy a greater assortment of goods there.

4621. The shopkeepers keep a greater assortment of goods, and therefore are better off than others?—Certainly.

4622. Therefore, do you think that this Bill gives protection to small shopkeepers in this matter of voting for early closing?—It is very hard to say that.

4623. In your opinion, is there a majority in any town of small shops or is there a majority of large shops?—You must have a definition of a small and a large shop. If you mean a shop where there is only one assistant or two assistants, or only the man himself or his wife, they would all be included under the small shops, I presume. Probably, in small towns, you would find a larger number of small shops than large; I should think so.

4624. And therefore it would be easy, you think, for them to protect themselves from possible injury by being compelled to close by the larger shops?—They would probably outvote the larger shops.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

4625. You spoke about the large shops that carried on different kinds of trade; one shop sometimes carries on half-a-dozen trades, and supposing each one of those trades fixes a separate time for closing, would, then, this large shop be obliged to close entirely, or only the separate department belonging to the trade in which the holiday holiday was being held?—It seems to me that that is rather an extreme case; it might so happen, but I should think it would very rarely be the case.

4626. But it is very common to have three or four trades carried on in a large shop?—It is.

4627. Supposing that each one of those trades fixes a separate time for closing; say, for instance, that the drapers fixed on Monday, the grocers Tuesday, and the booksellers Wednesday, would that large shop have to close on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday entirely?—I doubt whether that difficulty would really in practice ever arise. I think it is generally understood—it is now exceedingly common in the country (I am speaking now of the country)—to have one day a week as an early closing day, in order that the shops may keep open later on the market day.

4628. One day is fixed by all?—It is the commonest thing possible.

4629. Then you do not think that that would be a practical difficulty?—I do not.

4630. I gather that your main point is, in reference to the hour of closing, one night in the week being kept late for the working-classes?—That is so.

4631. Do you think that Saturday would be the most convenient day for that purpose?—That is so in the case of London, but in the country the market day is the day on which they would generally prefer to keep their shops open late.

4632. That day would be fixed by the local authority?—Yes.

4633. And you think that eight o'clock rather than six o'clock would be the right hour to take?—I think that would be a fair compromise.

4634. Do you think that the public at large are in favour of some compulsory early closing at night, so as to have their business done at an earlier hour; is that the general sense?—Yes, I think it is; that some interference would be welcome.

4635. And you do not think that this would be practicable without an Act of Parliament; you think it desirable to have this Act of Parliament?—Personally, I do.

4636. You think that voluntary action would scarcely cover these cases?—I doubt it.

4637. And you find that the general opinion both of shopkeepers and shop assistants is in favour of legislation in some measure like this?—I can hardly answer that question from intimate knowledge; but that is my impression.

4638. Where do your duties as inspector lead you to chiefly; what is the nature of your inspection?—I have the superintendence of the districts in the South, and South-East, and West of England, and the Eastern Counties, say from Norfolk to Cornwall.

4639. And what class of works are under your inspection?—All the factories in the counties comprised in the South, and South-East, and the Eastern Districts of England and the workshops outside the jurisdiction of the London County Council.

4640. I suppose, now, the smallest workshops are under inspection?—That is so.

4641. That is with regard to sanitation, and so forth?—That is now under the local authority. In the workshops our jurisdiction is confined to the hours of work for the protection of the hands.

Mr. Samuel Smith—continued.

4642. Is there any jurisdiction at all over shops for such things as ventilation and sanitation?—With regard to sale shops, absolutely none.

4643. So that a shop might be very badly ventilated, and yet there is no local power, or any power that exists for remedying that?—There is not at present.

4644. But, I suppose, in a factory you can see that the ventilation is sufficient?—Yes; not in the sale part of the shop.

4645. Do you think it desirable that there should be some inspection of the sanitary condition of shops?—I think it could do no possible harm, and might do a very great deal of good.

4646. In regard to such things as bad ventilation and foul air, for instance?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

4647. Respecting the domestic shops, I presume they are always small?—All those I have seen are.

4648. Then what would be the extent of their interference with neighbouring shops, supposing they were exempted?—That depends entirely upon the class of goods they were selling or the demand for those goods. I think it would be impossible to answer that question satisfactorily.

4649. But seeing that these domestic shops are small shops, and seeing that they do not interfere with their neighbours to any appreciable extent, do you think it is a reasonable thing to injure them by any restriction in this Bill?—If it could be proved that there was no interference with their neighbours and that they did not get an undue advantage over their neighbours, I think it would be better to leave them alone; but at present it is almost impossible to answer that question unless one knew the class of goods they were selling and whether they would have an undue advantage.

4650. But, still, you have stated your opinion, from your experience and knowledge, that they are only small shops?—Only small shops.

4651. And therefore their interference must necessarily be limited?—I could not answer that question; it would depend entirely upon the nature of the trade they were doing.

4652. But do you think it a reasonable thing to interfere with the little traffic which these small shops carry on?—Well, it depends upon whether, if they were not interfered with, their traffic might not become such as to damage their neighbours; that is the point.

4653. But you observe from the nature of the case that they, being domestic shops, must always be small shops, and therefore the interference would be very limited?—It is possible that that may be so, but I could not answer that question without more data.

4654. Do you think that it is a reasonable thing to interfere with the small trades conducted by members of the same family?—I think it should be done with very great discretion if it is done at all.

4655. Would you bring them under the Act, to run the chances of the Act, or exempt them altogether?—I do not see how you could exempt them altogether.

4656. Are you aware that they are exempted by law now under the Shop Hours Act; that the present legislation exempts them?—That it exempts them from any interference? Then it is quite possible that that might be advisable, but I could not express a strong opinion about that. I merely raise the question that there might be cases in which shops, which were kept up entirely by the inmates and their families, might interfere with the trade of the neighbourhood in the larger cases.

4657. Seeing that the law now exempts them, and seeing that you have had no complaint of mischief arising from that exemption, do you see any reason why that exemption should not be continued?—I see no reason at present except the one I have stated; I cannot go beyond that.

Chairman.

4658. What they are exempted from at present is the limitation of the hours; that that is not to be enforced against a parent as regards his own children; that is a different thing?—Quite.

4659. And would it not be a very difficult thing to draw a line as to what were small shops?—I think so.

4660. We had evidence before the last Committee of this character: One man says, "I keep no assistants; my shop is worked by my wife and daughter; we are very anxious to close earlier, but we are kept open till eleven o'clock every night because there is a man in the next street in the same business who will not close earlier." Are there not many cases of that sort where such a measure as this would be to the advantage of the small shopkeepers?—I think so, and that is a part of my reason for mentioning it.

4661. May I gather that, apart from this suggestion you have made as regards clauses, on the whole your opinion is in favour of this Bill?—It is generally.

4662. We had evidence before the last Committee that the general opinion of the inspectors of factories was that the time had arrived when there should be some legislation on this subject as far as possible; can you give us any information on that point; what is the opinion of the inspectors of factories generally?—I cannot answer that question. I have not had any conversation with any of my colleagues.

4663. As regards Sub-section 2 of Clause 1, you have suggested that six o'clock is probably too early; of course, you have observed that that is only a limit?—Perfectly.

4664. We have had evidence from persons who say that in their trades they close at eight o'clock now, and they would generally be prepared to close at seven o'clock; would you see any reason why they should not have the option of doing so, where they are prepared to do so?—Absolutely none.

4665. Therefore, you would not put any limit of eight o'clock as the hour which you think should be the limit in all cases?—I think that the hour should be left, as I understand it would be, to the sense of the locality.

4666. And in that sense you would not object to six o'clock remaining in the clause if it were simply a permissive power, if the sense of the locality were for closing them; it does not say it must be six o'clock; many places might be in favour of going on, as you say, as late as eight o'clock; this is only the extreme limit which can be applied under the Act?—Yes; I think you might have a difficulty arising. If you got some people who were anxious to be excessively disagreeable to their neighbours, they might insist upon six o'clock. I think six o'clock too early.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

4667. You have first to get two-thirds of the shopkeepers asking for it, and then the local authority decides; the local authority is not bound to do it unless it thinks fit?—I see it is not bound by the wish of the two-thirds; that might meet the case.

Chairman.

4668. You think, under those circumstances, it might remain in the Bill?—I should personally prefer seven o'clock.

4669. But do you not think, as it is permissive, that eight o'clock might be too late?—Eight o'clock might be too late.

4670. As regards areas, it would be extremely difficult in a Bill of this sort to lay down fixed rules as regards areas; not only as regards London, but other places?—It would undoubtedly.

4671. Therefore, is it not better to leave that question to be settled by the local feeling, the local authority?—I am entirely of that opinion.

Mr. Tennant.

4672. In reference to the point Sir John Lubbock has put now about eight o'clock, you said to me that you preferred six to be altered to eight; now you have modified that to seven, I understand?—Yes, in consequence of what Sir John Lubbock has said.

4673. That being purely permissive?—Yes.

4674. If you had it "not earlier than eight" you could not possibly close at seven o'clock; that is what you mean?—Quite so.

Friday, 3rd May 1895.

Mr. Tennant.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS PRATT LING, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frye.

4675. I BELIEVE you appear here as representing the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Merchants' Association?—I do.

4676. And also you are largely connected with business in shops in various parts of the country?—In the north of England and in London.

4677. Can you give us any idea of the hours of labour in those towns, such as Manchester?—We open, I think I am correct in saying, in every case, but I do not attend to it myself, at nine o'clock in the morning, and close at seven o'clock in the evening. It may be a little longer in a place like Oldham or Southport, but it would only vary half an hour, or something of that sort.

4678. So that this Bill probably would not affect you at all?—Not at all there; but it would in London.

4679. And I understand that you are against legislation of any kind with regard to the closing of shops?—I am.

4680. You think it would not work, at any rate in London, at all?—I think it would be perfectly unworkable; I do not think it is possible.

Mr. Frye—continued.

4683. Have you something to say on the fifth clause of this Bill?—Yes; if I take my own case, in my London shops there are certainly two distinct trades, and possibly three, if oil and colourmen are reckoned, but certainly there are groceries and provisions sold. Now, if the grocers adopt, say, Wednesday, for their early closing, and the provision dealers adopt Thursday, I must by this Bill close on both days.

4684. Do you think that that would act very unfairly, provided you carried on a number of trades, as many traders do?—I do; very unfairly.

4685. Then you also think that it would act very unfairly to small traders and costermongers, do you not?—From the conditions that now prevail amongst the lower classes of the country, I cannot see how costermongers are to live at all. The bulk of their trade is done after seven or eight at night.

4686. Do you also think that people who earn day wages, and get paid every day, and arrive home late in the evening, would be prevented from getting what is necessary in the way of food?—It appears to me that there are very many thousands of people who depend upon receiving a few pence, or shillings, or so, for odd jobs, who cannot get the necessaries of life until they have received that money, and if they do not get it until after eight o'clock at night, and all the shops are shut up, I do not see exactly where they are to buy the necessaries of life.

4687. And many of them travel long distances away, you think?—Yes, a great many, which is evidenced by the workmen's trains, out of which thousands are poured.

4688. And you think the small shopkeepers would suffer very much if this Bill were to pass into law?—They would suffer very much if you exempt the costermonger from it. Of course, the smallest shopkeepers would then be in a very invidious position. It would affect the smaller smaller shopkeepers, I think, from the fact that the wives of the working men, who like to finish their household work, and trim themselves up a bit before going out, would not be able to get out in time; and consequently I think it would come to this: that the husbands in many cases would bring the necessaries home from the larger shops in the centres where they work. For instance, a man working in Shoreditch, and having to get to Stratford, would call at a shop in Shoreditch or Bishopsgate before he got to the railway station, and take the goods home with him, to the detriment of the smaller shopkeepers in the working-class neighbourhoods. And that would be a very serious thing, because the margin of profit is so small that if you take away ever so little from the returns of these small shops it makes all the difference between comfort and penury.

4689. Do you think there would be great difficulty in enforcing this Bill if it became an Act of Parliament?—I think it would be impossible. I cannot see how it would work at all. I have no doubt that we grocers, like most Englishmen, are law-abiding people, and that if you enact the law it will be carried out so far as possible to begin with. We should all start right, I have no doubt. But I think that very soon you would have first one tradesman breaking away, and then another, and in a very few weeks everybody would say, "It is no use going on like this; we must keep open." Then you are face to face with thousands of tradesmen who are breaking the law; and what are you going to do with them? You cannot summon thousands; at least, I should think not.

4690. Then you think that in London it would really be impossible to carry it out?—I think it would be absolutely impossible.

Mr. Edwards.

4691. Has there been any improvement in early closing since 1886?—I think so; we have, at any rate, the half-holiday movement largely in force, which we had not then.

4692. I am talking of earlier closing in the evening; has there been any improvement in that respect since 1886?—I think we have improved, although, perhaps, not to so great an extent as we should like to see. We close half an hour earlier than we used to do in London.

4693. But can you say that there is any real advance in early closing since 1886?—I think so, but I am not prepared with statistics to prove that, and I do not know that I have thought it over particularly; my impression at the moment is that the Early Closing Association and the Voluntary Early Closing Association have made certain strides, and will make greater strides if they are allowed to do so.

4694. You think that early closing is a good thing?—Yes.

4695. And you are anxious to get it?—I should be anxious to alleviate the working classes in every way. I should be glad to see tramway and omnibus drivers and conductors not working till midnight; but the exigencies of their business are such that they have to do it; and it is about the same with these other people.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

4696. But early closing is a good thing in itself, you think?—I think so.

4697. And, therefore, it would be just as good if we could get it by law, as if we got it voluntarily, would it not?—My objection to legislation may be sentimental rather than otherwise; but I certainly object to interfering with adult labour. I think that if a man of 25 comes to me and wants a situation, he is perfectly capable of making his own bargain.

4698. But we do interfere with adult labour, do not we?—You have in cases where it is necessary, I suppose.

4699. And I understand that you gentlemen who are in favour of voluntary early closing, and are opposed to this Bill, are in favour of applying the Shop Hours Regulation Act to shops generally; that is to say, applying it not only to young persons but to adults?—Yes.

4700. That would be an interfering with adult labour which you would uphold?—That is straining it rather far. As the principle is already working, perhaps my objection to interfering with adult labour would be so far mitigated; but, at any rate, I would rather see that than compulsory early closing.

4701. It is a limited objection to interfering with adult labour, then?—Excuse me; I said that inasmuch as it is already in force to a certain extent my objection would be mitigated to extending it.

4702. Do I correctly understand you to say that supposing the law were put in force, if this Bill became an Act, that one man after another would break away, and the law would not be observed?—That is my impression in regard to London.

4703. That is the worst of the voluntary system, is it not?—Yes, that occurs under the voluntary system, certainly.

4704. That is the trouble, is it not, of the voluntary system?—Yes, that is the trouble of the voluntary system.

4705. One man breaks away, and then another man says, "My neighbour has broken away, I must too"?—Yes, but that would be intensified in this case; but being the law it would be binding on many men. I do not wish to set myself up as higher than my fellow men, but it would be binding on me, at any rate; whereas if it was a voluntary affair I should follow the others, as you say. We say that it is no use; but it would be very disagreeable to many men to have to obey this law when they saw their neighbours breaking away from it.

4707. Then, if those men wanted to break away, the chances are that they would not vote for

for the adoption of the Act; is not that so?—If this Clause 12 is not altered as to the way you are going to deal with London, that is to say, that the local authority "in the City of London and the liberties thereof," means the Mayor and Commonalty and citizens of London, acting by the Common Council, and in the County of London means the London Council; if you keep it as a whole, I have little objection, because I am certain that it will never be carried out if we live to the Greek Kalends.

4708. Quite so; it is almost a voluntary arrangement; it is subject to local option?—Yes.

4710. Then you say that in all the suburbs of London there is a difference from London itself. We understand that in London and large towns the small shops outweigh the large ones; but in the suburbs it is the reverse, you think?—I merely instance this case. But is it so in London? Take Oxford-street, for instance, where you will have large shops, they will far outnumber the shops in Clare Market. Or, take the Strand, where you will find the same thing in regard to Drury-lane.

4711. I do not know; I am only telling you what we have evidence about, namely, that the small shops outnumber the large ones; but you say that in the suburbs the large shops outnumber the small ones?—Yes, certainly, in certain suburbs. If you go into the East-end suburbs, to Ham, West Ham, and so on, it would not be so.

4712. But in Streatham it is so; and would you say the same of Sydenham?—I am speaking of Streatham more particularly, because it happens to strike me, as I live there; and I should think it is typical of very many of the suburbs of London.

4713. You are firmly of opinion that the result of the Act in the suburbs would be detrimental to the small shops?—I am.

4714. That there is a greater number of large shops that would close, and so make the others come in with them?—Yes, I believe that is so in Streatham and in many other suburbs; but I do not pledge myself to all the other suburbs of London, you understand; because, as I say, in the East end suburbs the converse would prevail.

4715. And you object to the Bill applying to London because of the over-lapping of areas?—

Mr. Edwards—continued.

That is one of the objections. I have a very strong objection to the eighth clause, lines 30 to 35. It appears to me to be a most cumbrous way of stopping it.

4716. Do not you think it is just possible that, assuming it so happened that two contiguous areas fixed on different hours of closing, that the practical good sense of the people would make them agree upon closing at the same hour?—So far as closing is concerned and many things of that sort, the good sense of grocers and provision dealers, so far as my experience is concerned, is an unknown quantity.

4717. They have no good sense, you say?—So far as regards combining to close, or for other trade purposes, that is my experience.

4718. Would this Bill prevent voluntary effort going on at the same time?—It would seriously impede it, I should think. I should think the tradesmen and assistants too, but especially the tradesmen, would very likely say, when the voluntary people come, "No, you have an Act put into force that would oblige everybody to do it." That would take the stimulus away; it would make voluntary effort less agreeable to people if they had a law, I think.

4719. But it would not be a law that would compel them to close; it could only do that if they adopted it of their own accord?—Yes.

4720. And why could they not go on if they liked, if they think the voluntary principle better, side by side with the Act?—First of all, I have instanced some cases in which I think I am right in saying that it would be compulsion. You could scarcely mention a constituency or a place in which it would not press hardly on some shops.

Chairman.

4721. You stated just now, very correctly, no doubt, that in Oxford-street there are more large shops than small ones; but certainly, if you take any considerable district, the small shops would outnumber the larger ones, would they not?—It may be so; I have no data to go upon; but it struck me at the moment that there were districts in the West-end in which the larger shops would outnumber the small ones.

4722. No doubt there are certain districts in which that would be so; but if you take any large district, surely the number of small shops is far the greater?—If you take a vestry, I should say that there are districts in which the large shops would outnumber the small ones; but if you take a postal district, I have no doubt that the smaller shops would outnumber the large ones.

4723. Therefore they practically would have the matter in their own hands?—Certainly.

4725. But you think it would be a trouble to carry out an Act which could only be carried out if it was in accordance with the wishes of a large majority of shopkeepers?—I think it would be a great trouble.

4726. Although you think that early closing would be an advantage?—I think early closing would be a great advantage if it could be carried out.

4727. Now, as regards the half-holiday, practically, excepting in the large shops in the West-end there is no half-holiday in London, is there?—Oh, yes. I have shops north, south, east, and west, and all in the working-class neighbourhoods, and I do not know of a shop in which we have not the half-holiday.

4728. I know your shops shut and the large shops shut; but in the poorer districts of London, outside the West-end, there is no regular half-holiday in which all the shops shut, I think, in London?—Are you now speaking of grocers, or of all shops?

4729. Of all shops?—Perhaps not. I think the grocers for the most part would shut.

4730. The larger grocers do; but do the smaller grocers also shut?—I think so. I am hardly competent to give an opinion upon that; I have not seen some of my shops for two or three years; they are controlled by collectors and so on; I cannot answer it.

4731. Does your objection to interference by Act of Parliament go so far as the Factory Acts; do you object to the Factory Acts?—I am not acquainted with them; I do not know the provisions of the Factory Acts.

Mr. Edwards.

4732. You have a great many shops yourself?—Yes.

4733. At what time do you close in your various branches?—I believe it is about nine o'clock on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays; on Thursdays we have a half-holiday.

4734. You close at nine o'clock on the first three days of the week?—Yes; that is in London. I think it is about nine o'clock; it might be half-past in some. It would not be all alike; it would be according to the neighbourhood.

4735. And on other days, when do you close?—I think 10 o'clock would be the average, some at a quarter to 10 and others at a quarter-past on Fridays; and on Saturdays it would be 12 o'clock at night.

4736. That is in London?—Yes. Then it is seven o'clock in Manchester and the North of England on the first five evenings, I think.

4737. And on Saturdays?—About nine o'clock, I think; it would not be later than that, I should think.

Chairman.

4738. At what time do you close on Thursdays?—In some shops at two o'clock and in some at five o'clock, I believe.

4739. When you speak of the half-holidays you count five o'clock as a half-holiday, do you?—It goes by that name.

Mr. Edwards.

4740. Of course, there are periods of the year when you close later?—Never later.

4741. Not at the stress of Christmas?—No, I put on more assistants to do the work.

4742. There was some question asked here about the difficulty that the Bill would create, owing to people remaining after closing hours; do your people get away soon after these hours at which you close?—Immediately.

4743. All your assistants?—I cannot say all; there are pretty well 100, perhaps. We have no rule for them to stop, and there is no custom for them to stop. If they have been dilatory, the manager may say, "We must have this thing done to-night before we go," and they may stop a quarter of an hour or half an hour later. That is amongst themselves. You may take it that as a rule they all leave at the time of closing.

4744. And, so far as you can say, what is your opinion about the effect of the Act upon that; do you suppose that if there were earlier closing imposed by the Act they would have to remain longer than they do now?—I am sure that one of two things must happen; either a tradesman must employ more assistants, or they must stop a little later, I suppose.

4745. Do you keep open now partly in order that your assistants may do the work that they would do after closing?—No, I do not. The work is done when the customers do not come. Unfortunately, the customers will not come till seven or eight o'clock, and from eight to nine o'clock, and then the assistants are busy serving; but if you close at eight, there would be, I suppose, a greater stream of customers at seven o'clock, and they would lose that hour's work in the ordinary way of preparing for closing.

4746. I suppose, if customers come towards the hour of closing, whatever it is, it involves a certain amount of work after closing?—No, not at all; in our shops that work would be done next morning when they take down the shutters.

4747. Then that could be done, too, under the Bill?—Certainly.

4748. It would not necessarily keep them later?—Certainly not.

Mr. Henry Cushen, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frye.

4749. You are, I believe, vice president of the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association?—Yes, I am vice president of the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association; and Chairman of Davies and Evans, Limited, oil and colourmen, with over 80 shops in the metropolitan area, and treasurer of the

Mr. Frye—continued.

Federation of Grocers' Associations of the United Kingdom.

4750. You have had a long experience in the trade, I think?—I have had over 40 years' experience of the trades mentioned in the metropolis.

4751. Will you state to the Committee the views

views which you have come here to represent with regard to the Bill which is the subject of our inquiry?—I object, on behalf of the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association, to any experimental interference with adult labour in the retail trades of the Metropolis, especially in view of the fact that Sir John Lubbock's Shops Early Closing Bill is an entirely novel proposed departure from the usual liberty of male adults to make contracts for their own labour. I further object to such proposed legislation, as it is a suggested experiment dealing with cases in which the health of adult males is not seriously affected, and excludes cases where possibly real danger arises by reason of long hours. I am of opinion that if such an experiment is to be made, it should be in those instances where, according to statistics, such as the Registrar General's decennial returns, such danger is shown to exist. I will put in a copy of the said returns for the Committee. I also consider that the statement that voluntary early closing as a system has proved a failure is absolutely incorrect, inasmuch as I believe the Early Closing Association claim to have brought about 1,500 towns, villages and hamlets within the operation of their work, beside which the Voluntary Early Closing Association claim to have brought in a large additional number, I believe about 1,000, numbering 10,000 assistants. It would be open to those witnesses who have stated that the voluntary early closing is a failure to note the progress made by the voluntary movement each week, as reported in the trade papers. As a matter of fact, when we look back over the past 10, 20, or 30 years, we are bound to admit that immense beneficial results have accrued, and that the hours now are considerably less than they obtained 20 years ago, whilst the wages of the assistants have correspondingly increased. The principal causes of such failures have been, in my opinion, brought about mainly from two causes: (1) the imperative necessity of the tradesman to supply the legitimate needs of his customers; and (2) from financial causes. Taking into consideration that the retail shopkeepers contribute a larger percentage of their profits to the rates than any other section of society, it is manifestly unfair to interfere with them in the legitimate pursuit of their business to such an extent as would be prejudicial to their trade, and would probably mean ruin to the minority. The whole question has now assumed such a position that both employers and employés are striving for the one object in this particular, the former more so than the latter. Shops which are compelled to keep open later in the evening have, by some unwritten law, come to be looked upon as not enjoying the same status as those closing earlier. That applies also to the assistants, so that it will be seen that there is a strong social and moral influence at work to bring about the desired result. In my opinion, legislative early closing is, at least so far as London is concerned, impracticable even under local option clauses, inasmuch as local interests, even in East London districts, are so diverse and over-lapping. I have conversed with many shopkeepers in the East End of London upon the proposals of this Bill, and have found that generally great surprise has been manifested that such proposals were likely to be seriously considered by the Legislature, and there was a strong expression of opinion that, if ever such a measure became law it would be entirely unworkable. I have read and carefully considered the Bill now before the Committee. As to Clause 1, it appears to be unsatisfactory, as it does not define who will prepare the written application to the local authority; neither does it give power for investigating signatures nor penalties for fraudulent signatures. As to the difficulty of getting the signatures from those shops which are carried on under certain titles of trading companies, the Bill should compel every owner of a shop to have his or their names legibly printed over the doorway and a register of such ownership to be kept by the local sanitary authority, and there should be a penalty for false statements, and the local sanitary authority should have power to charge a nominal fee for registration and enforce fines. It would appear to me that if the Bill were to become law it would be more satisfactory for all local purposes that the local authority for making the order should not be the London County Council, but the local sanitary authorities, as the latter have, or would have, an intimate knowledge of the requirements of their respective districts which the London County Council would not have. With reference to Clauses 2, 3, and 4, they are details in connection with the administration of the Act on which I offer no opinion. As to Clause 5, I am of opinion that this clause is absolutely unworkable. I would also point out that many of the large shops which would be affected by this clause, and which already have an early closing hour, do after the shops are closed yet carry on business by their travellers and carts, which are often engaged late in the evening, even though the shop is closed. The tendency would be to drive or to divert business from suburban districts to those centres where such shops are situated. Clauses 6 and 7 deal with details as to the enforcing of the Act, upon which I have no suggestions to offer. As to Clause 8, I object to the police, who, as a body, are brought into existence for dealing with criminals, having control over tradesmen who are endeavouring to satisfy the first duty of their being, namely, to obtain honourably the means to live. As to Clause 9, I am of opinion that if chemists are to be allowed to supply medicines, drugs, or medical appliances, as appointed under the Act for the closing of shops, such chemists should not be allowed to deal in articles other than those for which they are permitted to keep open. As to Clause 10, I am of opinion that if shops are to be closed, all of them should be closed to all persons, not excepting those lodging in any premises occupied by a shopkeeper. As to Clause 12, the definition of the word "shops" is unsatisfactory, as it does not indicate whether the items would include those carts taken out by travellers in which are goods to be sold to householders where the travellers call, which have not been previously ordered. As to the word "closed," the definition "not open for the serving of any customer" is unsatisfactory. As to the definition of the term "local authority," so far as that is concerned, it seems to be manifestly unjust unjust and improper to name the London County Council as the local authority when they are not the local authority. Under Sub-sections (c), (d), and (e), a sanitary authority is made the authority in the country, whereas it is proposed to take away from the actual local authorities in London the administration of the Bill, and to put it in the hands of the London County Council. This, as I have already indicated, would be taking the power out of the hands of the local authority most familiar with the needs of the district, and putting it in the hands of the authority which would be least familiar with the needs of the district. This contention is more necessary as, according to the definition of the term "district," were the London County Council to be the authority for administering the Bill, the whole of the County of London would be treated as one district which, for manifest reasons, would be entirely impossible in such a measure; and further, I wish to urge that the whole administration of the Act should be, if enforced, enforced by the local sanitary authority and not by the police authorities in any case, who, as I have already pointed out, are brought into existence to deal with people of totally different classes of society, and cases. As to the schedule with reference to the exemption of premises in which any intoxicating liquor is sold by retail for consumption on the premises, from the operations of the Bill I do not understand such exception, especially as the Registrar General's returns show that the mortality in that calling is very much greater than the mortality in other retail trades which would be affected by the operation of the Bill. If the object of this Bill is to secure shorter hours for the assistants engaged in the retail distributing trades, with a view to an improvement in health, it is manifest that such an exemption as I have mentioned is extremely illogical, inasmuch as the grocers' death-rate (the trade I represent) returns are 771 per 1,000 lower than the licensed victuallers', 1,521, and the innkeepers' servants, 2,205. With reference to "refreshment houses" the term is vague, especially as in many of these houses the business of a retail grocer is carried on as well as the sale of refreshments of all kinds; and the exemption for hot cooked provisions should, in my opinion, be extended to all classes of cooked provisions without qualification. The same objections hold to tobacconists and to newsagents, in both of which businesses packed tea and other goods in which grocers are interested are sold. I might also point out that the same thing might be said with reference to publicans, many of whom sell by retail a number of the articles dealt in by grocers and provision dealers.

4752. You have had to deal with, and have now, a great many assistants; have you had any complaints from them about the hours being too long?—None at all.

4753. And there has been no agitation, so far as that is concerned, by the assistants in favour of this Bill, except by one small society?—The movement is supported principally by the masters; and the assistants are, one might say, indifferent to the question as to earlier closing; but the assistants appear to approve of, and would prefer, the half-holiday. They say that they can do something with the half-holiday, but as to the earlier closing of shops, whether they close at eight or nine o'clock, the assistants appear to be practically indifferent.

4754. And, as a matter of fact, the half-holiday movement in London has extended very considerably, has it not?—Immensely.

4755. Even in the East End of London?—Comparatively immensely.

4756. They close at two o'clock on Wednesdays and Thursdays, I think?—Yes, on one or the other day of the week.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

4757. You represent a large number of shops; I did not catch the number exactly?—Over 80.

4758. Do you mean that they belong to your association?—No, to our company.

4759. Are these all grocers' shops?—Principally oilmen and Italian warehouses, and some grocers.

4760. What are about the average hours that these shops are kept open?—From eight o'clock in the morning to nine o'clock at night would be about the average, but some close at eight.

4761. What time is allowed for meals out of that?—Half-an-hour for breakfast, an hour for dinner, and half-an-hour for tea.

4762. Are your assistants mostly men or women?—Men.

4763. Have you any provision for their sitting down, or have they to stand all day?—There is no provision, but the men find plenty of provision themselves if they want to rest.

4764. Are there seats?—There is no difficulty upon that question at all.

Chairman.

4765. You said there was no difficulty; but are there any seats?—We do not put seats behind the counter.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

4766. Do not the men complain of getting tired after standing about 12 hours?—If we have a complaint of feeling tired it would be in this way, a man would say on Saturday night: "I feel I have done a fair day's work, and am ready for my supper." It is all said in a cheerful spirit, not in a grumbling or discontented spirit. We all feel tired at the end of our day's work.

4767. They do not complain of feeling exhausted?—No.

4768. And there is no strong feeling, you say, on their behalf for shorter hours?—On behalf of the assistants generally, no; they are very indifferent to the matter as a whole; but they do approve of the half-holiday. They like that because they can do something when they get an extra number of hours.

4769. And they all get it, you say?—In most cases, in nearly all cases they get the half-holiday.

4770. Are you later on Saturday night than on other nights?—Yes, we are open until 12 o'clock, from 11 to 12; some close at 11 and some at 12.

4771. What is the reason of that?—The necessity to supply the legitimate needs of the public.

4772. What class of goods do they buy so late

at night, chiefly?—General necessities for their homes. When you speak of a grocer's shop or an Italian warehouseman's shop, he is supplying all his goods late at night. It must be well known to you that in London, for which only I speak, there is an immense multitude of people whose day begins when the other section of society's day ceases. You see it yourself. You see omnibus drivers and cabmen about, and all that vast multitude of men, dockmen who come to discharge vessels and so on; they clear out late at night and want to be supplied; they are not a monetary class of people who can supply their needs in advance. You have only to walk through the streets of London and see an immense multitude practically lying idle all day; but as soon as evening begins their trade begins, and surely their legitimate needs must be supplied. You would not say to a man because he drives a cab and goes home at 11 or 12 o'clock at night, that he must not get his oil, candles, tea, sugar, soap, bacon, or bread, or whatever it is that he requires. There is an immense multitude in London whose work does not begin until really night begins to set in, and that multitude must be supplied. As tradesmen we should, of course, prefer to close earlier, and as representing a good class of shops, if I were to speak from a mercenary point of view, I should say that it would be beneficial to me to compel all shops to close, because this Bill would not affect us to any serious extent. But there is an immense number of smaller shops who supply a perfectly legitimate need which must be supplied, and they must be kept open.

4773. Is 11 o'clock usual on a Saturday night, or is that a late limit?—It is usual.

4774. And not on other nights?—Yes, every night in the week, with certain shops.

4775. Have you certain shops which are open until 11 and 12 o'clock every night?—Not ourselves, but there are in London shops open to past the middle of the night; in fact, you might almost say they are open pretty well all night long.

Mr. Frye.

4776. But they do not keep any assistants, do they?—They might have one or two.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

4777. However, you consider that though you keep your shop open late on a Saturday night, that is the only night as a rule?—That is the only night as a rule. On Friday one does generally a little later, perhaps, to 9.50.

4778. Does that arise from the fact that men have their money chiefly on the Saturday, and buy their week's supply?—That would, of course, mainly arise from the fact that the working classes chiefly receive their money on Fridays and Saturdays, some earlier and some later. Then, again, there is the class of shop assistants themselves. When they come out of a shop, the married men want to go with their wives. If he wants to buy a pair of breeches or a pair of boots, he must go and get them.

4779. Then you consider that late Saturday night shopping is unavoidable?—Yes.

4780. So that even if this Bill did become law, some provision must be made for keeping open late on Saturday night, you think?—It is an absolute necessity.

4781. Would not that be recognised by the local authority, should this Bill become law?—I think the London Council, as such, would have absolutely no knowledge of the needs of the districts about Radcliff, Wapping, Shadwell, and round there.

4782. And you recommend that the carrying out of the Act should be vested in the local sanitary authority?—Yes, I recommend the local sanitary authority, because they are the authority, representing the district, and they would have a better knowledge of the requirements of the district.

4783. What exactly do you mean by the local sanitary authority?—The vestries and the district boards.

Mr. Edwards.

4784. You say that you are in favour of early closing by the voluntary system?—Undoubtedly, the voluntary system is doing its work.

4785. Has it been doing a good work since 1886?—Yes, in bringing about that which we all desire, better than you will do it by any Act of Parliament.

4786. Are you a member of the Voluntary Early Closing Association?—No, I am not; but I have always worked for earlier closing.

4787. And I suppose a great many of the assistants work for early closing?—The assistants I have said are more indifferent than the masters.

4788. Is it not the fact that a great many shop assistants are members of the Early Closing Association?—Yes; no doubt. I am speaking comparatively.

4789. The assistants, you say, are more indifferent than the masters?—Yes, as a whole, they are much more indifferent to the whole of this question.

4790. It does not concern them?—No, do not put words into my mouth. I say that the assistants, as a whole, are less interested than the masters, as a whole, and less active in the movement to bring about early closing. The masters are more active, and the assistants less active.

4791. How are they not interested; is it not the interest of an assistant that he should have the same wage for less work?—No, not necessarily. For instance, as an assistant, I would rather be at work than spending my money about the streets of London.

4792. But you need not spend your money about the streets of London?—It is a difficult matter for you to have two or three hours at your disposal of an evening without spending your money in some shape or form.

4793. I am afraid that you and I are differently constituted; I was glad to get away from work, and when I did it was not to spend money?—The probability is that at the time when you were an assistant and when I was an assistant, different circumstances obtained. Now there are many better opportunities for men to spend their leisure hours than did obtain.

4794. That is in favour of early closing, therefore, is it not?—Not of necessity; it is not every man's nature or facility that would go to that intellectual cultivation or recreation that we desire.

4795. Therefore, those means are practically pearls cast before swine, in your opinion?—Yes, to some extent.

4796. The assistants are, in your opinion, rather indifferent to early closing; they do not mind how long they keep at it?—I have already corrected your statement; I have said that the assistants, as a whole, are more indifferent than the masters, as a whole.

4797. You are open till 12 o'clock on Saturday night, I think you said?—Yes.

4798. Do I rightly understand that you are the chairman of a company?—Yes.

4799. With a great many shops?—Eighty shops.

4800. All over London?—Yes.

4801. North, south, east, and west?—Yes, all over London.

4802. Are they all, in any part of London, all open till 12 o'clock on Saturday night?—Yes.

4803. Does the same cause apply to all parts; that it is to meet the necessities of dockers, omnibus men, and cabmen?—You would not get dockers shopping in Oxford-street.

4804. Probably you would not get omnibus drivers?—Probably not shopping in Oxford-street.

4805. But you said that you have to keep open till 12 o'clock to meet the difficulties of the public?—Yes.

4806. Is that so in every part of London?—Yes.

4807. Is it the universal custom to keep open till 12 in all parts of London?—If you have the necessity arise in your house to purchase some commodity that is a legitimate requirement, and you are committing no sin when you go to a tradesman who lays himself out to supply that need, to ask him to supply it.

4808. There is no right or wrong in it; it is simply a question of convenience?—Then I do not see where your question applies. It is our duty to supply the legitimate demands of the public, whose servants we are. We are the servants of the public, and we have to study the public and supply their demands, and so long as they come to us with proper and legitimate demands, it is our duty to supply them.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

4809. What Mr. Edwards is driving at, I am afraid you do not catch?—I am afraid I do not.

4810. It is that some of your shops are in residential districts where none of these poorer classes are?—Then they close earlier.

Mr. Edwards.

4811. That is what I want to know; you do not keep all your shops open so late?—No. You must clearly see that there are expenses going on, and if we can stop those expenses at earlier hours it is an advantage to the firm to do so.

4812. But you, of course, claim the right to keep open all night if you like?—Yes, I claim the right to work all day and all night if I choose, and no one has a right to say me nay, nor ought he to have the right.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

4813. We have understood that the shop assistants have asked for early closing, because it would benefit their health; you do not think that?—No, I do not think that. I think that that is a fallacious argument, because if you turn to the Registrar General's Returns you will find that shop assistants are, I think, the healthiest of the whole community, and the grocers' assistants particularly.

Chairman.

4814. Would you let me look at that Return for a moment?—Certainly. (Handing in the same).

Mr. Edwards.

4815. For what years are those figures?—1881 and 1882; that is the last we could get.

4816. And it is to the effect that their health is good?—Yes.

4818. Of course, you understand that the Voluntary Early Closing Association, and the Early Closing Association are both working practically to the same end, and on the same grounds, namely, that it is desirable to close early for the sake of the health of the assistants?—In that respect, yes.

4819. But you do not believe that?—The Voluntary Early Closing Association believe, and I think rightly, that they are doing their work more effectively and more lastingly than the Early Closing Association would do by legislation.

4820. But my point is this: that you do not agree with them as to the ground on which early closing is desirable; in fact, you do not think it is desirable from the point of health or from the point of morals?—I am not saying that it is not desirable from the point of health; I simply say when that argument is put forward that it is not borne out by the Registrar General's Returns. I mean as to there being any more necessity to deal with the grocers. But there may be, if you go on that ground, a necessity to deal with the publican, because he consumes three to four times more lives than the grocery trade does.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

(unfortunately I left a packet of my papers at home) by Dr. Carpmael, in which he attributes the bad health of young people and the pale faces which are seen about London at the present day, more to the effects of smoking and drinking, and the improper use of leisure hours, than all the harm which may be done by over-working or long hours in shops.

4822. Of course, I do not know what Mr. Carpmael's capacity was for coming to any conclusions on that point, and therefore it is not worth considering; but you agree with that, do you?—Yes.

4823. That the pale faces are not due to over-work, but to the effects of smoking and drinking?—I say my experience is this: when I say over-work, do not misunderstand me; the work as performed in shops at the present day is not over-work, and is not injurious to health; but I say that the injury to health is done outside the shop and not inside the shop.

4824. That is a thing you are liable to whether you close at nine or eight o'clock, is it not?—Undoubtedly.

4825. Then do you close early on Thursday?—Yes, generally.

4826. At what hour?—Four o'clock and five o'clock.

4827. Mr. Frye wants me to ask you whether there has been any expression of opinion as to a choice on the part of the assistants between the half-holiday or a general early closing?—The assistants generally prefer the half-holiday; they do like the half-holiday; there is no mistake about it.

4828. Do you close early on Thursday in East London?—I believe not in every case. I am not sufficiently conversant with the whole of their times, but I believe not in every case.

4829. Have the assistants there asked you to close early on Thursdays?—Speaking of a shop that I had to deal with in Mile End, when I first went to Mile End we used to close at eleven; then we got the hour down to ten, then we got the hour down to nine, and now they close, I think, at four o'clock on Thursday afternoons, so that you see that there has been a considerable improvement.

4830. Have you been asked by the East London Early Closing Association to close early on Thursday?—We have had, in common with others, circulars from these various associations. Mr. Stacey has visited my premises.

4831. What has been your reply?—My reply generally has been that I would prefer to conduct my own business in my own way. I never associated myself with either association.

4832. You have refused?—I prefer to have a free hand.

4833. That is the same thing; those are the gentlemen that so much complaint has been made of, you know. The complaint of the Early Closing Association is that you cannot manage to close, because there are some gentlemen who insist upon doing their business in their own way, and therefore prevent others from obtaining the benefits of early closing?—But there are other reasons. I was invited to attend a meeting at the Assembly Hall, Mile End, for the purposes of early closing, and to address the meeting, and, for what purpose I do not know, but I was informed privately before the meeting (and was shown a copy of the matter) that when I got on the platform I was to be howled down and not allowed to be heard, and that ribald songs were to be sung to the tune of "Britons never shall be slaves." The unfortunate part was that the local reporter put all this matter into his report, as though it had actually taken place; but, inasmuch as I did not attend the meeting, it did not take place.

4834. To come back to my point, we have it that you were asked to close early on Thursdays by the East London Early Closing Association, and you refused?—Undoubtedly I did, at that time.

4835. I say that is just what is complained of by these gentlemen who go in for voluntary closing. You say that you close at nine ordinarily?—Yes.

4836. Every day, except Saturday, at nine o'clock?—Fridays would be a bit later.

4837. What hour do you close at on Fridays?—Probably half-past nine. If there is a little trade on at nine they keep on until the shop is cleared, and when the shop is cleared they shut up; it may be a quarter-of-an-hour, or half-an-hour, or ten minutes.

4838. You never close later than ten on Fridays?—I should say not; but I am not prepared to make a positive statement, because each shop is under management, and the manager would exercise his discretion as manager; he would keep on as long as trade was going, and as soon as the shop was cleared he would close.

4839. Do you issue any instructions to that effect?—No; there would be a general closing time when the man would exercise his discretion.

4840. I understand that you open every day at eight o'clock?—Eight o'clock would be the average time.

4841. Then you close at nine o'clock on Fridays and at twelve on Saturdays; and when do the assistants get away?—Immediately that the shop is closed.

4842. At once?—At once.

4843. They are not kept there to do anything?—No, the man simply takes off his apron and hangs it up and goes.

4844. There is an end of it?—There is an end of it; we take no more time than if when this meeting is over we put on our hats and walk out of the room.

4845. It will be just the same under the Act then, will it not?—No, under the Act you can keep the men, I think?

4846. Supposing that on Fridays you closed at nine o'clock instead of at 10, and on Saturdays at 10 o'clock instead of at 12 o'clock, it does not matter whether it is by compulsory early closing or by voluntary action, the men could get away, just as now, as soon as the shop is closed?—I should not be prepared to say what would take place under the Act; they might be called upon to remain in the shop after the closing hour if the Act were in force.

4847. Why?—Because if the time were shortened they probably would have to be kept in to make up their stock, to prepare their stock for sale the next day.

4848. Then you keep your men there not for serving customers but preparing stock for the next day?—For the joint purpose: when they are not serving customers they are preparing the stock.

4849. I suppose, as a matter of fact, it comes to this: that customers, when they know that a shop is rather elastic in its hours of closing, will put it off and dawdle, and tend to keep the shop open late in that way; but if they know that a shop is to be closed sharp at nine o'clock or at eight o'clock they will be there before that hour?—No, I do not think that would apply, speaking generally.

4850. I am not talking now of Saturdays, when there may be local difficulties which occur, as you say, in the matter of cabmen, busmen, omnibus men, and dockers, and so on, who have to shop after hours; but is it not the fact generally that any persons wanting to purchase would come in time before the eight o'clock closing as much as they do now before the nine o'clock closing?—No, there is no doubt that there are a large number of persons who could shop earlier but do not because the shops are open and they go in.

4851. That is my point?—But that is the exception, I say, and not the rule.

4852. Human nature is the exception, is it?—I am not saying that human nature is the exception; I say that that particular circumstance is the exception, and does not apply to the whole marketing. The market is kept open till nine o'clock in the evening, because the necessities of the neighbourhood require it. If those shops were open till 12 o'clock, you would probably find somebody dropping in.

4853. That is just the point?—But we are not dealing with those exceptional matters; we are dealing with the necessities of the market. If you take a neighbourhood the necessities of which neighbourhood require the shops or market to be open to nine o'clock at night, it is the necessity of the neighbourhood that has to be dealt with and not the peculiarities of one or two individuals.

4854. But I daresay, if it were examined into, that particular necessity might stand over to the next day. There is no rush of business up to nine o'clock, and then a sharp putting up of shutters and away?—Sometimes we put up our shutters with a shop-full of people.

4855. Really?—Yes.

4856. What hour was that, 12?—No, nine o'clock.

4857. Oh?—Yes, frequently.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

4858. I understand your position to be, that it is necessary for the public supply that a shop should be open from eight o'clock in the morning to nine o'clock at night?—In some neighbourhoods, undoubtedly.

4859. And on Saturday from eight o'clock to midnight?—Undoubtedly.

4860. Therefore, you would not be in favour of limiting the hour by any voluntary action, by voluntary combination; you are not one of those who look to voluntary action as replacing legal action?—I say that voluntary action is already doing the work; but there are some neighbourhoods and some circumstances in which no voluntary action can apply.

4861. Where you would not wish to see these hours reduced by any process?—They could not be reduced.

Mr. Baldwin.

4862. I only want to ask you one question. Your evidence, I take it, applies entirely to London?—Entirely.

4863. You have had no experience with provincial towns, have you?—I would rather have nothing to do with provincial towns. I have to do with London.

Sir Blundell Maple.

4864. Your evidence has been very strong on certain points. I suppose it is because you feel very keenly upon the subject?—I do.

4865. Have you not often heard it remarked that if this Bill were to pass it would interfere with early closing and do damage to the movement, inasmuch as it would prevent voluntary action; because when the canvassers went round to the tradespeople to get them to agree to voluntary action, the people would be afraid that it was with the intention to compel them to close?—I think that a Bill of this nature would be a calamity to early closing.

4866. That is to say, that would prevent early closing being carried on by voluntary action?—Yes, and the Bill would have to be repealed within six months of its being passed, I am sure.

4867. You said that you would not close the shops in order to give shop assistants more recreation; but do not you think that if we could get earlier closing for shop assistants it would be advisable for them if they had some means of recreation, and went in for athletic sports, that it would be good for their health?—Undoubtedly; and that is where I feel that voluntary action comes in, because the movement is gradual. If you were to get this Bill passed you would throw an immense number of young men all at once on to the streets of London; whereas voluntary action brings it about gradually, and it is being brought about. I am not speaking of a thing that is not being done, it is gradually reaching that end, and it is being done so gradually that as the young men find themselves at liberty they can find a means, and a proper means, of utilising their spare time.

4867.* Being a shopkeeper yourself, and having so many shops, you must find it to your advantage and to the advantage of your different managers, and also tending to the reduction of your expenses, to have earlier closing when it is possible?—Undoubtedly we wish it and want it.

4868. I think just now, judging from the examination that took place, that one of the honourable Members of the Committee gathered from your remarks that you considered it disadvantageous to the young people to have earlier closing; but you did not, I take it, intend to convey such an impression?—Certainly not, I have been working for years at earlier closing.

4869. You have yourself?—I have myself individually been working for years for early closing. I have always supported early closing.

4870. And in neighbourhoods where the great majority close late now, this Bill, if it requires a two-thirds majority to close early, would be imperative, inasmuch as the great majority who now close late would not want to close early; is not that so?—Yes, in that respect it would; but you cannot lose sight of the fact (I am speaking in fairness to all the shops concerned) that it would be to the interest of the better class of shops to compel the smaller shops to close. I am speaking more, if I may so put it, so far as the shopkeepers are concerned, on behalf of that minority, those smaller shops who would be compelled to close, and to whom it would probably mean ruin; and I say that it is unfair and unjust to them that they should be compelled to close.

4871. Now, as regards Clause 5, do not other shops keep lots of different things that you grocers keep?—Yes.

4872. And by Clause 5, if a shop keeps grocery as well as drapery, if the drapery department were to be closed, the grocery department would have to be closed; would it not be so?—Undoubtedly.

4873. In your shops, where you say you call yourselves grocers, you keep other things besides grocery; you keep patent medicines, do you not?—Yes.

4874. Then if chemists were to be closed, you would have to be closed?—Yes, in that department.

4875. But besides grocery, you keep ironmongers' goods, shovels and spades?—Yes, we have a china and glass department, and furnishing ironmongery, and so on.

4876. General stores, generally speaking?—Yes. That Clause 5 is ridiculous, in fact.

4877. And generally in your shops you keep all sorts of different things?—Yes.

4878. And throughout London especially it is becoming more and more the custom, is it not, to keep different things in one shop?—Yes.

4879. What would be the action of this Clause 5, supposing that different traders decided to have a half-holiday on different days of the week, as regards a shop that kept different sorts of things?—It would be confusion worse confounded.

4880. I suppose you mean by that that all the shop would have to be closed on each half-holiday, so that the shop would have to be closed every day?—It looks as if you would have to shut up all the shops each day in each week in the year.

4881. Every day you would have to have a half-holiday?—Yes.

4882. You say that you have been connected with voluntary action for some years?—Yes, I have always worked at earlier closing, but I have not worked in conjunction with any association. I have not been a member of the Early Closing Association, nor have I been a member of the Voluntary Early Closing Association; but I have always, in my particular district in Mile End, when I was in business there, taken the lead in earlier closing.

4883. Walton, Hassell, and Port are large people in the same way?—Yes.

4884. And Lipton's?—Yes.

4885. And a lot of the grocers about there?—Yes.

4886. Is it their habit to close earlier than you close?—No, much about the same time. The closing comes about by the requirements of the neighbourhood, and the market. If you take a market in Whitechapel, the necessities of that market require the shops to be open to eight o'clock, and they are open to eight o'clock. If they can, they begin by closing a little earlier, say, a quarter of an hour for two or three months, and then they get it on to half an hour, and so it gradually works the people up to come to shop earlier.

4887. But in the West-end neighbourhoods, even the very best West-end neighbourhoods, there are a lot of small shops just in the back streets, are there not?—Undoubtedly.

4888. And the hours of business in those shops are much later than in the big shops?—They must of necessity be so.

4889. Although they are in the same locality?—Yes, although they are in the same locality.

4890. If you were to make a ring fence, say, round Marshall and Snelgrove's, you would find, within a hundred yards round there, an enormous number of small shops that have to be open late, would you not?—Yes, they must be open late, unless you are going to say to the public that they must not buy provisions, even though they require them, and have the money to pay for them. I do not know how you are going to do that. The legal point appears to me to be not to put the onus on the shopkeeper, but to put the onus upon the purchaser, and to tell the public that they shall not purchase after a certain hour, and that if they do they shall be subject to a penalty.

Chairman.

4891. I understand that you are the vice-president of the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association?—Yes.

4892. Has your association passed any actual resolution with reference to this Bill?—I am sorry to say I have left a packet of my notes at home, inadvertently. I should have had those particulars with me. I have not the matters in my mind. The council have passed resolutions hostile to this Bill, and it is in consequence of their instructions that I come here on their behalf to give evidence in opposition to the Bill.

4893. Your council has passed a resolution against any legislation?—Yes; not against early closing, but against legislation, or legislative interference.

4894. You stated that you were treasurer of the Federation of Grocers?—Yes.

4895. But they have passed no resolution against the Bill, I think?—I believe the Federation have passed no resolution.

4896. Therefore you are speaking to-day for the Metropolitan Grocers?—For the Metropolitan Grocers only.

4897. I should like to get your hours quite clearly. If I understand right, you open at eight o'clock.

4898. And on Mondays you close at nine o'clock?—On Mondays it would be nine o'clock.

4899. On Tuesdays at nine o'clock?—Tuesdays at nine.

Chairman—continued.

4900. And Wednesdays at nine o'clock?—On Wednesdays it would be at nine o'clock.

4901. And then Thursdays?—On Thursdays where they close early at four or five o'clock, either on Wednesday on Thursday; I am not conversant with the particulars.

4902. Then on Fridays it is at ten o'clock?—On Fridays it would be nine or 10 o'clock; nine in some cases, 10 in others, or half-past 10.

4903. Or 11?—Not 11.

4904. And on Saturday it is 12 o'clock at night?—On Saturdays it would be 11 or 12 o'clock.

4905. Then for meals, what allowance do you make?—Half an hour for breakfast, and those living out of the house would have an hour for their dinner and half an hour for tea.

4906. You say that great progress has been made in early closing; but do you say that the hours were much longer than I have formulated?—When I first went to Mile End we used to keep open to 11 every night.

4907. You have stated several times that you have done a great deal for early closing: may I ask in what way you have supported early closing when you have not joined the associations?—In Mile End I was the first one to bring about the earlier closing. I got the signatures of various tradesmen to an agreement, and although some broke away, and I was asked also to break away, I said, "No, I mean going on with this question," and we did not break away. And I mean to say that it was entirely owing to my influence in Mile End that we got earlier closing there, from 11 to nine o'clock.

4908. Then when you speak of early closing you are speaking of nine o'clock at night?—The requirements of that district called for the shops to be open to nine at night. I believe they close earlier now; I believe it is half-past eight now.

4909. I only wish that the Committee should clearly understand it?—I have addressed several meetings upon the question of early closing in different parts of the metropolis.

4910. What you call early closing then is from half-past eight to nine?—Yes, as compared with 11 o'clock. When I was an assistant we were not allowed out after the shop was closed, but were kept in the shop to 12 o'clock every night.

4911. You have stated that the main support of this movement is that of the shopkeepers themselves, and that the shop assistants are really indifferent to early closing?—No, do not misunderstand me. I say that the masters as a whole take more interest in this question than do the shop assistants as a whole. That there are some shop assistants who are very much interested, and who take great interest in the matter, and work very hard in the matter, one must admit; but I am speaking of them collectively, not individually.

4912. Do you mean to tell the Committee that the assistants collectively in London are not anxious for shorter hours?—They are not so anxious as the masters; at least they do not exhibit their anxiety. Upon that point I might say that I am supported in that opinion by a report from the Voluntary Early Closing Association at a meeting held on the 2nd of July 1891.

Chairman—continued.

Upon the motion of Mr. Hicks, of Messrs. Lister and Co., and seconded by Mr. Turner, of Messrs. Trewby and Co., a resolution was moved: "That this meeting regrets the apathy of the shop assistants of this district, and asks them to prove that they value the Thursday five o'clock closing by subscribing to the funds of the South London Early Closing Association, through whose means this much-prized boon has been so largely secured and extended in South London this year."

4913. Do you not think that the reason why assistants have not subscribed to the Voluntary Early Closing Association has been because they thought that the old parent Early Closing Association supporting legislation was more likely to give effect to their wishes?—No, I do not think so.

4914. You stated that the Registrar General's Returns show that the assistants have not suffered in their health from these late hours?—Yes.

4915. And you have handed me in a return. Is that the return that you alluded to?—That was a return got by our secretary, and given me this morning.

4916. I only ask whether it is the return you alluded to?—Yes.

4917. In this return I find that the mortality of farmers and gardeners is about 600. Is that 600 per 10,000?—But we are dealing with shop assistants.

4918. Will you kindly answer my question; would that be 600 per 10,000?—Per 1,000 of population.

4919. That is the mortality?—That is the mortality.

4920. That is 600 per 1,000 of population?—The return I asked the secretary to get was a letter similar to this (producing another return).

4921. Never mind that; what do these figures refer to, 600 to what?—It was headed here "per 1,000." I pointed out to the secretary that it could not be so, but he said it was; but will you allow me to substitute this one for that (handing in the same). That gives the percentage, and is more clear.

4922. Do you then now hand this one in to the Committee instead of the other?—Yes.

4923. Are you aware that this has no reference to shop assistants; this has reference to shopkeepers?—But it would be an index to the health of the trade.

4924. Not at all. Our contention has been that the health of assistants suffers from the long hours. You hand in a return, and I point out to you that that return has nothing to do with assistants, but refers to shopkeepers, which is a totally different thing. If you look at the return in your hand you will see that yourself state so?—I should say that was a fair index to the health of the trade, inasmuch as the masters work with the men, and what applies to the masters would apply to the men, with this exception, that the masters work harder than the men.

4925. In your opinion the shop assistants do not work such long hours as the shopkeepers?—Certainly not.

4926. You stated that this Bill would have the effect of throwing an immense number of young young men on the streets of London?—Undoubtedly it must of necessity.

4927. And you also stated that the Bill would be quite inoperative as regards London?—In my opinion I believe it would.

4928. Then if it is inoperative as regards London, how can it throw thousands of young men on the streets of London?—I say that if the Bill were passed into an Act it would throw a number of young men on to the streets of London undoubtedly. Then I say that the Bill would be inoperative in this sense, which I have already stated: that it would have to be repealed if it were put into force, it could not work; it is unworkable.

4929. But unless it were repealed, in your opinion it would set free a large number of young men to have more leisure than they have at present?—It might set them free; but one of the first things that would happen would be that the Bill would be set at defiance.

4930. But if the Bill is not repealed and not set at defiance, you think the effect would be to set free a large number of young men?—But it would be set at defiance; it could not work; it is impracticable.

4932. Then you think that if this Bill were passed a number of shop assistants who are now at work till 9 o'clock would get away, perhaps, at 8 o'clock?—In some shops, yes, and in others, no.

4933. And do you think that would be a benefit or an evil?—I would rather say that they would be better employed for the hour if they were in the shops.

4934. You think that they would be better kept in shops till 9 o'clock, instead of getting away at 8 o'clock?—I think 9 o'clock is a very fair and proper time for closing business, and that they are better at work.

Sir Francis Powell.

4935. You mentioned certain hours of closing in your evidence in answer to questions of the right honourable Chairman; what is the district you refer to in regard to those hours?—I have got East London more particularly in my mind as being one of the more difficult districts to deal with.

4936. You spoke of assistants being thrown on the streets by this legislation; have you heard that opinion expressed by others in the business?—Undoubtedly; largely.

4937. Has it been expressed in public meetings?—I cannot call to mind at the moment.

4938. Has it been expressed in petitions?—I have no knowledge of petitions.

4939. Or in any memorials of any kind?—I have no knowledge of memorials.

4940. Then it is an opinion cherished in the breasts of some, but not publicly announced?—I think it is a matter that simply appeals to one's common sense. If a man is not employed in a shop, and he is out of a shop, where is he? He goes to the street, and from there, either to some place of amusement or to some institute, which does him good, or to some other place that does him harm.

4941. Have these young men no places to which they can resort for healthy amusement or recreation?—Yes, they have, undoubtedly.

4942. Are those means of amusement or recreation increasing?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

4943. I think, speaking generally, you are in favour of early closing?—Yes, undoubtedly.

4944. But you are in favour of voluntary early closing?—Yes.

4945. Is it not the case that in order to make voluntary early closing effective, there must be a unanimous combination among the shops?—It is impossible to get universal early closing, or closing at one given hour.

4946. By voluntary effort, do you mean?—Or by legislation. It is equally impracticable by legislation.

4947. Then you admit that it is hopeless to expect to get universal early closing by voluntary effort?—I say that voluntary early closing will do more towards attaining that object than legislative interference.

4948. May I read you a paragraph from a speech by Mr. Chamberlain. He says:—"In order to bring about this change by any voluntary combination or arrangement, the arrangement must be unanimous. One single cantankerous, ill-conditioned fellow, acting entirely for his own selfish interests, is able to spoil an arrangement which may be agreed upon by everybody else in the trade." Do you agree with that sentiment?—No one takes Mr. Chamberlain at all times as serious.

4949. Perhaps some of us might agree with you in that, but we had better not argue that question; however, that is his opinion; do you concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Chamberlain?—I should be very sorry to concur in an opinion expressed by Mr. Chamberlain.

4950. Perhaps you will allow me to put this point to you: do you agree with Mr. Chamberlain and others, that in order to get voluntary closing of shops on any effective scale, you must have a unanimous combination among all the shops existing in a particular neighbourhood?—It is not necessary to have a unanimous combination.

4951. But you are in favour of early closing?—Yes.

Chairman.

4952. But by early closing you mean 9 o'clock at night?—Do not let me be misunderstood. If I could close my business at 5 o'clock in the evening, or at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. I should prefer to do so.

4953. Excuse me, you said in answer to one of my my questions, that you thought the assistants were better employed in a shop than if they were set free earlier than nine o'clock; that has nothing to do with the convenience of the public; I was asking you simply with regard to the shop assistants?—I would prefer, then, to qualify that, and to say that in certain cases the assistants would be better there. I am not speaking of them as a whole.

Dr. Farquharson.

4954. Do you not think that that remark would have been more applicable 20 or 30 years ago, before the facilities for recreation and self-cultivation were so large as they are now?—Human nature is pretty much the same to-day as it was 100 years go.

4955. Do you not think it is improving?—No, I do not.

4956. Do you not think that young men now, when they get out of a shop, get on to a bicycle and take a ride out into the country, or go into a public library and read; do you not think there is more of that kind of thing among young men of the working class than there used to be?—Undoubtedly, there is.

4957. Therefore, perhaps, you will modify your statement in some way, and say that it is not, perhaps, so dangerous to let young men out earlier at night?—In some cases I say they would be better at work; but I am not applying that to them as a whole; do not misunderstand me, not in all cases.

4958. You do not think, then, that there is a great need of early closing on account of health?—No; the statistics given by the Registrar General do not show that the health of shop assistants suffers as compared with others. If you compare them with commercial travellers, for instance, who are out in the air all day long, it is a singular fact that the death-rate of shop assistants comes out at precisely the same figure as that of commercial travellers.

4959. Is it not the case that the Registrar General's statistics refer only to life and death?—I am speaking now of the death-rate.

4960. Is it not the case that you may have a great deal of deterioration of health without life being terminated; that a person may be alive but may be in a very bad state of health from late hours?—You will get bad health in every state of life.

4961. But you may have observed that in some of the former Committees we have had a great deal of evidence from medical men as to the deterioration of health in shop assistants, among women especially?—I do not speak on behalf of women; we do not employ women.

4962. Your assistants are only men?—Yes.

4963. I think you said that you would like to have the regulation of hours put under the local sanitary authority rather than under the County Council. What is your reason for that?—I think if it is to be brought about at all, that would be preferable.

4964. By the local sanitary authorities do you mean?—And the local district boards. They would have a better knowledge of the needs of their districts than the London County Council possibly could have.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4965. Then who would carry out the provisions of the Act; you rather object to the police?—I think the local sanitary authority are quite competent to carry out any Act which the London County Council is capable of carrying out. Before passing away from that point I do not know whether I have referred to this, but there is a singular anomaly in the Bill as to the Metropolis being one district. Under the Bill, London would be made one area.

4969. But then do not the wives, as my honourable friend reminds me, do most of the shopping?—Yes; but the wives cannot spend the money until their husbands give it them.

Mr. Tennant.

Mr. Tennant—continued.

4971. Is there not a very large class of cabdrivers who stay out till past 12 o'clock, or, at any rate, until after the theatres have closed?—Yes.

4972. Those cabdrivers would bring the money home at night and their wives would be perfectly well able to shop next day at any time, is not that so?—I beg your pardon; if there are immediate necessities the shopping is done that night.

4973. You have spoken of the necessities of the neighbourhood; that was one of your phrases; have you any shops in this part of London, the West End?—In the western suburbs.

4974. Further west, in Bayswater and places of that sort?—Yes.

4975. Do you find that the necessities of such a neighbourhood are much the same as in the eastern part of London?—Each district would vary; you would find scarely any two alike.

4976. Then, do your hours of closing vary much?—They would vary probably from half-past to half-past nine o'clock; there is always a discretion left to the managing man.

4977. I understood you to say that you employ no women; do you employ any young persons; people under 18?—There may be a few boys about.

4978. You are aware that, under the Shop Hours Act that was passed some few years ago, young persons are not permitted to work more than 74 hours per week?—Yes.

4979. I have calculated your hours, and, deducting meal hours, your hours come to 79 a week, I think?—I do not know what they come to, but the manager would be instructed that no young person should be kept at work over the legal hours. There is nothing in that.

4980. You have told us that you have done a good deal for early closing; to get earlier closing, at any rate; can you tell the Committee what the hours used to be before you were able to effect what you have done for earlier closing?—I used to keep my shop open till 11 o'clock every night, and 12 o'clock and 12.30, and 1 o'clock on Saturdays, or Sunday mornings.

4981. Used those to be the prevailing hours?—Yes.

Chairman.

4982. I should just like to ask you this: You gave evidence before the Committee of 1886, I think?—Yes.

4983. You gave evidence aagingt the Shop Hours Regulation Bill then, I think?—Against the employment of young persons?

Chairman—continued.

4984. Yes?—Yes, I did; I have always opposed legislative interference.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

4985. You alluded to the variation of hours in your different branches; there are some of your branches, I understand, where the regular hour of closing is 9.30 on an ordinary day in the week?—Then there would be a discretionary power with the manager.

4986. But you would have certain branches where the ordinary hour of closing is 9.30 o'clock?—No, 9 o'clock would be their ordinary closing hour. In fact, if I were the manager in charge of a shop, and I found business coming along and I got the shop full of people, I should not say to the porters, "Put up the shutters."

4987. But would there not be some of your branches where the ordinary hour of closing would be half-past nine?—There may be.

4989. But the point has not come under your notice specially?—I believe, so far as my knowledge goes, that every shopkeeper that employs young people has a copy of the Bill hanging up.

Mr. Frye.

4990. You have to exhibit a notice now as you do under the Factories Act?—Yes. Well, the secretary would deal with that; whatever the regulations were they would be carried out.

Mr. Tennant.

4991. If you include the meal hours in your hours, they come to 81, and your young persons would have to go away long before 9 o'clock?—Whatever would be the time necessary for them to leave off so as to bring them within the Act, that would be done; there would be no doubt about that.

4992. You do not appear to know for certain whether that is done; what I wanted to ask you particularly is: Are you in favour, or are you against all interference by the State with the hours of labour?—Certainly, I am against interference by the Legislature with all adult labour.

Mr. WILLIAM JACKSON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

4993. You represent the Hull Retail Grocers' Association?—Yes.

4994. What position do you hold in the association?—My son is honorary secretary to the Grocers' Association, and Mr. Atkinson of 1, Posterngate, is the paid secretary, and I, by arrangement, appear as representing the members of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association.

4995. Could you tell the Committee what the usual hours are of the shop assistants in Hull?—May I, before I answer that question, just read a resolution of the association that was passed in reference to the Bill?

Chairman—continued.

4996. If you prefer to do so?—"That we, the members of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association, believing that it is desirable that the local authorities should have powers vested in them to enable them to carry out the wishes of a majority of the shop-keeping community with reference to their hours of closing, and seeing that Sir John Lubbock's Bill now before the

Chairman—continued.

House, when passed, will give such powers, hereby give our support to such measure, and move that a copy of this resolution be sent to Sir John Lubbock, also to the Members of Parliament for the Borough, requesting them to give their support."

4997. I believe you have a suggestion to make with reference to one of the Clauses of the Bill; but may we take it generally that your association approves of the Bill as it stands?—With two exceptions.

4998. Now I will ask you to be good enough to state what the suggestions are that you want to make?—In Clause 1, Sub-section (1), it says, "The local authority may if they see fit." The association suggests the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may."

4999. You wish in fact to strengthen the Bill as regards that point?—As regards that point; yes.

5000. I should like to put this consideration to you; several of the witnesses have stated that under the Bill, as it stands, it is conceivable that the grocers might elect to close early on Monday, the drapers on Tuesday, the hatters on Wednesday, and the oilmen on Thursday, and that a general shop would thereby be compelled to close early on every day in the week; do you think that that is at all a probable state of things to arise?—I am not sure about it, but I think it would be a real advantage if that was done. Perhaps I have not caught the drift of your inquiry.

5001. I will put it to you in this way; it is usually the case, is it not, that the half-holiday, when it is enacted, applies to all the trades generally?—Yes.

5002. Do you think that there is any fear that one trade might have the half-holiday for one day, one for another day, one for a third day, and so on, and that the general shop would have to close very early in the day on every day in the week?—I can only say in reference to our own town that I think the verdict is very clear in reference to that. I believe the only difficulty about that is that the drapers seem as though they preferred the half-holiday on Thursday prior to the Bank holiday, instead of the Thursday following the Bank holiday. That is the only difference, so far as I know, in our town.

5003. Therefore, you do not anticipate that there would be any difficulty arising from that consideration?—I do not think so; at any rate, I think there ought not to be.

5004. Then, although you ought not to anticipate any difficulty, do you not think that it would be desirable to leave some little option to the local authority, so that if there would be any difficulty they might do something to meet it?—So long as they did not interfere with the half-holiday as a whole. I believe the entire trade of the town, speaking generally, would be sorry to lose the half-holiday.

5005. Have you any doubt that the local authority in Hull would put the Act into operation, if a majority of the shopkeepers desired it?—I do not think there would be any difficulty in that matter.

5006. And I gather that you think that you would obtain a two-thirds majority for early closing in Hull?—Well, in the first place, I think I may say that Hull is very much advanced in reference to the matter of early closing.

5007. Have you any fear in Hull of losing the half-holiday?—There seems to be some little fear of it, on account of some persons keeping open; mainly the drapers, I think.

5008. And you think that this Bill would tend to secure the half-holiday?—I think it would.

5009. That is one of the points of view from which you are in favour of the Bill, is it not?—Yes.

5010. Now, you said that there was a second point on which you would like to see the Bill modified; and I understand that it is with reference to Sub-section 2 of Clause 3?—That is it.

5011. You wish to leave out the one-third in line 21, and put in two-thirds?—Yes; the association thought it was only fair that two-thirds should be in the Bill in both cases.

5012. Could you state to the Committee what are the usual hours of closing in the town of Hull?—We vary; I may say that we have three shops in different parts of the town, and our own hours are 64 per week.

5313. At what time do you open in the morning?—At 8 o'clock in the morning.

5014. And at what time do you close in the evening?—At 7 o'clock for the first three nights; at 8 o'clock on Friday night, and at 10 o'clock on Saturday night.

5015. And are those the usual hours of the district?—There are others that keep open 69 hours, and, I think it is possible, even more than that in some cases.

5016. Do you think there is any fear that the general public would be inconvenienced if this Bill passed into law?—I am pleased to have to reply to that, for this simple reason, that I have had experience in it myself. I mean that, as a working man, and as a close observer of the action of the community, I am sure that there is a good deal to be done in some way. We seem as though we cannot manage any way of getting the trade, especially on Saturday nights in summer time, done in reasonable hours. From 6 o'clock to half-past eight during the summer months the business is neally nil; and then there is a perfect rush on the part of the public to spend their money up to closing time; and I am sure that if the entire trade of the town would come down even to 10 o'clock the same trade could be done pretty nearly, if not altogether.

5017. Therefore you do not think there is any fear that the general public would be inconvenienced if this Bill become law?—I should not like to say positively in reference to that; there may be some people who would not be able to spend their money on Saturday nights at 10 o'clock; but I am pleased to say, as the result of my own experience in a very thickly populated working neighbourhood, that we find that our trade since we closed at 10 o'clock is simply quite equal to what it was when we closed at 10.30 o'clock.

5018. Would you not say that it was very unlikely that the majority of shopkeepers would select any hour that would be inconvenient to their their customers as a whole. Supposing, for instance, it is necessary to keep open on Saturday late, the majority of the shopkeepers would wish to consult the general convenience, would they not?—I have no doubt they would, but I believe there is a great deal in looking at the other side; if the general public cannot get what they want, they will come sooner; if they cannot get what they want at half-past 10, they will come sooner.

5019. Then if that be the case, the general public would not be put to any serious inconvenience by this Bill being passed?—I do not think they would, not the general public, not by any means.

Sir Francis Powell.

5020. I want to ask you one question; it is a question I have asked several witnesses, and it is a very interesting one: What are your hours for meals?—Our hours for meals are as follows: (please observe that all our young men live out, every one of them; and therefore it applies to all) an hour for dinner, and half-an-hour on Friday and Saturday nights for tea; there are no other hours for meals.

5021. Is there no breakfast hour?—No.

Mr. Frye.

5022. They breakfast before they come?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

5023. What is about the hour for dinner; at what time is it?—It has to be divided; there have to be so many go at one time, and so many when those come back.

5024. What would be the earliest, and what the latest hour?—From 12 o'clock to 3 o'clock.

5025. And what is the time for tea?—From 5 o'clock to half-past six.

Mr. Frye.

5026. You represent an association at Hull?—Yes.

Mr. Frye—continued.

5027. Could you tell me the number of members in the association?—I am told that there are about 100 members of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association. I may say that there is a provision dealers' association as well; that is a separate association; I do not represent them.

5028. And the grocers are in favour of this particular Bill?—That was their resolution.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

5029. What is your idea as to the hour at which you might close at night; the earliest hour that you think would be practicable?—Do you mean Saturday night?

5030. No, other nights?—May I just answer that question by telling you a little bit of what we did just before the half-holiday came into operation?

5031. If you please?—I objected to the half-holiday, and suggested that shorter hours of a night would be of advantage, and two or three leading traders of the town stood out against it, and broke through it, and we said that with a distinct understanding that the hours were shorter every day we would go into that arrangement; not otherwise. We found, eventually, that the assistants preferred the half-holiday, or else we said 6.30 o'clock for the first four nights in the week, 7 o'clock on Friday night, and 10 o'clock on Saturday night, and I said: "I am sure we can do that, and I am sure the public wants can be supplied by those hours." We tried it for three months, but it did not seem to take, generally, with the town, and so we adopted the half-holiday, and our present hours, with the exception of the 10 o'clock on Saturday night. We did up to a year of this time close at 10.30.

5032. What are your usual hours on other nights?—The first three nights, our hour is 7 o'clock, and on Friday night 8 o'clock, and on Saturday night 10 o'clock.

5033. And the Thursday half-holiday is at 1 or 2 o'clock?—At 1 o'clock.

Mr. JOSEPH STAINES, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frye.

5034. YOU are a grocer at Leeds?—Yes.

5035. What is the official position that you occupy with regard to the grocery trade?—I am here as an ex-chairman of the National Federation of the Off-License Holders' Associations, and as chairman of the finance and organising committee; I am also president of the Leeds Off-License Holders' Association.

5036. And you go about a great deal amongst the trade and attend many meetings?—Yes.

5037. Where have you attended meetings with regard to this particular Bill?—I have attended every annual Council meeting of the National Federation since its formation, and I have also attended off-license meetings in Birmingham, Bradford, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Derby, Leicester, York, Hull, Scarborough, Halifax, Dewsbury, Wakefield, Huddersfield, Nottingham and Sheffield, and within the last fortnight, Blackpool.

Mr. Frye—continued.

5038. What is the opinion of the off-license holders with regard to this Bill?—There is a very strong objection amongst off-license holders to being included in this Bill.

5039. Are there many assistants employed by the great majority of these off-license holders?—No, the off-license holders, as a rule, employ very few assistants.

have from a week to 10 days' holiday in the year. The assistants in my own employ work from 60 to 63 hours per week, inclusive of meals.

5041. And would you describe how the public who patronise these shops would be affected?—It would be a great inconvenience to the public who do not purchase their draught beer in small quantities until the time for actual consumption off the premises.

5042. They would be driven to the public-house?—They would.

5043. And if the off-license holders were scheduled, as you would wish them to be, in this Bill, they would agree, I understand, only to sell excisable articles after the closing hour?—I venture to say that the off-license holders would be willing to be restricted in the sale of general groceries, but they would strongly object to being included in the operation of this Bill so far as regards the sale of excisable articles.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

5045. What class of intoxicants do you chiefly sell?—I have a full license; that is to say, wholesale and retail, wines, spirits, and beer.

5047. But I understood that draught beer could not be sold with an off-license?—Yes; the off-license holder has the right to sell beer either in bottle or on draught. People go to the off-license holder for a pint or a quart of beer in a jug or vessel and take it home and consume it at home during meal times.

Mr. Frye.

5048. They must not consume it there and then on the premises?—No.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

5049. I was under the impression that it was only bottled beer that could be sold by off-license holders?—No, we can and do sell largely beer on draught. Hence, we complain of the attempt on the part of the non-licensed grocers to compel the licensed grocer to relinquish that part of his trade unless the same law is applied to the on-licensed dealer; that is to say, the licensed victualler.

5050. Taking off-licenses as a whole, would you say that there is more beer or more spirits sold?—Beer, in the proportion of ten to one.

5051. Is it generally draught beer?—Largely.

5052. For dinner?—Dinner and supper; mostly at supper time.

5053. At what hours do they apply for the supper beer?—The beer is sold between 8 o'clock and 11 o'clock at night.

5054. Do these off-license holders require to keep open until 11 o'clock at night?—Certainly, because the on-license holder keeps open till 11 o'clock, and if those who require beer cannot get it at the off-license holders, they will be driven to the other places, either to the on-license places or to clubs. They can go to their respective political or other clubs and obtain what they want in the way of drink and take it home from those places.

5055. I thought you said you closed your shop at 7 o'clock?—Yes, but I do not sell beer on draught.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

5056. Supposing that your trade were excluded from the Bill so far as the sale of excisable liquors was concerned, would your opposition to the Bill disappear?—I venture to say that it would.

5057. It is really based upon that?—Yes; we say that it would be a hardship to us, and to the trade; but we should be willing to make that concession, that if we can continue the right to sell as they do to-day our opposition to the Bill will be withdrawn.

Mr. Baldwin.

5058. I take it that what you want is that your hours should be the same as the publican's?—Yes.

5059. Then, if they are, as regards excisable liquors which Mr. Corbett has asked you about, your objection disappears?—Yes. You see we hold the magistrate's certificate to sell during the same hours as the on-licensed holder, and we claim that the non-licensed grocer has no right whatever to say that we holding those licenses and paying for them should be compelled to close at the same time as he is; though I may say that so far as I am concerned it would make no difference to me whatever.

5060. Because you sell no beer on draught?—Yes.

5061. The people that would be affected are those that sell beer for people to take home for dinner dinner and supper?—Yes; if you include that class of trader in this Bill you will practically ruin two-thirds of the off-license holders who sell beer.

5062. Because those who sell beer on draught, I suppose, sell it chiefly for supper?—Yes, that is so.

Chairman.

5063. The Committee, then, may take it from you as ex-chairman of the Off-License Holders' Association (at any rate you speak for them) that if the Committee thought fit to exclude the off-license holders, so far as the exciseable liquors are concerned, they would not then any further oppose the Bill?—That is so.

Mr. JOHN TUNNARD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Frye.

5064. WILL you kindly explain to the Committee your position as representing the trade of Leeds?—I am the Honorary Secretary of the Leeds and District Off-License Holders' Protection Association, and also a member of the Parliamentary Committee of the Off-License Holders' Federation.

5065. Can you give the figures of the number of off-license holders in the country?—About 32,000; the retail off-licenses for England and Wales issued up to the 31st of March 1894, according to the 37th Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, is as follows: Beer and cider, 12,429; beer and wine, 1,474; wine, retail, 4,525; sweets, 1,873; beer dealers, retail, 4,046; spirit dealers, retail, 7,581; total, 31,928.

5066. And the great majority of those are these off-licenses where they sell beer in jugs in the poorer parts of the town?—That is so.

5067. And they are a great convenience to the poor people who prefer to send to such a shop instead of going to the public-house?—In the case of Leeds, for which I am more particularly speaking, on the 15th of March last I myself served, from 8 o'clock to 9 o'clock, 41 people; from 9 o'clock to 10 o'clock, 62 people; from 10 o'clock to 11 o'clock, 58; or a total of 161 persons, with draught beer for supper purposes.

5068. As a matter of fact, there is a very considerable business done from 8 o'clock at night to 11 o'clock, is there not?—That is so.

5069. The majority of the business is done in those hours?—The majority of the business is done in those hours. If the off-license shops in Leeds were closed at an hour earlier than 11 o'clock some 27,000 families would be put to serious inconvenience, inasmuch as they to-day get their supper beer from off-license places, and they would be driven either to the unlicensed clubs or to the public-houses, where they do not go at the present time, preferring to deal with the off-license holders.

Mr. Frye—continued.

5071. And you think that if this Bill becomes an Act it would very seriously affect this particular trade?—Undoubtedly. And not only would it depreciate the freeholds, but it would also affect leaseholders whose leases cannot be broken; and it would also depreciate the goodwill of the business. I might tell the Committee that in the Leeds district very considerable sums are given for the right to sell exciseable beverages at off-license premises; in fact, in many instances as much, or more, money is given than for on-license premises.

5072. They are open on Sundays, too, are they not?—They are open on Sundays from half-past 12 o'clock till half-past two, and from six o'clock to 10, for the purpose of supplying the dinner and supper beer, the same as the public-houses.

5073. Do you know the opinion of the publicans with regard to this matter; are they opposed to your being allowed to remain open?—The Licensed Victuallers' and the Wine and Beer Sellers' Associations of Leeds have passed a resolution asking that the off-license holders shall be exempted from the operation of the Bill.

5074. What do they number in Leeds?—The publicans number some 750, and the off-license holders number some 390; but only about 300 out of the 390 are grocers; the others are wine merchants, chemists, confectioners, greengrocers, pork-butchers, and, in one or two instances, they are drapers.

Mr. Samuel Smith.

5076. How many hours per week do your assistants work in this trade?—Generally, those off-license shops that employ assistants open in the morning from eight o'clock to 8.30, and invariably close at from seven o'clock to eight o'clock in the evening, except on Saturday, when they are open until 11; but there are very few assistants employed by the off-license holders, especially that section of the off-license holders who sell draught beer; the business is managed by the husband and the wife. But they do not work anything near the number of hours that their place of business is open.

5077. Did you not say that the shops are open till 11 o'clock at night?—Nearly all the off-draught beer licence premises are open till 11 o'clock at night.

5078. I thought you said just now, in answer to one of my questions, that the shops were open from eight o'clock in the morning until seven or eight o'clock at night?—I was speaking of the shops generally, not the off-licence beer shops.

5079. I am only speaking of the off-licence beer shops?—They are open from eight o'clock in the morning till 11 o'clock at night.

5080. If there were assistants employed in those shops, that would be an extremely long time for them, would it not?—It would; but there are not assistants there; the business is worked in the man's own family and there is comparatively little business done except between the hours of 11 and two, and then again from eight o'clock to 11 in the evening.

5081. But they sell groceries as well?—They do sell groceries as well, but the bulk of their trade is done in the hours which I have named.

Mr. Frye.

5083. Would you put that return in?—Yes (handing in the same).

Mr. Samuel Smith.

5084. Who are the people who generally come for the supper beer?—The respectable working people.

5085. Is it the husband, the wife, or the children who come for it?—For the supper beer, it is generally the wife; in many cases the husband comes, of course; but the children do not come after nine, and very few come so late as nine. The children may be sent during the day, but there are very few of them that come in comparison to the husband and wife. I do not wish to infer that the beer is fetched for the wife; it is fetched for the wife and husband.

5086. Do you think there is any danger of the children getting into the habit of sipping the beer as they carry it along the streets?—There are always abuses, but I think comparatively few in that particular respect. I do not myself see one case a week, and I am moving about the town every day.

5087. You do not think it is an evil, children coming to carry beer for their parents?—I should like to say that personally I do not like to see very young children come for it; but when a boy gets to 10 or 11 years of age, I think he is capable of running an errand for his parents.

Mr. Samuel Smith—continued.

5088. You do not think that it leads to his sipping the beer?—Not at all.

Mr. Frye.

5089. And he would do that just the same if he brought it from the public-house, would he not?—Just the same, 5090. At any rate, he would have the same opportunities?—Yes.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

5091. You desire that the off-licence holders should be excluded from this Bill, so far as the sale of exciseable liquors is concerned?—Yes.

5092. Do you think that there would be any difficulty in drawing a line and enabling them to carry on that trade while preventing their carrying on the general grocery trade?—I think it would be a considerable hardship to a number of the public; but at the same time I do not see much difficulty in drawing a line, inasmuch as off-licence holders are law-abiding people, and are already under police surveillance the same as public-houses.

5093. Would it generally happen that the two businesses would be carried on in distinct parts of the shop?—No.

5094. There would not be separate counters, for instance?—No.

5095. The two are quite mixed up with each other?—Yes.

5096. Then your evidence would be, first of all, that your own opinion is in favour of exempting the trade; and, secondly, that a sufficient check could be had upon it by inspection to prevent groceries being sold?—Yes, in the same way as at the present time. I might, in support of that contention, refer to the fact that very few off-licence holders in the country are ever brought before magistrates for selling after the regulation hours.

Mr. Frye.

5097. Might I also ask you whether they are not under the inspection of the police just the same as public-houses?—Yes, exactly. I have stated so already.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

5098. You think that in that way there would be no difficulty in preventing their selling groceries while allowing them to continue selling exciseable articles after the hour of closing?—I am quite sure there would be no difficulty (although the hardship remains), for this reason: that the off-licence holder is not going to risk losing his licence for being convicted of selling other articles.

Mr. Baldwin.

5099. I take it that as a rule the off-licence holder who sells beer is what you may call a small man, he does not employ any assistants?—I do not think 5 per cent. of them employ assistants.

5100. It is a business managed by a man and his wife?—It is a business managed by a man and his wife.

5101. And,

Mr. Baldwin—continued.

5101. And, as a rule, they simply supply the working classes with what they want for dinner and supper?—They supply the more respectable portion of the working classes with what they want for dinner and supper.

Mr. Baldwin—continued.

5102. That makes the main part of your trade?—Yes.

5103. And very often children are sent to off-license premises to fetch the beer when the parents do not like to send them to public-houses; is not that so?—Yes.

Mr. JAMES AUSTIN STACEY, called in; and further Examined.

Chairman.

5104. YOU promised when you were here before that you would put in some resolutions passed by the trades' councils; are you prepared to do so now?—Yes, I can hand them in. (The same were handed in.)

5105. You also stated that you would put in resolutions passed at different public meetings in support of early closing by legislation; are you prepared to do that?—Yes. (The same were handed in.)

5106. Have there been any resolutions passed against this Bill at any public meetings, so far as you are aware?—Not so far as I am aware. There was a meeting held in 1888 at Exeter Hall, presided over by Lord Charles Beresford, which was of a hostile character, and I have a report of it here. The report that I have is in a paper of 28th April 1888. The meeting had reference to the old Compulsory Closing Bill.

5107. That referred to a Bill which proposed to settle the hours of closing for all the tradesmen, and not to allow tradesmen to settle the hours of closing for themselves?—Yes.

5108. Therefore it did not apply to the present Bill?—No.

5110. What are you reading from?—From a report in the "South London Press" of the 28th April 1888: "That this meeting of small traders, costermongers, and stallkeepers having considered the Compulsory Closing Bill, deem it an unjustifiable piece of class-legislation; unjustifiable on the grounds it is based upon, and interfering with the liberty to buy and sell at convenience; that it would inflict a cruel hardship on those whose livelihood is a precarious one, ruin numbers of small struggling traders, and sweep thousands into want and pauperism; that it is quite unsuitable to the requirements of the large, varied, and unsettled population to be found in this vast metropolis; and that the chairman be requested to sign a petition to both Houses of Parliament to that effect." The meeting was very uproarious from that point.

Chairman—continued.

5111. I do not think we need go into that; I think that is enough——

Mr. Frye.

5111*. And that resolution was carried against the Bill?—The report says that the motion was put amid great uproar and was carried by a large majority.

Chairman.

5112. That had reference to a totally different Bill?—Yes.

5113. The meetings that have been held in favour of legislation have been in many cases presided over by the mayors of the respective towns, have they not?—Usually so, such as that at the Birmingham Town Hall in 1892, and that at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, where the mayors presided. Those were towns meetings, and they are characteristic of other meetings throughout the country at which the mayors presided and resolutions were carried unanimously.

5114. Do you anticipate any difficulty arising from Clause 5 of the Bill as regards the classification of shops?—None whatever.

5116. Do you know of any case in the whole country where there are more than two different days for the half-holiday in different trades?—No.

5117. You would probably be aware of it if there was such a thing in existence?—I think so.

5118. It is the case, I think, in many places, is it not, that the half holiday is at present rather insecure, and there is a dread of losing it unless there is some power of enforcing it under this Bill or in some other manner?—That is so; and

and I should like to quote in regard to that the editorial introduction to a book published by the Early Closing Association, the "Commercial Traveller's Guide." This is a book that has been published for many years by the Early Closing Association, which gives a list of the market days and early closing days throughout the country, and the editorial preface to the last edition is as follows; it is not very long: "Every effort has been made to ensure accuracy in this Guide. The editor is greatly indebted to many travellers who have pointed out inaccuracies in the previous edition. Unfortunately, the Guide cannot pretend to absolute accuracy, for the half-holiday movement is in a state of continual unrest. At present it is everywhere liable to interruption or re-arrangement, as the number of alterations in the present edition will show. There is a strong and growing feeling amongst tradesmen to invoke the Legislature for some form of permanency for the half-holiday, and if this is obtained greater regularity will necessarily ensue."

Mr. Frye.

5120. So that there are three days now: Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday?—Allow me to add to what I was saying, that in several cases we have induced the traders to substitute Thursday for Wednesday; and we may look forward to a possible and probable substitution of Thursday for Wednesday, so that eventually in London we may have the ordinary establishments, what I have usually termed second and third-rate and poorer shops, closing on Thursday, and the few leading houses on Saturday.

5121. But you will never get a general half-holiday on Saturday, of course, in London?—I fear not; not without this Bill, and, indeed, not with the Bill, because Saturday being, by force of habit and custom for an indefinite number of years past, a late closing night, and a marketing night, too, I expect the Thursday closing will be more prevalent under the Bill than Saturday.

Chairman.

5122. Those are cases, are they not, of early closing on one day of the week, but hardly what you would call a half-holiday. At what hour, for instance, is the closing on Wednesday and Thursday?—We began, in advocating the Thursday half-holiday, with a five o'clock closing; but in many districts in the south-east of London, in the Old Kent-road district, and the east of London particularly, embracing the whole of that great area from Aldgate down to the Forest, and from Victoria Park down to the River, we have gradually substituted two o'clock for five in the drapery, and in a few of the grocery, ironmongery, and other trades; but the five o'clock closing is still general in the poorer shops of all trades.

5123. Is there any case in London of any district where there are certain shops closed at two o'clock on three days in the week; I do not mean the same classes of shops, but one class of shop closing at two o'clock on one day, and another class of shop closing at two o'clock on another day, and so on?—None.

Mr. Frye.

5124. Do you find the butchers, for instance, like to close on Monday?—They are amenable to Thursday closing.

5125. But they do now close on Mondays, do they not?—In some districts. Many years ago we induced the whole of the Lambeth butchers to close on Mondays as an experiment; 12 or 13 years ago I am speaking of.

Chairman.

5126. At what hour?—At five o'clock.

5127. My point is that closing at four or five o'clock can hardly be called a half-holiday, can it?—That is quite so; but I was replying to Mr. Frye that even the butchers, the most difficult of all trades, who have been held up as an example of difficulty in getting one universal day of closing, are amenable to Thursday closing, as we have shown again and again in our district work.

Mr. Frye.

5128. But even five o'clock is a great acquisition to tradesmen and their assistants?—Yes.

5129. They go for excursions into the country, and so on?—Yes.

Sir Francis Powell.

5130. Why do they prefer Thursday to Wednesday as a half-holiday?—I have often been curious to ascertain that, and have questioned shopkeepers; they generally concur in saying that there is a marked diminution in business on the Thursday night, and many of them are inclined to attribute that (and we, the Early Closing Association, certainly do attribute it) to the fact that many years ago we started a campaign and obtained the signatures of some 700 firms in the printing, the building, and other trades, for Friday payment of wages. We were very successful in that campaign, and Friday became very much the day for paying wages instead of Saturday. Now, Thursday is the day furthest away from pay day when there is the least money, perhaps, in hand for shopping purposes. That, we believe, is the cause of the falling off of trade on the Thursday night, and, consequently, the easier conditions that obtain to make Thursday the closing day.

5131. That would apply to working-class districts only, I suppose?—All the suburbs are working-class districts. Take, for instance, the western suburbs, Shepherd's Bush, Hammersmith, and Notting Hill; just as you have in the East End of London, so you have there the same very poor population referred to by the witness this morning, cabmen, gardeners, and labourers; that is to say, people who take day wages. In fact, we see no difference in many districts, north, south, east, or west, as to the poor populations.

5132. Have you any information as to the hours for meals in shops?—Yes. I was asked by you to put in some additional information to that which I gave previously on that point, and I have here a number of letters from firms of employers giving me the information; they go to confirm my previous answer, and they even point out that my answer was liberal in the extreme. They show that the average meal-time at mid-day consists of 30 minutes, and that it is usually so. I am not acquainted with any case where it exceeds 30 minutes.

5133. The usual and the average are very different things?—Yes, I should not have said average; I should have said usual.

5134. What is the usual time for dinner?—Thirty minutes.

5135. Is that for those living on the premises or for those living off, or both?—That is for those living on the premises; and I may add to that that it is very exceptional to find a shop assistant living away from the premises in London.

Mr. Frye.

5136. But in the country towns it is very common, is it not?—Yes, in Glasgow and some other towns it is common for shop assistants to live away from the premises; but in London it is very exceptional to find assistants living away.

Sir Francis Powell.

5137. Do you consider that 30 minutes is the ordinary dinner-time for shops in London?—Yes.

5138. Including the West End shops?—Yes; there may here and there be a slight extension, but I am not acquainted with any such case. I may read a letter here, perhaps, which comes from a manager in a West End house, I may say in one of the very leading West End houses.

5139. In what trade?—Drapery, mantles, costumes, millinery, and all that sort of thing. This gentleman writes: "Dear Mr. Stacey,—I am very sorry to have only received your letter, dated 3rd inst., to-day. I am anxious that your and others' endeavours shall be successful in this important matter. In the largest houses I am only sorry to say that the time allowed for dinner is but 30 minutes, and that for tea 15 and 20 minutes. Now, in large houses of business, I particularly wish to point out to you one great disadvantage; the dining-room is usually a distance to get at, and one has to traverse various flights of stairs, invariably following a slow crowd the distance to travel, and by the time you have your seat at table and served with dinner you find you have left but 20 minutes (this is alluding to assistants) to be back in your department and ready for business, and I am sorry to say that when assistants are but a few minutes late at their counter they invariably get the rule by those in power as shopwalkers." The rest of the question is hardly germane to the question of meal hours.

5140. You have had before you evidence to the same effect as that which you have given with regard to the 30 minutes?—Yes.

5141. Is that confined to London?—Yes, that is confined to London.

Chairman.

5142. The evidence, you mean, is confined to London, not the practice?—That is so.

Sir Francis Powell.

5143. Then, as regards the time for tea, what further information have you got?—The usual time for tea is 15 or 20 minutes, but I could point you to one of the largest firms trading as stores in London where absolutely no teatime is allowed.

5144. Not even on Saturday when the hours are so long?—I am speaking of the ordinary nights of the week.

5145. You have no knowledge of the country, I think?—What applies to London generally applies to country towns, but there is greater freedom generally in the small country towns, where in the small shops the family principle generally obtains.

5146. Do you consider, speaking generally, that in the shops throughout the country 30 minutes is the only time allowed for dinner?—Yes; I should say that would be a fair answer where there is a regular staff of assistants; anything like a staff, and where the shopwalker system obtains.

Mr. Frye.

5147. In speaking about the half-holiday, and the best day for the half-holiday, did I rightly understand that your remarks referred to London?—Yes.

5148. In country towns you could not have Thursday, for instance, if it was market-day, could you?—No.

5149. You do not mean a universal Thursday closing?—No; my reply referred to London.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

5150. You have heard it suggested that off-license holders might have their shops closed for grocery purposes and might still have them open for the sale of exciseable liquors?—Yes.

5151. Do you see any great difficulty in carrying that out?—No; I think a concession might very well be made in that respect; that the off-license holders should be allowed to maintain access to the beer counter or to supply strictly exciseable articles.

5152. Do you think it is desirable that some special protection should be offered to those large firms who close on Saturday, giving them, for example, power to apply to the local authority to have Saturday fixed on their behalf and to be exempted from other days' closing?—I think that would be well; and I would like to say that at the Nottingham Congress, in October 1893, a resolution was passed to the effect that any establishments which, for a period of three months prior to the passing of the Bill, had closed not later than five o'clock on Saturdays, should be exempted from the half-holiday section.

Tuesday, 7th May 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Baldwin.	Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. Cameron Corbett.	Sir John Lubbock.
Mr. Diamond.	Sir Blundell Maple.
Mr. Edwards.	Sir Francis Powell.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM IRELAND, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

5153. YOU are ex-president of the Family Grocers and Purveyors' Association of Dublin, I believe?—Yes.

5154. Do you attend this Committee on behalf of that association?—Yes.

5155. What are the hours in Dublin for shop assistants generally?—Do you mean all kinds of shops?

5156. Will you give it in any form you can give it conveniently?—The average hours are from eight to eight; of course some of them are shorter and some longer.

5157. Have you any half-holiday in Dublin?—No.

5158. On Saturday nights are they at all later, or what?—Some of the larger shops close on Saturday; that is, some of the large drapers close at four o'clock; also some of the ironmongers close at four o'clock on Saturdays.

5159. What about the smaller shops?—Some of the smaller shops do not close on Saturday until 11 o'clock, and some 12 o'clock.

5160. Do you think those hours might be shortened without inconvenience to the public?—Most decidedly.

5161. Are you hopeful of getting them shortened by voluntary action?—I am afraid not; though a great many have voluntarily closed, they are in the minority.

5162. Do you think you have come to about the limits of what voluntary action can do?—Yes, though the tendency is of late years to close somewhat earlier.

5163. Is your association in favour of some legislation on the subject?—Yes, almost unanimously.

5164. Has your association considered the Bill before this Committee?—It has.

5165. I will give you the opportunity in a moment of making any suggestions in detail, but will you state to the Committee what the feeling of your association is with reference to the Bill generally?—The feeling relative to the Bill is that the members would support it, and they approve of the Bill as a whole, but there are some clauses which they would take exception to.

5166. Taking the Bill as a whole, your association is in favour of it, is it?—Yes, that is, the spirit of the Bill for earlier closing.

Chairman—continued.

5167. The spirit and the general provisions?—Yes.

5168. Will you now state the points on which you would like to suggest modifications in the Bill?—My association is of the idea that it might be strengthened.

5169. Then, on the whole, is your association in favour of the Bill almost unanimously?—Yes, almost.

5170. But you wish to see it strengthened, I understand?—Yes.

5171. On Clause 1 there is an amendment which I believe you wish to suggest?—Yes; in Clause 1, where it states "shops within a district," the word "district," I think, should mean a town or city, inasmuch as if you divide, for instance, Dublin into districts or divisions, there would be some difficulty in carrying out the provisions of that clause.

5172. May I point out to you that that is what the word "district" means. If you look at Clause 12 you will find the word "district" means area in which the local authority has jurisdiction; therefore, in the case of Dublin it does mean the whole of Dublin. That you approve of, I understand?—Yes.

5173. You wish, I think, to put in the word "shall" instead of the word "may" towards the end of the clause?—Yes.

5174. Have you any doubt that the local authority in Dublin would put the Act into operation if the two-thirds majority were obtained?—I think they would.

5175. At any rate, however, you would like to see the Bill strengthened on that point?—Yes.

5176. Is there any other amendment which you wish to suggest in Clause 1?—I think not. With regard to Clause 1, I rather think it would be better to have it compulsory.

5177. But you have said that already. Is that all that you wish to say with regard to Clause 1?—Yes.

5178. You have not suggested any other amendments, have you?—No, that is the only one.

5179. Then the Committee may take it that your association is in favour of the Bill, but you wish to see it strengthened in that one particular?

Chairman—continued.

ticular?—With regard to shops, and what is meant by the word "shops," I do not know how you would deal with public-houses in Dublin.

5180. Public-houses do not come within the scope of the Bill?—But what I wanted to refer to was this: almost all the public-houses in Dublin sell groceries, and some of them provisions; how you would deal with that matter I do not know.

5181. As regards the working classes, are you aware whether your trades council in Dublin has passed any resolution in support of the earlier closing of shops?—I am not quite aware whether they have passed resolutions, but I know they are in favour of the early closing movement.

5182. Do you think the Committee may take it that they would be in favour of this Bill?—I believe they would.

5183. Do you believe the public would be in any way inconvenienced by this Bill?—I believe not.

Mr. Diamond.

5184. Will you kindly state to the Committee what is the membership of your association; have you a large number of members?—They number upwards of 200; about 200 is the number now, but they are increasing according as they see the benefits of the association.

5185. What relation does that number bear to the total number of tradesmen in Dublin who might fairly be expected to be members of your association?—The tradesmen are not members of our association.

5186. What is your association composed of?—Shopowners, family grocers, and wine merchants.

5187. What is the number of family grocers in Dublin altogether?—The number of family grocers in Dublin is about 280, taking them all round.

5188. And you have 200 of them in your association, have you?—I should qualify that answer; that is, there are about 280 family grocers and purveyors altogether.

5189. You have none of the employés as members of your association. I suppose it is purely an association of the employers, is it?—Yes.

5190. You spoke about the trades council in Dublin being in favour of the early closing of shops, and you also referred to the fact that most of the public-houses sell groceries as well?—They do.

5191. Is it true that the trades council is opposed to the earlier closing of public-houses, and also the Sunday closing of them, and has passed resolutions to that effect?—I am not aware of that.

5192. I think you will find that that is so, but you do not know, I understand, whether it is so or not?—I do not.

5193. With regard to your local authority in Dublin, what number of the licensed grocers do you think would be members of your local authority; a considerable number or not. This bears upon the point as to whether or not the local authority might be inclined to put the Act into force?—Of the members of the Corporation of Dublin who are grocers I believe there are three; I myself am one.

5194. But I refer also to members who are licensed victuallers?—I believe there are 20 of those.

5195. Do they sell provisions and so forth?—No, I do not think more than one of those sells provisions, but they all sell, I think, without exception (there may be one or two exceptions), groceries.

5196. Do you think if this Bill is passed this peculiarly constituted local authority, such as your corporation is, would be inclined to put it into force; I presume you do not think they would, because you want it made compulsory?—Just so.

5197. Can you tell the Committee how you think the general public of Dublin might be affected by this early closing, for instance, with regard to the payment of wages; how are wages paid in Dublin?—They are generally paid on Fridays.

5198. At what time?—It may be in the evening, it may be in the middle of the day, when employed go to dinner. Some do not pay until Saturdays, but the general rule is to pay on Fridays, and there would be no difficulty about that.

5199. At what time are those who are paid on Saturdays paid?—In the middle of the day.

5200. So that you believe the general public would be in no way inconvenienced by this Bill, do you?—I believe not; I believe, on the contrary, they are anxious that there should be early closing.

5201. Have the tradesmen ever made any effort in Dublin to get the half-holiday; has that been thought a desirable thing?—We have had a discussion on that matter, but the majority of our members think it would be an inconvenience to the public to have a half-holiday as in England and other places.

5202–3. Are you aware that in this country it is a very common thing?—Yes, I understand so.

5204. And that tradesmen here have not found it is an inconvenience to the general public?—Just so; I am only giving you the idea of the people of Dublin; they think it would be an inconvenience.

5205. Do you think they do not give the half-holiday purely because they are desirous of preventing inconvenience to the general public?—I should not like to say that. Personally, when I saw how it worked in England, I was in favour of half-holidays on Wednesdays or Thursdays, but, having fully considered the matter, I think that the earlier closing every day, and closing earlier on Saturday, would be the better system.

5206. Then you would be in favour, practically, of getting the half-holiday on Saturday, would you not?—No.

5207. What do you mean by early closing on Saturday?—I mean earlier closing than at present.

5208. There have been no public meetings in Dublin, have there, with regard to the matter of early closing?—There may have been; I think there there were meetings of the Grocers Assistants' Association, which passed resolutions.

5209. Have you endeavoured to get early closing by voluntary effort; have you canvassed?—We have obtained the opinion of all the members, but inasmuch as we have not all the people of Dublin connected with our association, we would not like to adopt anything that we think might prejudice or interfere with our members, inasmuch as other people would remain unfettered.

5210. You have told the Chairman that your association is in favour of the Bill?—Yes, they are, almost unanimously.

5211. And I suppose you can say that the assistants are in favour of it?—That follows.

5212. And you think that the general public will be in no way inconvenienced by it, do you?—No; on the contrary, I know from my customers, and other members of the association have stated that their customers have told them, that they would be glad of an earlier closing than at present, and that they would assist in every way to bring it about.

5213. Do you think you could get the requisite two-thirds majority in Dublin?—I think so. The only difficulty I can see in the way of it is what I have told you already, namely, that the public-houses sell groceries as well as the family grocers.

5214. So that a public-house may be open for the sale of spirits, and in the same shop there may be groceries and provisions?—Yes.

5215. And a grocery and provision merchant next door, whose place would be closed if this Bill were put into force, would feel it a hardship if the public-house next door was able to sell provisions and groceries while his place was closed?—Just so.

5216. And you think, do you, unless something can be done to deal with that aspect of the question, it is not likely that the grocer next door would close at all, or would vote for early closing unless the shops could be dealt with in which spirits were sold as well as groceries?—Yes, that is true; but I know in many places in Dublin, the more wealthy localities would close even if that were so. For instance, I myself close at seven o'clock, or a quarter past seven, while I have two neighbours, one on each side of me, having retail licensed houses, who do not close until 11 o'clock.

5218. That is to say, as a general rule, the amount of such trade is very small?—Very small indeed.

Sir Francis Powell.

5219. Do all the shops close at the same hour throughout Dublin, or have you different hours in different localities?—We have different hours in different districts. In the poorer districts they close later.

5220. What are your hours in Dublin for meals?—Generally between one and three. If the assistants are living out, they get from one to two, or two to three for dinner; if, on the contrary, they are living and boarded in the house, then they get half-an-hour or 40 minutes.

5221. They do not get a complete hour, do they?—No, not if they are living in the house, as a rule.

5222. How much time has an assistant living on the premises allowed for a meal?—There is no specified time; he goes upstairs or somewhere in the house for dinner, and when he has done he comes back.

5223. Is there any regulation?—No, except when he is living out, then there is an hour given.

5224. What security is there that any given person has half-an-hour or 40 minutes allowed him for dinner?—There is no security. No time is specified.

5225. Then it comes to this, does it not, that there is considerable uncertainty in the matter?—Yes, he may be half-an-hour, he may 25 minutes, or 35 minutes, the employers are not very strict as to the time. For instance, my young men board in the house and sleep in the house, but I do not specify any time that they are to remain at breakfast, dinner, or tea.

5226. Is there no minimum time?—No.

5227. I presume you do not allow them to stay beyond a certain time?—Well, they do not stop beyond what is a usual time.

5228. What is the custom with regard to breakfast; do they breakfast before the work begins?—They do. Are you speaking of the young men who board in the house?

5229. Yes.—They do not breakfast before the day begins, as a rule. The shop opens at eight o'clock, and about an hour afterwards they breakfast.

5230. After the first arrangements for the day are made?—Yes.

5231. What is the rule about tea?—They have tea about six o'clock.

5232. How much time do they have?—Twenty minutes, or 25 minutes, or half-an-hour.

5233. Then the tea is probably a more liberal meal than we have in England?—No, it is a shorter time in Dublin, I think.

Dr. Farquharson.

5234. How many young men do you employ?—Six.

5235. When do they get away in the evening?—My young men get away about half-past seven.

5237. The Committee had evidence from another witness that he objected to early closing because he thought young men would only get into mischief, is that your impression?—I think that is an old-fashioned idea. I do not think a young man who is right and proper should be punished because it happens that another young man goes wrong.

5238. You think, do you, that young men would really rather prefer to indulge in good amusements now than bad?—It depends on how a young man is brought up, there are so many facilities for improvement after a man leaves off work, such as reading, gymnastics, riding bicycles, and so on.

5239. Are bicycles much used in Dublin?—Yes.

5240. Is there a large working-class population in Dublin?—Yes, but not so large as in Belfast, or a town like that. There are not so many artisans as there are in Belfast.

5241. But I suppose like any other great towns the hours of the working man have been very much reduced?—Yes.

5242. He has shorter hours?—Yes.

5243. And that would make shopping at a reasonable hour much easier, I suppose?—Yes.

5244. Would you go so far as to say that a working man having got shorter hours for himself, would sympathise with the shop assistants in endeavouring to get shorter hours?—My experience is they would be glad if the assistants got shorter hours; they have sympathy for them, there is no doubt.

5245. Do you think if the shops were shut earlier than they are now, that business would regulate itself to meet the altered conditions?—Quite so; I find it so.

5246. Without causing any inconvenience to the working classes?—Without causing any inconvenience whatever.

Mr. Edwards.

5247. You have no assistants members of your association, have you?—No, it is not for assistants; they have an association of their own.

5248. Upon what general grounds do you support early closing?—Simply because I think it is good for the young man and good for the employer. I think it is good both for the employer and the employé, without causing any inconvenience to the customers.

5249. That would be so with regard to people who had a settled income which they could rely upon at any particular time; they could shop when they liked; but how about the shops in the poorer districts, you said the shops in the poor districts were open later, did you not?—Yes, they are.

5250. Up to what hour?—They are open up to very indefinite times, indeed; I am sorry to say that a great many small provision shops are open to 12 o'clock.

5251. Why should that be?—It is merely habit, I think, and the next-door neighbour, who is a customer, could go in at 9 o'clock just as easily as 12 o'clock to purchase.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

5252. They are not open every night in the week until 12 o'clock, are they?—Yes, in some poor districts.

5253. Then, that disposes, does it not, of the notion that they are open late in order that the workmen may get their pay before they go shopping, because they do not get paid every day in the week, do they?—No, once a week.

5254. It has been contended that you must keep these shops open on a Saturday night until very late, because men are paid on the Saturday and the missus cannot go shopping until the master gives her money?—But they are paid now on Fridays. It has become the practice more every year that they are paid on Fridays, or the middle of the day on Saturdays.

5255. Saturday, in most places, is an off-day, is it not?—Yes.

5256. And they are paid in the middle of the day, are they?—Yes.

5257. Therefore there is no reason, is there, why shops in the poorer districts should not close earlier on a Saturday just the same as on any other day so far as the payment of wages goes?—Quite so.

5258. And it is only the bad habit of the public, which you think this Bill would put an end to?—Yes.

5259. Are there many small shopkeepers in your association?—I think about half of them, not quite half, probably.

5260. Have you taken any means of ascertaining the views of small shopkeepers upon this matter?—Outside our association, do you mean?

5261. Yes.—We have not, but I believe from what I know that they are in favour of earlier closing.

5262. It has been represented to the Committee that it might injure them; do you believe that?—I do not.

Chairman.

5263. You speak, we understand, with the authority of the Family Grocers and Purveyors' Association, but I believe you know generally, to some extent, the feeling of other shopkeepers in Dublin?—Yes.

5264. Can you tell the Committee at all what that feeling is?—We are, as a rule, open later than in any other business in Dublin.

5265. Do you think that the general feeling of the shopkeepers in Dublin would be in favour of this Bill?—Yes, I do.

Mr. Edwards.

5266. Do you say that at public-houses they sell groceries?—Yes.

5267. You do not mean that a grocer may have an off-license, do you?—No. They sell groceries in public-houses in Dublin. I believe in many places they do not, and I do not approve of the system, I may say.

Dr. PERCY KIDD, called in; and Examined.

Dr. Farquharson.

5268. I BELIEVE you are a physician practising in London?—I am.

5269. How long have you been in practice, may I ask?—About 15 years.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

5270. What are your medical qualifications?—I am a Doctor of Medicine of the University of Oxford, a Fellow of the College of Physicians, and a Member of the College of Surgeons.

5271. You

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

5271. You are attached, I believe, to two large London hospitals?—Yes, the London Hospital and the Brompton Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest.

5272. Do you see out-patients or in-patients?—At the London Hospital I see out-patients and in-patients. At the Brompton Hospital I have now no longer to do with the out-patients; I am physician there.

5273. I suppose you see a very large number of out-patients daily?—Yes, a very large number.

5274. How many do you think you see in the course of a day?—I could not say exactly, because of the system of keeping the records; but I should think I see probably about 3,000 in the course of the year at the London Hospital.

5275. How many have you been in the habit of seeing at the Brompton Hospital?—Not quite so many; on an average 2,000. I saw 24,000 during my period of office as assistant physician there.

5276. Of all sexes and sizes?—Yes.

5277. And drawn, I suppose, from a pretty wide radius?—Yes, particularly so in the case of the Brompton Hospital, because the patients come from towns all round about the neighbourhood of London, and from the lower and middle class in London; but at the London Hospital the class is more uniformly the poorer class.

5278. I suppose you see people of a great variety of occupations?—Yes, a very great variety.

5279. Among those whom you see there, do you see many shop assistants?—At the Brompton Hospital a great many; not so many at the London Hospital.

5280. From your experience, have you formed any conclusion as to the effects, injurious or otherwise, of late hours of shopping on the health of shop assistants?—Yes, I have formed certain conclusions, but they may be divided into comparatively few heads. Shall I state those heads?

5281. Yes, I think it would be convenient if you were to describe generally the effects?—The most common effect I have noticed is general deterioration of health; very general symptoms, which we medically attribute to over action, and debility of the nervous system; that includes a great deal more than what is called nervous disease, such as indigestion, constipation, a general slackness, and a great many other indefinite symptoms.

5282. Are those symptoms more marked in women than in men?—I think they are much more marked in women. I should say one sees a great many more women of this class than men, but I have seen precisely the same symptoms in men, I should not say in the same proportion, because one has not been able to make anything like a statistical inquiry. There are other symptoms, but I mention those as being the most common. Another symptom, especially amongst women, is anæmia, bloodlessness or pallor, that I have no doubt is connected with long hours indoors.

5283. What part of the shop life do you think anæmia is specially due to?—I think largely to the want of sunlight, and also confinement indoors.

5284. Would prolonged standing have an injurious effect upon the female constitution?—I have no doubt it has, but I have not personally had the same experience of that; I have no doubt it causes varicose veins, but I have not seen many cases of that sort.

5285. Would you consider that calculations referring purely to life and death are altogether a satisfactory way of getting the health conditions of a community?—I should think it is a very imperfect one; it does not take account of the impoverished health which is important to the individual; it might not seriously curtail his life, but it makes his life much less pleasant and useful. I think any general loss of health ought to be taken into account.

5286. Then, will you define the various disorders which you think may be caused primarily by long hours in shops. Would you consider that long shopping hours would have the effect of aggravating diseases from which persons already suffered?—No doubt it would in some cases; for instance, long standing to a person who has heart disease would be a serious aggravation of the malady. The same with other diseases, too.

5287. The lungs, perhaps?—Certainly, if disease is present; I do not know that it would cause disease of the lungs, but it would aggravate it.

5289. So far as you know, do you think that the women whom you have seen, whose health has suffered from long hours, have come from big shops or small shops?—I really could not answer that question; I have no facts to enable me to answer that.

5290. Would you think, looking at the matter in the abstract, that the hygienic conditions are more likely to be unfavourable in a small shop than in a large shop?—Decidedly, I should say, as a matter of opinion.

5291. There are a great many small shops, are there not, carried on by a man himself, and his wife, and perhaps a son or daughter, where the hours are longer, and where the air would be bad and probably stuffy?—Certainly, as a matter of observation, I have seen the difference in such shops myself, and on going into them one can tell, from the senses, that things are much better arranged in large shops; but that is a different thing to saying that I have definite proof that the results are worse in one case than the other. I have not specially studied that question.

5292. Let me direct your attention to the expression of opinion given by the medical profession seven years ago on this question. At that time the general sentiment of the medical profession was very strong that the long hours of shopping shopping were injurious to health, was it not?—I should think it is still of that opinion.

5293. Would you endorse that opinion, generally, from your own practical experience?—Certainly.

Mr. Edwards.

5294. You say that in the Brompton Hospital you have to attend in-patients entirely?—Yes.

5295. And that in the London Hospital you do not see many shop people?—I do not see so many in proportion as at Brompton, they are more of the labouring classes, dock labourers and women of the labouring class; one sees a certain number of shop assistants there, but not such a large proportion.

5296. That is not in any way due then to the nature of the hospital. The Brompton Hospital is a hospital for consumption, is it not?—I think it is partly due to the fact that people think they have diseases of the chest often, when they have not, and I think it is due to the fact that many large firms subscribe to the Brompton Hospital, and when their employés complain of anything, they give them a letter to go to the hospital.

5297. It is rather a serious fact, is it not, as showing what happens, that the lungs go?—I do not think that is proved at all; they very often complain of symptoms which lead them to suppose they have disease of the lungs when they have nothing of the sort.

5298. In seeing these patients, do you find out what their occupation in life is?—That is always stated in writing.

5299. To what do they attribute their break down in health. There are, no doubt, two causes. Do they attribute it to the fact that they follow sedentary occupations, or that they have too long hours?—I do not think they often say much about that. This is, of course, in hospital work. The work is very great, and one has not time to go into cases in that way. The patients are more concerned with their present physical necessities, and they do not go so much into those questions. Unless you ask the question directly, they say nothing about it. I often put the question to them, "Have you very long hours," and I am very frequently told that they have to work 12 hours and more, at a stretch, without any rest.

5300. Which is, of course, very serious, is it not?—Very.

5301. Then, on the whole, do you come to the conclusion that long hours bring patients to the Brompton Hospital?—Yes, I think they do; I say a certain proportion of patients, of course.

5302. Do you often find that it is due to their own personal habits that their break down takes place?—In some cases, not often among the women, I think.

5303. Have you ever had any complaints from women, who come as patients, of their being obliged to stand at their work so long?—Yes, I have heard that complained of in many cases.

5304. On the whole, taking such patients as have come before you, would you consider that the number who came owing to intemperate habits are few?—No, there are very many of that class among the men.

5305. Who have broken down in that way?—Yes.

5306. Then you do not inquire anything more than the fact that it is due to intemperance or due to long hours; as to the cause of the intemperance, you do not inquire, do you?—No, one does not go into those points.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

Sir Blundell Maple.

5307. I suppose you have a great many shop assistants from the large firms, I think you said, because the large firms subscribe?—That is an inference; I would not like to be too positive about that.

5308. It is a fact that all the large firms of London do subscribe to the hospitals, is it not?—A great many of them do.

5309. And directly their employés are unwell they give them tickets, do they not?—Yes.

5310. Are you prepared to say that shop assistants, male and female, are more unhealthy than people employed in factories. It is necessary for all classes to earn their living; but do you not find them more often break down in factories where they have to sit and work a sewing machine?—I cannot say I have noticed that specially; I have noticed it, of course, where the trade is an injurious one, like the lead trade, which is, perhaps, the most dangerous of all; but I could not answer the question in the affirmative with regard to ordinary factories.

5311. But in shops the doors are being continually opened, and therefore there is always a good deal more ventilation, is there not, while in factories I think you will find they are shut up, and directly there is a little cold air the workers want to have the gas lighted?—I believe that is so.

5312. And that way of acting would be more likely to make them unhealthy than walking about, would it not?—Certainly.

5313. It is disadvantageous for women to stand too much, is it not?—Yes, it is.

5314. But you do not think many break down from that cause, do you?—It is difficult to separate that from the general exhaustion which results from long hours.

5315. Does not the break down which occurs among young people, generally speaking, occur among young people who come from the country to London?—It is very common with them, but not exclusively; we see plenty of Londoners, born and bred, who break down in the same way.

5316. I speak with some little experience myself, but the young people who break down are those who come from the country, where there is fresh air, into the different atmosphere of London; is not that so?—Yes.

5317. There is more change in their way of living, is there not?—That is true.

5318. From your experience in a hospital for consumption, do you not think that consumption is very hereditary?—Undoubtedly. I have not spoken of the effects of consumption. I hesitate to attribute any direct influence in the production of consumption. I purposely did not mention that, because that opens out another question altogether.

5319. I suppose, as a general rule, when shopwomen come to you they are under the age of 20?—No, I should not say that; many of them are; but many of them are over 20.

5320. Do they come to you as married women?—No. There are many of them who come between the ages of 20 and 30.

5321. You

5321. You see, now we have legislation to deal with young people's labour up to 18, and the point which is now being considered by the Committee is the point whether further legislation should apply from that age and after. Do you find that they come to you when they are married?—Yes, a certain number; but we do not always know whether they are married or not; it depends on what they say themselves.

5322. Then you would not like to say that you speak with any authority in particular as regards the shop assistants, would you, and that it is a class which has bad health?—It is a class which is very liable to these complaints, as far as my experience goes, especially this general debility, which is more frequent in them than in other classes. I will not say it is confined to shop assistants; it affects factory workers as well.

5323. Have you been long in London?—Yes.

5324. I suppose you have found that shops close earlier now than they used to?—Yes, much earlier.

5325. And that there is, consequently, more recreation going on?—Undoubtedly.

5326. Do you think that a large proportion of the people are more healthy than they were?—I have not sufficient facts to answer that question. I do not see so many men as I do women. I see vastly more women than men, especially women of the class to which we are referring.

Chairman.

5327. When you said that shops were shut much earlier now, were you speaking of the large shops?—Yes.

5328. You did not mean to state that the small shops in the poorer districts of London were shut earlier, did you?—No, I did not; I have no accurate knowledge on the point.

5329. You did not wish to convey that to the Committee, did you?—I did not.

5330. Is it not the fact with late hours that when the gas has been lit for some time and the air is less pure it is particularly injurious to shop assistants?—Yes, I think so; certainly if the ventilation is not very perfect.

5331. You are aware, are you not, that in factories the hours are very much shorter than in shops?—Yes.

5332. It is the long hours of the small shops in the poorer districts which is particularly injurious, is it not?—I should think so.

5333. That is particularly the case in factories where women are employed, is it not?—Yes.

Sir Blundell Maple.

5334. There is no legislation in factories with regard to men, is there; men are allowed to work as long as they like?—No.

Chairman.

5335. Still, as a matter of fact, they do not work so long, do they?—I think not.

5336. Is it the fact that 12 hours a day at work, which we have heard is very common, is injurious to women after marriage?—It is, but I was anxious to confine my remarks to what I have seen. That class of case has not come before me.

5337. Do you concur with the opinion expressed by the leading medical men a few years ago that it would have that effect?—I would, certainly.

Chairman—continued.

5338. I should like to direct your attention to the clause in the Bill which relates to chemists, and to ask you whether you think that clause would obviate any inconvenience as regards chemists?—That seems to me a very desirable arrangement.

5339. Do you think it would meet the case?—I think it would.

Sir Blundell Maple.

5340. Could you define it; Clause 9 says, "A pharmaceutical chemist and druggist shall not be liable to any fine under this Act for supplying medicines, drugs, or medical appliances after the hour appointed by an order made under this Act for the closing of shops; but this section shall not be deemed to authorise a pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist to keep open shop after the said hour." How would you limit the things that they are to sell; all sorts of things are sold, such as brushes, rubbers, and hot-water bottles?—It would be difficult to define it exactly.

5341. It is urgent if a medical man requires a patient to have at once a bottle of eau-de-cologne, is it not?—Yes; it is very difficult to define it exactly.

5342. A brother-in-law of mine, who is a doctor, told me the other day that he rang up a chemist at two o'clock in the morning for a bottle of eau-de-cologne for a patient. That would be considered a drug, would it not?—Yes, if he thought it necessary. That would have to be left to the doctor.

5343. But who is to certify that the chemist is right in supplying; must it be under a doctor's order, or can any friend of a patient who is very ill go and ask for anything in a druggist's shop?—I do not feel competent to answer that. It seems to me to be a practical detail, but I think it ought to be possible for people to get anything that is urgently required at any time of the day.

5344. And by anybody?—Yes, by anybody. You might not be able to get at the doctor to certify; he might have gone away.

Chairman.

5345. If anything was urgently required of that character I presume it would be because it was ordered by a doctor?—Yes.

Mr. Corbett.

5346. As a matter of fact, chemists, after they do close their shops, are at present able to be got at by a night bell, or something of that kind, are they not?—Yes, they are.

5347. So that I suppose your impression would be, if the hour of closing were fixed under this Bill, the chemist would comply with an urgent demand as at present, would he not?—Just so.

5348. No new difficulty in working would arise, would it?—I do not think so.

Dr. Farquharson.

5349. The chemist is something like the medical man; he must sacrifice his own convenience a little bit for the convenience of the public, I suppose?—Yes.

5350. If a man is knocked up in the middle of the night to supply a bottle of eau-de-cologne, at all events he is not sitting in his shop, he is in bed bed enjoying the pleasures of sleep, and he goes back to bed when he has sold the bottle?—Quite so.

5351. Which is different, is it not, to a man staying up all night to meet the demands of a casual customer?—Yes.

5352. Would this be a fair way of putting it: it is not the actual work of people in shops, but having to be there and standing about and sitting about in bad air; it is the long hours which is the injurious part of it?—Quite so, the prolonged tension.

5353. Not the actual strain upon their minds from working in the shops, but the strain upon their bodies through being there under unfavourable conditions?—Probably both, I should think.

Chairman.

5354. At any rate, speaking as a medical man, would you be satisfied with that clause as it stands?—I must say I should, but I have not had much experience in reading legal documents and drafts.

Mr. Edwards.

5355. Have you ever heard your patients say anything as to the time they are allowed for meals?—Only in a few instances. I am afraid I have not any evidence worth mentioning on that point.

5356. You spoke of indigestion just now, did you not?—Yes; and I think it is very likely an insufficient time given for meals, in fact there is no doubt about it, would promote indigestion.

5357. Also I suppose that would be the case too if men or women were obliged to stand to their work after meals?—It would be worse, I think. Still, many of us have to do that. Personally I have to do that myself every day.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

5358. To stand?—Yes, to stand directly after lunch, for two hours.

5359. When one goes to a doctor what one is invariably told is, that one ought to get out more into the open air?—Yes.

5360. That sort of advice, no doubt, would be a good thing for shop assistants; that they ought to take air?—Yes.

Chairman.

5361. Has your attention been called to the Registrar General's Returns of Mortality?—Not in a general way; only with regard to special subjects.

5362. One of the witnesses laid before the Committee the returns of the health of shopkeepers of different denominations; do you think we could safely take those as representing the health of shop assistants, or would not the length of hours make a considerable difference in the two cases?—I should think it would be quite impossible to draw any conclusion as to shop assistants from those returns.

5363. Is it not the case very often that with regard to young men, and even more, young women, coming from the country, their health breaks down owing to the length of hours, and that they return home and take to some other occupation, or gradually fade away?—That is, I believe, the case in many instances.

5364. So that they would not appear in the Registrar General's Returns, would they?—No.

Miss MACDONALD, M.B., called in; and Examined.

Dr. Farquharson.

5365. YOU are in medical practice in London, I believe?—I am.

5366. Where did you study?—At the School of Medicine for Women, and the Royal Free Hospital.

5367. Are you now attached to the London Hospital?—I am attached to the new Hospital for Women in the Euston-road.

5368. Do you attend to out-patients there, or in-patients?—Out-patients.

5369. Do you see a large number there?—We have an average of 25 new ones the days that I am there. I am there two days each week, and we have an average of 70 or 80 attendances of old patients.

5370. Among those patients do you get many women from shops?—A certain proportion, I could hardly say how many.

5371. From your experience have you been led to any conclusions as to the effect of prolonged hours in shops on the health of women?—I do not think I could say that the prolonged hours struck me more than a good many other of the conditions under which shop women have to work.

5372. What are those other conditions, may I ask?—The standing, insufficient time for meals, and the confinement generaly in rather close atmospheres.

5373. Have any of your patients complained of the long hours they have to work?—No, I do not think one of them has done so.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

5374. But of other conditions of an unfavourable kind?—I do not think they have actually complained of any of the conditions, but on inquiry one has found that the conditions have been irksome to them. I have not found that the long hours have been specially complained of.

5375. Can you say generally whether your patients have come from the larger shops or smaller shops?—Some have come from the larger shops, and some from the smaller shops. I think in the smaller shops the hours are longer; they are kept open much later.

5376. The hours are longer, and I suppose the hygienic conditions are probably less favourable?—Yes, and the wages are less, I think.

5377. The air would not be quite so good, perhaps?—No, the air would not be quite so good, and they are generally in a lower state, to begin with. Their outside circumstances are less favourable for them.

5378. Is there any particular class of female disease which you think is brought about by the unfavourable conditions of shop life?—I do not think the diseases specially particular to women are caused by shop life.

5379. Dr. Kidd told us just now that in his experience at Brompton Hospital, there was a good deal of general deterioration of health among women?—That is exactly what I should say, anæmia, and general nervous debility.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

5380. Do you think that would be due to shop-work, whether to late hours, or to other causes?—It would be common to all exhausting work. I should not say specially, shopwork; I do not think the health of shop assistants is worse than the health of a great many of the women who are employed in other ways.

5381. Is there anything you would like to state to the Committee in a general way as to your experience with regard to this question?—No; I think not, because I feel that unless one had had charge of a large establishment of shop girls, one would not really be in a position to state that anything was entirely connected with the long hours of shop life; one does not seem to get a sufficient number to be able to really generalise from what one sees.

5382. You have not been medical attendant attached to any large shop, have you?—No, I have not; and I think it is only in that way that one would really be fit to give an opinion on the subject.

Chairman.

5383. Are you aware of the hours that are kept in many of the smaller shops in the poorer districts of large cities?—I have one patient in my mind at this moment whose work went on from half-past 8 in the morning to 10 or 11 at night, she had been at this work for about 15 or 16 years, I think, and she was completely broken down by it. I do not think to begin with she could have been a very strong woman, and it might have told upon her more than it might have told upon other women, but the hours, I I think, were too long; and what struck one was that in this small shop where she was the only shopwoman, she had to take her meals just as she could snatch them. She had no regular time, and, I think, she suffered from that quite as much as from the long hours.

5384. The Committee have had a great deal of evidence that in many parts of our large cities, the hours of the shops are from 8 in the morning to 9 at night, and sometimes to 11 and 12 on Saturday?—Yes.

5385. Do you not think that such hours as those in the close atmosphere of a shop must be very prejudicial?—They are extremely prejudicial.

Chairman—continued.

5386. And would not standing so long very much affect women, if they were married, afterwards?—It is not good for women to stand. It is not good for them to stand at all really, I think.

5387. If it is not good for them to stand at all, still less will it be good for them to stand 13 hours a day?—I think it is shocking.

5388. Do you think it is important under those circumstances there should be some effort made by Parliament to shorten those long hours?—Yes; but there are other things to be taken into consideration too, I think.

5389. Has your attention been called to a circular which was issued by Sir Richard Quain, Sir James Paget, and Sir Andrew Clark, and other leading medical men a few years ago?—Yes, I think I remember the circular. On the subject of standing; I think the diseases I have come across could not be put down as due to standing alone; it is the standing in connection with other things. The standing of course would exhaust the women and make them more liable to other illnesses.

5390. But to the whole circumstances together would you attribute the evil?—Yes.

5391. Do you generally agree with that circular?—Yes.

5392. You say there are other circumstances to be taken into consideration; will you tell the Committee what you had in your mind?—I was thinking of the low wages they get.

5393. But that makes the matter worse and not better, does it not?—It does; there is nothing that can make it better.

5394. Then the other circumstances you mean aggravate it, do you?—Yes, that is what I mean.

5395. I thought you rather meant there were circumstances to palliate it?—No; I think it aggravates it.

5396. Then that would strengthen the case for some legislation, would it not?—I think it would.

Dr. W. CHAPMAN GRIGG, called in; and Examined.

Dr. Farquharson.

5397. YOU are, I believe, a physician practising in London?—Yes.

5398. Have you directed your attention more especially to the disorders of women?—Yes.

5399. With what hospital have you been connected?—I was out-patient physician for the diseases of women at the Westminster Hospital and senior physician to the Queen Charlotte Lying-in Hospital, and I was connected with the Victoria Hospital for Children.

5400. At those various institutions have you had a large experience of female disorders?—Yes.

5401. Have you directed your attention especially to the subject which this Committee is investigating, the effect of long shop hours upon health?—It has been brought to my notice simply by cases that have come under my care from time to time.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

5402. Would you please tell us in a general way your experience as to the effects of these prolonged hours on health?—It has a very grave effect upon the generative organs of women, entailing a great deal of suffering and also injuring a very large body of them permanently, setting up inflammation in the pelvis in connection with those organs.

5403. What part of the shop-life do you consider those things are mostly due to?—They all tell me that it is the prolonged hours of standing. I have had a great many very sad cases come before me of women who were permanent invalids in consequence.

5404. You would say that the prolonged hours in shops are directly responsible for that class of disorder?—Quite so. It is a condition of things I have not seen in regard to any other class of calling that women follow. These inflammations come on in the pelvis in the generative organs to the right and left of the womb. If the matter could be gone into carefully I think the Committee would be perfectly surprised to find what a large number of these women are rendered sterile in consequence of these prolonged hours.

5405. I suppose you would say that there are various causes combining?—Yes.

5406. But you put the prolonged hours as the most important?—I think it is the prolonged hours of standing at the time the menstrual flow is on. Then, of course, there is exposure to draught from the shop doors being always opened.

5407. Can you say whether these women come more commonly from large or from small shops?—I should say from both, but not equally. I have seen them, in some cases, in the best houses, and I have seen cases in small houses. I may say that in small houses they appear to be living in a more friendly and sociable way; they are allowed, for instance, to go into a back room and rest themselves sometimes. It is rather in the larger houses that I have seen my worst cases.

5408. You would say that the combined causes that bring about this deterioration in their health are the standing and prolonged hours and the bad air?—Yes.

5409. Have you anything else you would like to mention to the Committee, besides what I have brought out by my questions?—I think it must be acknowledged that sterility is often due to this inflammatory mischief arising round the generative organs. I believe that that is one of the greatest evils attached to these prolonged hours. I have seen many cases in families where certain members who have pursued the calling of shop-girl assistants have been sterile, whereas other members of the family have borne children. I know of one case where four members of a family who were shop girls were sterile, and two other girls not shop girls in the family have borne children; and I have known other instances in which that has occurred. I do not find that to be the case among milliners' assistants who live in these private milliners' shops and houses. I have never seen such a condition of things there as I have seen in these cases. I have had patients come to me from all parts of London; I could mention houses all round London. It appears to be a most common condition of things.

Chairman.

5410. When these women have children, do you find that the children themselves suffer from the mother having been affected by these very long hours?—I have seen many cases where I have attributed the mischief arising in childbed to this inflammatory mischief in the mother, which, after delivery, has set up fresh mischief, and I have seen serious consequences resulting.

Mr. Edwards.

5411. I suppose you have made inquiries from your patients as to what the cause is, and you would always know their way of life?—Yes.

Mr. Edwards—continued.

5412. Do they really complain that they are serving long hours?—Yes, they do; they cannot help themselves. I have often recommended them to leave their situation and try a situation where they have a less strain upon them. For instance, I have recommended shop-girls in the West End to try and go into wholesale houses in the City, where the strain is nothing like so great; but it is very difficult to bring that about. I have sent them into the country sometimes, because in some places in the country they have an off-day in the week when the shop is closed. I have often recommended girls, even at a loss of income, to go into the country where they may get an off-day, on their showing a tendency to delicacy; and they have gone with good results.

5413. You think that if the hours were altered there would be less of this deterioration to health which you speak of?—I am sure of it; they all tell the same tale, and say it is the prolonged hours and not being allowed to sit down.

5414. Is that a very common complaint now?—Very common.

5415. But that is a very serious matter in these days, is it not?—Yes. I believe in some of the better houses, the best houses, that has been modified of late.

5416. One sees these girls sitting down in large houses in London nowadays?—Yes; but that is only of recent date.

5417. You think even now that is not at all a common practice?—Not at all; so far as my experience goes that is not a common practice. I do not want to mention names, but I have known houses of repute in London where that is not allowed even now. It is invidious to mention names, but the Committee would be surprised to hear the names of the houses where that is still the case. Only as recently as this morning I saw a case from a very large house.

Chairman.

5418. I wish to ask you one question with regard to chemists. We have put a clause into the Bill authorising the chemists after hours to sell medical drugs and medical appliances as they do now, by means of the night bell; do you think that that would meet any possible inconvenience that might otherwise arise to the public from including chemists in the Bill?—I am sure it would.

Mr. Cameron Corbett.

5419. This Bill not only provides for shorter hours, but it provides for the possibility of getting a weekly half-holiday. The weekly half-holiday has generally been advocated on account of the recreation that it would give; but from the answer which you gave just now it would appear that you would consider an off day in the week a very important arrangement as to health?—I do. As I stated just now, I have often recommended girls to go to houses of business in the country where they would get a day off each week. In a very large number of country towns there is one closed day in the week, and that is a very great advantage to these girls.

RESOLUTIONS unanimously adopted at Annual Council Meetings of the Federation, 1892 to 1895, inclusive.

At Leicester, 1st March 1892 :—

"That the chairman sign a petition to Parliament on behalf of the Executive of the Federation, praying that Sir John Lubbock's Shops (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill may not be passed without such alteration as may exclude "off" licence holders from its operations, and that the various federated associations be recommended to adopt a similar course."

At Nottingham, 22nd February 1893 :—

"That in the event of a Bill being introduced into Parliament to close shops compulsory at certain hours "off" licence holders should be exempted from the operation of such a Bill on the ground that all retailers of liquors should be placed on an equal footing as to the hours of opening and closing their premises."

At Leeds, 7th March 1894 :—

"That this Council do take steps to secure the exemption of "off" licence holders from the operation of Sir John Lubbock's Shops (Early Closing) Bill, or any similar Bill."

At Bradford (Yorks), 20th March 1895 :—

"(1.) That inasmuch as grave injustice would accrue to holders of "off" licences for home consumption if their places of business were compulsorily closed during the hours which holders of licences for consumption on the premises are permitted to remain open, this Council instructs the Executive to take such action as may be advisable to obtain facilities for evidence being tendered to the Select Committee on the Shops (Early Closing) Bill, prepared and brought in the House of Commons by Sir John Lubbock."

"(2.) That Messrs. J. Parker (Nottingham), H. Coggan (Sheffield), Henry Brown (Leeds), and H. G. Crews (Manchester), do ask to be permitted to tender evidence on behalf of this Federation before the Select Committee on Sir John Lubbock's Bill."

"(3.) That this Council would respectfully suggest that the Off Licence Association of Birmingham, Leicester, Oldham, Bradford, Derby, Halifax, Leeds, Hull, Southport, and Blackburn, do request the Select Committee of the House of Commons to receive evidence from those towns in favour of the exemption of "off" licence holders from the Shops (Early Closing) Bill."

I certify the preceding copies of Resolutions to be correctly copied from the Minute Book.

BELFAST AND NORTHERN OF IRELAND GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

THE following resolution was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the above Association, held on Thursday evening, 28th March, 1895 :—

"That this Association, representing upwards of 400 grocers in the city and vicinity of Belfast, hails with pleasure the fact that a Bill is now before Parliament to regulate the hours of closing retail shops. We hereby agree to give it our cordial support, believing it to be, as far as we can judge, an honest attempt to grapple with and solve this difficult question, which we consider is ripe for legislation ; but we notice on the Schedule that holders of sitting licences are exempted, and desire most emphatically to express our opinion that no measure will be complete or satisfactory that does not include such shops. We, therefore, earnestly request the promoters of the Bill to have all licensed houses included in the measure, as the assistants engaged in that business need the relief the Bill would afford as much, if not more, than any other class. We also request copies of this resolution to be forwarded to the Irish Members of Parliament, the Parliamentary Committee of the Grocers' Federation, and the Trade Press."

Belfast, 3 April 1895.

AT a special meeting of the United Early Closing Alliance, held in the Town Hall, on 1st April 1895, the following resolution was proposed by Rev. James Maconachie, B.A., seconded by Mrs. Donnan, and passed unanimously :—

"That we are convinced that nothing except legislation will accomplish the earlier closing of shops, and that we thoroughly approve of the Bill now introduced by Sir John Lubbock to the House of Commons, so far as it goes, but regret to find that public-houses have not been included in the scope of the Bill, and we earnestly ask the House of Commons to include them."

BELFAST VINTNERS AND GROCERS ASSISTANTS' ASSOCIATION.

Offices : 30, ANN STREET.

Dear Sir, Belfast, 1 April 1895.

THE Committee and members of this Association are desirous of supporting any measure having for its object the shortening of the hours of labour without injury to employer or employed effected ; and they deem the present Short Hours Bill calculated to have such an effect if passed into law.

Hugh Renton, Esq., Secretary, B.N.I.G. Association, Garfield Chambers, Belfast.

(signed) J. C. Lavery, Secretary.

Dear Mr. Renton, Schomberg, Strandtown, Belfast, 3 April 1895.

AT the last meeting of the United Early Closing Alliance it was unanimously decided to ask you if you would be so good as to represent us in the House of Commons, and we shall be much obliged by your doing so.

Yours, &c.
(signed) Helen V. Ewart.

Dear Sir, Belfast.

HEARING that you are about to go to London to give evidence before Committee of the House of Commons, I have pleasure in handing you a copy of resolution unanimously passed at a special meeting of Belfast Drapers' Early Closing Association, held on the 3rd instant, when it was also decided that you would be requested to speak favourably of the Bill on behalf of upwards of 900 members of our Society. There are about 1,500 young men and women in drapery shops in Belfast, all of whom would be delighted to learn that the Bill had been entered upon the Statute Book, very many of whom will never get shorter hours except employers are compelled to close by Act of Parliament.

Resolved,—"That we thoroughly approve of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, which we believe to be the only solution of the question of the earlier closing of shops."

Yours, &c.
(signed) W. Fergusson, Hon. Secretary.

APPENDIX, No. 8.

PAPER handed in by Councillor John Jamieson, 9 April 1895.

NOTES.—EARLY CLOSING LEGISLATION.

ONE of the witnesses examined on Tuesday before the Select Committee on the Shops (Early Closing) Bill stated that "The Drapers' Record" was "dead against" legislation of the kind under consideration. This is not correct. We have not expressed any final opinion one way or the other, holding that the trade, which is the final authority on the subject, has not yet voiced its own view with anything like distinctness. Were it otherwise, there would hardly be much necessity for the Select Committee to seek evidence on the point. We have repeatedly urged the members of the trade to take counsel together, and to then state their conclusions with decision and effect. It is obvious that such a declaration would be received by Parliament with the respect its representative character would deserve. But no collective voice is heard, and the Select Committee have accordingly to trust to individual opinions some of which, as we have shown, are chiefly based upon error. The situation reflects but little credit upon the trade, whose lack of organisation is a standing reproach to its members. Surely the time has now come when the formation of the long-promised central and representative Drapers' Association should be begun in earnest?

SHOP HOURS.

THE Select Committee on the Shop Hours (Early Closing) Bill has this week been taking more evidence, some part of which requires a brief notice from us. A witness examined was Mr Bryce Grant, one of the founders of the Voluntary Early Closing Asssociation, and his testimony was in the main satisfactory. But it was not quite correct when he referred to "The Grocer"; hence this explanatory comment. Sir Blundell Maple asked Mr Grant this question: "Do the trade organs, such as "The Grocer," speak in favour of this legislation?" and the reply was, "No, they are dead against it." Subsequently, Sir John Lubbock asked the same witness: "You have said that the trade journals are opposed to this Bill; are you prepared to say that 'The Grocer' is opposed to it?" "I am not," was Mr. Grant's more judicious reply. Our attitude in regard to this matter has been perfectly consistent. At first we had certain objections to compulsory legislation, which we did not hesitate to express, and we hoped that the results of the voluntary action would be more generally satisfactory. Still, we have always kept an open mind in respect to the question, being anxious to advocate what will be of the greatest benefit to the majority of our readers. In many districts there is no doubt that the voluntary principle has done no good, and the lamentable spectacle is often presented of one or two traders, by their refusal to close at an earlier hour, preventing the adoption of the movement throughout the neighbourhood. In such a case we have seen what the result of the present system is, viz., a failure; we shall not, therefore, object to see what legislation can do, knowing perfectly well that there is plenty of room for improvement. When Mr. Bryce Grant stated that "The Grocer" is "dead against" the Shop Hours Bill, he was drawing rather on his imagination than on his knowledge; indeed, as he subsequently admitted, he knows little or nothing of the matter. Although voluntary early closing is in some places making progress, especially in regard to the weekly half-holiday, we cannot resist the conviction that in many towns the existing state of things leaves much to be desired; and if the needed reform can be accomplished by legislation we shall be amongst the first to welcome the régime.

It will be useful to our readers if we give an outline of the principal clauses of the Shop Hours Bill. It provides that two-thirds of the shopkeepers or "any class of shops" within a district may make application in writing to the local authority praying that an order may be made to close such shops on each day or any specified days of the week at whatever hour the shopkeepers may determine, but not to be earlier than one o'clock on any one day, or six o'clock on other days. Thus it may be a weekly half-holiday or an all-round earlier hour. The clause is silent, however, as to the machinery by which this two-thirds petition is to be obtained. The second clause deals with the making and effect of the order, but Sub-section 2, which provides that the order may be either for certain seasons of the year, appears to be too vague to meet the wishes of some who wish for more drastic legislation. Clause 3 provides that amendments of the early closing order may be made in the same way as the original order; also that if at any time more than one-third of the shopkeepers in a district where an order is in force desire to have it revoked, a petition to that effect may lead to the order being discharged. In the minds of some these provisions appear to offer an opportunity for annoyance on the part of compulsory and non-compulsory associations getting up all sorts of rival agitations, thus keeping shopkeepers in a continual state of unrest. On the other hand, the supporters of the clause say that it is inserted to give fair play all round. The fourth clause gives the central authority in each county the power of deciding when a dispute arises in any district as to the classification of shops, and the exercise of that power will, of course, necessitate an inquiry by an official from the central authority in any locality where such a dispute arises, just as now the Local Government Board sends down an inspector to hear evidence from both sides in any dispute on municipal questions.

Clause 5, though brief, has received much attention, and states that: "A shop in which trades of two or more classes are carried on shall be closed for the purpose of all such trades at the hour at which it is by any order made under this Act required to be closed for the purpose of any of them." Or, paraphrased, it means that a grocer who is also a baker and a butcher must, if two-thirds of each of those trades decide to close on three different days, close his shop on each of those three days; or, in cases where several businesses are carried on under one roof, this clause might necessitate a closing on each day of the week. Clause 6 provides that the penalties shall range from 5*s.* to 5*l.*, and the amendments proposed by some witnesses include imprisonment. Clause 7 exempts the employer if the offence can be proved to have been committed by the assistant without his knowledge. Clause 8 provides for summary proceedings for the enforcement of the Bill, just as under the Factory and Workshop Act; Clause 9 allows a chemist or druggist to open his shop for compound prescriptions; and Clause 10 contains a provision allowing a shopkeeper to supply the lodgers on his premises. Of course, it will be necessary to make it clear what is the definition of a lodger; and, so far, the witnesses that have come up have not grappled with this difficulty. Clause 12 is one of definitions, and provides that a "shop" means any place where goods are exposed for sale by retail, even down to a costermonger's barrow; it also states that "closed" means not open for the purpose of serving a customer, and also that customers in the shop at the time of closing may be served. There is, however, no provision that the assistants shall leave off work when the shop is closed. Public-houses, refreshment-rooms where "hot cooked provisions are sold," tobacconists, and newsagents are exempted from the Bill.

PAPERS handed in by the Representative of "The Voluntary" Early Closing Association, 26 April 1895.

Sir, 30 March 1895.

MAY we ask you, as one of our honorary physicians, to kindly state, as near as you can remember, how many of our members (shop assistants) have been treated by you during the time you have kindly acted in that capacity for this Association, and whether you consider the causes of their visits to you have been occasioned by the time they are employed in shops.

We are anxious to prove that compulsory closing is not necessary so far as the shop assistants' health is concerned, though we deem voluntary earlier closing most desirable.

If you can kindly let us receive your reply by Tuesday morning next we shall be greatly obliged.

Thanking you in anticipation,

IN reply to yours of 30th ultimo I have only seen one or two cases for your Association during the time of my appointment, and as far as I recollect there was nothing to show that the cause of illness was the time they were employed in shops.

IN reply to your inquiries of 30th March, I am sorry to have to inform you that not one of your members have sought my advice, although I have been in on Thursday evenings as named (except during my autumn holiday). Further I know that not one consulted Dr. Kate Mitchell (Mrs. West) during the time she was on your list. I represented this to her on her proposing to suggest me as her successor, but she said that being a new appointment it would require time before the young women would be likely to apply, and she thought it worth while to accept the appointment. Had any young women consulted me I should certainly have given special attention to the point you mention, and to that of prolonged standing and seats.

The lease of this house having expired, and renewal being refused, I presume it will shortly come down, and on having to change my address I intended to inform you none of your members came to me, so that we might mutually consider whether it was worth while for me to keep my name on your list.

BRADFORD AND DISTRICT TRADES AND LABOUR COUNCIL.

32, GREAT RUSSELL-STREET, BRADFORD.

Dear Sir, 3 April 1895.

AT a meeting held last night of the above body the following Resolution was passed unanimously :—

"That this Council is of opinion that the hours of shop assistants can only be effectively dealt with by the Legislature, and hereby gives its cordial support to Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill, and requests the Members of Parliament for Bradford and district to support the third reading of the Bill by their votes in the House of Commons."

Yours, &c.

HULL RETAIL GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

OFFICE :—1, POSTERNGATE, HULL.

Sir, 10 April 1895.

AT a general meeting of the members of the above Association, held last night, I beg to inform you that your Early Closing Bill was discussed, and I was instructed to forward you the following Resolution passed thereon :—

"That we, the members of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association, believing that it is desirable that local authorities should have powers vested in them to enable them to carry out the wishes of a majority of the shop-keeping community with reference to their hours of closing, and seeing that Sir John Lubbock's Bill now before the House, when passed, will give such powers, we hereby give our support to such measure, and move that a copy of this Resolution be sent to Sir John Lubbock, also to the Members of Parliament for the borough, requesting them to give it their support."

I may say that, in accordance with the foregoing Resolution, I have forwarded a copy of same to each of our local Members of Parliament.

Yours, &c.

Sir John Lubbock, M.P. (signed) S. T. Nicholson, General Secretary.

EARLY CLOSING BY LOCAL OPTION.

WHAT a changed world this would be to some hundreds of thousands of our fellow countrymen and countrywomen if Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill, or something like it, could be carried and brought into effective operation! There is absolutely no necessity whatever for the long hours at present occupied in most shops. There is no reasonable reason why the work of distribution, like that of production or manufacture, should not be performed in eight hours out of the twenty-four. We all believe that, somehow or other, this desirable result will come to pass some time in the next century. The only question is whether it cannot be hurried a bit, so that some of the people now living may get a share of the benefit. Some excellent people, who are as keenly desirous of bringing about shorter shop hours as Sir John Lubbock himself, think the proper way to secure their objects is to proceed by example and moral suasion. Mr. Frye and Sir J. B. Maple are the most prominent representatives of this view on the Select Committee now sitting on the subject. It can hardly be denied that their policy is the preferable one, if only it would work. But that seems to be exactly the thing it will not do. Voluntary efforts have been proceeding as long as any of us can remember, and there is, perhaps, no one of us who has not had experience of their breakdown. Among the smaller shops it is doubtful whether the hours of closing are any earlier than they were a generation since. Some observers, indeed, say they are later. Meanwhile office hours, warehouse hours, factory hours have all been reduced considerably, and nobody depending on any of these seems to be any the poorer in consequence.

Legislation in regard to early closing would inevitably be a failure if it should turn out to be far in advance of the wishes of shopkeepers themselves. The coercion of any considerable minority in this direction would be both impossible and improper. Sir John Lubbock's Bill proposes to give power to the local authority to enforce earlier closing among the members of any trade on the demand of two-thirds of the members of that trade in a specified locality. Perhaps two-thirds is not a large enough majority, at all events, to begin with. It is open to doubt whether in a town where there are 15 chemists 10 of these should have power to coerce the other five. But it must be remembered, on the other hand, that at present the five are coercing the ten. Where the line is to be drawn is a delicate question. But we all feel that there should be a limit somewhere to the power of the minority. When the arrangements of 14 chemists in regard to evening closing or a weekly half-holiday are frustrated by the obstinacy of the fifteenth, the time does seem to have come for something a little more persuasive than voluntary effort.

In order to test the feeling of chemists to some extent in regard to this Bill, we are sending this week to the retail chemists in Birmingham, Brighton, and Liverpool a statement summarising the provisions of the measure, together with a postcard, addressed to ourselves, on which we ask the chemists referred to to vote for or against the principle of the measure. Postcards from any other part of the country expressing an opinion about the proposal will be welcome, but the towns named have been selected as typical ones, and the vote from them should give a fair idea of the reception which the Bill would have from one of the trades concerned.

It may be of some interest to add that, at the request of Sir John Lubbock, the editor of this paper will attend before his Committee on Friday next, 26th April, to give in evidence the result of the vote taken some eight years ago on his previous Bill. On that occasion 10,000 voting papers were sent out, and 2,227 were returned. Of these 1,330 chemists voted in favour of the Bill, 734 against it, and 163 declared themselves to be neutral. The Bill then under consideration fixed the hour for closing for the whole country, subject to modifications which, under certain circumstances, might be made by the local authority. The Bill now before Parliament leaves the days and the hours of closing optional, and only permits the enforcement of a chosen hour as regards a particular trade when a local authority shall be satisfied that two-thirds of the members of that trade carrying on business in the locality concerned are in favour of such enforcement.

PAPER handed in by the Chairman, 7 May 1895.

London, 5 March 1888.

Sir,

It may be in your recollection that a Committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1886 reported that in many places the hours of labour in shops are from 80 to 90 per week, and it is well known that in few places are they longer than in many parts of London.

The Early Closing Associations are endeavouring to induce Parliament to pass a Bill which has been introduced by Sir John Lubbock, and have appealed to us for the expression of an opinion that these long hours are grievously injurious to health. The Bill provides that shops, with a few specified exceptions, shall close at eight p.m. on five days of the week, and at ten on the sixth. It also proposes that wherever two-thirds of the shopkeepers desire it, the local authority shall be empowered to enact a weekly half-holiday; and power is also given to diminish Sunday trading. A form of petition which it is intended to present to Parliament will be found below, and if you approve will you please sign and return it?

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled:

We, the undersigned medical men, having had our attention called to the very late hours to which shops are open, and being satisfied that such prolonged hours of labour are grievously injurious to health, especially in the case of women, pray your Honourable House to enact the Early Closing Bill, introduced by Sir John Lubbock, by which it is sought to diminish Sunday trading, and to provide that all shops (with certain exceptions) may be closed not later than eight p.m. on five days of the week, and not later than ten p.m. on Saturday, or such day (as market day) as may be ordered by the local authority in lieu thereof, as well as on any day preceding a public holiday.

And your Petitioners will ever pray.

Name. Address.

VOTES OF TRADES COUNCILS IN SUPPORT OF THE BILL.

Vote of London Trades Council ; proposed by Mr. Marks, seconded by Mr. Sayford, and carried unanimously :—

"That this delegate meeting, representing more than 26,000 adult artisans and mechanics in the metropolitan district, strongly denounces the system and practice of late shopping as being fraught with injurious consequences, both moral and physical, to a vast portion of our overworked industrial population, and therefore, earnestly urges all workers in the constituencies of the United Kingdom to call upon their Parliamentary representatives to support Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill, which, in its operation and result, is calculated to become a blessing to those employed in shops and an advantage to the national welfare."

The Manchester Trades Council passed a resolution similar in substance in support of Sir John Lubbock's Early Closing Bill on 19th August 1893.

The Dublin Trades Council passed a resolution confirming the necessity of supporting the Bill on 11th June 1893.

The Bolton United Trades Council, 77, St. George's-road, Bolton, on the 17th April 1895, unanimously resolved to support the Bill now before Parliament, introduced by Sir John Lubbock, and further re-affirmed the resolution passed on the same subject in 1893.

Hyde and District Trades Council, 46, Croft-street, Hyde. A resolution in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Shops (Early Closing) Bill was passed by the above Council on 5th January 1894.

Further resolutions supporting the Bill have been passed by the Trades Councils of Glasgow, Oldham, Burnley, Denton, Staleybridge, Rochdale, Bacup, Derry, Halifax, Hull, and Liverpool.

The following is a list of some of the meetings held in support of the Shops (Early Closing) Bill, or Sir John Lubbock's previous Bill, which, like the present Bill, had the hearty support of the general body of traders and was reviewed clause by clause, and, with various alterations or additions, unanimously approved at the London, Glasgow, or Nottingham Early Closing Congresses, at which representatives were present from all parts of the country. Meetings in favour of early closing legislation have been held in various parts of the country for many years past, commencing with a Conference of London Traders, held in 1872 and presided over by Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P. The present list, however, only deals with meetings held during the past five years. Most of the meetings were called specially to promote the Bill, but in some instances a resolution in its favour was added to the agenda paper dealing with matters of local early closing interest in connection with the Early Closing Association's ordinary district work of promoting voluntary early closing.

The principal meetings held this year have been :—

12th January 1890.—Birmingham.—Great meeting at the Grand Theatre, Mr. Alderman Barrow in the chair. Enormous audience. Resolution in favour of Bill passed unanimously.

23rd January 1890.—London : Canning Town.—Great public meeting at the Wesleyan Schoolroom, Rev. F. Newland, M.A., in chair. Resolution passed unanimously.

30th January 1890.—London : Deptford.—Public meeting at Amersham Hall, E. Smith, Esq. (Chairman, Greenwich Board of Works), in the chair. Resolution passed unanimously.

17th February 1890.—Edinburgh.—Great meeting in St. Mary's Hall, Councillor Gulland presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

20th February 1890.—Edinburgh.—Annual general meeting of Edinburgh and Leith Licensed Grocers' Association. Agreed to petition for Bill. Votes : for, 22 ; against, 18. (The licensed grocers compete with publicans).

March 1890.—Glasgow.—Meeting in favour of sending deputation to Home Secretary. (See report of Glasgow Congress approving Bill last year).

9th March 1890.—Manchester.—Great public meeting at Chorlton Town Hall. Resolutions carried with the greatest enthusiasm.

18th March 1890.—London : Clapham Junction and Battersea.—Crowded public meeting at Crichton Hall. Resolution in favour of Bill passed enthusiastically, with one dissentient. Petition signed by chairman, T. L. Corbett, Esq., L.C.C.

24th March 1890.—Middlesborough.—Resolution carried unanimously at the annual meeting of the Middlesborough Amalgamated Early Closing Association :—"That this meeting accords its most hearty thanks to Sir John Lubbock for the efforts he is making on behalf of shop assistants in general, and trusts he will receive the cordial support of all parties to secure a speedy passage of such needful and beneficial measures."

9th April 1890.—Bristol.—Great public meeting, Rev. E. Gange presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

14th April 1890.—Liverpool.—Meeting of Master Bakers' Association. Resolution carried unanimously. Many great public meetings held during the year, at which resolutions have also been carried with enthusiasm.

30th April 1890.—London.—Great public meeting at Balham, Stafford C. Northcote, Esq., presiding. Resolution in favour of the Bill carried unanimously.

4th May 1890.—Halifax.—Meeting of the Drapers and Hosiers' Association, Archdeacon Brooke presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

29th May 1890.—London.—Great crowded meeting at Town Hall, Stratford, Mr. J. A. Stacey presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

3rd June 1890.—London.—Great crowded meeting at Brixton Hall, R. Stapley, Esq. presiding. Resolutions in favour of Bill carried unanimously.

11th June 1890.—Croydon.—Annual meeting, Croydon Early Closing Association. Resolutions carried.

24th June 1890.—London.—Public meeting at Holloway Hall, Mr. James May (Spencer Brothers) presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

27th June 1890.—London, Mansion House, the Lord Mayor presiding. A resolution in favour of the Bill unanimously carried.

1st July 1890.—London.—A crowded public meeting at Public Hall, Peckham, Edwin Jones, Esq., L.C.C., presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

8th July 1890.—London.—Meeting of London County Council. Resolution carried to petition in favour of the Bill.

10th July 1890.—Sunderland.—Great public meeting, Mr. J. A. Stacey presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

5th August 1890.—Malton, Yorks.—Great public meeting. Resolutions carried unanimously.

8th October 1890.—Hull.—Great public meeting, Councillor Hall presiding. Resolutions carried with the utmost enthusiasm.

15th October 1890.—Aberdeen.—Great public meeting under presidency of the Lord Provost. Resolutions carried.

15th October 1890.—Eastbourne.—Great public meeting under presidency of the Mayor. Resolutions carried unanimously.

25th November 1890.—London.—Great crowded meeting (beyond capacity of hall to seat) at Camden Town, Young Men's Christian Association Hall, Colonel Edis, L.C.C., presiding. Resolutions carried unanimously.

4th December 1890.—London.—Hawkstone Hall, Lambeth, C. Darling, Esq., M.P., presiding. Resolution in favour of Bill carried in spite of adverse speech of Chairman.

Many other meetings of less importance, frequently those of Early Closing Committees, both of employers and assistants in all parts of the country, have supported the Bill by petitions and resolutions.

22nd April 1891.—Wesleyan Chapel, Upper Holloway. Chairman, Rev. T. W. Johnson.

28th April 1891.—Mount Zion Schoolroom, Dorset-square. Chairman, Martin Morris, Esq.

A large number of great and influential petitions have been sent up: one of these was signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, many other Bishops, and over five hundred London clergymen and Nonconformist ministers; by His Eminence Cardinal Manning, and many of the Roman Catholic clergy, and by five hundred matrons and nurses of London hospitals. Another was signed by the President of the College of Physicians, the President of the College of Surgeons, the President of the British Medical Association, and more than three hundred medical men practising in London, who, being satisfied that the prolonged hours of labour were grievously injurious to health, especially in the case of women, prayed the House to enact the Early Closing Bill. Another and very significant set of petitions was sent in from the working men's clubs and trade unions, representing 144,653 persons. These petitions came from some of the principal organisations, including the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the London Society of Compositors, the Working Men's College, the National Union of Gasworkers and General Labourers of Great Britain and Ireland. In addition, the Trade Councils of several important towns have passed resolutions in its favour.

Council Chambers, Corn-street, Newport, Monmouth,
Sir, 11 May 1895.

At a general meeting of members of the Newport, Monmouth, Grocers' Association held a day or two back, it was resolved to support the Early Closing Bill as originally introduced by Sir John Lubbock, and which, I believe, is now receiving the attention of the House; but the members disagree with the Amendment intended to be moved, which has for its object the limiting of the time which masters can ask their assistants to work after the closing of the shop.

I was instructed to bring the foregoing resolution to your notice.

I am, &c.
Sir John Lubbock, M.P., (signed) J. R. Algie, Secretary,
House of Parliament, London. Newport, Monmouth, Grocers' Association.

Coventry and District Trades and Labour Council.—Established 1890.

Sir, 36, Weston-street, 9 May 1895.

I have the honour to inform you that this Council, after careful consideration, emphatically support the proposals contained in the Shops (Early Closing) Bill for the better control of those places of business scheduled.

But, having regard to the grievously long hours worked in nearly all shops by the assistants, both male and female, this Council would urge that the provisions contained in your Bill be made applicable to all places of business, of whatsoever kinds. Wishing your kindly efforts to ameliorate the lot of a hard-worked, under-paid, and generally deserving class of the community every possible success,

I have, &c.
The Right Hon. Sir John Lubbock, Bart. (signed) R. Peacock, Secretary.

SOUTHPORT and District Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association.

16 May 1895.

1st. THIS meeting hails with satisfaction the efforts put forth by Sir John Lubbock to secure a shortening of the hours of labour in shops, and trusts that he may be successful in placing upon the Statute Book a measure empowering local authorities to enforce earlier closing where a majority of traders desire it.

2nd. This meeting is of opinion that the suggested poll ought to include all traders not mentioned in Schedule in order to avoid the complexity and confusion which would inevitably arise if the separate trades are to be classified, and separate polls taken. During the discussion on the resolutions an opinion was expressed that the local authorities ought to be empowered also to ascertain the wishes of the traders. So far as we can perceive, the Bill provides no machinery for this purpose; it is left to individuals or associations. With best wishes for the success of the measure.

EXCERPT from Minute of Meeting of Executive Committee of the Glasgow Branch of the Newsagents and Booksellers' Union, held on Thursday 4th April 1895.

GEORGE DOTT, Esq., President, in the Chair.

THE Chairman moved, "That this meeting of the Executive of the Glasgow Branch of the Newsagents and Booksellers' Union resolve, on behalf of the Union, to support the Shops (Early Closing) Bill introduced by Sir John Lubbock."

The motion was seconded by Mr. R. F. Seller, and unanimously carried, and the secretary was instructed to write Sir John Lubbock informing him of the above resolution, and tendering the thanks of the Union for his endeavours to ameliorate the condition of shopkeepers.

George Dott, Chairman.
Peter Allan, Secretary.

APPENDIX, No. 21.

PAPER handed in by the Chairman, 21 May 1895.

Resolved, This meeting of the London Trades Council declares itself in favour of a reduction of the hours of labour of shop assistants, believes that the Shops (Early Closing) Bill now before Parliament would not inconvenience the purchasing public, but would be of great benefit to the assistants if carried with the amendments of the Shop Assistants' Unions incorporated in it.

Statement that a system of continuous audit was followed by witness, 687–696——Belief that the accounts of the Patriotic Fund are efficiently kept, 697, 698. 704–707——Experience that the system adopted in connection with the payments to widows and orphans is thoroughly efficient, 699–703——Explanation of the cause which led to the variation in the signing of the last report made by witness, 708–710.

"Thunderer" Fund. Explanation that the "Thunderer" Fund was administered as part of the Royal Naval Relief Fund, Young 198–202.

"Thurlow" Fund. Examination as to the uses made of the "Thurlow" Fund by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, Young 114–120——Very few cases for which the "Thurlow" Fund is considered to be applicable, it being applied only to girls whose health has unfitted them for domestic service; balance of 500*l.* in respect of this fund in 1884, the present being 591*l.*, ib. 912–916.

Tiltman, Mary. Examination upon a letter written by the Commissioners to Mrs. Mary Tiltman on 13th January 1894, in which she is informed that she will receive an allowance of 5*s.* per week in respect of her son, lost in the "Victoria," but that as she has already received a gratuity from the Admiralty, the allowance will not commence till 1st July 1895; Young 1148–1156. 1188, 1189.

Tripp, George H. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness, who is clerk in charge of accounts in the Home Office, has, by Treasury appointment, audited the accounts of the Patriotic Fund for the last three years, 711–718. 724–726.

Testimony to the accuracy of the accounts, 719, 720——Evidence showing that a similar system is adopted for the payment of widows and orphans to that in use at the Admiralty and War Office, 721–723——Explanation of the duties of witness in reference to the investments, and their being in accordance with the trusts, 728–732——Information respecting a transfer of investment in the case of the "Captain" and "Eurydice" Funds, 734–740.

Trust Deeds. Conditions laid down in the trust deeds of the funds by the committee that raised each fund, the Commissioners being guided thereby as regards surpluses, &c., Young 1428–1431.

Copies of the various trust deeds relating to the different funds, App. 153 et seq.

Tully, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Secretary of the Royal Military Tournament; is also Honorary Secretary of the Imperial War Fund, 2428–2430.

Information in regard to the two funds subscribed for the first Egyptian War, and the Eastern Soudan War, and combined in "The Imperial War Fund;" explanation that the nucleus of the fund originated as the result of a military tournament, 2431–2441. 2451, 2452——Evidence showing the principles of the application of the fund; intention of the fund to afford immediate relief, 2442, 2443. 2472–2479. 2496, 2497. 2510–2514——Statement that the capital at present is 5,412*l.*, out of which 56*l.* only was paid in relief last year; practice to allow the capital to accumulate in view of another war, 2444–2448. 2481. 2557–2561.

Explanations

Explanations with reference to the Soldiers' Effects Fund, which has practically caused a disappearance of claims on the Imperial War Fund, 2448–2450. 2457. 2478–2482. 2545–2556——Document handed in showing the amount distributed from the formation of the fund to 1893; 2453–2456——Question as to whether it would not be worth while to hand over the fund to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; reasons for objecting to such transfer, 2458–2471. 2515–2518. 2522–2539. 2562–2564.

Attention called to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, and to the danger of overlapping; document prepared by witness ten years ago, respecting various funds, handed in, 2483–2495——Particulars as to the method adopted in arriving at a knowledge of cases requiring relief, 2498, 2499. 2515–2521——Details respecting the trust deed, 2500–2509. 2540–2544——Admission that amalgamation of funds would be beneficial, provided there was good administration, 2565–2570.

V.

Valuation of Funds. See Liabilities and Assets.

"Victoria" Fund:

Information as to the various sums subscribed and expended at the Mansion House, Portsmouth, Devonport, and Chatham, on account of the loss of the "Victoria," Young 377–395. 406–409——Explanation of the means taken to ascertain the families who were in need of assistance; uncontrollable causes prevented the Patriotic Fund Commissioners giving prompt relief, but the Admiralty authorities met the immediate necessities of the sufferers, ib. 396–405.

Enumeration of the scale of allowances agreed upon for the "Victoria" Fund; evidence showing that, owing to the largeness of the money allowances for children, one girl only has applied for admission to the Patriotic Asylum, Young 410–420——Detailed information to the effect that the variation in the allowances to widows of common sailors under the "Victoria" funds is due to the allowance being governed by the actual income of the man, which varied according to the extra pay earned, ib. 428–448.

Explanation with reference to a valuation made by witness of the assets and liabilities of the "Victoria" Relief Fund, Finlaison 532, 533. 549–553.

Explanatory statement as to the conditions and principles upon which the "Victoria" Relief Fund has been administered; recognition of the principle, as adopted by the Mansion House Committee, that the distribution should be graded according to rank and wages, Young 1117–1135. 1191–1196——Obligation upon the Commissioners under the Act of 1881 as to the mode of application of surpluses, so that they were debarred from handing over to the Admiralty any surplus from the fund, as proposed by Lord Spencer, ib. 1136–1138.

Positive denial that there was any undue delay on the part of the Commissioners in administering the "Victoria" Fund; explanations hereon in connection with the relief distributed by a committee at Portsmouth acting in conjunction with Miss Weston, Young 1140–1147——Explanation as to the allowances from the fund having been made at an earlier date than was at first intended, ib. 1155, 1156——Absence of any unnecessary delay on the part of the Commissioners in presenting their provisional scheme for the fund, ib. 1357–1359.

Information as to the "Victoria" fund having been distributed without any loss of time, Lambert 1765–1775——Opinion as regards the "Victoria" fund that every penny of it should be distributed among the relatives of those lost in the vessel, this being the intention of the donors, Gildea 2112–2119.

Trust deed, dated 30th March 1894, respecting the management and administration of the "Victoria" fund, App. 174. 175.

W.

War Office:

Witness (who is Assistant Accountant General in the Army) has had before him numerous applications to the War Office from soldiers' widows and others for relief, there being, however, no fund at the War Office available for the purpose, Carc-Browne-Cave 1267–1271. 1273——Very rare instances of reference of cases to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; that is, where there is any probability of their being able to grant relief, ib. 1272–1284.

Very long hours in the grocery trade in Belfast, especially in the outskirts of the city on Saturdays, when many shops are open till twelve and some still later; shorter hours in the centre of the city and in the large establishments, Renton 3428, 3429. 3461, 3462. 3479. 3489-3515. 3526–3529——Entire absence of any half-holiday in any of the trades in Belfast, ib. 3430. 3460. 3516–3522——Repeated failure of voluntary early closing, ib. 3431. 3530.

Belief that the required majority of two-thirds for applying the Bill would be obtained, Renton 3437–3439——Desire of the Trades Council of Belfast for early closing, ib. 3530, 3531——Dissent from the view that closing at seven o'clock in Belfast would be an inconvenience to the working classes, the latter being decidedly in favour of earlier closing than at present, ib. 3532–3551.

Information as to the very long hours of shop assistants in witness' district, especially in the smaller shops and on Saturday, Dunwoody 3701–3703. 3786–3790——Conclusion that in Belfast there is no prospect of the hours being shortened by voluntary action, whereas there is a general consensus of opinion in favour of early closing, ib. 3727. 3745–3747. 3759-3761——Expediency of Belfast being treated as one district, ib. 3731. 3888.

Decided approval of the Bill by the Trades Council of Belfast, Dunwoody 3743——Entire approval of the application of the Bill being left to the City Council, ib. 3747. 3920-3925——Opinion that neither the small shopkeepers nor the public who now shop late would be prejudiced by the operation of the Bill, whilst the wholesale houses close early as a general rule, ib. 3761–3776. 3786–3801. 3819–3829.

Copy of resolution adopted at a meeting of the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association on 28th March 1895, in support of compulsory early closing, App. 230——Resolution adopted by the United Early Closing Alliance in support of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, ib.——Resolutions to a similar effect adopted by the Vintners' and Grocers' Assistants' Association, and the Drapers' Early Closing Association, ib.

Birmingham. Evidence showing the very long hours for which the shops of Birmingham and its suburbs are open, Beaumont 2769. 2781–2783. 2788, 2789. 2817, 2818. 2832–2834——Statement that the Birmingham Early Closing Association is in favour of the Bill, ib. 2775–2777——Reference to a large meeting held at Birmingham in 1892, which decided unanimously in favour of legislation, ib. 2778. 2882. 2886–2893.

Information showing that all classes of shopkeepers in Birmingham are desirous of obtaining legislation; details of a canvass in proof of this statement, Beaumont 2779, 2780. 2786, 2787. 2793–2795. 2807–2811. 2825, 2826. 2844–2849. 2859–2864——Evidence as to the failure of the half-holiday movement, ib. 2784. 2792. 2828–2831.

Explanation that the Early Closing Association consists of both employers and assistants, Beaumont 2798, 2799. 2823. 2852–2858. 2882–2885——Approval of legislation by the Grocers' Association, ib. 2814-2816. 2948, 2949——Petition in favour of the Bill to be presented to the House from Birmingham, ib. 2947.

BOLTON:

Details respecting the constitution of the Bolton and District Shop Assistants' Association; it numbers 205 members, Vicar 1362, 1363. 1430, 1431——Evidence showing that the shops at Bolton are open from sixty-three-and-a-half to sixty-nine-and-a-half hours per week, ib. 1364. 1464–1470. 1474–1479. 1522–1525. 1584–1593. 1660–1662——Statement that the general scope of the Bill meets with the approval of the Bolton Association, ib. 1369–1373. 1424, 1425.

Reference to the hours at which shopping is mostly done in Bolton; about seven o'clock is the busiest time, Vicar 1515–1521——Information as to the cash and credit trade respectively; conclusion that the credit customers are, to a large extent, the cause of late closing, ib. 1647–1656——Particulars respecting a meeting of the Bolton Trades Council, and also a meeting held at Bolton in 1888, at both of which unanimous resolutions were passed in favour of legislation, ib. 1657–1659. 1665–1669. 1672–1675. 1681–1684.

Explanation that the Bolton Drapers' Association consists of employers, and does not include assistants, Stubbs 4309–4311. 4362–4366——Evidence showing that the general hours of the trade average about seventy-two per week, ib. 4312. 4394——Reference to the utter failure of voluntary action in shortening the hours, ib. 4313–4315.

Approval of the proposed Bill by the Drapers' and the Grocers' Associations, Stubbs 4316. 4319. 4325–4333. 4341——Opinion that the smaller shopkeepers are strongly in favour of the Bill, ib. 4322, 4323. 4367–4376——Desirability of including all Bolton in one area, ib. 4338–4340——Improbability of the clause relating to shops where trades

Central Authority. Question as to the "central authority" referred to in the Bill; acquiescence in the proposal that it should be the Home Office, Gould 4554–4559.

Chemists. Statement that chemists are included in the Bill by their own desire, Stacey 268–276——Suggestion that chemists might be exempted from the Bill, Sutherland 665, 666——Concurrence in the provision relating to chemists provided it does not endanger the Bill, Cooney 885. 900–902——Desirability of limiting chemists to the sale of medicines after closing hours, Flint 1172, 1173——Approval of the exemption of chemists under certain conditions, Jamieson 3332, 3333.

Detailed information in regard to two circulars issued by witness with the view of obtaining the opinion of chemists respecting early closing; the majority were in favour of the Bill, Wootton 4396–4412. 4450–4461. 4509. 4530–4537——Examination as to the working of the clause in the Bill permitting chemists to sell drugs, &c., after the shops are closed; opinion that it offers no practical difficulty, ib. 4420–4449. 4465–4478——Information respecting the long hours for which chemists' shops are open, ib. 4509–4529.

Approval of the provisions in Clause 9 of Sir John Lubbock's Bill as regards chemists being exempted from fine for selling drugs, &c., after the fixed hour for closing, Kidd 5338–5351. 5354; Grigg 5418.

Extract from "The Chemist and Druggist" of 20th April 1895, in strong support of legislation on the subject of early closing, App. 234.

Classification of Trades (General Shops):

Consideration of the clause relating to the classification of trades; belief that it would not present any great difficulty, Horsman 488–494; Beaumont 2909–2916——Suggestions as to the means of obviating difficulties that may arise in the classification of trades, Sutherland 545, 546. 599–619. 644–651; Flint 981–995. 1101–1107.

Question as to the classification of trades in shops where two or more trades are carried on; suggestion that each division should close in accordance with the hours chosen by the respective trades, Cooney 730–732. 805–807——Consideration of the question of ensuring that shops where two or more trades are carried on should close for all trades; suggestions as to the manner in which such closing might be effected, Day 1219. 1222–1238. 1323. 1332–1337. 1341–1345.

Opinion that early closing should be comprehensive, and not apply to individual trades, Vicar 1374–1379. 1457–1463. 1508, 1509. 1568–1571. 1594–1602——Conclusion that where two or more trades are carried on in one shop, there would be no difficulty in closing any individual department and leaving the others open, Lewis 1726. 1765–1769. 1835–1845.

Examination respecting the classification of shops; belief that it would seriously inconvenience the public, and would present grave difficulties, Grant 1926–1928. 2013–2035; Debenham 2379–2384——Suggestion as to the manner in which the difficulty in regard to the classification of trades might be overcome, Macpherson 3007—3016. 3040, 3041; Johnson 3017. 3041, 3042.

Expediency of shops where spirits and drapery as well as general goods are sold being included in the Bill; consideration of the mode of ascertaining whether in such cases there is a majority of two-thirds in favour of the Bill, as well as in the case of the smaller class of shops, Dunwoody 3737. 3774, 3775. 3865–3870. 3888–3912——Belief that it will be impossible to carry out the clause relating to shops where two or more trades are carried on, Wootton 4414–4416——Probability that the clause dealing with shops where two or more trades are carried on may give rise to difficulties, Gould 4560–4568. 4612–4629.

New clause adopted upon the subject of premises structurally separated being deemed separated shops, Rep. x.

Coggan, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness, as President of the Sheffield "Off" Licences Association, confirms the evidence of Mr. Parker as to the great hardship to "off" licence holders generally if not exempted from Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 3661 et seq.

Statement showing the large public use after 8 p.m. of grocers' shops in Sheffield holding "off" licences for the sale of beer off the premises, 3666–3670——Belief that compulsory early closing would be the ruin of the "off" licence trade, 3671. 3681——Few assistants employed by "off" licence holders, 3674–3677. 3682——Difficulty and hardship in allowing "off" licence holders to sell beer, and in closing their shops as regards other articles, 3684–3688——Entire approval of a weekly half-holiday for assistants, 3691–3694.

Colonies. Examination respecting the legislation of the colonies in regard to early closing; belief that it has been successful, Stacey 82–92.

Compulsory Regulations. Large preponderance of advantages over disadvantages by the adoption of early closing compulsorily, Jamieson 3392——Belief that there would be a wide spread feeling against proceedings for the enforcement of the proposed legislation, Parker 3655——Approval generally of the present Bill, subject to some amendments, though witness would like to see direct compulsion applied to all trades throughout the country, Hill 4252 et seq.

Grounds for the conclusion that legislation for the compulsory closing of shops at a certain hour is inexpedient and would in London be perfectly unworkable, Ling 4679 et seq.——Enumeration of various objections to different provisions of the Bill and to its compulsory character, Cushen 4751 et seq.——Witness repeats that he is (and always has been) opposed to legislative interference with adult labour, ib. 4867–4869. 4882-4889. 4906–4910. 4982-4984. 4992.

Cooney, John Adams. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As chairman of the Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union witness supplies detailed information respecting the constitution of the Union, which now numbers 2,500 members, 709–718. 770–772. 903–906.

Opinion that the proposed Bill meets with the approval of both employers and employed, 719, 720. 773——Reasons for believing that the extension of the Shop Hours Act would not be as efficacious as the Early Closing Bill, 721–725. 749–757. 877——Desirability of inserting a clause in the Bill that would limit the hours of the assistants, 725–728. 783–786. 909, 910.

Question as the classification of trades in shops where two or more trades are carried on; suggestion that each division should close in accordance with the hours chosen by the traders, 730–732. 805–807——Expediency of including the whole borough of Glasgow as one district, 733–735. 888, 889.

Examination as to the possibility of obtaining the consent of two-thirds of the shopkeepers of each class to close at a certain time; opinion that it could be done, and that it would be the duty of the union to institute a canvass, 736–743. 816–821. 890–899——Concurrence in the proposal in the Bill to place the carrying out of the Act in the hands of the police, 744–748——Opinion that it should be made imperative upon the "local authorities" to enforce the Act, 746. 776–782.

Grounds for the conclusion that the half-holiday might be on a Saturday, commencing at four o'clock, 760–769. 822-845. 937, 938. 948–952. 956–963——Suggestion as to the means to be adopted to ascertain that employés are not made to work after closing time, 786–804. 911–913. 923–925——Reasons for thinking it desirable that small tradesmen should be included in the Early Closing Act, 808–814. 867–876. 917, 918. 922.

Evidence respecting the differences in the general hours of closing in Glasgow, 849–855. 935, 936. 943–947——Conclusion that seven o'clock might be taken as the general hour of closing, 863–866——Suggestion that although restaurants are excluded from the Bill, their employés should only work a certain number of hours per day, 880–884.

Concurrence in the provision relating to chemists provided it does not endanger the Bill, 885. 900–902——Desirability of allowing one vote only for each shop, 939–942——Opinion that voluntary action is a failure, 914–916——Disapproval of the idea that all shops should close at the same hour; each trade should arrange its own hours, 964.

Co-operative Stores. Statement as to various co-operative stores of the working classes in Lancashire being voluntarily closed at comparatively early hours without causing inconvenience to the members, Jump 4008–4017. 4026–4028.

Costermongers. Evidence showing the difficulties that would accrue in ascertaining the opinion of the costermongers upon the question at issue, Grant 1932-1938. 2119-2127.

Coventry. Resolutions passed by the Coventry and District Labour Council in strong support of the passing of Sir John Lubbock's Bill in an extended form, App. 241.

Crewe. Statement of the hours of closing at Crewe, the shops being open till about 10.30 on Fridays and eleven on Saturdays, but closing on Wednesdays at two; proposed curtailment, Hill 4243–4251——Habit of late shopping on Fridays and Saturdays, ib. 4249, 4250. 4282——Difficulty in getting a two-thirds majority at Crewe; modification proposed, ib. 4254–4264. 4279–4282. 4300 4304.

Expediency of Crewe being dealt with as one district in the application of the Bill, all trades being dealt with alike, Hill 4270–4272. 4284–4287——Suggestion that the hour of closing in Crewe should be fixed at eight o'clock, ib. 4294–4299.

Cushen, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representation by witness of the Metropolitan Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association, and of Davies and Evans, Limited; he is also treasurer of the Federation of Grocers' Associations of the United Kingdom, and has had over forty years' experience in trade, 4749–4751. 4757–4759. 4891–4896.

Objection that Sir John Lubbock's Bill involves an entirely new departure from the liberty of male adults to make contracts for their own labour, 4751. 4812—— Objection also that the proposed curtailment of hours interferes with cases in which the health of male adults is not seriously affected; statistics hereon as to the health of grocers and other classes of traders, 4751. 4813–4824. 4914. 4925. 4958–4962—— Grounds for denying that the system of voluntary early closing has proved a failure, 4751. 4784–4786. 4819, 4820. 4829.

Contention that legislative early closing, even with local option clauses, would prove unworkable in London, 4751——Objection to Clause 1 of the Bill as regards the application to the local authority for putting the Act in force, 4751——Opinion that in London the sanitary authorities rather than the County Council should make the order applying the Act, 4751. 4781–4783. 4963-4965.

Reference to Clause 5 of the Bill as absolutely unworkable, whilst it would tend to divert business from suburban to central districts where large shops are situated, 4751 ——Objection to the employment of the police for the enforcement of the Act, 4751 ——Enumeration of various other objections to different provisions of the Bill, 4751.

Much greater indifference of shop assistants in London than of masters as regards earlier closing, their chief desire being for the weekly half-holiday, 4752–4769. 4787–4796. 4827. 4911–4913——Closing of the numerous shops in which witness is interested at about nine, except on Saturdays, when they are open till eleven or twelve; absolute necessity of late closing on Saturday, 4760–4780. 4797–4812. 4825–4841. 4897–4904.

Opportunities for the assistants to sit down, though seats are not specially provided, 4763–4767 — Much greater harm to health from smoking and drinking than from over-work or late hours, 4821–4824——Statement as to witness having been asked by the East London Early Closing Association to close early on Thursday and having refused, 4825–4835.

Practice as to witness' assistants leaving at once when the shops are closed; doubt whether this could take place under compulsory early closing, 4841–4848—— Argument that the necessities of a large portion of the public in London require shops to be kept open till a late hour, especially on Saturday, and that with numerous persons late shopping is not a mere habit, 4849–4863. 4890.

Effect of a compulsory system in checking the operation of the voluntary system, 4864–4866——Explanation that witness is, and always has been, in favour of early closing by voluntary action; illustrations to this effect, 4867-4869. 4882-4889. 4906–4910. 4943–4952. 4980, 4981——Effect of the Bill that great numbers of young men would be thrown on the streets at eight o'clock, whereas it would be better for them in some cases to be an hour longer in the shops, 4867. 4926-4934. 4936–4942. 4953–4957.

Impracticability of working Clause 5 of the Bill (as regards a half-holiday) in the case of shops keeping grocery, drapery, and other classes of goods under the same roof, 4871–4881.

Allowance in witness' shops of two hours a day for meals, 4905——Harder work and longer hours of the masters than of the men, 4924, 4925——Conclusion that under the Bill London would be one area, the London County Council being the local authority, 4965, 4966.

Further statement as to the necessity of late closing in some districts in order to meet the legitimate wants of the working classes; illustration in the case of cab-drivers and dockers, 4967-4976——Explanation that witness does not employ boys under eighteen beyond the legal hours per week, 4976–4979. 4985-4992——Discretion exercised by the manager of each shop as to closing before or after nine o'clock, the time being sometimes 9.30, 4976. 4985–4991.

Witness repeats that he is (and always has been) opposed to legislative interference with adult labour, 4982–4984. 4992.

D.

Day, Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary of the West Yorkshire Federated Chamber of Trade; is prepared to give evidence respecting the hours of closing, &c., in several large centres of population in the county, 1188, 1189.

Statement that the general feeling of the chamber represented by witness has always been in favour of legislation, 1190, 1191——Detailed information respecting the holidays and hours of closing in Batley, Sheffield, Leeds, Huddersfield, and other important centres of Yorkshire, 1192–1218——Importance of inserting a clause in the Bill making it unlawful to serve customers after hours, 1219–1221.

Evidence respecting the question of ensuring that shops where two or more trades are carried on should close for all trades; suggestions as to the manner in which such closing might be effected, 1219. 1222–1238. 1323. 1332–1337. 1341–1345——Opinion that the order to close two or more trades should apply equally to grocers holding beer licenses, 1239–1246. 1286. 1326–1331——Grounds for suggesting that eight o'clock should be the general time for closing on Saturdays, 1247–1255. 1267–1278. 1302, 1303. 1346–1359.

Examination as to the lengthy hours worked by employés; acquiescence in the proposal to secure them a reasonable time for leisure, 1256–1259. 1287–1295. 1309–1318——Desirability of including small shops in the Early Closing Bill, 1260–1266. 1296–1299. 1306–1308——Concurrence as to the inefficiency of voluntary arrangements, 1279, 1280——Belief that all trades might adopt the same hour for closing, 1283–1286. 1300–1305.

Debenham, Frank. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the firm of Debenham and Freebody; is chairman of a voluntary closing association board, and was an alderman of the London County Council, 2264–2266. 2273.

Concurrence generally in the views expressed by Mr. Bryce Grant, 2267–2269. 2319——Grounds for the opinion that voluntary effort has made, and is still making, good progress, both as regards the half-holiday and the general hours of closing, 2269–2272. 2297–2313. 2320–2324. 2372, 2373——Examination as to the hours of closing in the West-end; practice amongst the larger shops to close, on an average, at about seven o'clock for five days, and on Saturdays at two o'clock, 2274–2286. 2347–2357——Disapproval of the Bill generally, especially on account of its permissive character, 2288–2296. 2314–2318. 2393–2395——Improbability of the two-thirds majority ever being obtained, 2292, 2293. 2331.

Belief that the Bill, if carried, would make little difference to the larger shops, 2325–2327. 2385——Conclusion that late shopping is due to habit and indifference on the part of the customers, 2327–2330. 2358–2364——Opinion that no difficulty would arise in regard to a conflict of jurisdiction between local authorities, 2365–2367.

Belief of the association that voluntary effort is more efficacious than legislation, 2368. 2386–2392——Evidence showing that early closing has proved economical to the shopkeepers, 2374–2378——Reasons for believing that the classification of trades would present grave difficulties, 2379–2384.

District or Area (Application of Act). Consideration of questions raised as to the meaning or definition of the term "district," and as to the parties for determining the same with reference to the application of the Bill, Stacey 191–193. 244–250——Admission that the division of towns into districts presents difficulties, Horsman 482–487——Discussion relating to the ambiguity of the word "district" as used in the Bill, Sutherland 542–544. 593–598.

Difficulties that would arise in defining the "districts" in London, Grant 1925. 1985–1997. 2050, 2051——Question considered as to the division of towns into districts; desirability of including Birmingham in one area, Beaumont 2801–2806. 2917–2935. 2942——Objection to the division of towns into areas, Macpherson 3004–3006.

Improvement if the provision were compulsory under Clause 1 as regards the formation of districts for putting the Bill in force, Dunwoody 3731–3734——Examination as to the question of areas; belief that difficulties will be presented, Wootton 4487–4506. 4538–4542——Consideration of the question of areas; suggestion that London might be divided into from five to eight districts, Gould 4574–4582.

Domestic Shops. See Small Tradesmen.

Drapers. See the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Dublin. Representation by witness of the Family Grocers and Purveyors' Association of Dublin, which comprises about 200 members, who are all employers, Ireland 5153, 5154. 5184–5189. 5247——Average hours in Dublin shops from eight till eight, though some of the larger shops close at four on Saturday, while some of the smaller remain open till 11 or 12, ib. 5155–5159——Tendency in Dublin to shorter hours voluntarily; expediency, however, of legislation on the subject, ib. 5160–5178. 5208–5213.

Approval by witness' Association of the principle of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, though it is suggested that the Bill be strengthened on certain points, Ireland 5163–5173. 5184–5189—— Conclusion that not only Trades Council in Dublin, but the local authority, would be in favour of applying the Bill, ib. 5174. 5181, 5182. 5190–5196. 5208–5213.

Grounds for submitting that the working classes would not be inconvenienced by earlier closing; reference especially to the unduly long hours in small shops on Saturday, Ireland 5183. 5197–5200. 5245, 5246. 5248–5258——Difficulty hitherto in the way of a weekly half holiday in Dublin, ib. 5201–5207. 5266, 5267——Conclusion that the smaller, as well as the larger, shopkeepers are generally in favour of the Bill, ib. 5259–5267.

Dundee. Evidence respecting the lengthy hours customary in Dundee, MacRae 2400, 2401. 2430–2440. 2489–2496——Approval of the proposed Bill by the Dundee Shop Assistants' Association, ib. 2409–2419. 2429——Unanimity of the vote returned by the employers in 1891 in favour of the Half Holiday Bill, ib. 2420–2423.

Belief that the necessary majority of two-thirds could be quite easily obtained, the majority of all classes of shopkeepers being in favour of the Bill, MacRae 2427. 2458–2466. 2486—— Expediency of including the whole town of Dundee in one district, ib. 2484, 2485.

Opinion that eight o'clock would be chosen as the general hour for closing in Dundee, MacRae 2487, 2488. 2497–2504——Examination as to the views of the Trades Council at Dundee, witness representing that the council is in favour of the Bill, ib. 2505–2512.

Dunwoody, Robert. Witness, who is a wholesale grocer at Belfast, is president of the Grocers' Federation, which comprises members from all parts of the United Kingdom, 3695–3700. 3777–3785. 3865.

Information as to the very long hours of shop assistants in witness' district, especially in the smaller shops and on Saturdays, 3701–3703. 3786–3790. —— General opinion of the shopkeepers themselves that the hours are too long, and should be shortened by legislation; resolutions passed to this effect by the Grocers' Federation and the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association, the former body objecting, however, to certain clauses in Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 3704–3726. 3837–3864. 3922, 3923.

Conclusion that in Belfast there is no prospect of the hours being shortened by voluntary action, whereas there is a general consensus of opinion in favour of early closing, 3727. 3745–3747. 3759–3761—— Decided approval by witness of Sir John Lubbock's Bill generally, and of the option in each trade to put it in force, 3728–3730. 3740–3742——Improvement if the provision were compulsory under Clause 1 as regards the formation of districts for putting the Bill in force, 3731–3734——Expediency of Belfast being treated as one district, 3731. 3888 —— Improvement also if a majority (instead of one-third) were necessary to revoke an order, 3735, 3736.

Expediency of shops where spirits and drapery, as well as general goods, are sold being included in the Bill; consideration of the mode of ascertaining whether in such cases there is a majority of two-thirds in favour of the Bill, as well as in the case of the smaller class of shops, 3737. 3774, 3775. 3865–3870. 3888–3912 — Objection to public-houses being dealt with under the Bill, 3738, 3739 — Decided approval of the Bill by the Trades Council of Belfast, 3743.

Grounds for objecting to the movement in favour of a compulsory half-holiday weekly, 3743, 3744. 3810–3818. 3913——Reference to the Cavan Grocers' Association as entirely in favour of the Bill, 3746. 3835——Entire approval of the application of the Bill being left to the City Council of Belfast. 3747. 3923, 3925——Information as to the intervals allowed to grocers' assistants in Belfast for meals, 3748–3758——Conclusion as to the long hours being more or less injurious to health, 3759, 3760.

Opinion that neither the small shopkeepers in Belfast, nor the public who now shop late, would be prejudiced by the operation of the Bill, whilst the wholesale houses close early as a general rule, 3761–3776. 3786–3801. 3819–3829——Evidence favourable to a general closing at seven on five days in the week, and at nine on Saturday, 3786–3801. 3830–3836. 3865–3887——Approval of the smaller shopkeepers who do not keep assistants being bound by a majority of two-thirds, 3802–3809.

Decided support of the Bill by small as well as large shopkeepers, and by the general public, 3819–3829——Approval of power in the county inspector of constabulary to enter shops after the hour of closing, in order to see that customers are not being served, 3915–3921.

Economy in Working. Evidence showing that early closing has proved economical to the shopkeepers, Debenham 2374–2378.

Edinburgh. Evidence respecting the long hours of labour of the employés of the Cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, Flint 1036–1049. 1068–1072. 1116–1119——Readiness of the Corporation of Edinburgh to put the provisions of the proposed Act in force, witness believing that the two-thirds majority would not be put to any inconvenience, Jamieson 3168–3171. 3302–3309——Comparatively early closing in the better class of shops in good neighbourhoods, whilst in the smaller shops the hours are excessively long; particulars to this effect, ib. 3172–3177. 3201–3212. 3293–3301.

Contemplated sub-division of Edinburgh by wards or otherwise for the application of the Act; opinion that this question and the ascertainment of the two-thirds majority may be safely left to local authorities, Jamieson 3233–3248. 3393–3401. 3406–3411——Resolutions passed by different associations of Edinburgh, and at public meetings in favour of the principle contained in Sir John Lubbock's Bill, ib. 3287–3292. 3303. 3309.

Examination as to witness' grounds for the conclusion that the small shopkeepers of Edinburgh (or the great majority of them) are in favour of the Bill, whilst the larger shopkeepers would not be affected by it, Jamieson 3293–3309——Public support to be given in Edinburgh to the Bill, so that it will work smoothly, ib. 3318.

Very limited success of the half-holiday movement in Edinburgh, Jamieson 3337–3344——Earlier closing in the clothing trade than in the boot and shoe, the drapery, and other trades, it being proposed to bring all alike under the Bill, ib. 3363–3369——Power in the small shopkeepers, as being in a majority, not to apply the Bill if they disapprove of it, ib. 3402–3404.

Paper explanatory of the views of the Edinburgh drapers respecting certain provisions of the Bill, App. 231.

Exemptions. Suggestion for conciliating the opponents when a two-thirds majority has been obtained; that is, by the local authority allowing exemption on certain conditions, Jump 3978, 3979. 4032–4038.

Female Shop Assistants. Data submitted on several points in support of the conclusion that the health of shop assistants is very injuriously affected by the unduly long hours, and that the female assistants especially suffer much from the prolonged standing, Kidd 5280 et seq. 5350–5352; Miss Macdonald 5370–5396; Grigg 5401–5419.

Fines and Penalties. Feeling of the Manchester Association of Shop Assistants, &c., that the fine suggested by the Bill is not heavy enough to prove deterrent, Horsman 362–364——Importance of inserting a clause in the Bill making it unlawful to serve customers after hours, Day 1219–1221——View of the Bolton Association that the fines suggested in the Bill are not sufficiently heavy, Vicar 1414–1417. 1432–1440.

Undesirability of increasing the penalties proposed by the Bill, Lewis 1805–1808——Consideration of the proposed penalties; no importance attached to the amount of the fine, but exception taken to the idea of imprisonment, Grant 1946——Opinion that the fines proposed by the Bill are not sufficiently heavy, Macpherson 2972–2974; Maher 3111——Belief that more substantial fines would be approved by the shopkeepers, Johnson 2975——Difference of opinion at Manchester upon the question whether the fines under the Bill should be increased, Robinson & Jump 3950–3953.

Flint, Thomas W. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a merchant at Glasgow, and represents the Scottish Shopkeepers' and Assistants' Union, 965, 966. 1026–1030. 1174.

Examination in regard to a plebiscite taken two years ago in Glasgow, the result showing that 80 per cent. of the shopkeepers were in favour of legislation for early closing, 967–969. 972–974——Opinion that each trade should choose its own hours of closing, 970, 971. 1022——Views respecting the difficulty of limiting the work done by employés after closing hours, 975–977. 1082–1087. 1148–1153. 1161, 1162.

Concurrence in the suggestion made at the Nottingham Congress respecting the exemption of traders who habitually close on Saturdays, 978–980. 1031–1035. 1140–1144——Examination as to the means to be adopted to overcome the difficulties arising from the classification of trades, 981–995. 1101–1107——Objection raised to the unification of Glasgow in one district, 996–1010. 1108–1115.

Concurrence in the view that the union should undertake the task of obtaining the opinion of the shopkeepers on the Early Closing movement, 1011–1021——Opinion that inspectors rather than the police should look to the enforcement of the law, 1023–1025——Evidence respecting the lengthy hours of labour of the employés of the cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, 1036–1049. 1068–1072. 1116–1119.

Conclusion adverse to the extension of the Shop Hours' Act, 1050–1064. 1074. 1154–1157——Reference to the discretion allowed to the local authority in respect of fixing the hours of closing, 1065, 1066. 1073. 1128–1130. 1146, 1147. 1163, 1164——Opinion that late shopping is a matter of habit, 1075–1081. 1095–1100——Examination as to Sunday closing; possibility of the Bill being made applicable to Sundays, 1120–1127——Preference for ten o'clock as the hour of closing on Saturday, 1131–1135. 1167.

Approval of the proposal to give each shopkeeper one vote only, 1136–1139. 1165, 1166——Desirability of limiting chemists to the sale of medicines after closing hours, 1172, 1173——Advocacy of early closing on the ground of the physical benefit that would accrue to the employés, 1175–1181——Belief that the voluntary system has been ineffectual, 1182–1187.

Freedom of Contract. Objection that Sir John Lubbock's Bill involves an entirely new departure from the liberty of male adults to make contracts for their own labour, Cushen 4751. 4812.

G.

General Shops and Stores. Discussion as to the manner in which large places of business, such as Whiteley's, would be classified for early closing, Stacey 222–244——Suggestion as to the mode of applying early closing and a weekly half-holiday to stores, and to general shops dealing in grocery, spirits, and various other articles, Robinson and Jump 3949. 4038–4047. 4088–4102——Difficulty as regards a fixed hour of closing in the case of general shops where spirits, groceries, &c, are sold, Ireland 5179, 5180. 5213–5218——See also Classification of Trades. Large Establishments.

Glasgow. Particulars respecting the North Western Shopkeepers' Association of Glasgow and the South Eastern Grocers' Association, both consisting of traders, Sutherland 517–527. 549——Opinion that very little progress has been made by the voluntary movement towards shortening the working hours, ib. 528–530. 534–537. 670–672. 704——Evidence respecting the very long hours of business in Glasgow, ib. 531–533. 550–554. 560–578. 633–636. 696, 697——Approval of the Early Closing Bill by the two associations represented by witness, ib. 538–541. 547, 548.

Several grounds for desiring shorter hours in Glasgow, Sutherland 579–589. 637——Impracticability of making the usual hour of closing earlier than seven o'clock, ib. 674–682——Belief that the long hours of business may partly account for the dearth of shop-assistants, ib. 698–703.

Opinion that the proposed Bill meets with the approval of both employers and employed in Glasgow, Cooney 719, 720. 773——Expediency of including the whole borough of Glasgow as one "district," ib. 733–735. 888, 889——Evidence respecting the differences in the general hours of closing, ib. 849–855. 935, 936. 943–947.

Examination in regard to a plebiscite taken two years ago, the result showing that eighty per cent. of the shopkeepers were in favour of legislation for early closing, Flint 967–969. 972–974——Objection raised to the unification of Glasgow as one district, ib. 996–1010. 1108–1115——Concurrence in the view that the Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union should undertake the task of obtaining the opinion of the shopkeepers on the Early Closing Movement, ib. 1011–1021.

Glasgow—continued.

Resolution passed by the Glasgow branch of the News-agents' and Booksellers Union in support of the Bill, App. 242.

Gould, Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Her Majesty's Superintending Inspector of Factories, 4543, 4544.

Suggestion that ten o'clock on Saturdays, and eight o'clock on other nights, would prove satisfactory hours for closing, 4546–4553. 4569. 4586–4594. 4630–4633. 4663–4669. 4672–4674——Question as to the "central authority" referred to in the Bill; acquiescence in the proposal that it should be the Home Office, 4554–4559.

Probability that the clause dealing with shops where two or more trades are carried on may give rise to difficulties, 4560–4568. 4612–4629——Approval of the local option character of the Bill; belief that it will be a great boon to shop-assistants, and will not inconvenience the public, 4584, 4585. 4661, 4662.

Examination as to the question of areas; suggestion that London might be divided into from five to eight districts, 4574–4582——Opinion that the district authorities rather than the London County Council should apply the Bill, 4595–4600. 4670, 4671.

Discussion as to the advisability of including small domestic shops in the Bill; grounds for believing that they should be included, 4601–4606. 4622–4624. 4647–4660——Information respecting the duties of witness as an inspector; statement that sanitary arrangements are in the hands of the local authorities, 4638–4646.

Grant, Bryce. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is engaged in the drapery trade at Penge; has held important official positions in connection with early closing associations, 1878–1885.

Grounds for the conclusion that there has been a great improvement in regard to early closing, and that it has been entirely due to voluntary effort, 1886–1891. 1902. 1943, 1944. 2001–2006. 2076–2079. 2084, 2085. 2166–2169. 2172–2175. 2203–2207——

Examination as to the effect of shop-work on the health of the employés; testimonials from eight doctors to prove that the occupation of shop-assistants is not unhealthy, 1892–1894. 2080–2083. 2210–2231——Opinion that the labour of employés is tedious but is not excessive, 1894, 1895. 1961–1971.

Reasons which induced witness to leave the old Early Closing Association, and start, a Voluntary Early Closing Association, 1896–1898. 1972–1977. 2218, 2219——Grounds for the opinion that voluntary action is better than compulsion, 1899–1901. 1945. 1952–1956. 2062–2070. 2140–2155. 2179–2181——Evidence showing that the weekly half-holiday, upon which most of the work of the society has been expended, is now granted in 952 towns of Great Britain, 1903–1913. 2191–2202——Belief that the society will eventually succeed in shortening the daily hours, 1914.

Grounds for believing in the impracticability of adopting an earlier hour than nine o'clock for general closing in London, 1915–1921. 1998, 1999. 2007. 2182–2190——Statement to the effect that the majority of the trade journals are against the Bill, 1924. 2162–2165. 2231–2240, 2257–2263——Difficulties that would arise in defining the "districts" in London, 1925. 1984–1997, 2050, 2051.

Examination respecting the classification of shops; belief that it would seriously inconvenience the public, 1926–2928. 2013–2025——Suggestion as the means necessary to be employed in order to obtain the opinion of two-thirds of any particular class of tradesmen, 1929–1931. 2036–2049. 2052–2063——Evidence showing the difficulties that would accrue in ascertaining the opinion of the costermongers, 1932–1938. 2119–2127——Impracticability of making the Saturday half-holiday apply to all shops, 1939–1942.

Consideration of the penalties proposed by the Bill; no importance attached to the amount of the fine, but exception taken to the idea of imprisonment, 1946——Particulars respecting the districts included in the work of the Voluntary Early Closing Association, 1947–1951——Conclusion favourable to the extension of the Shop Hours' Regulation Act, provided it does not apply to adult men, 1957–1960. 2093–2098. 2156–2161. 2246–2252.

Suggestion that employers might allow their assistants to go out for a short time during the middle of the day, 1957, 1958. 2008–2012. 2089–2092——Probability that were the Bill enforced it would practically ruin small tradesmen, 2086. 2107–2118. 2158——Question as to the general feeling of tradesmen in regard to the Bill; belief that many have had no opportunities of considering it, and that public meetings should be held in order to arrive at their opinion, 2087, 2088. 2105. 2170, 2171. 2176–2178.

Reference to the unfairness that might arise in the event of a possible conflicting action of the authorities in the City and County of London, 2099–2104. 2127–2133. 2255, 2256——Opinion that the two-thirds majority would never be obtained, 2106. 2112——Examination as to the views of witness seven or eight years ago, in regard to legislation; admission that he signed a report in favour of the Early Closing Bill in 1887, and voted in its favour at a Congress at Glasgow, 2203–2217. 2241–2246.

Greenwood, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a hair-dresser in Ashton-under-Lyne, and is chairman of the Northern Federation of Hair-dressers; is prepared to give evidence principally in regard to the Sunday closing, 2513. 2574–2577. 2581, 2582. 2597, 2598. 2698–2702.

Particulars respecting the constitution and working of the Association; it numbers about 750 members, 2514–2516. 2593–2596. 2648–2650——Evidence showing that in some districts hair-dressers work from 80 to 90 hours per week, 2517–2519——Enumeration of the Trades Association (Hair-dressers), and also of the Trades Councils that approve of the Bill but are particularly desirous for the insertion of a clause making Sunday closing compulsory, 2520–2534. 2539. 2581–2588. 2691–2693. 2707–2725. 2734–2736——Opinion that there would be no difficulty in obtaining the consent of two-thirds of the tradesmen, 2535, 2536. 2540–2543. 2650.

Statement that in the neighbourhood of Ashton-under-Lyne voluntary arrangement has been very effective except with regard to Sunday labour, but that it has failed when applied to large cities, such as Manchester, 2543–2553. 2669, 2670. 2686–2688. 2703, 2704. 2757–2759. 2765–2767——Difficulty of obtaining a conviction in regard to Sunday closing under the Act of Charles II., 2551. 2617–2632. 2638–2641. 2651–2662 2743–2745.

Examination as to the division of Manchester into districts; conclusion that if Manchester were treated as one district there would be a large majority in favour of early closing, 2554–2560. 2568, 2569. 2633. 2737–2742——Desirability of totally closing a shop in which the business of hair-dressing is combined with some other trade, 2564–2567——Belief that early closing would not inconvenience the public, 2580. 2651–2653. 2656, 2657. 2684. 2693.

Evidence as to the evil effect of long hours on the health of the employés, 2582–2592——Disapproval of adopting a general hour irrespective of districts for week-day closing, 2612–2616. 2633–2637. 2645–2647. 2672–2675——Advisability of empowering a town council to enforce the law for each district, 2642–2644. 2676–2678.

Probability of 9 o'clock being chosen by hair-dressers as the usual hour of closing, 2654, 2655——Evidence showing that the general hours of Ashton-under-Lyne and neighbourhood average seventy-four per week, 2663–2668. 2726–2733——Necessity for keeping open until 11 o'clock on Saturdays, 2680–2683. 2685——Contention that it is unnecessary to open on Sundays, 2691–2697. 2705, 2706. 2746–2756. 2760–2764.

Grigg, Dr. W. Chapman. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness, who is connected with several hospitals in London, has had a large experience of female disorders, and has made them a special study, 5397–5401.

Strong testimony as to the extremely injurious effect upon the health of female shop assistants through the very long hours, and the continuous and prolonged standing; sterility frequently caused by the latter evil, 5401–5419——Equal abuse as regards prolonged standing in the case of large as of small shops, though in some of the best houses the mischief has been modified, 5407. 5415–5417.

Great benefit to health when shop girls go from London to country towns, where they can often get a day off in the week, 5412–5419——Approval of the provision in the Bill authorising chemists to sell medical drugs and appliances after the fixed hour of closing, 5418.

Grocers. Comment upon the willingness of the grocery trade to support legislation, Stacey 16. 97–103——Representation by witness of the Grocers' Federation, which comprises members from all parts of the United Kingdom, Dunwoody 3695–3700. 3777–3785–3865——Decided approval by witness of Sir John Lubbock's Bill generally, and of the option of each trade to put it in force, ib. 3728–3730. 3740–3742.

Want of shorter hours in the grocery trade on the scale of recreation rather than health, Jump 4081–4087——Grounds for objecting to a proviso that grocers should be liable to be fined if their assistants are employed on the premises more than thirty minutes after the time of closing, Robinson 4103–4105.

Information as to the time of closing at witness' shop in London and in provincial towns respectively, and as to the practice of giving a weekly half-holiday, King 4727–4741——Harder work and longer hours of the masters than of the men, Cushen 4924, 4925——Explanation that witness does not employ any boys under eighteen beyond the legal hours per week, ib. 4976–4979. 4985–4992——Discretion exercised by the manager of each shop as to closing before or after 9 o'clock, the time being sometimes 9.30, ib. 4976. 4985–4991.

Hair-dresers. Witness, who is a hair-dresser in Ashton-under-Lyne, is chairman of the Northern Federation of Hair Dressers, and is prepared to give evidence principally in regard to Sunday-closing, Greenwood 2513. 2574–2577. 2581, 2582. 2597, 2598. 2698–2702——Particulars respecting the condition and working of the association; it numbers about 750 members, ib. 2514–2516. 2593–2596. 2648–2650——Evidence showing that in some districts hair-dressers work from eighty to ninety hours per week, ib. 2517–2519.

Enumeration of the Trades Association and also of the Trade Councils that approve of the Bill, but are particularly desirous for the insertion of a clause making Sunday closing compulsory, Greenwood 2520–2534. 2539. 2581–2588. 2691–2693. 2707–2725. 2734–2736——Opinion that there would be no difficulty in obtaining the consent of two-thirds of the trades, ib. 2535, 3536. 2540–2543. 2650——Desirability of totally closing a shop in which the business of hairdressing is combined with some other trade, ib. 2564–2567——Probability of nine o'clock being chosen by hairdressers as the usual hour of closing, ib. 2654, 2655.

Evidence showing that the general hours for Ashton-under-Lyne and neighbourhood average seventy-four per week, Greenwood 2663–2668. 2726–2733——Necessity for keeping open until eleven o'clock on Saturdays, ib. 2680–2683. 2685——Contention that it is unnecessary to open on Sundays, ib. 2691–2697. 2705, 2706. 2746–2756. 2760–2764——Objection to the exemption of hairdressers' shops, Jamieson 3379, 3380.

Resolutions passed by various local bodies of hairdressers in support of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, App. 224.

Half-Holiday:

Evidence purporting to show that the benefit of the weekly half-holiday is counteracted by the shops being kept open later on other days, Stacey 177–184——Grounds for believing that employés have received no practical benefit from the mid-weekly holiday, Horsman 439. 457–460——Conclusion that the half-holiday might be on a Saturday commencing at four o'clock, Cooney 760–769. 822–845. 937, 938. 948–952. 956–963.

Evidence showing that the weekly half-holiday is now granted in 952 towns of Great Britain, Grant 1903–1913. 2191–2202——Desirability of closing all shops on the same day with the exception of those that close habitually on Saturdays, Johnson 3017–3020——Statement that the weekly half-holiday is not general in the Tottenham and Edmonton district, Marsh 3084, 3085. 3091–3094.

Doubtful expediency of compulsory provisions as regards a weekly half-holiday; approval of Saturday as the best day, Jamieson 3186–3192 3213–3232. 3370, 3371, 3407, 3408——Entire approval of a weekly half-holiday for assistants, Coggan 3691–3694——Grounds for objecting to the movement in favour of a compulsory half-holiday weekly, Dunwoody 3743, 3744. 3810–3818. 3913.

Statement as to witness having been asked by the East London Early Closing Association to close early on Thursday and having refused, Cushen 4825–4835——Impracticability of working Clause 5 of the Bill (as regards a half-holiday) in the case of shops keeping grocery, drapery and other classes of goods under the same roof, ib. 4871–4881.

Absence of any practical difficulty in working Clause 5 of the Bill as regards the weekly half-holiday in the case of general shops; good prospect of Thursday being adopted in the different trades in London, Stacey 5114–5131. 5147–5149——Importance of legislation as a means towards a permanent half-holiday, ib. 5118——Approval of houses which close early on Saturdays being exempt from the provisions as regards a half-holiday on any other day, ib. 5152.

New clause adopted empowering the substitution of Saturday for any other day for half-holiday, Rep. x.

See also Saturday.

Health:

Argument that the Bill is desirable for two main reasons, viz., the physical health of the employés and for economical reasons in regard to shopkeepers, Stacey 279–297——Advocacy of early closing on the ground of the physical benefit that would accrue to the employés, Flint 1175–1181——Reasons for believing that shorter hours are necessary for the health of the employés, Lewis 1779–1792.

Examination as to the effect of shop work on the health of the employé; testimonials from eight doctors to prove that the occupation of shop assistants is not unhealthy, Grant 1892–1894. 2030–2033. 2210–2231——Opinions that the labour of employé's is tedious but is not excessive, ib. 1894, 1895. 1961–1971.

Evidence as to the evil effects of long hours on the health of the employés in the hair-dressing trade, Greenwood 2589–2592——Conclusion as to the long hours being more or less injurious to health, Beaumont 2827. 2899–2903; Dunwoody 3759, 3760——Expediency of earlier closing in the interests of health, especially in the smaller shops, Robinson 4070–4074——Advocacy of the Bill on the score both of health and recreation, Wilson 4141, 4142. 4172–4174. 4213–4215.

Objection that the proposed curtailment of hours interferes with cases in which the health of male adults is not seriously affected; statistics hereon as to the health of grocers and other classes of traders, Cushen 4751. 4813–4824. 4914–4925. 4958–4962——Much greater harm to health from smoking and drinking than from overwork or late hours, ib. 4821–4824.

Data submitted in detail in support of the conclusion that the health of shop assistants is very injuriously affected by the unduly long hours, and that the female assistants especially suffer from the prolonged standing, Kidd 5280 et seq.——Injurious effect upon health in cases where a very short time is allowed for meals, ib. 5355–5360——Difficulty in drawing conclusions as to the health of shop assistants from the Registrar General Returns, ib. 5361–5364.

Experience of witness as a medical practitioner in London; she is now attached to the Hospital for Women in the Euston-road, Miss Macdonald 5365–5369——Injurious effect upon the health of young women in shops not only from the long hours, but from the prolonged standing, insufficient time for meals, and bad atmosphere; special reference to prolonged standing as extremely prejudicial, ib. 5370–5390——Worse condition and surroundings in the smaller than in the larger shops; aggravation of the mischief through low wages, ib. 5375–5377. 5392–5396.

Witness who is connected with several hospitals in London, and has had a large experience of female disorders and has made them a special study, Grigg 5397–5401——Strong testimony as to the extremely injurious effect upon the health of female shop assistants through the very long hours and the continuous and prolonged standing; sterility frequently caused by the latter evil, ib. 5401–5419——Equal abuse as regards prolonged standing in the case of large as of small shops, though in some of the best houses the mischief has been modified, ib. 5407. 5415–5417——Great benefit to health when shop-girls go from London to country towns, where they can often get a day off in the week, ib. 5412–5419.

Communications from several medical men showing that long hours have not, in their experience, caused much illness to shop assistants, App. 232.

Extract from supplement to the Registrar General's Report, 1885, for the years 1880–1882, showing the death-rate per cent. in different trades and occupations, App. 235.

Petition to Parliament in 1888, signed by numerous medical men, strongly in support of the Bill then introduced by Sir John Lubbock for limiting the hours of labour, App. 236.

Hill, Edward Rainbow. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representation by witness of the Crewe Tradesmen's Association, 4238–4242.

Statement of the hours of closing at Crewe; the shops being open till about 10.30 on Fridays and 11 on Saturdays, but closing on Wednesdays at 2; proposed curtailment, 4243–4251——Habit of late shopping on Fridays and Saturdays, 4249, 4250. 4282——Approval generally of the present Bill, subject to some amendments, though witness would like to see direct compulsion applied to all trades throughout the country, 4252 et seq.

Difficulty in getting a two-thirds majority at Crewe; modification proposed, 4254–4264. 4279–4282. 4300–4304——Expediency of Crewe being dealt with as one district in the application of the Bill, all trades being dealt with alike, 4270–4272. 4284–4287.——Suggestion that the hour of closing in Crewe should be fixed at 8 o'clock, 4294–4299——Recommendation that the hour in each town should be fixed by the local authority, 4296, 4297. 4305–4307.

Horsman, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Represents the Manchester District of the Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks; has had thirty years' experience behind the counter, 310. 330. 422, 423. 474–477.

Statement that the Manchester Association numbers about 600 members, 311, 312. 424–429——Evidence as to the great length of the working day in the shops of Manchester, 313–322. 371–373. 461–466——Opinion that voluntary action has not been very effectual, 323–326. 334–338. 433–436. 478–481.

Desire for legislation on the part of the Manchester Association of Shop Assistants and also of the local traders, 328, 329. 331, 332. 339——Suggestion that the consent of the two-thirds of the traders mentioned in the Bill should apply generally and not to individual individual trades, 340–342. 345–350. 374–385. 452–454. 495–497——Approval by the association of the general scope of the Bill, 344. 370.

Desire of the association that when the consent of the traders is obtained, the enforcement of the Bill by the local authorities should be made compulsory, 351–353. 386–397——Opinion that the Bill should take effect throughout the whole year, 354–357——Expression of doubt as to the possibility of closing at 6 o'clock, 358–361. 455, 456——Feeling of the association that the fine suggested by the Bill is not heavy enough to prove deterrent, 362–364.

Desirability of inserting a clause to ensure that early closing would benefit the employés; belief that such clause would be more effectual than an extension of the Shop Hours Regulation Bill, 365–368. 398. 411–421. 430–433. 437–451. 509–513——Suggestions that employés might be paid for overtime work, 398–411——Grounds for believing that employés have received no practical benefit from the mid-weekly holiday, 439. 457–460.

Details respecting the constitution and the views of the Manchester Trade Council, 467–473——Admission that the division of towns into districts presents difficulties, 482–487——Opinion that the classification of trades can be satisfactorily accomplished, 488–494——Examination as to the length of time allowed for meals, 498–508.

Hour of Closing. Conclusion that in Glasgow 7 o'clock might be taken as the general hour of closing, Cooney 863–866——Disapproval of the suggestion that all shops should close at the same hour; each trade should arrange its own hours, Cooney 964; Flint 970, 971. 1022.

Desirability of enforcing early closing throughout the entire year, and not relaxing it at any special season, Vicar 1382–1389——Undesirability of choosing 6 o'clock as a general closing hour in the early stages of the operation of the Bill, ib. 1526, 1527. 1530, 1531——Opinion that the latest time of compulsory closing should be 8 o'clock, the larger shops closing voluntarily, much earlier, Jamieson 3325–3330. 3372–3405.

Evidence favourable to a general closing at 7 on five days in the week, and at 9 on Saturday, Dunwoody 3786–3801. 3830–3836. 3865–3887——Suggestion that 10 o'clock on Saturdays and 8 o'clock on other nights in the week would prove satisfactory hours for closing, Gould 4546–4553. 4569. 4586–4594. 4630–4633. 4663–4669. 4672–4674.

Hull. Resolution passed by the Hull Retail Grocers' Association in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, Jackson 4995–4996; App. 233——Belief that in Hull there would be no difficulty under the Bill as regards general shops in the selection of one particular day in the week for a half-holiday; general feeling of the trade and of the assistants in favour of the half-holiday, Jackson 5000–5009. 5031.

Closing of the shops in which witness is interested in Hull at 7 o'clock on the first three days of the week, at 1 on Thursday (the half-holiday), at 8 on Friday, and at 10 on Saturday; belief that the general public would not be inconvenienced by these hours generally, Jackson 5012–5019. 5029–5033.

I.

Imprisonment. Improbability of the penalty of imprisonment ever being inflicted, Beaumont 2878–2881. 2939, 2940. See also Fines and Penalties.

Inspection. Opinion that inspectors rather than the police should look to the enforcement of the law, Flint 1023–1025——Difficulty as regards inspection in applying the limit of seventy-four hours weekly to adults above the age of eighteen; preference for the provisions of the present Bill, Jamieson 3417–3419.

Intervals of Rest. Suggestion that employés might allow their assistants to go out for a short time during the middle of the day, Grant 1957, 1958. 2008–2012. 2089–2092.

Ireland, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representations by witness of the Family Grocers and Purveyors' Association of Dublin, which comprises about 200 members who are all employers, 5153, 5154. 5184–5189. 5247.

Average hours in Dublin shops from 8 till 8, though some of the larger shops close at 4 on Saturday, whilst some of the smaller remain open till 11 or 12, 5155–5159——Tendency to shorten hours voluntarily; expediency, however, of legislation on the subject, 5160–5178. 5208–5213.

Approval by witness's association of the principle of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, though it is suggested that the Bill be strengthened on certain points, 5163–5178. 5184–5189——Conclusion that not only the Trades Council in Dublin, but the local authority authority would be in favour of applying the Bill, 5174. 5181, 5182. 5190-5196. 5208–5213——Difficulty as regards a fixed hour of closing in the case of general shops where spirits, groceries, &c., are sold, 5179, 5180. 5213–5218.

Grounds for submitting that the working classes would not be inconvenienced by earlier closing; reference especially to the unduly long hours in small shops on Saturday, 5183. 5197–5200. 5240–5246. 5248–5258——Difficulties hitherto in the way of a weekly half-holiday in Dublin, 5201–5207. 5266, 5267.

Varying practice in Dublin in different shops as to the time allowed for meals, 5219–5233——Opinion that bad results would not follow if the assistants had more time on their hands in the evening, 5234–5239. 5247, 5248——Conclusion that the smaller as well as the larger shopkeepers are generally in favour of the Bill, 5259–5267 ——Evidence to the effect that traders generally in Belfast and throughout the country should have the option of coming under the Bill, witness contemplating the adoption of nine o'clock on Saturday and seven o'clock on other days in the week, Renton 3476-3488.

General opinion of the shopkeepers themselves that the hours are too long, and should be shortened by legislation; resolutions passed to this effect by the Grocers' Federation and the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association, the former body objecting, however, to certain clauses in Sir J. Lubbock's Bill, Dunwoody 3704–3726. 3837–3864. 3922, 3923.

J.

Jackson, William. Representation by witness of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association which comprises about 100 members, 4993, 4994. 5026–5028.

Resolution passed by the association in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 4995, 4996——Suggestion, on the part of the association, for an alteration of Clause 1 of the Bill as regards the initiative of the local authority, 4997–4999.

Belief that in Hull there would be no difficulty under the Bill, as regards general shops, in the selection of one particular day in the week for a half-holiday; general feeling of the trade and of the assistants in favour of the half-holiday, 5000–5009. 5031——Suggested substitution of "two-thirds" for "one-third" in Sub-section 2, of Clause 3; 5010, 5011.

Closing of the shops in which witness is interested, in Hull, at seven o'clock on the first three days of the week, at one on Thursday (the half-holiday), at eight on Friday, and at ten on Saturday; belief that the general public would not be inconvenienced by these hours generally, 5012–5019. 5029–5033——Allowance of an hour for dinner and half-an-hour for tea, the assistants having breakfast before they come, 5020–5025.

Jamieson, John. Witness, who is a merchant clothier, in Edinburgh, is a director of the Scottish Shopkeepers' Union, is vice-president of the Merchants' Association of Edinburgh, and is a member of the City Council, 3151–3167. 3279–3286.

Influence of the Shopkeepers' Union chiefly among the smaller class of shopkeepers, assistants being also comprised in the Union, and both classes being strongly in favour of the present Bill, 3154–3158. 3179 et seq. 3321–3324——Readiness of the corporation of Edinburgh to put the provisions of the proposed Act in force, witness believing that the two-thirds majority would be obtained, and that the working classes would not be put to any inconvenience, 3168–3171. 3302–3309.

Comparatively early closing in the better class of shops in good neighbourhoods, whilst in the smaller shops the hours are excessively long; particulars to this effect, 3172–3177. 3201–3212. 3293–3301——Conclusion that voluntary action as regards early closing is inadequate, and that statutory and compulsory provisions are necessary, 3178. 3229. 3316, 3317. 3337–3344.

Strong approval by the Shopkeepers' Union of the general provisions of the present Bill, especially as regards compulsory earlier closing in the evening, 3181-3193——Doubtful expediency of compulsory provisions as regards a weekly half-holiday; approval of Saturday as the best day, 3186–3192. 3213–3232. 3370, 3371. 3407, 3408——Inaccuracy of statements as to the "Drapers' Record" and the "Grocer" being adverse to the Bill, 3194–3199——Contemplated sub-division of Edinburgh, by wards or otherwise, for the application of the Act; opinion that this question, and the ascertainment of the two-thirds majority, may be safely left to local authorities, 3233–3248. 3393–3401. 3406–3411.

Evidence in approval of Clause 5, with respect to the early closing of large and general shops, or stores, in Edinburgh, which carry on several classes of business, absence of hardship or inconvenience in these cases, 3248–3278——Resolutions passed by different associations of Edinburgh, and at public meetings, in favour of the principle contained in Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 3287-3292. 3303. 3309.

Examination as to witness' grounds for the conclusion that the small shopkeepers of Edinburgh (or the great majority of them) are in favour of the Bill, whilst the larger shopkeepers would not be affected by it, 3293–3309——Habit rather than necessity of late shopping in the poorer districts, witness contending that the working classes would not be seriously convenienced by early closing, 3293-3296. 3310–3315.

Public support to be given in Edinburgh to the Bill, so that it will work smoothly, 3318——Expediency of the Bill being applied to England and Scotland at the same time, 3319, 3320——Opinion that the latest time of compulsory closing should be 8 o'clock, the larger shops closing, voluntarily, much earlier, 3325–3330. 3372. 3405.

Doubt whether tobacconists should be exempted from the Bill, 3331. 3373——Approval of the exemption of chemists, under certain conditions, 3332, 3333——Special legislation required for public houses, 3334——Objection to newsagents being exempted, 3335, 3336. 3374–3378——Very limited success of the half-holiday movement in Edinburgh, 3337–3344.

Practice in witness' shop and in numerous others at Edinburgh for the assistants to go to dinner in two detachments, 3345–3362——Earlier closing in the clothing trade than in the boot and shoe, the drapery, and other trades, it being proposed to bring all alike under the Bill, 3363–3369——Objection to the exemption of hairdressers' shops, 3379, 3380——Approval of the exemption of refreshment places and ham and beef shops under certain conditions, 3381–3391.

Large preponderance of advantages over disadvantages by the adoption of early closing, compulsorily, 3392——Power in the small shopkeepers of Edinburgh, as being in a majority, not to apply the Bill if they disapprove of it, 3402–3404.

Very satisfactory working in Edinburgh of the Shop Hours Regulation Act limiting the employment of young persons under the age of 18 to 74 hours a week, 3412–3416——Difficulty as regards inspection in applying the limit of 74 hours weekly to adults above the age of 18; preference for the provisions of the present Bill, 3417–3419.

Jamieson, J. Notes handed in by Councillor Jamieson, explanatory of the views of the Edinburgh drapers respecting certain provisions of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, and referring to certain evidence before the Committee on the question, App. 231.

Johnson, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is General Treasurer of the National Union of Warehousemen and Clerks, 2965.

Belief that more substantial fines would be approved by the shopkeepers, 2975——Reasons for the necessity of a clause to limit the work of the employés after closing hours, 2981. 2983–2986——Examination as to the means of overcoming the difficulty of the classification of trades, 3017. 3041, 3042——Desirability of closing all shops on the same day, with the exception of those that close habitually on Saturdays, 3017–3020——Conclusion that London should form one area with a uniform hour of closing for all trades, 3021–3037. 3039.

Jump, Charles Arthur. See Robinson Henry, &c.

K.

Kidd, Dr. Percy. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Extensive professional experience of witness in London; very large practice in connection with the Brompton Hospital for Consumption and the London Hospital, 5268–5279.

Data submitted on several points in support of the conclusion that the health of shop assistants is very injuriously affected by the unduly long hours, and that the female assistants, especially, suffer much from the prolonged standing, 5280 et seq.; 5352, 5353.

Approval of the provisions in Clause 9 of Sir John Lubbock's Bill as regards chemists being exempted from fine for selling drugs, &c., after the fixed hour for closing, 5338–5351. 5354——Injurious effect upon health in cases where a very short time is allowed for meals, 5355–5360——Difficulty in drawing conclusions as to the health of shop assistants from the Registrar General's Returns, 5361–5364.

L.

Large Establishments. Belief that the Bill if carried would make little difference to the larger shops in the metropolis, Debenham 2325–2327. 2385——Evidence in approval of Clause 5, with respect to the early closing of large and general shops or stores in Edinburgh

Large Establishments—continued.

Edinburgh which carry on several classes of business; absence of hardship or inconvenience in these cases, Jamieson 3248–3278.

See also General Shops and Stores.

Leeds. Explanation that the off-license shops at Leeds are generally open from 8 or 8.30 a.m. till 11 p.m., but that comparatively few assistants are employed in those shops where draught beer is sold, Tunnard 5076–5082. 5099–5101.

Numbers of beer consumers at five "off" license holders' shops between 3 p.m. and 11 p.m. on certain days in March and April 1895, App. 233.

Lewis, Edwin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary to the Grocery and Provision Dealers' Assistants' Association in Liverpool, 1695. 1712.

Information respecting the great number of hours that shops in Liverpool are open per day and per week, 1696. 1727, 1728. 1746, 1747. 1777, 1778. 1818–1835——Detailed reasons for concluding that voluntary action is unsatisfactory, 1697–1702——Unanimity of the association in accepting the Bill as it stands, but with the addition of a clause to make Sunday closing compulsory, 1703–1708. 1713–1716.

Statement as to the Grocers' Employers' Association of Liverpool being in favour of the Bill, 1709–1711. 1774–1776. 1847–1852. 1874–1877——Practicability of taking Liverpool as a whole when obtaining the opinion of two-thirds of the shopkeepers, 1717–1719——Conclusion that it would be the work of the association to ascertain the desire of the traders on early closing, 1720–1725.

Opinion that where two or more trades are carried on in one shop there would be no difficulty in closing any individual department and leaving the others open, 1726. 1765–1769. 1835–1845——Inexpediency of extending the Shop Hours Regulation Act, 1732–1739. 1802–1804. 1854–1859——Discussion as to the cause of shops being kept open so late; belief that if they were closed earlier people would make their purchases earlier, 1740–1745. 1799–1801. 1803, 1804.

Examination as to the beneficial effect of the Bill, in the case of small shopkeepers, 1748–1755——Reference to the unanimous resolution in favour of the Bill passed at a large public meeting in Liverpool in January 1894; 1756–1764. 1771–1773——Reasons for believing that shorter hours are necessary for the health of the employés, 1779–1792.

Undesirability of increasing the penalties proposed by the Bill, 1805–1808——Suggestion as to the means to be employed to ensure that shops are really closed and that work is not being carried on after hours, 1809–1815——Opinion that ten o'clock would be a reasonable hour for closing on Saturdays, 1816.

Limitation of Hours. Extent to which the hours should be curtailed in those cases where they run from eighty-five to ninety hours per week, Robinson and Younge 3988. 4029–4031——Insufficiency as regards shop-assistants of a limitation of the hours, as under the Shop Hours Regulation Act, Wilson 4205–4212.

See also Shop Hours Regulation Act.

Ling, Thomas Pratt. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representation by witness of the Metropolitan Grocers' and Provision Merchants' Association; he is also largely interested in shops in the North of England and in London, 4675, 4676.

Practice at witness's shops in provincial towns to close at seven o'clock, so that the present Bill would not affect the local shops as it would shops in London, 4677, 4678. 4736–4741——Grounds for the conclusion that legislation for the compulsory closing of shops at a certain hour is inexpedient and would in London be perfectly unworkable, 4679 et seq.——Great prejudice to small traders and to large numbers of working men not paid till late in the evening if the shops were closed at eight o'clock, 4683–4690.

Improvement under the voluntary system as regards earlier closing in London and the adoption of a weekly half-holiday; difficulty, however, in securing a general early closing, either under the voluntary system or a compulsory system, 4691–4709——Belief that the proposed Act would never be enforced in London if it rested with the Corporation and the London Council to apply it, 4707, 4708. 4724.

Evidence to the effect that in some of the suburbs of London and in some of the leading thoroughfares the large shops outnumber the small ones, and could under the Bill enforce early closing upon the latter, greatly to their detriment, 4709–4717. 4720–4723——Effect of a compulsory system in checking the operation of the voluntary system, 4718——Local hardship under the Bill, though it would require a majority for its application and would be very troublesome to carry out, 4719–4726.

Information as to the time of closing at witness's shops in London and in provincial towns, respectively, and as to the practice of giving a weekly half-holiday, 4727–4741——Practice ——Practice as to the assistants at witness' shops leaving immediately after the time of closing, subject to some exceptions, 4742–4748.

Ling, Thomas Pratt—continued.

Liverpool. Information respecting the great number of hours that shops in Liverpool are open per day and per week, Lewis 1696. 1727, 1728. 1746, 1747. 1777, 1778. 1818-1835 ——Unanimity of the Grocery and Provision Dealers Assistants' Association in accepting the Bill as it stands, but with the addition of a clause to make Sunday closing compulsory, ib. 1703–1708. 1713–1716——Statement as to the Grocers' Employers Association being in favour of the Bill, ib. 1709–1711. 1774–1776. 1847–1852. 1874–1877.

Practicability of taking Liverpool as one district when obtaining the opinion of two-thirds of the shopkeepers, Lewis 1717–1719——Conclusion, that it would be the work of the Grocery, &c., Association, to ascertain the desire of the traders on early closing, ib. 1720–1725——Reference to the unanimous resolution in favour of the Bill passed at a large public meeting in Liverpool in January 1894, ib. 1756–1764, 1771–1773.

Representation by witness of the Liverpool and District Grocers' Association, which comprises nearly 400 shopkeepers, Wilson 4106. 4226–4228——Varying hours in grocers' shops in many districts, the hours running up as high as from eighty-six to ninety weekly; long hours also in several other trades, chiefly on Fridays and Saturdays. ib. 4107. 4155–4161. 4175-4177. 4232——Limited success of some vigorous efforts made by the assistants to obtain earlier closing voluntarily, ib. 4108. 4233.

General approval of the present Bill by the association represented by witness, subject to certain amendments, Wilson 4109–4115——Several large demonstrations in Liverpool in favour of early closing, ib. 4116. 4222–4231——Conclusion, that the public would not be inconvenienced under the Bill, and that it could be applied equally over the whole city as one area, ib. 4117–4130. 4175–4188.

Belief that a majority of two-thirds would work well, and that grocers and other tradesmen in the outlying districts of Liverpool would not be prejudiced by the action of the larger and more central tradesmen who now close earlier than the former, Wilson 4123–4140. 4175–4188. 4199-4202——Long hours in small shops in side streets and in the outskirts of the city, even though the work may not be hard nor continuous; belief that, as a body, the small traders would readily come under the provisions of the Bill, ib. 4189–4221.

Local Authorities. Concurrence in the opinion that it should be made imperative upon the "local authorities" to enforce the Act, Cooney 746. 776–782; Vicar 1380, 1381. 1441–1444; Maher 3104-3108. 3129–3131——Reference to the discretion allowed to the local authority in respect of fixing the hours of closing, Flint 1065, 1066. 1073. 1128–1130. 1146, 1147. 1163, 1164——Opinion that no difficulty would arise in regard to a conflict of jurisdiction between local authorities, Debenham 2365–2367.

Advisability of empowering a town council to enforce the law for each district, Greenwood 2642–2644. 2676–2678——Doubt expressed as to whether the local authorities would put the Act into operation; suggestion that their action should be made compulsory, Macpherson 2963, 2964. 2967–2969——Desirability of making the action of the local authorities compulsory, Maher 3104-3108. 3129–3131——Difference of opinion upon the question whether the local authority should be bound to carry out the wishes of a majority of two-thirds, Robinson and Jump 3938–3942.

Suggestion that the hour in each town should be fixed by the local authority, Hill 4296, 4297. 4305–4307——Opinion that the district authorities rather than the London County Council should apply the Bill, Gould 4595–4600. 4670, 4671.

Objection to Clause 1 of the Bill as regards the application to the local authority for putting the Act in force, Cushen 4751——Suggestion on the part of the Hull Retail Grocers' Association for an alteration of Clause 1 of the Bill as regards the initiative of the local authority, Jackson 4997–4999.

Local Option. Approval of the local option character of the Bill; belief that it will be a great boon to shop assistants, and will not inconvenience the public, Gould 4584, 4585. 4661, 4662.—— See also Local Authorities. Majority of Two-thirds. Voluntary System.

London:

Reference to the Mansion House meeting of 1886 as proving the strong desire of the metropolitan shopkeepers for legislation, Stacey 12–16. 33–38——Detailed results of a canvas instituted in the poorer districts of London in order to ascertain the views of the shopkeepers on the Early Closing movement, ib. 20–33. 114–117——Enumeration of districts which, owing to their geographical features, lend themselves to the purposes of the Bill; admission that in the case of Oxford-street and Tottenham Court-road difficulties are presented, ib. 211–228. 249–254.

Reasons for believing in the impracticability of adopting an earlier hour than nine o'clock for general closing in London, Grant 1915–1921. 1998, 1999. 2007. 2182–2190

2190——Reference to the unfairness that might arise in the event of a possible conflicting action of the authorities in the City and County of London, Grant 2099-2104. 2127–2133. 2255, 2256.

Examination as to the hours of closing in the West End; practice amongst the larger shops to close on an average at about seven o'clock for five days, and on Saturdays at two o'clock, Debenham 2274–2286. 2347–2357——Evidence showing the houses in the poorer districts of London average from eighty to eighty-five per week, Macpherson 2957, 2958——Grounds for concluding that London should form one area or district, with a uniform hour of closing for all trades, Johnson 3021–3037. 3039——Conclusion that London should be separated into districts, Ward 3058-3061. 3077–3082.

Statement that as a rule from eighty-six to ninety hours are worked per week, Maher 3097, 3098. 3115, 3116——Approval of the proposed Bill as regards London, subject to certain amendments, ib. 3100–3103.

Belief that the proposed Act would never be enforced in London if it rested with the Corporation and the London Council to apply it, Ling 4707, 4708. 4724——Evidence to the effect that in some of the suburbs of London, and in some of the leading thoroughfares, the large shops outnumber the small ones, and could, under the Bill, enforce early closing upon the latter, greatly to their detriment, ib. 4709–4717. 4720–4723.

Contention that legislative early closing, even with local option clauses, would prove unworkable in London, Cushen 4751——Opinion that in London the sanitary authorities rather than the County Council should make the order, applying the Act, ib. 4751. 4781–4783. 4963–4965——Reference to Clause 5 of the Bill as absolutely unworkable, whilst it would tend to divert business from suburban to central districts, where large shops are situated, ib. 4751.

Much greater indifference of shop assistants in London than of masters as regards earlier closing, their chief desire being for the weekly half-holiday, Cushen 4752–4769. 4787–4796. 4911–4913——Conclusion that under the Bill London would be one area, the London County Council being the local authority, ib. 4965, 4966.

Reference to a public meeting (of a disorderly character) at Exeter Hall in 1888, at which a resolution was passed adverse to the former compulsory closing Bill, this Bill having been totally different from that now under consideration, Stacey 5106–5112.

Resolution passed by the London Trades Council in support of Early Closing Bill, and of the adoption also of amendments of the Shop Assistants' Union, App. 242.

Macdonald, Miss, M.B. (Analysis of her Evidence.)—Experience of witness as a medical practitioner in London; she is now attached to the Hospital for Women in the Euston-road, 5365–5369——Injurious effect upon the health of young women in shops, not only from the long hours but from the prolonged standing, insufficient time for meals, and bad atmosphere; special reference to prolonged standing as extremely prejudicial, 5370–5390——Worse conditions and surroundings in the smaller than in the larger shops; aggravation of the mischief through the low wages, 5375–5377. 5392–5396.

Macpherson, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary to the National Union of Shop Assistants, which numbers 2,000 members, 2953–2956. 2987.

Evidence showing the hours in the poorer districts of London average from eighty to eight-five per week, 2957, 2958——Absolute failure of the voluntary system, 2959——Approval of the Bill by the Association, provided certain amendments are made, 2960, 2961. 2979, 2980. 2989, 2990——Doubt expressed as to whether the local authorities would put the Act into operation; suggestion that their action should be made compulsory, 2963, 2964. 2967–2969——Desirability of requiring a majority of two-thirds necessary to revoke the Bill, 2970, 2971.

Opinion that the fines proposed by the Bill are not sufficiently heavy, 2972–2974——Necessity for inserting a clause to limit the work of the employés after closing hours to thirty minutes, 2976–2978. 2982——Improbability of the Bill prejudicing small shopkeepers, 2988——Preference given to the proposed Bill rather than to an extension of the Act of 1892; 2991–2993——Objection to the division of towns into areas, 3004–3006——Suggestion as to the manner in which the difficulty in regard to the classification of trades might be overcome, 3007–3016. 3040, 3041.

MacRae, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is treasurer of the Dundee Shop Assistants' Union, which has a membership of over 500; 2396–2399. 2456, 2457.

Evidence respecting the lengthy hours customary in Dundee, 2400, 2401. 2430-2440. 2489–2496——Grounds for believing voluntary action to be ineffectual, 2402–2408. 2470-2476——Approval of the proposed Bill by the Association, 2409–2419. 2429——Unanimity of the vote returned by the employers in 1891 in favour of the Half-holiday Bill, 2420–2423.

Belief that in Dundee the necessary majority of two-thirds could be quite easily obtained, the majority of the shopkeepers of all classes being in favour of the Bill, 2427. 2458-2466. 2486——Evidence showing that although certain work has to be done by the employés after closing hours they would still feel the benefit of the Bill, 2477–2482——Expediency of including the town of Dundee in one district, 2484, 2485——Opinion that eight o'clock would be chosen as the general hour for closing, 2487, 2488. 2497–2504——Examination as to the opinion of the Trades Council at Dundee, witness representing that it is in favour of the Bill, 2505-2512.

Maher, Alfred George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a clothier's assistant; represents the United Shop Assistants' Association of London, 3095, 3096. 3117, 3118.

Statement that from eighty-six to ninety hours are worked per week, 3097, 3098. 3115, 3116——Approval of the proposed Bill, subject to certain amendments, 3100-3103——Desirability of making the action of the local authorities compulsory, 3104–3108. 3129-3131——Opinion that a two-thirds majority should be necessary to revoke the Bill, 3109, 3110. 3137-3145——Suggestion that the fines should be heavier, 3111.

View that the work of employés should cease when the shop closes, 3112–3114——Particulars respecting the constitution of the association represented by witness, 3119–3123——Experience that small traders are in favour of legislation, 3132–3134——General inefficiency of the voluntary movement, 3135, 3136——Approval of the suggestion of a time-limit, 3146–3150.

MAJORITY OF TWO-THIRDS:

Opinion that in case of votes being taken upon the question at issue it should be on the one shopkeeper one vote principle, Stacey 74–80——Examination respecting the difficulty to be overcome in obtaining the consent of two-thirds of any particular class of traders in each district, ib. 194–202.

Suggestion that the consent of the two-thirds of the traders mentioned in the Bill should apply generally and not to individual trades, Horsman 340–342. 345–350. 374–385. 452–454. 495-497——Evidence as to the probability of obtaining the consent of two-thirds of the shopkeepers of each class to close at a certain time, and as to the means of carrying out a canvas on the question, Cooney 736–743. 816–821. 890–899——Approval of the proposal to give each shopkeeper one vote only, ib. 939–942; Flint 1136–1139. 1165, 1166.

Contention that as the consent of two-thirds of the shopkeepers is necessary to enforce early closing the opinion of two-thirds should be also requisite to revoke the application of the Bill, Vicar 1390–1407. 1502–1504; Beaumont 2777. 2908; Macpherson 2970, 2971; Maher 3109, 3110. 3137–3145; Dunwoody 3735, 3736. Robinson 3947; Stubbs 4318–4321.

Suggestion as to the means necessary to be employed in order to obtain the opinion of two-thirds of any particular class of tradesmen, Grant 1929–1931. 2039–2049. 2052–2063——Improbability of the two-thirds majority ever being obtained, Grant 2106–2112; Debenham 2292, 2293. 2331——Disapproval of the Bill generally, especially on account of its permissive character, Debenham 2288–2296. 2314–2318. 2393–2395.

Suggestion that the Bill should not be revoked before the expiration of a fixed time, and that a majority of two-thirds should be necessary to revoke the Bill; Ward 3052, 3053——Recommendation that there should be an interval of six or twelve months before the decision of a majority of two-thirds could be set aside, Robinson 3943–3946.

Grounds for the conclusion that the two-thirds majority in favour of compulsory closing will not be obtained in every district, Wootton 4479-4486——Approval of the suggestion to reconsider from time to time the decision of the locality in reference to early closing, ib. 4507, 4508.

Local hardship under the Bill though it would require a majority for its application and would be very troublesome to carry out, Ling 4719–4726——Suggested substitution of "two-thirds" for "one-third" in Sub-section 2 of Clause 3, Jackson 5010, 5011.

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD:

Representation of the views of the Manchester Association of Shop Assistants, Clerks, and Warehousemen, which numbers about 600 members, Horsman 311, 312. 424–429——Evidence as to the great length of the working day in the shops of Manchester, ib. 313–322. 371–373. 461–466——Opinion that the voluntary action has not been very effectual, ib. 323–326. 334–338. 433–436. 478–481.

Desire for legislation on the part of the Manchester Association of Shop Assistants and also of the traders of Manchester, Horsman 328, 329. 331, 332. 339——Approval by the association of the general scope of the Bill, ib. 341. 370——Desire of the association that when the consent of the traders is obtained the enforcement of the Bill by the local authorities should be made compulsory, ib. 351–353. 386–397——Expression of doubt as to the possibility of closing at six o'clock, ib. 358–361. 455, 456——Details respecting the constitution and the views of the Manchester Trades' Council, ib. 467–473.

Examination as to the division of Manchester into districts; conclusion that if it were treated as one district there would be a large majority in favour of early closing, Greenwood 2554–2560. 2568, 2569. 2633. 2737–2742.

Varying hours of shop assistants in witness' district from seventy to ninety hours per week, Robinson 3930–3932——Concurrence in general approval of the Bill some amendments being suggested on the part of the Manchester and Salford Grocers' Association, Robinson and Jump 3954-3958. 3962, 3963. 3965——Statement as to the very long hours in the working class suburbs of the city, Jump 3964.

Belief that the required majority would be obtained in Manchester and Salford and that the local town councils would apply the Act, Robinson and Jump 3966-3969——Information as to the number of members of the Manchester and Salford Grocers' Association, grocers being largely represented, ib. 3970–3973.

Conclusion that the great majority of the shops would vote for applying the Bill, though dealers holding "off" licenses would mostly vote against its application; illustration hereon of the necessity of compulsion in the matter, Robinson and Jump 3974–3978 — Half-holiday given by many grocers in Manchester though the smaller shops frequently continue open, ib. 3980-3985.

Approval of the Bill both by shopkeepers and by shop assistants, there being a strong feeling that legislation is necessary, Robinson 3986-3991——Conclusion that in dealing with Manchester as one or more areas under the Bill the local authority would not experience any great difficulty in applying the Bill, Jump and Robinson 4048-4057.

Resolution passed by the second branch of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters' and Joiners' in support of the Bill, App. 223.

Meals (Time Allowed). Information as to the time allowed in shops at Manchester for meals, Horsman 498–508——Intervals allowed in Glasgow for meals, Sutherland 683-690——Practice in witness' shop and in numerous others at Edinburgh for the assistants to go to dinner in two detachments, Jamieson 3345–3362.

Statement as to the extremely short time allowed for meals in some shops in Belfast, Renton 3492–3515——Information as to the intervals allowed to grocers' assistants at Belfast for meals, Dunwoody 3748–3758——Allowance in witness' shops of two hours a day for meals, Cushen 4905.

Allowance in witness' shops at Hull of an hour for dinner, and half-an-hour for tea, the assistants having breakfast before they come, Jackson 5020–5025——Grounds for statement that the usual dinner time allowed in London shops, where the assistants almost always live on the premises, is only thirty minutes, and for tea fifteen or twenty minutes, Stacey, 5132–5144——Belief that in provincial shops, wherever there is a regular staff of assistants, only thirty minutes are allowed for dinner, ib. 5145, 5146——Varying practice in Dublin in different shops as to the time allowed for meals, Ireland 5219–5233.

Moral Effect (Early Closing.) Effect of the Bill that great numbers of young men would be thrown on the streets at eight o'clock, whereas it would be better for them in some cases to be an hour longer in the shops, Cushen 4867. 4926–4934. 4936–4942. 4953-4957——Opinion that in Dublin bad results would not follow if the assistants had more time on their hands in the evening, Ireland 5234–5239. 5247, 5248.

N.

National Union of Shop Assistants. Total of about 2,000 members comprised in the National Union of Shop Assistants, Macpherson 2953–2956. 2987——Approval of the Bill by the association, provided certain amendments are made, ib. 2960, 2961. 2979, 2980. 2989, 2990.

Newport (Monmouth) Grocers' Association. Resolution passed by the association in support of the Bill, App. 241.

Newsagents. Objection to newsagents being exempted from the Bill, Jamieson 3335, 3336. 3374–3378.

North of Ireland Grocers' Association. Very small grocers in Belfast, as well as large, belonging to the association, the members being practically unanimous in favour of the Bill, Renton 3432–3441. 3463–3470.

Nottingham. Statement as to the present Bill having been discussed at the Nottingham Congress of 1893; Stacey 17–19. 53, 54. 118–121.

Great inconvenience to the working classes at Nottingham if not able to purchase up to a late hour the goods sold by grocers and provision dealers; reference hereon to the late hours in the lace factories, and to the long hours of labourers who receive their wages from day to day, Parker 3587–3596. 3652.

Very ruinous effect upon small shopkeepers if obliged to follow the lead of large shopkeepers who voluntarily close not later than eight; question hereon whether the smaller shops, as being in a majority could not prevent the application of the Bill; witness not concurring in this view, Parker 3597–3617. 3621, 3622. 3635–3637. 3647–3651. 3656–3660.

O.

OFF LICENSES (GROCERS):

Concurrence in the suggestion that off license holders might be exempted from the Bill as regards the sale of liquors, Sutherland 655, 656. 667–669; Stacey 3150, 3151——Grounds for the opinion that grocers' shops holding off licenses should be included in the clause which orders that shops in which two or more classes of trade are carried on shall close for the purpose of all such trades, Day 1239–1246. 1286. 1326–1331; Vicar 1407–1414. 1445–1456. 1484–1487. 1498–1501. 1513, 1514.

Information as to the traders at Birmingham holding off licenses, witness considering that they should be exempt from the Act as regards their trade in beer, Beaumont 2819–2821.

Approval of early closing in the case of those grocers holding off licenses, even though publicans might be open much later; expediency of the latter having power to come under the Bill, Renton 3442–3472.

Representations by witness, who is Secretary to the Nottingham "Off" License Association, of the National Federation of "Off" License Holders' Association, the latter body comprising some fifty-three or fifty-four branches, Parker 3552–3556——Resolutions passed at the annual meetings of the Council of the Federation strongly adverse to the holders of "off" licenses for home consumption being required to close during hours when houses for consumption on the premises are allowed to remain open, ib. 3557–3559. 3581——Sale by witness as an "off" license holder of beer for consumption off the premises, he being also a grocer and provision dealer, ib. 3560.

Hardship upon witness and the numerous other "off" license holders at Nottingham, if compelled to close before the publicans and if not exempted from the proposed Act, Parker 3561–3570——Comparatively few "off" license holders at Nottingham who keep assistants, ib. 3571–3575. 3620. 3633, 3634——Prejudicial effect of the Bill in so far as a two-thirds majority of grocers could compel a minority of "off" license holders to accept early closing, ib. 3576–3580. 3585, 3586.

Total of 20,301 "off" license holders in England and Wales, as at 31st March 1894, Parker 3582–3584——Long hours in the small shops kept by "off" license holders; the work, however, not being continuous, nor heavy, ib. 3618–3620. 3623–2632. 3643–3646——Advocacy of grocers holding "off" licenses being exempted from the Bill, even though other grocers may be required to close early, ib. 3638–3643.

Witness, as President of the Sheffield "Off" Licenses Association, confirms the evidence of Mr. Parker as to the great hardship to "off" license holders generally, if not exempted from Sir John Lubbock's Bill, Coggan 3661 et seq.——Statement, showing the large public use after eight p.m. of grocers' shops in Sheffield holding "off" licenses licenses for the sale of beer off the premises, Coggan 3666–3670——Belief that compulsory early closing would be the ruin of the "off" license trade, ib. 3671. 3681——Few assistants employed by "off" license holders, ib. 3674–3677. 3682——Difficulty and hardship in allowing "off" license holders to sell beer, and in closing their shops as regards other articles, ib. 3684–3688.

Representations on the part of the Leeds Off License Holders Association and of off license holders associations generally, strongly adverse to the hours of closing under Sir John Lubbock's Bill, as being not only exceedingly injurious to the trade but very inconvenient to the public, Staines 5034–5062——Willingness of grocers who are license holders to withdraw their opposition to the Bill if excluded from it as regards the sale of exciseable liquors, more especially of beer for consumption off the premises; claim to similar hours as the publicans in respect of beer, wines, and spirits, ib. 5043–5063.

Statistics as to the number of retail off licenses for England and Wales for, beer, wines, spirits, &c. respectively: great majority of cases in which beer is sold in jugs to the working classes, the business at Leeds being chiefly done between 8 and 11 o'clock in the evening, Tunnard 5065–5069. 5082–5090——Great injury to the holders of off-licenses and great inconvenience to the poorer classes if the former could not sell beer, &c. after 8 o'clock, ib. 5047–5072. 5082–5090. 5101–5103——Evidence strongly in favour of the exemption of off-license holders from Sir John Lubbock's Bill, as regard the sale of exciseable articles; withdrawal of their opposition if restricted only in respect of groceries, ib. 5073–5082. 5091–5098.

Paper showing the names and addresses of the president and other officers of the National Federation of "Off" License Holders' Associations and of the Secretaries of Federated Associations, App. 224, 225.

Return of retail "off" licenses (England and Wales) issued up to 31st March 1894; total of 31,928; App. 227.

Particulars as to the cost, &c. of licenses for the sale of wines and spirits for consumption off the premises, App. 227, 228.

Resolutions unanimously adopted at annual Council Meetings of the Federation from 1892 to 1895, inclusive; claim to exemption from Sir John Lubbock's Bill, App. 229.

Overtime. Suggestion that employés might be paid for overtime work, Horsman 398–411——Suggestions as to the means to be employed to ensure that shops are really closed and that work is not being carried on after hours, Cooney 786–804. 911–913. 923–925; Lewis 1809–1815——Consideration of difficulty of limiting the work done by employés after closing hours, Flint 975–977. 1082–1087. 1148–1153. 1161, 1162.

Necessity for limiting the time that a customer may remain in a shop after closing hours, Vicar 1418–1420——Opinion that the work of the employés should be limited to thirty minutes after closing hours, ib. 1420–1422. 1540–1543. 1603–1622. 1676–1680——Evidence showing that although certain work has to be done by the employés after closing hours, they would still feel the benefit of the Bill, McRae 2477–2482.

Necessity for inserting a clause to limit the work of the employés after closing hours to thirty minutes, Macpherson 2976–2978. 2982——Reasons for the necessity of a clause to limit the work of the employés after closing hours, Johnson 2981. 2983–2986——The work of employés should cease when the shop closes, Maher 3112–3114.

Practice as to the assistants at witness's shops leaving immediately after the time of closing, subject to some exceptions, Ling 4742–4748——Practice as to witness' assistants leaving at once when the shops are closed; doubt whether this could take place under compulsory early closing, Cushen 4841–4848.

P.

Parker, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness is secretary to the Nottingham "Off" License Association, and represents the National Federation of "Off" License Holders' Associations, the latter body comprising some fifty-three or fifty-four branches, 3552–3556.

Resolutions passed at the annual meetings of the Council of the Federation strongly adverse to the holders of "off" licenses for home consumption being required to close during hours when houses for consumption on the premises are permitted to remain open, 3557–3559. 3581——Sale by witness, as an "off" license holder, of beer for consumption off the premises, he being also a grocer and provision dealer, 3560——Hardship upon witness and the numerous other "off" license holders at Nottingham if compelled to close before the publicans, and if not exempted from the proposed Act, 3561–3570.

Comparatively few "off" license holders at Nottingham who keep assistants, 3571–3575. 3620. 3633, 3634——Prejudicial effect of the Bill in so far as a two-thirds majority of grocers could compel a majority of "off" license holders to accept early closing, 3576–3580. 3585, 3586——Total of 20,301 "off" license holders in England and Wales, as at 31st March 1894; 3582-3584.

Great inconvenience to the working classes at Nottingham if not able to purchase up to a late the goods sold by grocers and provision dealers; reference hereon to the late hours in the lace factories and to the long hours of labourers who receive their wages from day to day, 3587-3596. 3652——Very ruinous effect upon small shopkeepers if obliged to follow the lead of large shopkeepers who voluntarily close not later than eight; question hereon whether the smaller shops, as being in a majority, could not prevent the application of the Bill, witness not concurring to this view, 3597–3617. 3621, 3622. 3635–3637. 3647-3651. 3656-3660.

Long hours in the small grocers' shops kept by "off" license holders, the work, however, not being continuous or heavy, 3618–3620. 3623-3632. 3643-3646——Approval of an application of the Shop Hours Regulation Act where the hours are excessively and injuriously long, 3629–3632. 3653, 3654.

Advocacy of grocers holding "off" licenses being exempted from the Bill, even though other grocers may be required to close early, 3638-3643——Belief that there would be a wide-spread feeling against proceedings for the enforcement of the proposed legislation, 3655.

Penalties. See Fines and Penalties.

Police. Concurrence in the proposal in the Bill to place the carrying out of the Act in the hands of the police, Cooney 744–748——Approval of power in the county inspector of constabulary to enter shops after the hour of closing, in order to see that customers are not being served, Dunwoody 3915–3921——Objection to the employment of the police for the enforcement of the Act, Cushen 4751.

Post Offices. Adoption of amendment that "nothing contained in any order made under this Act shall be deemed to interfere with the transactions of post office business by the occupier of any shop who is also an officer of the Post Office, Rep. x.

Provincial Towns. Reference to the favourable reception of the Bill at public meetings, attended by witness in all the large towns Dundee to Plymouth; list handed in, Stacey 39–47; App. 223. 237–240——Reference to the sub-division of large provincial towns into districts; Bolton would form one district, Vicar 1461. 1564–1567.

Practice at witness's shops in provincial towns to close at 7 o'clock, so that the present Bill would not affect the local shops as it would in London, Ling 4677, 4678. 4736-4741.

Public, The (Working Classes):

Contention that customers might conveniently make their purchases earlier in the day, Stacey 163–176. 278. 295; Greenwood 2580. 2651–2653. 2656, 2657. 2684–2693——Concurrence in the opinion that the public shop late from force of habit, Sutherland 555–559. 659–664; Flint 1075–1081. 1095–1100.

Question as to the causes which may necessitate late shopping on the part of the public; belief that it is principally a matter of habit, Vicar 1631–1641. 1685–1690——Opinion that the proposed Act would not interfere with the convenience of the public, Vicar 1640–1646. 1691–1694; Stubbs 4324. 4347, 4348——Discussion as to the causes of shops being kept open so late; belief that if they were closed earlier people would make their purchases earlier, Lewis 1740–1745. 1799–1801. 1803, 1804.

Conclusion that late shopping is due to habit and indifference on the part of the customers, Debenham 2327–2330. 2358–2364——Examination respecting the reason for the late closing of suburban shops at Birmingham, this being mainly owing to the thoughtlessness of the public, Beaumont 2790, 2791. 2824. 2835-2841——Opinion that shorter hours would not inconvenience the public, ib. 2796, 2797. 2800. 2894–2898.

Habit rather than necessity of late shopping in the poorer districts, witness contending that the working classes would not be seriously inconvenienced by early closing, Jamiesm 3293-3296. 3310–3315——Concurrence in the view that the working classes and the public generally could shop earlier without inconvenience, Jump and Robinson 4062–4065. 4074–4078.

Great prejudice to small traders and to large numbers of working men not paid till late in the evening after the shops were closed at 8 o'clock, Ling 4683-4690——Argument that

Refreshment Houses (Restaurants). Consideration of the difficulties in the way of determining what class of shops are included as the refreshment houses exempted from the Bill, Stacey 258–267——Suggestion that although restaurants are excluded from the Bill their employés should only work a certain number of hours per day, Cooney 880–884——Approval of the exemption of refreshment places and ham and beef shops under certain conditions, Jamieson 3381–3391.

Renton, Hugh. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representation by witness of the Belfast and North of Ireland Grocers' Association, which numbers more than 400 members, all of whom are employers, 3420. 3424–3427. 3432–3441. 3457–3459——Representation also of several other associations, all of whom have passed resolutions in favour of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 3421–3423. 3457–3459.

Very long hours in the grocery trade in Belfast, especially in the outskirts of the city, and on Saturdays, when many shops are open till twelve, and some still later; shorter hours in the centre of the city and in the large establishments, 3428, 3429. 3461, 3462. 3479. 3489–3515. 3526–3529——Entire absence of any half-holiday in any of the trades in Belfast, 3430. 3460. 3516–3522——Repeated failure of voluntary early closing in Belfast, 3431. 3530.

Very small grocers in the city, as well as large, belonging to the North of Ireland Grocers' Association, the members being practically unanimous in favour of the Bill, 3432–3441. 3463–3470——Belief that the required majority of two-thirds for applying the Bill would be obtained, 3437–3439——Approval of early closing in the case of those grocers holding off-licenses, even though publicans might be open much later; expediency of the latter having power to come under the Bill, 3442–3472.

Evidence to the effect that trades generally in Belfast and throughout the country should have the option of coming under the Bill, witness contemplating the adoption of nine o'clock on Saturday and seven o'clock on other days of the week, 3470–3488——Statement as to the extremely short time allowed for meals in some shops, 3492–3515——Provision of seats for the shop assistants in the drapery trade, but not in other trades, 3523–3525.

Desire of the Trades Council of Belfast for early closing, 3530, 3531——Dissent from the view that closing at seven o'clock in Belfast would be an inconvenience to the working classes, the latter being decidedly in favour of earlier closing than at present, 3532–3551.

Robinson, Henry, and Charles Arthur Jump. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. Robinson.) Representation by witness (as late president) of the Grocers' Association of Manchester, Salford, and district, 3926, 3927. 3929——(Mr. Jump.) Representation also of the association by witness, he being a member of the committtee of the association, 3928, 3929. 3962.

(Mr. Robinson.) Varying hours of shop assistants in witness' district from seventy to ninety hours per week, 3930–3932——Impracticability of securing early closing save by legislation, witness approving generally of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 3933–3937——(Mr. Robinson and Mr. Jump.) Difference of opinion upon the question whether the local authority should be bound to carry out the wishes of a majority of two-thirds, 3938–3942.

(Mr. Robinson.) Suggestion that there should be an interval of six or twelve months before the decision of a majority of two-thirds could be set aside, 3943–3946——Expediency of a majority of two-thirds being required in order to revoke a similar majority, 3947.

(Mr. Robinson and Mr. Jump.) Suggestions as to the mode of applying early closing and a weekly half-holiday to stores and to general shops dealing in grocery, spirits, and various other articles, 3949. 4038–4047. 4088–4102——Difference of opinion upon the question whether the fines under the Bill should be increased, 3950–3953——Concurrence in general approval of the Bill, some amendments being suggested on the part of the Manchester and Salford Grocers' Association, 3954–3958. 3962, 3963. 3965.

(Mr. Robinson.) Limited extent to which the Bill might increase Sunday trading; expediency of such trading being abolished as far as possible, 3959–3961. 3992–3999. 4017–4025. 4058–4060——(Mr. Jump.) Dissent from the view that the Bill would increase Sunday trading, 3962. 4060, 4061——Statement as to the very long hours in the working class suburbs of Manchester, 3964.

(Mr. Robinson and Mr. Jump.) Belief that the required majority would be obtained in Manchester and Salford, and that the local town councils would apply the Act, 3966–3969——Information as to the number of members of the Manchester and Salford Grocers' Association, grocers being largely represented, 3970–3973——Conclusion that the great majority of the shops would vote for applying the Bill, though dealers holding "off"-licenses would mostly vote against its application; illustration hereon of the necessity of compulsion in the matter, 3974–3978.

(Mr. Jump.) Suggestion for conciliating the opponents when a two-thirds majority has been obtained; that is, by the local authority allowing exemptions on certain conditions, 3978, 3979. 4032–4038——(Mr. Robinson and Mr. Jump.) Half-holiday given by many grocers in Manchester, though the smaller shops frequently continue open, 3980–3985——(Mr. Robinson.) Approval of the Bill both by shopkeepers and by shop assistants, there being a strong feeling that legislation is necessary, 3986–3991.

(Mr. Robinson and Mr. Jump.) Suggestions as to the extent to which very small shopkeepers, such as those not employing assistants, should be brought under the Bill, 3988–3991. 4000–4007. 4066–4069. 4079–4087——Extent to which the hours should be curtailed in those cases where they run from eighty-five to ninety hours per week, 3988. 4029–4031——(Mr. Jump.) Statement as to various co-operative stores of the working classes in Lancashire being voluntarily closed at comparatively early hours without causing inconvenience to the members, 4008–4017. 4026–4028.

(Mr. Jump and Mr. Robinson.) Conclusion that in dealing with Manchester as one or more areas under the Bill, the local authority would not experience any great difficulty in applying the Bill, 4048–4057——Concurrence in the view that the working classes and the public generally could shop earlier without inconvenience, 4062–4065. 4074–4078.

(Mr. Robinson.) Expediency of early closing in the interests of health, especially in the smaller shops, 4070–4074——Full opportunity to the working classes to shop by 10 o'clock on Saturday, 4075–4078——(Mr. Jump.) Want of shorter hours in the grocery trade on the score of recreation rather than of health, 4081–4087——(Mr. Robinson.) Grounds for objecting to a proviso that grocers should be liable to be fined if their assistants are employed on the premises more than thirty minutes after the time of closing, 4103–4105.

Rural Districts. Consideration of the hours of work in rural districts and small towns; belief that they are shorter than in large towns, and that there is a great extension of the weekly half-holiday, Stacey 124–138.

S.

Saturday. Reference to a suggestion made at the Nottingham Congress by which traders who had habitually closed early on Saturdays should be exempted from the day of closing voted by their trade, Stacey 203–210——Concurrence in the suggestion made at the Nottingham Congress respecting the exemption of traders who habitually close on Saturdays, Flint 978–980. 1031–1036. 1140–1144.

Preference for 10 o'clock as the hour of closing on Saturdays, Flint 1131–1135. 1167; Lewis 1816——Grounds for suggesting that 8 o'clock should be the general time for closing on Saturdays, Day 1247–1255. 1267–1278. 1302, 1303. 1346–1359——Opinion that 9 o'clock would be a reasonable time for closing on Saturday, provided that the Wednesday half-holiday is retained, Vicar 1505–1507.

Impracticability of making the Saturday half-holiday apply to all shops, Grant 1939–1942——Full opportunity to the working classes to shop by 10 o'clock on Saturday, Robinson 4075–4078.

Opinion that there is no necessity as regards the working classes of shops being open on Saturdays till midnight: opinion that they should close at 10 or 10.30, Wilson 4234–4236——Suggestion that 10 o'clock on Saturdays and 8 o'clock on other days would be convenient hours for closing, as at Bolton, Stubbs 4350–4356. 4377–4393.

Saturday—continued.

Closing of the numerous shops in which witness is interested at about nine o'clock, except on Saturdays, when they are open till eleven or twelve; absolute necessity of late closing on Saturday, Cushen 4760-4780. 4797–4812. 4825-4841. 4897–4904.

See also Half-Holiday. Public, The.

Scotland. Statement that there is no general half-holiday in Glasgow and Edinburgh, although the custom prevails in smaller towns and villages in Scotland, Sutherland 620–632. 657, 658. 705–708.

As chairman of the Scottish Shopkeepers and Assistants' Union witness supplies detailed information respecting the constitution of the union, which now numbers 2,500 members, Cooney 709–718. 770–772. 903–906.

Influence of the Scottish Shopkeepers' Union chiefly among the smaller class of shopkeepers, assistants being also comprised in the union, and both classes being strongly in favour of the present Bill, Jamieson 3154–3158. 3179 et seq. 3321–3324; App. 234——Strong approval by the Shopkeepers' Union of the general provisions of the present Bill, especially as regards compulsory earlier closing in the evening, Jamieson 3181-3193. App. 234.

Inaccuracy of statements as to "The Draper's Record" and "The Grocer" being adverse to the Bill, Jamieson 3194–3199——Expediency of the Bill being applied to England and Scotland at the same time, ib. 3319, 3320.

See also Dundee. Edinburgh. Glasgow.

Seats for Shop Assistants. Provision of seats for the shop assistants in the drapery trade in Belfast, but not in other trades, Renton 3523–3525——Opportunities generally for assistants to sit down, though seats are not specially provided, Cushen 4763–4767.

Sheffield. Number of customers at ten "off" license shops between the hours of 8 p.m. and 11 p.m. on Friday 5th April 1895; App. 226.——See also Off Licenses.

Shop Hours Regulation Bill. Question as to the practicability of extending the Shop Hours Regulation Bill to adult labour; opinion that compulsory closing would be more effectual, Stacey 154–169——Desirability of inserting a clause to ensure that early closing would benefit the employés; belief that such clause would be more effectual than an extension of the Shop Hours Regulation Bill, Horsman 365–368. 398. 411–421. 430-433. 437-451. 509–513.

Reasons for believing that the extension of the Shop Hours Act would not be as efficacious as the Early Closing Bill, Cooney 721-725. 749-757. 877——Conclusions adverse to the extension of the Shop Hours' Act, Flint 1050–1064. 1074. 1154–1157; Lewis 1732–1739. 1802–1804. 1854-1859; Beaumont 2865–2874. 2950–2952——Belief that the extension of the Shop Hours Act would not receive the unanimous support of the shopkeepers, Vicar 1553. 1580-1583.

Conclusion favourable to the extension of the Shop Hours Regulation Act provided it does not apply to adult men, Grant 1957–1960. 2093–2098. 2156–2161. 2246. 2252——Preference given to the proposed Bill rather than to an extension of the Act of 1892; Macpherson 2991–2993.

Very satisfactory working in Edinburgh of the Shop Hours Regulation Act, limiting the employment of young persons under the age of eighteen to seventy-four hours a week, Jamieson 3412–3416——Approval of an application of the Shop Hours Regulation Act where the hours are excessively and injuriously long, Parker 3629–3632. 3653, 3654.

Small Tradesmen (Domestic Shops). Reasons for thinking it desirable that small tradesmen should be included in the Early Closing Act, Cooney 808–814. 867–876. 917, 918. 922; Day 1260-1266. 1296–1299. 1306–1308——Evidence showing the necessity of including small domestic shops in the proposed Bill, Vicar 1528-1539. 1554–1561. 1575–1579. 1663, 1664——Examination as to the beneficial effect of the Bill in the case of small shopkeepers, Lewis 1748-1755.

Difficulty in classifying shops so as to apply different treatment to the smaller classes; approval, however, by witness' association, of the exclusion of very small shops from the Bill, though it is not the view of witness, Wilson 4143–4154. 4162–4171.

Probability that were the Bill enforced it would practically ruin small tradesmen, Grant 2086. 2107–2118. 2158——Belief that legislation would not injure the smallest shopkeepers, Beaumont 2807. 2812. 2842, 2843. 2850. 2943–2946; Macpherson 2988——Experience to the effect that small traders are in favour of legislation, Maher 3132-3134.

Approval of the smaller shopkeepers who do not keep assistants being bound by a majority of two-thirds, Dunwoody 3802-3809——Decided support of the Bill by small as well as large shopkeepers in Belfast and by the general public, ib. 3819-3829.

Suggestions as to the extent to which very small shopkeepers, such as those not employing assistants, should be brought under the Bill, Robinson and Jump 3988–3991. 4000–4007. 4066–4069. 4079–4087——Discussion as to the advisability of including small domestic shops in the Bill; grounds for believing that they should be included, Gould 4601–4606. 4622–4624. 4647–4660.

See also Belfast. Bolton. Edinburgh. Liverpool. Nottingham.

Southport. Strong approval of the Bill by the Southport and District Grocers and Provision Dealers' Association; its extension recommended, App. 242.

Stacey, James Austin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary of the Early Closing Association; has held that position for nearly twenty years, and is fully conversant with the work done by the society, 1–4. 139.

Evidence showing that, with the exception of the mid-weekly closing, small progress has been made under the voluntary system since the previous Committee of 1886; 5–11. 81. 93-96——Grounds for believing that voluntary action is and will be inadequate, 12. 56. 146–151.

Reference to the Mansion House meeting as proving the strong desire of the shopkeepers for legislation, 12–16. 33–38——Comment upon the willingness of the grocery trade to support legislation, 16. 97–103——Statement as to the present Bill having been discussed at the Nottingham Congress of 1893; 17–19. 53, 54. 118–121.

Detailed results of a canvass instituted in the poorer districts of London in order to ascertain the views of the shopkeepers on the early-closing movement, 20–33. 114–117 —— Reference to the favourable reception of the Bill at public meetings attended by witness in all the large towns from Dundee to Plymouth; list handed in, 39–47—— Resolutions passed by the Trades Councils of London, Birmingham, Liverpool, &c., in favour of an Early Closing Bill, 48–53. 62, 63.

Grounds for conclusion that shops at Brixton, Clapham, and other suburban districts are open from eighty to eighty-two hours per week, 56–61. 177–184. 298–308—— Opinion that in case of votes being taken it should be on the one-shopkeeper-one-vote principle, 74–80——Examination respecting the legislation of the colonies in regard to early closing; belief that it has been successful, 82–92.

Consideration of the hours of work in rural districts and small towns; belief that they are shorter than in larger towns, and that there is a great extension of the weekly half-holiday, 124–138—— Question as to the practicability of extending the Shop Hours Regulation Bill to adult labour; opinion that compulsory closing would be more effectual, 154–169——Contention that customers might conveniently make their purchases earlier in the day, 163-176. 278. 295.

Evidence showing that the benefit of the weekly half-holiday is counteracted by the shops being kept open later on other days, 177-184——Consideration of questions raised as to the meaning of the term "district," and as to the parties for determining the same under the Bill, 191–193. 244–251——Examination respecting the difficulty to be overcome in obtaining the consent of two-thirds of any particular class of traders in each district, 194–202.

Reference to a suggestion made by the Nottingham Congress by which traders who had habitually closed early on Saturdays should be exempted from the day of closing voted by their trade, 203-210——Enumeration of districts which, owing to their geographical features, lend themselves to the purposes of the Bill; admission that in the case of Oxford street and Tottenham Court-road difficulties are presented, 211–228. 249-254——Discussion as to the manner in which large places of business, such as Whiteley's, would be classified for early closing, 229–244.

Consideration of the difficulties in the way of determining what class of shops are included as the refreshment houses exempted from the Bill, 258–267——Statement that chemists are included in the Bill by their own desire, 268-276——Argument that the Bill is desirable for two reasons, namely, the physical health of the employés and for economical reasons in regard to shopkeepers, 279–297.

[Second Examination.]—Resolutions handed in, as passed by trades councils and at different public meetings, in support of early closing as under Sir John Lubbock's Bill, 5104, 5105——Reference to a public meeting (of a disorderly character) at Exeter Hall in 1888, at which a resolution was passed adverse to the former Compulsory Early Closing Bill, this Bill having been totally different from that now under consideration, 5106–5112 ——Important public meetings at Birmingham, Liverpool, and other towns, in favour of legislation, 5143.

Absence

Absence of any practical difficulty in working Clause 5 of the Bill as regards the weekly half-holiday in the case of general shops; good prospect of Thursday being adopted in the different trades in London, 5114-5131. 5147-5149——Importance of legislation as a means towards a permanent half-holiday, 5118.

Grounds for statement that the usual dinner-time allowed in London shops, where the assistants almost always live on the premises, is only thirty minutes, and for tea, fifteen or twenty minutes, 5132-5144——Belief that in provincial shops, wherever there is a regular staff of assistants, only thirty minutes are allowed for dinner, 5145, 5146.

Concurrence in the suggestion that off-license holders might be exempted from the Bill as regards the sale of exciseable articles, 5150, 5151 ——Approval of houses which close early on Saturday being exempt from the provisions as regards a half-holiday or any other day, 5152.

Staines, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Representations on the part of the Leeds Off-License Holders' Association, and of off-license holders' associations generally, strongly adverse to the hours of closing under Sir John Lubbock's Bill, as being not only exceedingly injurious to the trade but very inconvenient to the public, 5034-5062 ——Willingness of grocers who are off-license holders to withdraw their opposition to the Bill if excluded from it as regards the sale of exciseable liquors, more especially of beer, for consumption off the premises; claim to similar hours as the publicans in respect of beer, wines, and spirits, 5043-5063.

Stubbs, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a draper, and is Honorary Secretary of the Bolton Drapers' Association, 4308. 4360, 4361.

Statement that the association consists of employers and does not include assistants, 4309-4311. 4362-4366——Evidence showing that the general hours of the trade at Bolton average about seventy-two per week, 4312. 4394——Reference to the utter failure of voluntary action in shortening the hours, 4313-4315——Approval of the proposed Bill by the Drapers' and the Grocers' Associations, 4316. 4319. 4325-4333. 4341.

Suggestion that a majority of two-thirds should be necessary to revoke the Bill, 4318-4321——Opinion that small shopkeepers are strongly in favour of the Bill, 4322, 4323. 4367-4376——Belief that the Bill will not prove inconvenient to the public, 4324. 4347, 4348——Desirability of including Bolton in one area, 4338-4340.

Improbability of the clause relating to shops where trades of two or more classes are carried on causing any difficulty in Bolton, 4342-4346——Suggestion that ten o'clock on Saturdays and eight o'clock on other days would be convenient hours for closing, 4350-4356. 4377-4393.

Suburban Districts (London). Grounds for conclusion that shops at Brixton, Clapham, and other suburban districts are open from eighty to eighty-two hours per week, Stacey 56-61. 177-184. 298-308.——See also London. Tottenham and Edmonton.

Sunday Closing. Examination as to Sunday closing; possibility of the Bill being made applicable to Sundays, Flint 1120-1127——Limited extent to which the Bill might increase Sunday trading; expediency of such trading being abolished as far as possible, Robinson 3959-3961. 3992-3999. 4017-4025. 4058-4060——Dissent from the view that the bill would increase Sunday trading, Jump, 3962. 4060, 4061.

Sutherland, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chairman of the North Western Shopkeepers' Association of Glasgow; also represents the South Eastern Grocers' Association, 514-517.

Particulars respecting the above-mentioned associations, both consisting of traders, 517-527. 549——Opinion that very little progress has been made by the voluntary movement towards shortening the working hours, 528-530. 534-537. 670-672. 704. ——Evidence respecting the lengthy hours of business in Glasgow, 531-533. 550-554. 560-578. 633-636. 696, 697——Approval of the Early Closing Bill by both Associations represented by witness, 538-541. 547, 548.

Discussion respecting the ambiguity of the word "district" as used in the Bill, 542-544. 593-598——Reference to difficulties that may arise in the classification of trades, 545, 546. 599-619. 644-651——Opinion that the public shop late from force of habit, 555-559. 659-664——Several grounds for desiring shorter hours, 579-589. 637.

Statement that there is no general half-holiday in Glasgow and Edinburgh although the custom prevails in smaller towns and villages, 620-632. 657, 658. 705-708——Opinion that licensed grocers and people holing off-licenses might be allowed to remain open for the sale of liquors only, 655, 656. 667-669——Suggestion that chemists might be exempted from the Bill, 665, 666.

Impracticability of making the usual hour of closing in Glasgow earlier than seven o'clock, 674–682——Information as to the length of the intervals allowed in Glasgow shops for meals, 683–690——Belief that the long hours of business may partly account for the dearth of shop assistants, 698–703.

T.

Tally System. Desirability of bringing the tally man under the operation of the Act, Ward 3054. 3088–3090.

Time Limit. Approval of the suggestion of a time limit, Maher 3146–3150. See also Shop Hours Regulation Act.

Tobacconists. Reasons for approving of the exemption of tobacconists from the Bill, Vicars 1423. 1480–1485. 1488–1496. 1510–1512——Doubt whether tobacconists should be exempted from the Bill, Jamieson 3331. 3373.

Tottenham and Edmonton. Information as to the great number of hours for which the shops are apen in the district comprising Tottenham and Edmonton, Ward 3047——Statement that the feeling of the small tradesmen in the district is in favour of legislation, ib. 3048, 3049. 3057. 3083——Approval of the proposed Bill by the association subject to one or two conditions, ib. 3050–3052——Probability that 8.30 or nine o'clock would be the hour chosen for closing in witness' district, ib. 3069–3082.

Trade Journals. Statement to the effect that the majority of the trade journals are against the Bill, Grant 1924. 2162–2165. 2231–2240. 2257–2263.

Trades Councils.—Resolutions passed by the trades councils of London, Birmingham, Liverpool, &c., in favour of an Early Closing Bill, Stacey 48–52. 62, 63.

Resolutions handed in, as passed by trades councils and at different public meetings, in support of early closing as under Sir John Lubbock's Bill, Stacey 5104, 5105; App. 237–240.

Copies of resolutions passed by several trades councils and local bodies in support of the Bill, App. 223. 237–240.

Tradesmen (Generally). Question as to the general feeling of tradesmen in regard to the Bill; belief that many have had no opportunities of considering it, and that public meetings should be held in order to arrive at their opinion, Grant 2087, 2088. 2105. 2170. 2176–2178.

Tunnard, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness is honorary secretary of the Leeds and District Off-License Holders' Protection Association, and is a member of the Parliamentary Committee of the Off-License Holders' Federation, 5064.

Statistics as to the number of retail off-licenses for England and Wales, for beer, wine, spirits, &c., respectively; great majority of cases in which beer is sold in jugs to the working classes, the business at Leeds being chiefly done between eight and eleven o'clock in the evening, 5065–5069. 5082–5090——Great injury to the holders of off-licenses and great inconvenience to the poorer classes if the former could not sell beer, &c., after eight o'clock, 5067–5072. 5082–5090. 5101–5103.

Evidence strongly in favour of the exemption of off-license holders from Sir John Lubbock's Bill, as regards the sale of exciseable articles; withdrawal of their opposition if restricted only in respect of groceries, 5073–5082. 5091–5098——Explanation that the off-license shops at Leeds are generally open from eight or 8.30 a.m. till eleven p.m., but that comparatively few assistants are employed in those shops where draught beer is sold, 5076–5082. 5099–5101.

U.

Uniform Hour of Closing. Belief that all trades might adopt the same hour for closing, Day 1283–1286. 1300–1305——Disapproval of adopting a general hour, irrespective of districts, for weekday closing, Greenwood 2612–2616. 2633–2637. 2645–2647. 2672–2675.

United Shop Assistants' Association. Representation by witness of the views of the United Shop Assistants' Association of London, Maher 3095 et seq.——Particulars respecting the constitution of the Association, ib. 3119–3123.

V.

Vicar, Archibald. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been Secretary of the Bolton and District Shop Assistants' Association for the last six months, 1360, 1361. 1426–1429.

Details respecting the constitution of the Association; it numbers 205 members, 1362, 1363. 1430, 1431.——Evidence showing that the shops at Bolton are open from 63½ to 69½ hours per week, 1364. 1464–1470. 1474–1479. 1522–1525. 1584–1593. 1660–1662——Grounds for believing that voluntary action is unsuccessful, 1365–1368.

Statement that the general scope of the Bill meets with the approval of the Bolton Association, 1369–1373. 1424, 1425——Opinion that early closing should be comprehensive and not apply to individual trades, 1374–1379. 1457–1463. 1508, 1509. 1568–1571. 1594–1602——Suggestion that the action of the local authorities in regard to the application of the Bill should be made compulsory, 1380, 1381. 1441–1444——Desirability of enforcing early closing throughout the entire year and not relaxing it at any special season, 1382–1389.

Necessity for limiting the time that a customer may remain in a shop after closing hours, 1418–1420——Opinion that the work of the employés should be limited to thirty minutes after closing hours, 1420–1422. 1540–1543. 1603–1622. 1676–1680——Reasons for approving of the exemption of tobacconists from the Bill, 1423. 1480–1485. 1488–1496. 1510–1512——Reference to the sub-division of towns into districts; Bolton would form one district, 1461–1463. 1564–1567.

Belief that nine o'clock would be a reasonable hour for closing on Saturdays provided that the Wednesday half-holiday is retained, 1505–1507——Examination as to the general hours at which shopping is done in Bolton; about seven o'clock is the busiest time, 1515–1521——Undesirability of choosing six o'clock as a general closing hour in the early stages of the operation of the Bill, 1526, 1527. 1530, 1531.

Evidence showing the necessity of including small domestic shops in the proposed Bill, 1528–1539. 1554–1561. 1575–1579. 1663, 1664——Conclusion that the extension of the Shop Hours Act would not receive the unanimous support of the shopkeepers, 1544–1553. 1580–1583——Question as to the causes which may necessitate late shopping on the part of the public; belief that it is principally a matter of habit, 1631–1641. 1685–1690.

Opinion that the proposed Act would not interfere with the convenience of the public, 1640–1646. 1691–1694——Information as to the cash and credit trade, respectively, in Bolton; conclusion that the credit customers are to a large extent the cause of late closing, 1647–1656——Reference to a meeting of the Bolton Trades Council, and also to a meeting held at Bolton in 1888, at both of which unanimous resolutions were passed in favour of legislation, 1657–1659. 1665–1669. 1672–1675. 1681–1684.

Voluntary System:

Evidence showing that, with the exception of the mid-weekly closing, small progress has been made under the voluntary system since the Select Committee of 1886; Stacey 5–11. 81. 93–96——Grounds for believing that voluntary action is and will be inadequate, ib. 12. 56. 147–151.

Concurrence in the conclusion that voluntary action has proved a failure and that compulsory regulations are required, Cooney 914–916; Flint 1182–1187; Day 1279, 1280; Vicar 1365–1368; Lewis 1697–1702; MacRae 2402–2408. 2470–2476; Beaumont 2770–2774. 2822; Macpherson 2959; Maher 3135, 3136.

Grounds for the conclusion that in London there has been a great improvement in regard to early closing, and that it has been entirely due to voluntary effort, Grant 1886–1891. 1902. 1943, 1944. 2001–2006. 2076–2079. 2084, 2085. 2166–2169, 2172–2175. 2203–2207——Reasons which induced witness to leave the old Early Closing Association and start a Voluntary Early Closing Association, ib. 1896–1898. 1972–1977. 2218, 2219——Contention that voluntary action is better than compulsion, ib. 1899–1901. 1945. 1952–1956. 2062–2070. 2140–2155. 2179–2181——Belief that the Voluntary Society will eventually succeed in shortening the daily hours, ib. 1914.

Particulars respecting the district included in the work of the Voluntary Early Closing Association, Grant 1947–1951——Examination as to the views of witness seven or eight years ago in regard to legislation; admission that he signed a report in favour of the Early Closing Bill in 1887, and voted in its favour at a congress at Glasgow, Grant 2203–2217. 2241–2246.

Concurrence generally in the views expressed by Mr. Bryce Grant. Debenham 2267–2269. 2319—— Grounds for the opinion that voluntary effort has made and is still making good progress, both as regards the half-holiday and the general hours of closing, ib. 2269–2272. 2297–2313. 2320–2324. 2372, 2373——Belief as to voluntary effort being more efficacious than legislation, ib. 2368–2392.

Statement that in the neighbourhood of Ashton-under-Lyne voluntary arrangements have been very effective except with regard to Sunday labour; but that they have failed when applied to large cities, such as Manchester, Greenwood 2543–2553. 2669, 2670. 2686–2688. 2703, 2704. 2757–2759. 2765–2767——Conclusion that voluntary action as regards early closing is inadequate, and that statutory and compulsory provisions are necessary, Jamieson 3178. 3229. 3316, 3317. 3337–3344——Impracticability of securing early closing save by legislation; witness approving generally of Sir John Lubbock's Bill, Robinson 3933–3937.

Improvement under the voluntary system as regards earlier closing in London, and the adoption of a weekly half-holiday; difficulty, however, in securing a general early closing, either under the voluntary system, or a compulsory system, Ling 4691–4709——Effect of a compulsory system in checking the operation of the voluntary system, Ling 4718; Cushen 4864–4866.

Grounds for denying that the system of voluntary early closing has proved a failure, Cushen 4751. 4784–4786. 4819, 4820. 4829—— Explanation that witness is and always has been in favour of earlier closing by voluntary action; illustrations to this effect, ib. 4867–4869. 4882–4889. 4906–4910. 4943–4952. 4980, 4981–4984. 4992.

W.

Ward, Leonard Edgar. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a tradesman for thirteen years, and is Honorary Secretary of the Tottenham and Edmonton Early Closing Association, 3043–3046. 3062-3064.

Information as to the great number of hours for which the shops are open, 3047—— Statement that the feeling of the small tradesmen is in favour of legislation, 3048, 3049. 3057. 3083——Approval of the proposed Bill by witness' Association subject to one or two conditions, 3050–3052——Suggestion that the Bill should not be revoked before the expiration of a fixed time, and that a majority of two-thirds should be necessary to revoke the Bill, 3052, 3053.

Desirability of bringing the tally-man under the operation of the Act, 3054, 3088–3090 — Conclusion that London should be separated into districts, 3058–3061. 3077–3082——Probability that 8.30 or 9 o'clock would be the hour chosen for closing, 3069-3082——Statement that the weekly half-holiday is not general, 3084, 3085. 3091–3094.

Weekly Hours. Desirability of inserting a clause in the Bill that would limit the weekly hours of the assistants, Cooney 725–728. 783–786. 909, 910.

See also Shop Hours Regulation Act. Time Limit.

Wilson, Hartley. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Witness is President of the Liverpool and District Grocers' Association, which represents nearly 400 shops, 4106. 4226–4228.

Varying hours in grocers' shops in Liverpool, in many districts the hours running up as high as from eighty-six to ninety weekly; long hours also in several other trades, chiefly on Fridays and Saturdays, 4107. 4155–4161. 4175–4177. 4232——Limited success of some vigorous efforts made by the assistants to obtain earlier closing voluntarily, 4108. 4233 —— General approval of the present Bill by the Association represented by witness, subject to certain amendments, 4109–4115——Several large demonstrations in Liverpool in favour of early closing, 4116. 4222–4231.

Conclusion that in Liverpool the public would not be inconvenienced under the Bill, and that it could be applied equally over the whole city as one area, 4117–4130. 4175–4188——Belief that a majority of two-thirds would work well, and that grocers and other tradesmen in the outlying districts would not be prejudiced by the action of the larger and more central tradesmen who now close earlier than the former, 4123–4140. 4175–4188. 4199–4202.

Advocacy of the Bill on the score both of health and recreation, 4141, 4142. 4172–4174. 4213–4215——Difficulty in classifying shops so as to apply different treatment to the smaller class; approval, however, by witness' Association of the exclusion of very small shops from the Bill, though this is not the view of witness, 4143–4164.

4143–4154. 4162–4171———Long hours in small shops in side streets and in the outskirts of the city even though the work may not be hard nor continuous; belief that as a body the small traders would readily come under the provisions of the Bill, 4189–4221.

Insufficiency, as regards shop assistants, of a limitation of the hours, as under the Shop Hours Regulation Act, 4205–4212——Opinion that there is no necessity, as regards the working classes, of shops being open on Saturdays till midnight; opinion that they should close at 10 or 10.30; 4234–4236.

Wootton, Alfred Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Editor of "The Chemist and Druggist" newspaper, 4395.

Detailed information respecting two circulars issued by witness with the view of obtaining the opinion of chemists respecting early closing; the majority were in favour of the Bill, 4396–4412. 4450–4461. 4509. 4530–4537——Belief that it will be impossible to carry out the clause relating to shops where two or more trades are carried on, 4414–4416.

Examination as to the working of the clause in the Bill permitting chemists to sell drugs, &c., after the shop is closed; opinion that it offers no practical difficulty, 4420–4449. 4465–4478———Grounds for the conclusion that the two-thirds majority in favour of compulsory closing will not be obtained in every district, 4479–4486.

Consideration of the question of areas; belief that difficulties will be presented, 4487–4506. 4538–4542———Approval of the suggestion to reconsider from time to time the decision of the locality in reference to early closing, 4507, 4508——Information respecting the long hours for which chemists' shops are open, 4509–4529.

Working Classes. See Public, The.

Y.

Yorkshire. Statement that the general feeling of the West Yorkshire Federated Chamber of Trade, represented by witness, has always been in favour of legislation, Day 1190, 1191———Detailed information respecting the holidays and hours of closing in Batley, Sheffield, Leeds, Huddersfield and other important centres in Yorkshire, ib. 1192–1218——Examination as to the lengthy hour worked by employés; acquiescence in the proposal to secure them a reasonable time for leisure, ib. 1256–1259. 1287–1295. 1309–1318.
